Living in the World  "Ajaan Mun once said, 'People are all alike, but not at all alike, but in the final analysis, all alike.' You hav think about this for a good while before you can understand what he was getting at."  "If y judge other people, judge them by their intentions."  "When you want to teach other peop you have to see how far their goodness can go. If you try to make them better than they can one who's being stupid."  "Nothing comes from focusing on the faults of others. You can by looking at your own faults instead."  "How good or bad other people are is their own b Focus on your own business instead."  One of Ajaan Fuang's students complained to hin problems she was facing at work. She wanted to quit and live quietly by herself, but circums allow it, because she had to provide for her mother. Ajaan Fuang told her, "If you have to live things, then find out how to live in a way that rises above them. That's the only way you'll be survive."  Advice for a student who was letting the pressure at work get her down: "When don't let the job do you."  Another one of Ajaan Fuang's students was having serious prob home and in her work, so he appealed to her fighting spirit: "Anyone who's a real, live perso meet up with real, live problems in life."  "When you meet with obstacles, you have to put If you give up easily, you'll end up giving up all your life long."  "Tell yourself you're made heartwood, and not out of sapwood."  One of Ajaan Fuang's students--a young nurse--ha being the brunt of a lot of gossip at work. At first she tried to ignore it, but as it happened mo more often, her patience began to wear thin. One day, when the gossip was really getting to meditate with Ajaan Fuang at Wat Makut. While meditating, she saw a vision of herself repe back to infinity, as if she were caught between two parallel mirrors. The thought occurred to many previous lives she had probably had to endure an untold amount of the same sort of g made her even more fed up with her situation. So when she left meditation she told Ajaan Fu she was of being gossiped about. He tried to console her, saying, "This sort of thing is part a the world, you know. Where there's praise, there also has to be criticism and gossip. When y why let yourself get involved?"Her mood was so strong, though, that she argued with him, "I involved with them, Than Phaw. They come and get involved with me!"So he turned the tabl don't you ask yourself--who asked you to butt in and be born here in the first place?"  "If t you're no good, remind yourself that their words go only as far as their lips. They've never re touched you at all."  "Other people criticize us and then forget all about it, but we take it a thinking about it. It's as if they spit out some food and we pick it up and eat it. When that's th who's being stupid?"  "Pretend you have stones weighing down your ears, so that you do away by everything you hear said."  One day Ajaan Fuang asked, as if out of the blue, "If clothing fell down into a cesspool, would you pick it back up again?"The woman he asked ha was getting at, but knew that if she wasn't careful about answering his questions, she'd com like a fool, so she hedged her answer: "It depends. If it was my only set of clothing, I'd have up. But if I had other sets, I'd probably let it go. What are you getting at, Than Phaw?""If you hear bad things about other people, then even though you have no part in the bad karma of still pick up some of the stench."  If any of his students were bearing a grudge about som would tell them: "You can't even sacrifice something as minor as this? Think of it as making Remember how many valuable things the Buddha sacrificed during his life as Prince Vessan yourself, 'This anger of mine has no value at all. Why can't I sacrifice it, too?'"  "Think firs before you act. Don't be the sort of person who acts first and then has to think about it afterw

 "Beware of fall-in-the-well kindness: the cases where you want to help other people, but i pulling them up, they pull you down.  "When people say something is good, it's their idea is it always what's really good for you?"  "If people hate you, that's when you're let off the
You can come and go as you like without having to worry about whether or not they'll miss y at your going. And you don't have to bring any presents for them when you come back. You' you like."  "Trying to win out over other people brings nothing but animosity and bad karm better to win out over yourself."  "Whatever you lose, let it be lost, but don't ever lose hea
 "If they take what's yours, tell yourself that you're making it a gift. Otherwise there will be to the animosity."  "Their taking what's yours is better than your taking what's theirs." ***
it's really yours, it'll have to stay with you, no matter what. If it's not really yours, why get all w up about it?"  "There's nothing wrong with being poor on the outside, but make sure you'r the inside. Make yourself rich in generosity, virtue and meditation--the treasures of the mind of Ajaan Fuang's students complained to him, "I look at other people and they seem to have life. Why is life so hard on me?" His answer: "You're 'hard life' is ten, twenty times 'the good lot of people. Why don't you look at the people who have a harder time than you do?"  So any of his students were facing hardships in life, Ajaan Fuang would teach them to remind th can I blame anyone else? Nobody ever hired me to be born. I came of my own free will." ***

that happens has its lifespan. It won't last forever. When its lifespan is up, it'll go away on its
 "To have a partner in life is to suffer. To have a good partner is really to suffer, because attachment."  "Sensual pleasure is like a drug: One taste and you get addicted. They say heroin it's hard to break the habit, but this is even worse. It goes deep, right into the bone. It made us get born in the first place, and has kept us circling through birth and death for aeon There's no medicine you can take to break the habit, to wash it out of your system, aside fro of the Buddha's teachings."  "When we see Hindus worshiping Siva lingas it looks strang actually everyone in the world worships the Siva linga--i.e. they worship sex, simply that the the only ones who are open about it. Sex is the creator of the world. The reason we're all bo we worship the Siva linga in our hearts."  Once, when one of Ajaan Fuang's students was by her parents to look for a husband so that she could settle down and have children, she as true what they say, that a woman gains a lot of merit in having a child, in that she gives som chance to be born?""If that were true," he answered her, "then dogs would get gobs of merit give birth to whole litters at a time."  He also told her, "Getting married is no way to esca suffering. Actually, all you do is pile more suffering on yourself. The Buddha taught that the are a heavy burden, but if you get married, all of a sudden you have ten to worry about, and and then twenty..."  "You have to be your own refuge. If you're the sort that has to take re other people, then you'll have to see things the same way they do, which means you have to same way they are. So pull yourself out of all that, and take a good look at yourself until thin within you."  "You may think, 'my child, my child,' but is it really yours? Even your own bo really yours."  One of Ajaan Fuang's students, when she was suffering a serious liver dis that she had died and gone to heaven. She took this as a bad omen, and so went to Wat Ma dream to Ajaan Fuang. He tried to console her, saying that it was really a good omen in disg survived the disease, she'd probably get a promotion at work. If she didn't, she'd be reborn i circumstances. As soon as he said this, though, she got very upset: "But I'm not ready to die told her, "when the time comes to go, you have to be willing to go. Life isn't a rubber band yo out or shrink as you like."  "If there are any sensual pleasures you really hunger for, it's a enjoyed them before in a previous life. That's why you miss them so much this time around.
about this long enough, it should be enough to make you dispassionate and dismayed."

The Celibate Life  "Some people say that monks don't do any work, but actually the worl your defilements is the most difficult work in the world. The work of the everyday world has i but our work doesn't have any time off at all. It's something you have to do 24 hours a day. S may feel you're not up to it, but still you have to do it. If you don't, who's going to do it for you your duty, and nobody else's. If you don't do it, what are you living off the donations of other for?"  "Whatever work you're doing, keep an eye on your mind. If you see that it's going o stop whatever you're doing and focus all your attention on it. The work of looking after your m always come first."  "The Buddha's Dhamma is akaliko--timeless. The reason we haven't is because we have lots of times: time for this, time for that, time to work, time to rest, time t time to sleep_Our whole life turns into times, and as a result they don't give us a chance to s clearly within ourselves. So we have to make our practice timeless. That's when the truth wi hearts."  Ajaan Fuang was very meticulous about keeping things clean and in their place students to be meticulous too, for that was the way he was taught by his teachers, and he kn benefitted from it. In his words, "If you can't master obvious things like this, how are you goin the subtle things, like the mind?"  The monk who attended to his needs--cleaning his hut, water for his bath, looking after him when he was sick, etc.--had to be very observant, for Aj the teacher-student relationship as an opportunity to teach by example. Instead of explaining should be placed or when certain duties should be done, he left it up to the student to obser

If he caught on, Ajaan Fuang wouldn't say anything. If he didn't, Ajaan Fuang would give hin down--but still wouldn't explain what was wrong. It was up to the student to figure things out
As Ajaan Fuang said, "If it gets to the point where I have to tell you, it shows that we're still strangers."  One evening, one of the monks at Wat Dhammasathit saw Ajaan Fuang wor up scraps of lumber around the chedi construction site and putting them in order. The monk him, and after a while asked him, "Than Phaw, this sort of work isn't something you should b
There are lots of other people. Why don't you get them to help?""I am getting other people to Fuang answered as he continued to pick up pieces of wood."Who?" the monk asked as he l no one else."You."  When I returned to Thailand in 1976 to be ordained, Ajaan Fuang ga warnings: 1) "Being a meditator isn't simply a matter of sitting with your eyes closed. You ha at everything you do."2) "If you want to learn, you have to think like a thief and figure out how your knowledge. What this means is that you can't just wait for the teacher to explain everyth to notice for yourself what he does, and why--for everything he does has its reason."  The of a monk to his supporters is something of a balancing act. One of Ajaan Fuang's favorite r monk disciples was, "Remember, nobody's hired you to become a monk. You haven't ordain servant." But if a monk complained that the monastery attendants weren't doing as they wer
"Did you ordain to have other people wait on you?"  "Our life depends on the support of o don't do anything that would weigh them down."  "Monks who eat the food that other peo then don't practice, can expect to be reborn as water buffaloes next time around, to till the fi off their debts."  "Don't think that the small disciplinary rules aren't important. As Ajaan M said, logs have never gotten into people's eyes, but fine sawdust can--and it can blind you." women are often upset when they learn that monks aren't allowed to touch them, and they u sign that Buddhism discriminates against women. But as Ajaan Fuang explained it, "The rea didn't allow monks to touch women is not that there's anything wrong with women. It's becau something wrong with the monks: They still have mental defilements, which is why they have control."  For anyone who tries to follow the celibate life, the opposite sex is the biggest t to leave the path. If Ajaan Fuang was teaching monks, he'd say, "Women are like vines. At f weak and soft, but if you let them grow on you, they curl up around you until they have you a finally bring you down."When teaching nuns, he'd warn them about men. Once a nun was th and returning home, knowing that her father would arrange a marriage for her. She asked A advice, and he told her, "Ask yourself. Do you want to live inside the noose or out?" As a res decided she'd rather stay out.  "If you find yourself thinking about sex, run your hand ove to remind yourself of who you are."  Ajaan Fuang had many stories to tell about his times Lee. One of my favorites was of the time a large group of Ajaan Lee's Bangkok students arra him on a meditation trip into the forest. They agreed to meet at Hua Lampong, the main train Bangkok, and take the train north to Lopburi. When the group assembled at the station, thou that many of them had each brought along at least two large suitcases of "necessities" for th even many of the monks from Bangkok monasteries had brought along large loads. On seei said nothing, but simply set out walking north along the railroad tracks. Since he was walkin to walk, although it wasn't long before the members of the group most burdened down bega Phaw, why are you making us walk? We've got so much heavy stuff to carry!"At first Ajaan L but finally told them, as he kept on walking, "If it's heavy, then why burden yourself with it?"

few moments for his message to sink in, but soon the dif-ferent members of the group had s their bags and throw everything unessential into the lotus ponds that lined either side of the tracks. When they reached the next train station, Ajaan Lee saw that they had trimmed dow enough that he could let them take the next train north.  "When you live in a monastery, p you're living alone: What this means is that once you've finished with the group activities--th chanting, the chores and so on--you don't have to get involved with anyone. Go back to you meditate."When you live alone, pretend that you're in a monastery: Set up a schedule and s
 When I went to Wat Asokaram--a very large monastery--for my first Rains Retreat, Ajaan
"If they ask you questions in Thai, answer in English. If they ask in English, answer in Thai. A they'll get tired to talking to you, and will leave you alone to meditate."  "It's good to live in monastery where not everyone is serious about the practice, because it teaches you to depe you lived only with people who were serious meditators, you'd get so that you wouldn't be ab anywhere else."  "We keep disagreeable people around the monastery as a way of testin defilements really are all gone."  "The purpose of adhering to the ascetic practices is to w your defilements. If you adhere to them with the thought of impressing other people, you'd d adhere to them at all."  On fasting as an aid to meditation: "For some people it works, for works just the opposite--the more they fast, the stronger their defilements get. It's not the ca you starve the body you starve the defilements, because defilements don't come from the bo the mind."  "There's a passage where the Buddha asks, 'Days and nights pass by, pass b doing right now?' So what answer do you have for him?"  "If you go teaching others befo practice is up to standard, you do more harm than good."  "Training a meditator is like tra boxer: You pull your punches and don't hit him any harder than he can take. But when he co he gives it everything he's got."  The first time I was going to give a sermon, Ajaan Fuang "Pretend you have a sword in your hand. If any people in the audience think critical thoughts off their heads."  When I first went to Wat Dhammasathit, the trip from Bangkok was an a since the roads were much worse and more roundabout than now. One evening a woman re all the way from Bangkok to get Ajaan Fuang's advice on the problems she was having in he a couple of hours of consultation she took the cab all the way back. After she left, he said to one good thing about living way out here: If we were living near Bangkok, people with a lot o their hands and no idea of how to spend it would come and waste our time chatting all day. I people make the effort to come out, it shows that they really want our help. And no matter ho takes to talk things over with them, it's no waste of time at all."  "When people come to se have them sit and meditate first so that they know how to make their minds quiet. Only then bring up any other problems they may want to talk about. If you try discussing things with the minds aren't quiet, there's no way they'll understand."  "If people get it into their heads tha they're enlightened when they aren't, then you shouldn't waste any breath on trying to straig

If they don't have faith in you 100%, then the more you try to reason with them, the more the their opinions. If they do have faith in you, then all it takes is one sentence or two and they'll their senses."  Once the father of one of the monks living with Ajaan Fuang wrote his son asking him to disrobe, return home, continue his studies, get a job, start a family, and have a happy life like everyone else in the world. The monk mentioned this to Ajaan Fuang, who sa kind of happiness is something special, but look at it--what kind of happiness is it, really? Ju old smelly stuff you left when you ordained. Isn't there any happiness better than that?"

Meditation  Many were the times when people would tell Ajaan Fuang that--with all the work and responsibilities they had in their lives--they had no time to
And many were the times he'd respond, "And you think you'll have time after you're dead?"
have to study is the meditation-word, buddho. As for any other fields you might study, they n end, and can't take you beyond suffering. But once you're come to the end of buddho, that's to true happiness."  "When the mind's not quiet--that's when its poor and burdened with o
It takes molehills and turns them into mountains. But when the mind is quiet, there's no suffe there's nothing at all. No mountains at all. When there's a lot to the mind, it's simply a lot of defilement, making it suffer."  "If you're single-minded about whatever you think of doing, to succeed."  "When you're thinking buddho you don't have to wonder about whether or n in your meditation. If you put your mind to it, you're sure to do well. The things that come to o are simply the forces of temptation, come to put on a play. Whatever the play, all you have t watch--you don't have to get on stage with them."  "What's really essential is that you brin views in line with the truth. Once your views are right, the mind will immediately come to rest views are wrong, everything is immediately wrong. All the things you need for the practice--t mind--are already there. So try to bring your views in line with the breath, and you won't hav of force in your meditation. The mind will settle down and come to rest right away."  "The like a king. Its moods are like his ministers. Don't be a king who's easily swayed by his court group of laypeople who had studied the Abhidhamma together came to Ajaan Fuang to try o mental training, but when he told them to sit, close their eyes and focus on the breath, they i backed off, saying that they didn't want to practice concentration, for fear that they'd get stuc and end up being reborn in the Brahma worlds. He responded, "What's there to be afraid of?

Non-returners are reborn in the Brahma worlds. At any rate, being reborn in the Brahma wor being reborn as a dog."  When Ajaan Fuang taught meditation, he didn't like to map thing advance. As soon as he had explained the beginning steps, he'd have the student start sittir presence, and then take the steps back home to work on there. If anything came up in the c practice, he'd explain how to deal with it and then go on to the next step.Once a layman who than his share of meditation teachers came to discuss the Dhamma with Ajaan Fuang, askir of an advanced nature as a way of testing his level of attainment. Ajaan Fuang asked him in you had these experiences in your own meditation yet?""No, not yet.""Then in that case I'd r discuss them, because if we discuss them when they're not yet a reality for you, they'll just b and not the real Dhamma."  One meditator noticed that his practice under Ajaan Fuang w progress, and so he asked what the next step would be. "I'm not going to tell you," Ajaan Fu
"Otherwise you'll become the sort of amazing marvel who knows everything before he meets masters everything before he's tried his hand. Just keep practicing and you'll find out on you
"You can't plan the way your practice is going to go. The mind has its own steps and stages let the practice follow in line with them. That's the only way you'll get genuine results. Otherw turn into a half-baked arahant."  "Don't make a journal of your meditation experiences. If you'll start meditating in order to have this or that thing happen, so that you can write it down journal. And as a result, you'll end up with nothing but the things you've fabricated."  Som are afraid to meditate too seriously, for fear that they'll go crazy, but as Ajaan Fuang once sa have to be crazy about meditation if you want to meditate well. And as for whatever problem are always ways to solve them. What's really scary is if you don't meditate enough for the pr out in the open in the first place."  "Other people can teach you only the outer skin, but as lies deeper inside, only you can lay down the law for yourself. You have to draw the line, bei keeping track of what you do at all times. It's like having a teacher following you around, in p private, keeping watch over you, telling you what to do and what not to do, making sure that line. If you don't have this sort of teacher inside you, the mind is bound to stray off the path a into mischief, shoplifting all over town."  "Persistence comes from conviction, discernmen mindful."  "Persistence in the practice is a matter of the mind, and not of your posture. In words, whatever you do, keep your mindfulness constant and don't let it lapse. No matter wh make sure the mind sticks with its meditation work."  "When you start out sitting in medita takes a long time for the mind to settle down, but as soon as the session is over you get righ it away. It's like climbing a ladder slowly, step by step, to the second floor, and then jumping window."  A woman army officer sat in meditation with Ajaan Fuang at Wat Makut until it mind was especially blissful and bright. But when she returned home, instead of trying to ma state of mind, she sat around listening to a friend's woes until she herself started feeling dep

A few days later she returned to Wat Makut and told Ajaan Fuang what had happened. He r gold and traded it in for excrement."  Another student disappeared for several months, ar return told Ajaan Fuang, "The reason I didn't show up is that my boss sent me to night scho semester, so I didn't have any time to meditate at all. But now that the course is over, I don't anything but meditate--no work, no study, just let the mind be still."She thought he'd be plea how intent she still was on meditating, but he disappointed her. "So you don't want to work-- defilement, isn't it? Whoever said that people can't work and meditate at the same time?" **
isn't a matter of making the mind empty, you know. The mind has to have work to do. If you then anything--good or bad--can pop into it. It's like leaving the front door to your home oper all can come strolling right in."  A young nurse practiced meditation with Ajaan Fuang sev running, and finally asked him one day, "Why wasn't today's session as good as yesterday's "Meditating is like wearing clothes. Today you wear white, tomorrow red, yellow, blue, whate keep changing. You can't wear the same set of clothes all the time. So whatever color you're be aware of it. Don't get depressed or excited about it."  A few months later the same nur sitting in meditation when a sense of peace and clarity in her mind became so intense that s would never have a bad mood infiltrate her mind again. But sure enough, bad moods eventu before. When she mentioned this to Ajaan Fuang, he said, "Looking after the mind is like rai
There will have to be bad days along with the good. If you want only the good, you're in for t have to play neutral: Don't fall in with the good or the bad."  "When the meditation goes w get excited. When it doesn't go well, don't get depressed. Simply be observant to see why it' it's bad. If you can be observant like this, it won't be long before your meditation becomes a
 "Everything depends on your powers of observation. If they're crude and sloppy, you'll ge crude and sloppy results. And your meditation will have no hope of making progress."  O woman was sitting in meditation with Ajaan Fuang and everything seemed to go well. Her m relaxed, and she could contemplate the elements in her body as he told her, step by step, w all. But the next day, nothing went right. After the session was over, he asked her, "How did She answered, "Yesterday I felt as if I were smart, today I feel like I'm stupid."So he asked h
"Are the smart person and the stupid person the same person or not?"  A student came t Ajaan Fuang that she had been meditating for years, and still hadn't gotten anything out of it immediate response: "You don't meditate to 'get' anything. You meditate to let go."  The after practicing meditation with Ajaan Fuang for several months, told him that her mind seem mess than it was before she began meditating. "Of course it does," he told her. "It's like your you polish the floor every day, you won't be able to stand the least little bit of dust on it. The the house, the more easily you'll see the dirt. If you don't keep polishing the mind, you can le and sleep in the mud without any qualms at all. But once you get it to sleep on a polished flo there's even a speck of dust, you'll have to sweep it away. You won't be able to stand the m you get excited by other people's experiences in meditation, it's like getting excited by other wealth. And what do you gain from that? Pay attention to developing your own wealth instea will and compassion, if they aren't backed up by equanimity, can cause you to suffer. That's the equanimity of jhana to perfect them."  "Your concentration has to be Right Concentra right, on an even keel, all the time. Whatever you do--sitting, standing, walking, lying down-- have any ups and downs."  "Concentration: You have to learn how to do it, how to mainta to put it to use."  "Once you catch hold of the mind, it'll stay in the present, without slippi to the past or future. That's when you'll be able to make it do whatever you want."  "Wher that you catch on to the meditation, it's like a kite that finally catches the wind. It won't want t down."  One evening, after a work party at Wat Dhammasathit, Ajaan Fuang took his lay the chedi to meditate. One woman in the group felt completely exhausted from all the work, meditation anyway, out of deference to him. As she sat there, her awareness got weaker an and smaller, to the point where she thought she was going to die. Ajaan Fuang happened to said, "There's no need to be afraid of death. You die with every in and out breath."This gave strength to fight off her exhaustion, and to continue meditating.  "To meditate is to practic so that you'll be able to do it right."

Breathing  When my father came for a visit to Wat Dhammasathit, I got him to sit and meditate with Ajaan Fuang, while I acted as interpre starting, my father asked if his being a Christian would be an obstacle to the meditation. Aja assured him that it wouldn't: "We're going to focus on the breath. The breath doesn't belong Christianity or anyone else. It's common property all over the world, and everyone has the ri it. So try looking at the breath until you can see your own mind and know your own mind. Th of what religion you belong to won't be an issue, because we can talk about the mind instea religions. This way we can understand each other."  "When you do anything in meditatio the breath, for that's the basis of the entire skill we're developing."  "Catching the mind is catching eels. If you simply jump down into the mud and try to grab hold of them, they'll slip which way. You have to find something they like--like when people take a dead dog, put it in and then bury it in the mud. In no time at all the eels come swimming into the jar of their own feed off the dog, and then all you have to do it put your hand over the mouth of the jar and th You've got your eels."It's the same with the mind. You have to find something it likes, so ma as comfortable as you can, to the point where it feels good throughout the whole body. The comfort, so it'll come of its own free will, and then it's easy to catch hold of it."  "You have know the breath at all times, and then happi-ness will be yours. The human state, the heave nibbana are all here in the breath. If you get carried away with other things, happiness will s your fingers, so you have to learn how to observe the in-and-out breath at all times. Pay atte it's getting along--don't leave it to fend for itself. When you know its way of life--sitting, stand walking, everything--then you can get what you want from it. The body will be light, the mind at all times."  "The breath can take you all the way to nibbana, you know."  "The first s simply to look at the breath as it is. You don't have to go fiddling around with it a lot. Just thi with the in-breath, and dho with the out. Bud- in, dho out. Don't force the breath, or force the trance. Simply hold the mind carefully right there with each breath."  "How do you use yo observation to get acquainted with the breath? Ask yourself: Do you know the breath? Is the you can't see whether the breath is for real, look further in until it's clearly there. There's no g mystery to it. It's always real, right there. The important thing is whether or not you're for rea are, then simply keep at it. That's all there is to it. Simply keep being real, being true in what and your meditation will make progress. It'll gradually grow stronger, and the mind will grow clear about what you're doing. Don't have any doubts. If you can doubt even your own breat no two ways about it: You'll doubt everything. No matter what happens, you'll be uncertain a straightforward and true in whatever you do, for everything comes down to whether or not yo "Once the mind stays with the breath, you don't have to repeat buddho in the mind. It's like o water buffalo. Once it comes, why keep calling its name?"  "Make the mind and the breat same. Don't let them be two."  "Don't be a post planted in the mud. Have you ever seen a in the mud? It sways back and forth and can never stand firm. Whatever you do, be firm and about it. Like when you focus on the breath: Make the mind one with it, like a post planted fi rock."  "Hold onto the breath the way a red ant bites: Even if you pull its body so that it se from the head, the head will keep on biting and won't let go."  When I first heard Ajaan Fu about "catching hold" of the breath, I didn't understand him. I'd sit tensing up my body to cat it, but this simply made me feel tired and ill at ease. Then one day, as I was riding the bus to I sat in concentration and found that if I let the breath follow its natural course, it felt a lot mo comfortable, and the mind wouldn't run away from it. When I reached Wat Makut, being a typ took him to task, "Why do you say to catch the breath? The more you catch it, the more unc

You have to let it go to flow naturally."He laughed and said, "That isn't what I meant. To 'cat to stick with it, to follow it and to make sure you don't wander away from it. You don't have to force or control it. Whatever it's like, just keep on watching it."  "Get so that you really kno breath, not just that you're simply aware of it."  "Observing the breath is the cause, the pl that arises is the result. Focus as much as you can on the cause. If you ignore the cause an away with the result, it'll run out and you'll end up with nothing at all."  "When you focus o breath, measure things by how much pleasure you feel. If both the breath and the mind feel doing okay. If either the breath or the mind feels uncomfortable, that's when you have to ma adjustments."  "The main thing when you meditate is to be observant. If you feel ill at eas the breath until you feel better. If the body feels heavy, think of spreading the breath so that light. Tell yourself that the breath can come in and out every pore of your skin."  "When th says to focus on the breath sensations in the different parts of the body, it means to focus on feelings are already there in the body."  "The breath can be a resting place for the mind, be what the mind actively contemplates. When the mind isn't willing to settle down and be st that it wants exercise. So we give it work to do. We make it scan the body and contemplate sensations in the different parts to see how they're related to the in-and-out breath, to see w energy flows smoothly and where it's blocked. But make sure that your mind doesn't wander body. Keep it circling around inside and don't let it stop until it gets tired. Once it's tired you c a place for it to rest, and it'll stay there without your having to force it."  "Make the breath viscous and then think of it exploding to fill the whole body."  Ajaan Fuang once told a stu liked to keep in shape with yoga and aerobic exercises every day: "Use the breath to keep in Sit in meditation and spread the breath throughout the body, to every part. The mind will get the body will be strong with no need to tie it into knots or make it jump around ."  A nun w practiced meditation with Ajaan Fuang had had poor health since she was a child, and was a with one disease or another. Ajaan Fuang told her: "Every morning when you wake up, sit a yourself a physical examination, to see where the aches and pains are, and then use your b them. The heavy pains will grow lighter; the light ones will disappear. But don't make a big d whether or not they disappear. Keep on examining the body and dealing with the breath no happens, because the important point is that you're training your mindful-ness to stay with th point where it's strong enough to go above and beyond pain."  "Adjust the breath until it's even. If you see a white light, bring it into the body and let it explode out to every pore. The be still; the body weightless. You'll feel white and bright all over, and your heart will be at eas

 "When the breath fills the body, it's like water filling a jar to the brim. Even though you ma pour more into it, that's all it can take. It's just right, in and of itself."  "Meditation needs rapture--a feeling of fullness in body and mind--as its lubricant. Otherwise it gets too dry." **
you meditate you have to let go in stages. Like when they go into outer space: The space ca go of the booster rockets before it can reach the moon."  "When the mind is really in plac go of the breath, and it won't wander off anywhere. It's like pouring cement: If the cement ha can't remove the plywood forms, but once it's set, it'll stay where it is without any need for th all."  "Spread the breath until the body and mind are so light that there's no sense of body all--just awareness itself. The mind will be clear like crystal clean water. You can look down water and see your own face. You'll be able to see what's going on in your mind."  "When full and still, you let go of it. Then you think of each of the other elements in the body--fire, w earth--one by one. When they're all clear you put them together, i.e. balance them so that th too hot, too cold, too heavy too light: just right in every way. Now you let go of that and stay space element--a feeling of emptiness. When you're skilled at staying with space, look at wh "space". This is where you turn to look at awareness itself, the element of consciousness. O become one like this, you can then let go of the oneness, and see what's left. "After you can practice going in and out of the various stages until you're skilled at it, and you can notice th modes of the mind as you do it. That's where discernment will begin to appear."  "In cont yourself, the six elements have to come first. You take them apart and put them back togeth you learn your ABC's and how to make them into words. After a while you can make any wo "Take your time to make sure that this foundation is solid. Once it's solid, then no matter how you want to build on top of it, they'll go up quickly and stay in place."  "If you were to say easy, well yes, it's easy. If you were to say it's hard, it's hard. It all depends on you."  "Th basic steps of breath meditation that Ajaan Lee describes in his Method 2 are just the main practice. As for the details, you have to use your own ingenuity to work variations on his out it fits your experiences. That's when you'll get results."  "If you're having any problems in concentration, check what you're doing against the seven steps in Method 2. I've found that to me with problems in their concentration, all I have to do is apply one of the seven steps. T to all meditation."  "The texts say that breath meditation is right for everyone, but that's n really the case. Only if you're meticulous can you get results from focusing on the breath." *

famous meditation teacher once criticized Ajaan Lee: 'Why do you teach people to look at th there to look at? There's just in and out. How are they going to gain discernment from lookin that?' He answered, 'If that's all they see, that's all they'll get.' This is a question that comes knowing how to look."  "People of discernment can take anything at all and put it to good

Visions & Signs  One year--when Ajaan Fuang was seeing a Chinese doctor in Bangkok for his skin disease and s Asokaram--a group of nuns and laypeople came to practice meditation with him every night.

the group would report having this or that vision in the course of their meditation, and finally nuns complained: "I know that my mind isn't slipping off anywhere; it's staying right with the
the time, so why aren't I having any visions like everyone else?"Ajaan Fuang answered her, lucky you are? With people who have visions, this, that and the other thing is always coming interfere. But you don't have any old karma to get in the way of your meditation, so you can on the mind without having to get involved with any outside things at all."  "Don't be amaz with visions. Visions are nothing else but dreams. There are true ones and false ones. You c trust them."  A Bangkok housewife who was practicing meditation with Ajaan Fuang hear other students say that meditation without visions was the straight path. It so happened that frequent visions in her meditation, and so hearing this made her wonder why her path was s convoluted. When she asked Ajaan Fuang about this, he told her: "Having visions in your m having lots of lush wild greens growing along the side of your path. You can gather them as that you'll have something to eat along the way, and you'll reach the end of the path just like else. As for other people, they might see the greens without gathering them, or may not eve all--because their path goes through arid land."  "People who practice concentration fall i groups: those who have signs via the eyes when their minds settle down, and those who ha body. People in the first group are the ones who see visions of people, animals, whatever. T second group don't have visions, but when their minds settle down, their bodies will feel unu light, large or small, etc. When these people focus on the elements in their body, they'll notic feelings: warmth, coolness, heaviness, spaciousness and so forth. "If I'm teaching people lik meditate, I don't have to worry about them too much, because there aren't many dangers in from the danger of their getting discouraged because they don't see anything happening in t
The ones I worry about are those in the first group, because they have lots of dangers. Thei lead them to jump to all sorts of false conclusions. If they don't learn the right way to deal wi visions, they'll get stuck on them and never be able to reach any higher level than that." ***

"Visions--or whatever things appear in the course of you meditation: It's not the case that yo pay any attention to them, for some kinds of visions have important messages. So when thin appear, you have to look into how they're appearing, why they're appearing, and for what pu
"People who have visions have a double-edged sword in their hands, so they have to be car that appear have their uses and their dangers. So learn how to squeeze out their uses and l behind."  Usually if any of Ajaan Fuang's students saw a vision of their own body in medi have them divide it up in the vision into the four elements--earth, water, wind and fire--or into basic parts, and then set fire to it until it was nothing but ashes. If the same vision reappeare have them deal with it the same way again until they were quick at it.One of his students, a n practicing this sort of meditation every day, but as soon as she had divided the body into its was getting ready to set fire to it, another image of her body would appear right next to the fi as she was getting ready to cremate the second one, another one would appear right next to another and another, like fish lined up on a platter waiting to be grilled. As she looked at the fed up with the idea of continuing, but when she mentioned this to Ajaan Fuang, he told her, purpose in doing this is to get fed up, but not fed up with the doing."  Another technique A taught for dealing with an image of one's own body would be to focus on what it looked like t in the womb, the second week, the third and so on to the day of birth; then the first month af second month, the first year, the second year and so on up until old age and death. One wo this technique, but it seemed too slow to her, so she focused on five- and ten-year intervals Ajaan Fuang found out, he told her, "You're skipping over all the important parts," and then n set of rules: "Think of your head and then think of pulling out one hair at a time and placing i palm of your hand. See how much you can pull out, and then replant it one hair at a time. If y finished, don't leave your meditation until you do. If you want to pull it out in bunches, okay, have to replant it one hair at a time. You have to go into the details like this if you want to ga anything good from it."  One of Ajaan Fuang's students asked him, "Why is it that the intu from my concentration come in such short flashes, without letting me catch the whole picture
"When they put a record on a record player, the needle has to keep bearing down continuall to hear the whole story. If you don't keep bearing down, how can you expect to know anythin Another student was sitting in meditation with Ajaan Fuang when she saw an image of a dea concentration, asking for a share of some of the merit from her practice. This made her feel told Ajaan Fuang, "There's a ghost in front of me, Than Phaw.""That's not a ghost," he respo person.""No, it's really a ghost," she insisted."If that's a ghost," he said, "then you're a ghost.
see it as a person, then you can be a person, too."  After that he told her to spread thoug loving kindness if she saw anything like that again, and the image would go away. So from t that's what she'd do, at the drop of a hat, the minute she saw an image of a dead person in When Ajaan Fuang found out about this, he taught her, "Wait a minute. Don't be in such a h them. First look at what condition they're in and then ask them what karma they did to becom you do this, you'll begin to gain some insight into the Dhamma."  Several weeks later she of an emaciated woman holding a tiny child. The woman was wearing nothing but dirty rags, crying without stop. The student asked the woman in her vision what she had done to be so answer was that she had tried to have an abortion, but both she and the child had died as a this, the student couldn't help feeling sorry for them, but no matter how much she spread tho kindness to them, it didn't seem to help them at all, because their karma was so heavy.This so she told Ajaan Fuang. He replied, "Whether or not they can receive your help is their bus of yours. Different people have different karma, and some are beyond help for the time bein you can, but you don't have to go back and make an official survey of how things turned out and leave it at that. They ask for help, you give them what you can. They appear for you to s you'll learn more about the results of karma. That's enough. Once you're finished, go back to

  She kept following Ajaan Fuang's instructions until one day it occurred to her, "If I keep g giving, giving like this, will I have anything left for myself?" When she told her doubts to Ajaa gave her a blank look for a second and then said, "Boy, you really can be narrow-hearted wh be, can't you?" Then he explained: "Loving kindness isn't a thing, like money, that the more less you have. It's more like having a lit candle in your hand. This person asks to light his ca yours, that person asks to light hers. The more candles you light, the brighter it is for everyone--including you."  Time passed and one day she had a vision of a dead man ask his children and grandchildren to make merit in such and such a way and to dedicate it to hi meditation, she asked permission to go inform the dead man's children, but Ajaan Fuang sa You're not a mailman. Even if you were, he doesn't have any money to pay your wages. Wh you going to give them that what you say is true? If they believe you, you're going to get car think that you're some special kind of psychic. Everywhere you go, you'll keep smiling this lit yourself. And if they don't believe you, you know what they'll say, don't you?""What, Than Ph say that you're crazy."  "There are true visions and false visions. So whenever you see o still and watch it. Don't get pulled into following it."  "You should watch visions the same w watch TV: Just watch it, without getting pulled inside the tube."  Some of Ajaan Fuang's s would have visions of them-selves or their friends in previous lifetimes and get all excited ab saw. When they'd report their visions to Ajaan Fuang, he'd warn them, "You aren't still wrapp past, are you? You're foolish if you are. You've been born and died countless aeons. If you t of all your past bodies and piled them up, they'd be taller than Mount Sumeru. The water in a is less than the water of the tears you've shed over all the sufferings, big and small, you've b
If you reflect on this with real discernment, you'll feel disenchanted with states of being, and take pleasure in birth. Your mind will aim straight for nibbana."  In 1976 Ajaan Fuang gain numbers of new students. One of them wondered why this was the case, and so asked hers meditation. The answer came to her that Ajaan Fuang had had many children in a previous they had been reborn as his students.When she left meditation, she asked him why this was he'd tell her that he had once been a king with a large harem, but instead he said, "I was pro

in the sea, laying who knows how many eggs at a time."  One evening a school teacher v home and began remembering her previous lives all the way back to the time of King Asoka saw King Asoka beating her father mercilessly over a trivial infraction of palace etiquette. Th morning she went to tell Ajaan Fuang about her vision, and it was obvious that she was still King Asoka for what she had seen him do.Ajaan Fuang didn't affirm or deny the truth of her he spoke to her anger in the present, "Here you've been carrying this grudge for over 2,000 is it getting you? Go ask forgiveness of him in your mind and have done with it."  "It's goo people can't remember their previous lives. Otherwise things would be a lot more complicate already are."  One woman, who at that point wasn't yet a student of Ajaan Fuang, was pr meditation at home on her own when she had a vision of a sentence--somewhat like Pali, bu quite--appearing in her meditation. So she copied it down and went from wat to wat, asking translate it for her. No one could until she met one monk who told her that it was in arahant l only an arahant could understand what it said. Then he had the gall to translate it for her, aft told her to bring him any other sentences she got from her visions, and he'd translate them, completely convinced of what he had said, and happened to mention it to Ajaan Fuang when His response: "What? Arahant language? The minds of arahants are above and beyond con language would a mind like that have?"  "People for the most part don't like the truth. The make-believe instead."  There were occasions when some of Ajaan Fuang's students wo of one sort or another in their visions, get carried away with it, and yet he wouldn't take them
One day the seamstress asked him why he didn't warn such people that their practice was g and he told her, "You have to look at how mature they are. If they're really adults, you can te straight out. If their minds are still infants, you have to let them play for a while, like a child w new toy. If you're too harsh with them, they might get discouraged and give up completely. A mature they're sure to start seeing for themselves what's proper and what's not."  "Don't anything to do with the past or the future. Just stay with the present--that's enough. And eve that's where you're supposed to stay, you're not supposed to latch onto it. So why do think y on to things where you're not even supposed to stay?"  "You know that you shouldn't bel own visions, so why go believing the visions of others?"  "If you can't let go of your vision never gain release."  One of Ajaan Fuang's students asked him, "When you see somethi how can you know whether it's true or false?"His answer: "Even when it's true, it's true only i convention. You have to get your mind beyond both true and false."  "The purpose of the make the heart pure. All these other things are just games and entertainment."

Right at Awareness  "Whatever you experience, simply be aware of it. You don't have to take after it. The primal heart has no characteristics of everything. But as soon as things make contact, within or without, they cause a lapse in m that we let go of awareness, forget awareness in and of itself, and take on all the characteris things that come later. Then we act out in line with them--becoming happy, sad or whatever.
this way is because we take conventional truths and latch on to them tight. If we don't want t their influence, we'll have to stay with primal awareness at all times. This requires a great de mindfulness."  One of Ajaan Fuang's students was feeling mistreated by the world, and s for consolation. He told her, "What's there to feel mistreated about? You're the one that's sw events that have hit you, that's all. Contemplate what's happening and you'll see that the mi separate. Events come passing in and then go passing by. So why be influenced by them? I at the simple awareness that these things come and soon they'll be gone, so why follow the really, is yours? When you die, you won't be able to take any of these things with you, so wh wanting anything? There's nothing you have to want at all. Make your mind quiet. Make it or to concern yourself with your own attainments or those of other people. Simply be aware. Th

 "Whenever anything hits you, let it go only as far as 'aware'. Don't let it go all the way into heart."  "All you need to do is keep your sense of simple awareness solid and strong, and be able to overwhelm you."  "Stay with awareness itself at all times--except when you sle minute you wake up, stay right at awareness, and it won't be long before discernment arises woman who practiced meditation with Ajaan Fuang came to feel that she had split into two p acting, and one watching. She felt this way both while sitting in meditation and while she wa point where she didn't feel like sitting in meditation at all, because she felt that sitting and no were in no way different. She asked him about this, and he told her, "If you don't want to, yo to sit. Just keep this sense of 'the watcher' going at all times. Sitting with your eyes closed is external convention. Just keep watching. When the mind and the body become separate like can't press on the mind. If the body presses on the mind, the mind will have to be under the what goes on in the body."  "Right awareness has to be paired with the breath."  "To b means to be aware as soon as defilement arises, to see defilement and not act under its pow
"There's no past here, and no future, only the present. No man, no woman, no sign of any ki There's nothing, not even self. What self there is, is only in a conventional sense."  "Once is solid, you have to get above and beyond it."  In 1978, one of Ajaan Fuang's students h Hong Kong, and so he set up a small meditation center there. In one of his letters he asked write out a short outline of the main points of the practice, and this was the answer he receiv on all six of the elements: earth, water, wind, fire, space and consciousness. When you're a each of them, meld them into one, and focus on them until they grow stable and strong. You gather together until both the body and the mind feel full. When the physical elements are ba harmony, they'll grow full, and the mind will let go of them on its own and turn to oneness. Th will be one, the mind will be one. So now you turn your attention to the mind. Focus on the m become fully aware of it. Then let go of that awareness, together with whatever knowledge y there won't be anything left. Let go even of the events in the present that you're aware of. Th intuitive discernment will arise, and meditation comes to an end."  One night Ajaan Fuang of his students up to sit in meditation at the chedi on top of the hill in Wat Dhammasathit. Lo the south, in the inky darkness, they could see the bright lights of the fishing boats far out at commented, "When you're up on a high place like this, you can see every-thing." For one wo this had special meaning, because she knew he wasn't referring just to the view from the hil

Contemplation  "Everything that happens to you has its causes. Once you contemplate it skillfully until you know its caus able to get past it."  "Our defilements have made us suffer enough already. Now it's our t them suffer."  There are two kinds of people: those who like to think and those who don't.

who don't like to think start meditating, you have to force them to contemplate things. If you them, they'll simply get stuck like a stump in concen-tration, and won't get anywhere at all. A who like to think, they really have to use force to get their minds to settle down. But once the mastered concentration, you don't have to force them to contemplate. Whatever strikes the to contemplate it right away."  "The discernment that can let go of defilement is a special discernment, not ordinary discernment. It needs concentration as its basis if it's going to let "For insight to arise, you have to use your own strategies. You can't use other people's strat expect to get the same results they did."  "When insights arise, don't try to remember the they're real insights, they'll stay with you. If you try to memorize them, they'll turn into labels concepts, and will get in the way of new insights arising."  A meditator in Singapore once letter to Ajaan Fuang, describing how he applied the Buddha's teachings to everyday life: W focused on, he would try to see it as inconstant, stressful and not self. Ajaan Fuang had me in response, saying, "Do things ever say that they're inconstant, stressful and not self? They so don't go faulting them that way. Focus on what labels them, for that's where the fault lies.
"Even though your views may be right, if you cling to them you're wrong."  The wife of a lieutenant was meditating at home when suddenly she had an urge to give Ajaan Fuang a g
No matter how much she tried to drive the thought out of her mind, she couldn't. Several day to ask his forgiveness, and he told her, "The mind can think good thoughts, so why can't it th thoughts? Whatever it's thinking, just watch it--but if the thoughts are bad, make sure you do line with them."  A high school student once said that in practicing meditation, if his mind good thoughts he'd let them pass, but if it thought bad thoughts he'd put a stop to them right Fuang told him, "Just watch them. See who it is that's thinking good thoughts and bad thoug thoughts and bad thoughts will disappear on their own, because they fall under the Three Cl inconstancy, stress and not-self."  "If the mind is going to think, let it think, but don't fall fo its thoughts."  "The defilements are like duckweed. You have to keep pushing them out o that you can see the clear water underneath. If you don't keep pushing them aside, they'll m the water again--but at least you know that the water underneath them is clear."  A woma Ajaan Fuang that she had been meditating for a long time but still couldn't cut any of her def laughed and said, "You don't have to cut them. Do you think you can? The defilements were this world long before you came. You were the one who came looking for them. Whether or exist on their own. And who says that they're defilements? Have they ever told you their nam go their own way. So try to get acquainted with them. See both their good and their bad side day Ajaan Fuang was explaining to a new student how to watch the arising and passing awa defilements. It so happened that she was a veteran reader of many Dhamma books, so she "Instead of just looking at them this way, shouldn't I try to uproot them?""If all you can think o uprooting them," he replied, "their fruit just might fall on the ground and start growing again."

of Ajaan Fuang's students told him that she had reached the point in her meditation where s indifferent to everything she encountered. He warned her, "Sure, you can be indifferent as lo run into anything that goes straight to the heart."  "Everyone lives with suffering, suffering suffering, but they don't comprehend suffering, which is why they can't free themselves from "Those who know don't suffer. Those who don't know are the ones who suffer. There's suffe life--as long as there are the five khandhas, there has to be suffering--but if you really come can live in ease."  "When you're sick you have a golden opportunity. You can contemplat that arise from your illness. Don't simply lie there. Meditate at the same time. Contemplate th the pains as they arise. Don't let the mind fall in with them."  One of Ajaan Fuang's stude taking cobalt treatments for cancer until she developed an allergic reaction to the anesthe-si were at a loss as to what to do, so she suggested that they try the treatment without the ane first they were reluctant to do so, but when she assured them that she could use the power o to withstand the pain, they finally agreed to give it a try. After the treatment Ajaan Fuang visi the hospital. She told him that she had been able to concentrate her mind so as to endure th had left her exhausted. He advised her: "You can use the power of concentration to fight off squanders your energy. You have to approach the pain with discernment, to see that it's not yours. Your aware-ness is one thing, the pain is something separate. When you can see it in will be easier."  Several months later the same woman went to hear a famous Bangkok m on the cycle of life, death and rebirth as an ocean of suffering. It had a profound effect on he afterwards she went to visit Ajaan Fuang and told him about it. As she was speaking, the im struck her as so overwhelming that tears came to her eyes, so he said, "Now that you know don't you just cross over to the other side?" That was enough to stop her tears.  "The Bu teach us to cure our pains. He taught us to comprehend them."  "It's true that illness can obstacle to your meditation, but if you're intelligent enough to take illness as your teacher, yo that the body is a nest of illnesses, and that you shouldn't cling to it as yours. You can then u attachments that are concerned about the body--because nothing in it is yours at all. It's sim you to use to make good karma and pay off your old bad karma debts as you are able." ***
on seeing pain and stress, you have to get to the subtle levels--to the point where you see th arises the instant you open your eyes and see things."  Advice for a woman who had to li illness after another: "Use your mindfulness to contemplate the body until you can visualize falling down in a heap, and you can set them on fire until there's nothing left. Then ask yours your self? Then why does it make you suffer and feel pain? Is there any 'you' in there? Keep you reach the true core of the Dhamma--until there's nothing of yours at all. The mind will th as it really is, and let go of its own accord."  "Tell yourself: The reason I still feel suffering because I still have an 'I'."  "The day will arrive when death comes to you, forcing you to l everything of every sort. That's why you should practice letting go well in advance so that yo at it. Otherwise--let me tell you--it's going to be difficult when the time comes."  "You don' be afraid of death. You'd do better to be afraid of birth."  "When you die don't get caught symptoms of dying.  "Lift the mind above what it knows."  "Whatever dies, let it die, b let the heart die."

Realization  A tape-recorded talk given to one of his students who had reached an impas meditation.Once the mind is firmly established in the breath, you then try to separate the mi object--from the breath itself. Focus on this: The breath is an element, part of the wind elem of the breath is something else. So you've got two things that have come together. Now, wh separate them--through realizing the breath's true nature as an element--the mind can stand After all, the breath isn't you, and you aren't the breath. When you can separate things in thi mind gains power. It's set loose from the breath, and is wise to the breath's every aspect. W is full, it's wise to all the aspects of the breath, and can separate itself from them.Now if it so that your mind is strong and your mindfulness sharp while you're doing this, that's when insi knowledge will arise in that moment, letting you know that you've really let go. If your mindfu still weak, though, you won't be able to let go. Only when your mindful-ness is really resilient have mindfulness and insight arising together.This is something you have to keep contempla have the chance. When you can separate the mind from its objects, it'll be freed from all its b focus your attention right down, in the area of the heart. Keep it focused there, and then obs breath and what it is that's aware of the breath. Be as observant as you can, and eventually they separate from each other. When they've separated, that gives you the chance to invest inside. And once you've investigated this one element, you'll find that what you learn applies else.When you investigate the breath, you'll find that it's not a being, not a person--so what i latch on to? You can't latch on to it as your self, for it simply goes its own way. When you loo breath you'll see that it doesn't have a body--no head, no legs, no hands, no feet, nothing at see this, you let go of it, in line with the way it really is.The texts say, 'Cago patinissaggo mu analayo': You move out of the breath. You remove your concerns for it. You don't make it yo longer--because it's not yours. You let it go in line with its original nature. You give it back. W it's got, you give it back to nature. All of the elements--earth, water, wind, fire and space--yo to nature. You let them return to what they originally were. When you examine all five of thes you'll see that they're not a being, not a person, not 'us', not 'them'. You let them all return to original nature in every way.This then brings us to the mind, what it is that's aware of these f elements. What is it going to stay with now? Turn your powers of observation on this knowin is now standing on its own, with nothing else left. Examine it to see what's what, and that's w level of insight will arise.If you want to gain the insight that will let go of all things in line with their original nature, there has to be a special realization that arises in the act of letting go. If isn't this realization, your letting go is simply an ordinary, everyday label or perception. It's m discernment. But when this special realization arises in the act of letting go--the instant you result comes right back at you, verifying, certifying what's happened for what it really is: You You've let go. You then experience the purity within you. This is called transcendent discern realization arises within you, verifying what you've seen and what you've done, that's called discernment. As long as this realization doesn't arise, your discernment is still mundane. So working at your investigation into things until all the conditions are ripe. Then when they're ri nothing more you have to do, for transcendent discernment penetrates things completely the arises. It's not like mundane discernment at all.The path we follow, then, is to be observant, investigate things. Keep making a focused investigation until you reach the strategic point. W reaches that point, it lets go on its own. What happens is that it reaches a point of fullness--t within it is full--and it lets go. Once it lets go, the results will appear immediately.So. Keep on practicing. There's nothing to be afraid of. You'll have to reap results, there's no doubt about reap results all along the way. Like right now, while you're sitting in meditation here. You kno breath and the mind are comfortable with each other. That's a result of the practice. Even th haven't yet reached the end of the path, you're still gaining a sense of comfort and ease in y meditation. The mind is at peace with the in-and-out breath. As long as the mind and breath from each other, they have to help each other along. The mind helps the breath, and the bre mind until they can get fully acquainted. Once the mind gets fully acquainted, it can let go. W it lets go. As long as it doesn't really know, it won't really let go. What this means is that you associate with the breath, spend time with it, and gradually come to know it. As the mind get acquainted, it will be able to unravel its attach-ments to body, feelings, perceptions, thought-and consciousness. Its identity-views--seeing these things as the self--will fall away. This is freedom. The moment this transcendent discernment arises, you'll be free. You'll be able to yourself from all the conventional truths of the world that say, 'person', 'self', 'man', 'woman', 'them', and so on. But as long as you can't yet let go, you still have to depend on these thing your resting spots, but not your refuge. You simply lean on each other, and help each other you can make progress on your way. You can't abandon these things, for they're the path of long as you stick with the practice, you won't fall back. But as soon as you let up on the prac start back-sliding immediately. You'll fall prey to doubts, wondering whether or not the Dham have to keep being observant of the mind: awareness itself. It's not the case that the mind is know. It's basic nature is awareness. Just look at it. It's aware of everything--aware, but it ca go of its perceptions, of the conventions it holds to be true. So you have to focus your invest in. Focus on in until the mind and its objects separate from each other. Simply keep at it. If y persistent like this, without let-up, your doubts will gradually fade away, fade away, and even reach your true refuge within you, the basic awareness called buddha that sees clearly throu

This is the Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha appearing within you as your ultimate refuge.This what's actually within, what's actually without, what's actually a resting spot, and what's reall refuge. You'll be able to distinguish these things.Things outside are simply resting spots. Lik It's a resting spot. For the brief moment that the elements of earth, water, wind and fire stay together, you can rest with the body. But as for your true refuge, you've already seen it. It's t awareness itself, within the mind. Your awareness of the breath is a refuge on one level. Wh from the breath, it's a refuge on another level. And as for your true refuge--buddha--that's th which lies further within. Once you realize this, that's all there is. It's sovereign in and of itsel knows clearly and truly, all around. That's the true refuge within you. As for things outside, th temporary supports, things you can depend on for a little while, like a crutch. As long as ther breath to keep them alive, you make use of them. When there's no more breath, that's the e

The physical elements separate and no longer depend on each other, so the mind returns to refuge. And where is that? Just where is that buddha awareness? When we've trained the m refuge, there will be no sorrow at that moment in the meditating heart.The Buddha's own sea refuge. He taught all of his disciples to take refuge in themselves, for we can depend on othe little while. Other people merely show us the way. But if you want what's really true and good have to depend on yourself--teach yourself, train yourself, depend on yourself in every way.
come eventu-ally from you. Your happiness, eventually from you. It's like eating: If you don't you going to get full? If you leave it up to other people to eat, there's no way you're going to
If you want to be full, you yourself have to eat. It's the same with the practice. You can't let y latch on to things outside you. Things outside are inconstant. Impermanent. Undependable.
every in-and-out breath. This holds not only for you, but for everyone. If you don't part from o while you're still alive, you part when you die. You part from things with every in-and-out bre can't base the meaning of your life on these things--and you don't have to. You can simply to that this is the way things are all over the world. The world offers nothing lasting. We don't w to be that way, but that's the way they are. They don't lie under anyone's control at all. This i only with things outside, but also with things within you. You want the body to stay alive, you it to die, but it's going to die. You don't want it to change, but it changes, constantly.This is w have to get your mind in shape so that it can take refuge in itself, in line with the principles o skill the Buddha taught. And you don't have to feel doubts about the practice, for all the qual to develop in the practice are already present within you. All forms of good and evil are pres
you. You already know which path is the good one, which path is the shoddy one, so all you train your heart to hold onto the good path. Stop and take a look at yourself right now: Are y right path? Whatever is wrong, don't latch onto it. Let go of it. Past, future, whatever, let go o leaving only the present. Keep the mind open and at ease in the present at all times, and the investigating.You already know that things outside aren't you or yours, but inside you there a you have to examine. Many levels you have to examine. Even the mind isn't really yours. Th inconstant and stressful things inside it. Sometimes it wants to do this, sometimes to do that really yours. So don't get too attached to it. Thought-constructs are the big issue. Sometimes good thoughts, sometimes evil thoughts, even though you know better. You don't want to thi and yet they keep appearing in the mind, in spite of your intentions. So you have to regard th being yours. Examine them. There's nothing dependable about them. They don't last. They'r events, so let them go in line with their own nature.And what is there that's lasting, solid, dep true? Keep looking on in. Focus your mindfulness on the breath, and ask yourself right there you'll come to see what's what within you. Whenever you have any doubts or problems in th down on the breath and ask the mind right there, and understanding will arise, to loosen up and help you past your impasse.But even this understanding is inconstant, stressful and not dhamma anatta: Everything that arises, the Buddha said, is inconstant and not self. Even th that arise in the mind aren't constant. Sometimes they arise, some-times they don't. So don' attached to them. When they arise, take note of them, and then let them follow their own cou views be Right Views: i.e., just right, not going overboard. If you go overboard with them, yo tight to them, and then they turn wrong on you, for you've lost sight of what you're doing.Wh boils down to is that the more mindfulness in your practice, the better. As your mindfulness g more mature, more and more complete, it turns into something transcendent. The transcend mentioned above arises from the power of your mindfulness as it becomes more and more c training your mindfulness until it's Great Mindfulness. Try to keep it constant, persistent and until you see all things for what they are. That's how you'll advance in the Buddha's teaching Release  "Our practice is to go against the stream, against the flow. And where are w the source of the stream. That's the 'cause' side of the practice. The 'result' side is that we c and be completely at ease."  "The stages of the practice... Actually the different stages d what they are. We simply make up names for them. As long as you stay stuck on these mad never get free."  "When teaching people, you have to teach them in line with their temper aptitudes, but eventually they all come to the same point: letting go."  "Nibbana is subtle lot of discernment. It's not something that the force of desire can reach. If we could get there force of desire, everyone in the world would have gotten there by now."  "Some people ta 'temporary nibbana, temporary nibbana,' but how can nibbana be temporary? If it's nibbana, constant. If it's not constant, it's not nibbana."  "When they say that nibbana is empty, the that it's empty of defilement."  "Right where there's no one to be pained, no one to die. R It's in each and every person. It's as if your hand were palm-down, and you turn it palm-up-- of discernment will be able to do it. If you're dense, you won't see it, you won't catch on to it, go beyond birth and death."  "The heart when it's released is like the fire element in the a fire goes out, it isn't annihilated anywhere. It still permeates space, simply that it doesn't latc any kindling, so it doesn't appear."When the mind 'goes out' from defilement, it's still there, b new kindling comes, it doesn't catch fire, doesn't latch on--not even to itself. That's what's ca release."

ÉÍÍÍ

AND ATTAIN THE BLISS OF NIRVANA.

FOREWORD

Buddhism has long been an important part of the cultural heritage of South East Asia. The monuments of Angkor Wat in Cambodia and Borobudur in Indonesia are just two of countless testimonies to the former greatness of Buddhism in this region. In Singapore too Buddhism is an important element in the cultural heritage of the people. The fact that a large section of the Chinese Community as well as the small but influential Sri Lankan Community acknowledge Buddhism as the primary force shaping their religious ideals and moral values is more than proof of this. Nonetheless, it is certain that if Buddhism is to continue to exercise a positive influence upon present and future generations, it cannot remain content with the achievements of the past. The religious ideals and moral values of Buddhism which have proved so useful to past generations must be transmitted to men and women living in a changing world. In order that this can be accomp-lished, it is important that the teachings of the Buddha be made available to the largest number of people.

With this objective in mind, the Sri Lankaramaya Buddhist Temple invited Dr Santina to deliver a series of public lectures. The lectures outlined the fundamentals of Buddhism and were well delivered. As a result, it was decided to produce transcriptions of the lectures and publish them in the form of a book to be made freely available. It is also hoped that the publication will contribute in a small degree to the understanding of the genuine teachings of the Buddha. Sincerest thanks are extended to all those who lent their invaluable support and contribution to this project and especially to Dr Santina for imparting to us his deep understanding of the Buddha Dharma.

N Sumana Thera
Resident Monk

SRILANKARAMAYA
BUDDHIST TEMPLE
SINGAPORE

VESAK 1984

BUDDHISM: A MODERN PERSPECTIVE

We are going to cover what we might call basic Buddhist teachings over a series of twelve lectures. We are going to cover the life of the Buddha, the Four Noble Truths, the Noble Eightfold Path, Karma, rebirth, dependent origination, the three universal characteristics and the five aggregates. But before I begin the series of lectures, I would like to deal today with the notion of Buddhism in perspective. There are many ways in which different people in different cultures view Buddhism and particularly, I think we can contrast the western or modern attitude towards Buddhism with the traditional attitude. The reason why this kind of per-spective study is useful is because when we understand how people of different cultures view a certain thing, we can then begin to see some of the limitation or one-sidedness of our own view.

In the West, Buddhism has aroused extensive interest and sympathy. There are many persons of considerable standing in western societies who are either Buddhists or who are sympathetic towards Buddhism. This is most clearly exemplified by the remark made by Albert Einstein in his autobiography, the remark that he was not a religious man, but if he were one, he would be a Buddhist. This is quite surprising, and off-hand we would not expect such a remark to be made by the Father of Modern Science. Yet if we look at contem-porary western societies, we will find an astrophysicist who is a Buddhist in France, we will find an outstanding psychologist who is a Buddhist at the University of Rome, and until recently a judge from England who is a Buddhist. We will look into the reasons for this interest in Buddhism in the West in a moment. But before we do that I would like to compare this situation with the situation that we find in this part of the world.
In Europe generally, the attitude towards Buddhism is that it is very advanced, very rational and very sophisticated. It was therefore quite a shock to me when I came to Singapore and found that a lot of people here view Buddhism as old fashioned, irrational and too much tied up with superstitions. This is one of the two attitudes that work against the appreciation of Buddhism here. The other is that Buddhism is so deep and so abstract that no one can ever understand it. It is a complete turnabout. This is what I mean by perspective, because in the western perspective Buddhism has a certain image, while in the traditional perspective we have another image. This negative image that people have about Buddhism has to be changed before they can really come to appreciate the Buddha's teachings, before they can get a kind of balanced perspective regarding Buddhism.

One of the first things that a Westerner appreciates Buddhism is that it is not culture bound, not bound to any particular society, race or ethnic group. There are certain religions that are culture-bound, Judaism is one example. Buddhism is not. That is why historically we have Indian Buddhists, Thai Buddhists, Chinese Buddhists, Srilankan Buddhists, Burmese Buddhists and so forth, and we are going to have in the near future English Buddhists, American Buddhists, French Buddhists and so forth. This is because Buddhism is not culture-bound. It moves very easily from one culture to another because the emphasis in Buddhism is on internal practice rather than on external practice. Its emphasis is on the way you develop your mind rather than the way you dress, the kind of food you take, the way you wear your hair and so forth.

The second point that I would like to make regards the pragmatism or the practicality of Buddhism. Instead of taking an interest in metaphysics and academic theories, the Buddha deals with problems per se and approaches them in a concrete way. This is again something which is very much in agreement with western ideas about utilitarianism. That is, if something works, use it. It is very much a part of western political, economic and scientific philosophy. This attitude of pragmatism is clearly expressed in the Culama-lunkya Sutra where the Buddha made use of the example of the wounded man. The man wounded by an arrow wishes to know who shoots the arrow, from which direction it comes, whether the arrow head is made of bone or iron, whether the shaft is of this kind of wood or another before he will have the arrow removed. This man is likened to those who would like to know about the origin of the Universe, whether the world is eternal or not, finite or not before they will undertake to practice a religion. Just as the man in the parable will die before he has all the answers he wants regarding the origin and nature of the arrow, such people will die before they will ever have the answers to all their irrelevant questions. This exemplifies what we call the Buddha's practical attitude. It has a lot to say about the whole question of priorities and problem solving. We would not make much progress developing wisdom if we ask the wrong question. It is essentially a question of priority. The first priority for all of us is the problem of suffering. The Buddha recognized this and said it is of no use for us to speculate whether the world is eternal or not because we all have got an arrow in our chest, the arrow of suffering. We have to ask questions that will lead to the removal of this arrow. One can express this in a very simple way. We can see that in our daily life, we constantly make choices based on priority. If, for instance, we happen to be cooking something on the stove and we decide that while the beans are boiling we will dust the house, and as we dust the house we smell something burning. We have to make the choice, whether to carry on with our dusting or whether to go to turn down the flame on the stove to save the beans. In the same way, if we want to make progress towards wisdom we have to recognize our priorities and this point is made very clearly in the parable of the wounded man.

The third point that I would like to refer to is the Buddha's teaching on the importance of verification through experience. This point is made clearly in His advice to the Kalamas contained in the Kesaputtiya Sutra. The Kalamas were a people very much like us in our modern day when we are exposed to so many different teachings. They went to the Buddha and enquired that as there were so many different teachers and as all of them claimed that their doctrine was true, how were they to know who was telling the truth. The Buddha told them not to accept anything out of authority, not to accept anything because it happens to be written down; not to accept anything out of reverence for their teacher; or out of hearsay; or because it sounds reasonable. But to verify, test what they have heard in the light of their own experience. When they know for themselves that certain things are harmful then they should abandon them. When they know for themselves that certain things are beneficial, that they lead to happiness and calm, then they should follow them. The Buddha gives this advice that-one-has to verify what one hears in the light of one's experience. In the context of the Buddha's advice to the Kalamas, I think what the Buddha is saying is to use your own mind as a test tube. You can see for yourself that when greed and anger are present, they lead to suffering, pain and disturbance. And you can see for yourself that when greed and anger are absent from your mind, it leads to calm, to happiness. It is a very simple experiment which we all can do for ourselves. This is a very important point because what the Buddha has taught will only be effective, will only really change our life if we can carry out this kind of experiment in our life, if we can realize the truth of the Buddha's teachings through our own experience and verify it through our own experience. Only then can we really say that we are making progress on the path towards enlightenment.

We can see a striking parallel between the Buddha's own approach and the approach of science to the problem of knowledge. The Buddha stresses the importance of objective observation. Observation is in a sense the key to the Buddha's method of knowledge. It is observation that yields the first of the Four Noble Truths the truth of suffering. Again at the final stage of the Buddha's path, it is observation that characterizes the realization of the total end of suffering. So at the beginning, in the middle and at the end of the Buddha's path, observation plays an extremely important role. This is similar to the role that objective observation plays in the scientific tradition which teaches that when we observe a problem we must first formulate a general theory followed by a specific hypothesis. We find the same thing happening in the teaching of the Four Noble Truths and here the general theory is that all things have a cause, and the specific hypothesis is that the causes of suffering are craving and ignorance. This truth that the causes of suffering are craving and ignorance can be verified by the experimental method. In the context of the Four Noble Truths, the experimental method is the path. Through the path, the truth of the Second Noble Truth (the truth of the cause of suffering), and the Third Noble Truth (the truth of the cessation of suffering) are verified because through this cultivation of the path one eliminates craving and ignorance. And through the elim-ination of craving and ignorance one eliminates suffering. This experiment is repeatable just as in science because not only did the Buddha attain the end of suffering, but so too did all those who followed His path. So if we look closely at the Buddha's approach to the problem of knowledge, we find that His approach is very similar to the scientific approach and this too has aroused a tremendous amount of interest in the West. We can now begin to see why it is that Einstein could make a remark like the one that he did. We will see more clearly why this is not as surprising as it seems initially because I would like to talk about the Buddhist method of analysis and we can begin to see it operating very clearly when we look at the Buddhist approach to experience.

Experience in Buddhism is comprised of two components - the objective component and the subjective component. In other words, the things around us and we the perceivers. Buddhism is noted for its analytical method in the area of philosophy and psychology. What we mean by this is that the Buddha analyzes experience into various elements, the most basic of these being the five Skandhas or aggregates - form, feeling, perception, mental formation or volition and consciousness. The five aggregates in turn can be analyzed into the eighteen elements (Dhatus) and we have a still more elaborate analysis in terms of this seventy two elements. This method is analytical as it breaks up things. We are not satisfied with a vague notion of experience, but we analyze it, we probe it, we break it down into its component parts like we break down the chariot into the wheels, the axle and so on. And we do this in order to get an idea how things work. When we see for instance a flower, or hear a piece of music, or meet a friend, all these experiences arise as a result of components. This is what is called the analytical approach. And again this analytical approach is not at all strange to modern science and philosophy. We find the analytical approach very substantially used in science. In philosophy, we see the analytical tradition perhaps best in Bertrand Russell. There have been studies that compare quite successfully the philosophy of Bertrand Russell with the philosophy of the Buddhist Abhidharma. So in western science and philosophy, we find a very close parallel with the Buddhist analytical method and this again is one of the familiar features that has attracted western thinkers and academics to Buddhism. In the area of psychology, psychologists are now deeply interested in the Buddhist analysis of the various factors of experience - feeling, idea, habit and so forth. They are now turning to Buddhist teachings to gain a greater insight into their own disciplines.

This growing interest in Buddhism and these many areas of affinity between the teachings of the Buddha and the tendencies of modern science, philosophy and psychology have reached their apex at this very time in the suggestions now proposed by quantum physics, the latest developments in experimental theoretical physics. Here too we find that not only is the method of science observation, experiment and analysis anticipated by the Buddha, but that some of the very specific conclusions about the nature of man and the Universe that are indicated by the latest developments in quantum physics were also indicated by the Buddha. For instance, the importance of the mind. A noted physicist not long ago has remarked that the Universe is really something like a great thought. And it is said in the Dhammapada that the mind precedes all things, that the mind is the maker of all mental states. Similarly, the relativity of matter and energy is mentioned. There is no radical division between mind and matter. All these indications are now gradually being revealed by the latest developments in science.
So what has happened is that in the western contexts, academics, psychologists, and scientists have found in Buddhism a tradition which is in harmony with some of the basic tenets of western scientific thought. In addition to this, they find that Buddhism is particularly interesting because although the methods and the dis-coveries often resemble closely those of Buddhism, they find that in science so far, there is no path or method of achieving an inner transformation. They have methods of building better cities and expressways but they have not had any system which will enable them to build better people. So people in the West are turning to Buddhism. As an ancient tradition, it has many aspects that closely resemble practices in the western scientific traditions and yet goes beyond the materialism of the western tradition, beyond the limits of the scientific tradition.

THE PREBUDDHIST BACKGROUND

We are going to begin today with a consideration of the prebuddhist situation in India. Normally Buddhist studies courses begin with a study of the life of the Buddha. We are going to begin before the life of the Buddha. Personally I feel this is quite important as I feel it helps one to understand the life and teachings of the Buddha in their broader historical and conceptual con-text and to understand and appreciate better the nature of Buddhism and perhaps Indian thought as a whole.

I do not know how many of you have visited India. We have in the North of India two great rivers - one is the Ganges and the other is the Yamuna. These two great rivers have separate sources in the Himalayas and they flow separately for a good proportion of their lengths. They unite in the north eastern region of India. From there they flow on together to the Bay of Bengal. In a way the geography of these two great rivers is a symbol of the origin and development of Indian religion, philosophy and thought because in Indian religion too we have two great rivers which were originally quite distinct and had separate origins and which for a considerable length of time were separate but which at a certain point of time merged and flowed on united right to the present day. Perhaps as I go into the prebuddhist history of India, we can keep in mind the image of these two rivers originally separate and at a certain point merging and flowing together to the sea.
When we look at the very early history of India, we find that there existed in the 3rd Millennium B.C. a very highly developed civilization in the Indian subcontinent. This civilization is as old as those which are called the cradles of human culture, civilizations like those of Egypt and Babylon. This civilization existed approxi-mately between the year 2800 B.C. and 1800 B.C. It was known as the Indus Valley Civilization or it is sometimes called the Harappa Civilization, and it extended from what is now Western Pakistan, south to a point which is near Bombay and eastward to a point which is in the neighborhood of what is now Simla in the foothills of the Himalayas. If you see a map of India, you will realize that this is a very considerable extent. Not only was this civilization stable for a thousand years, it was also a very highly developed civilization both materially and spiritually. Materially the civiliz-ation was an agrarian one. They were skilled in irrigation and the planning of towns. In addition, they had a very highly developed spiritual culture. This is clear from the archaeological evidence that has been discovered at Mohenjodaro and Harappa. There is also evidence of the fact that they were literate. They had developed a script which unfortunately we are not able to decipher.

The peaceful life of this civilization was unfortunately interrupted in about the year 1800 or 1500 B.C. by an invasion that came from the North West. The invading people were known as the Aryans and this is a term that designated a people of Eastern Europe. The origin of the Aryans was in the grassy region extending from Poland to Western Russia. The Aryans were very different from the people of the Indus Valley Civiliz-ation because they were generally nomadic and pastoral. They did not have a highly developed urban civilization. They were a warlike expanding pioneer civilization that lived in large part from the spoils and plunder that they gathered from the peoples they conquered in the course of their migration. When the Aryans arrived in India, they very quickly destroyed the Indus Valley Civiliz-ation. The Indus Valley Civilization succumbed very quickly to the military might of the Aryans. What existed in India after the invasion was an Aryan dominated civilization.

Here we have a brief outline of the facts regarding the early history of India. But let us look at the religious outlook of the people of the Indus Valley Civilization and the Aryan Civilization which is of particular interest to us. The Indus Valley Civilization had a script which we are unfortunately unable to decipher. But our information regarding the nature of this civilization is from two sources, first from the archaeological dis-coveries at the sites of Mohenjodaro and Harappa and second from the records of the Aryans who described the religious behavior and beliefs of the people they conquered. From the archaeological evidence we find a number of symbols that are of religious significance, that are special to Buddhism: the symbols of the Bodhi tree and animals such as the elephant and deer. Perhaps most importantly there have been discovered several images of figures sitting in cross-legged postures with their hands resting on their knees, with their eyes narrowed, half-closed quite evidently in postures of meditation. These archaeological findings have been studied by eminent scholars and the conclusion is that we can quite definitely trace the origin and practice of meditation to the Indus Valley Civilization. When we look at the descriptions of the religion of the Indus Valley Civilization from the writings of the Aryans - the Vedas, we find the figure of a wandering ascetic frequently mentioned. We find that they practiced meditation, that they were celibate, that they observed an austere life, that they were sometimes naked or clothed in most simple garments, that they wandered about homeless and that they taught in the way beyond birth and death. If we put together the evidence of the archaeological findings and the evidence of Aryan literature, we find that there emerges a picture of the religion of the people of the Indus Valley Civilization in which there are several important elements. First of all, meditation or mental concentration; secondly renunci-ation, abandoning the household life, living the life of a wandering ascetic, thirdly that we have a conception of rebirth over a long series of lives, and fourthly we have a conception of moral responsibility beyond this life, the notion of karma, and lastly we have a goal of religious life, a goal of liberation. These are the salient features of the religion of the very earliest Indian Civilization.

By contrast, and it would be hard to find two religious views that are more different, let us look at the religion of the Aryans. Here we find it much easier to construct a picture because we have a complete literature with regard to their religion. When the Aryans came to India, they had a religion which was totally secular. They were an expanding pioneering society. There are many close parallels between the Aryan religion and the religion of the Greeks. If you have come across the description of the Greek pantheon you will find striking similarities between their pantheon and the Aryan pantheon. You will find in the Aryan faith a number of gods who are personifications of natural phenomena. We have Indra for instance who was the God of Lightning and the Thunderstorm personifying power, we have Agni the God of Fire, and Varuna the God of Water. We have a religious set-up in which the priest is the most important figure, while in the Indus Valley Civilization the ascetic was the most important figure. In the Indus Valley Civilization renunciation was the ideal of religious life, while in the Aryan religion the ideal state is the householder state. In the Indus Valley Civilization we have a rejection of sons and offspring, while in the Aryan religion sons are the highest good. While in the Indus Valley Civilization we have the practice of meditation, in the Aryan religion we have the practice of sacrifice - sacrifice was an important mean of communication with the gods, of achieving victories in battles, of gaining offspring, of going to heaven. While in the Indus Valley Civilization we have belief in the Law of Karma, and rebirth, in the Aryan Civilization we have no conception of rebirth. Just as in the Indus Valley Civilization we have the notion of moral res-ponsibility extending over a series of lives, in the Aryan Civilization we have no such notion. In fact the highest ideal was loyalty, those values that contributed to the power of the community. Finally while in the Indus Valley Civilization we have liberation as the goal of religious life, in the Aryan Civilization we have heaven as the goal of religious life. The idea that they had of heaven was a heaven modelled upon a perfected version of this life. So if we want to sum up the differences between the religions of these two civilizations, we can say that on the one hand the Indus Valley Civilization stresses renunciation, meditation, rebirth, karma, the goal of liberation; on the other hand the Aryan religion stresses this life, material well-being, wealth, power, fame and sacrifices as means of achieving these goals. It would be hard to find a set of more diametrically opposed religious attitudes. In addition, there are two more important elements of Aryan religion that we ought to recall caste - the division of society into social strata; and belief in the authority of the revealed scriptures, the Vedas. These two elements were not present in the Indus Valley Civilization.

The history of Indian religion from 1500 B.C. up to 600 or 500 B.C., the time of the Buddha, the history of those 1000 years in India is a history of gradual interaction between these two totally opposed religious views. As the Aryans gradually spread and settled across the gigantic Indian subcontinent, as their pioneering exploits diminished, gradually these two totally opposed religious views began to influence, interact and merge with each other. This is the merging I had in mind when I talked about the merging of the two great rivers. Consequently by the time of the Buddha, we have a very heterogeneous religious scene. We can understand this clearly if we look at some of the facts regarding the life of the Buddha. For instance, we find that when the Buddha was born, two groups of people made prophecies regarding His future greatness. The first prophecy was made by Asita. Asita was a hermit, who lived in the mountains and yet sources tell us that he was a Brahmin, that he belonged to the priestly class. This in itself is already evidence of the interaction of the two traditions. In the Buddha's time, Brahmins had begun to go forth as hermits. This was unheard of a thousand years before. A little later, we are told that 108 Brahmins were invited to the naming ceremony. Here we have examples of priests who had not renounced the household life, an example of an institution that pro-perly and originally belonged to the Aryan Civilization.

How is it that the two traditions - the Indus Valley tradition and the Aryan tradition, initially so different were able to merge? I think the answer to this lies in the dramatic changes which took place in the life of the Indian people between the 2nd millennium B.C. and the time of the Buddha. The Aryan expansion came to an end when they had conquered the plains of India. This end of expansion brought about many social, economic and political changes. In the first place, the tribal political society evolved into the institution of the territorial state so that no longer do you have a tribe with a very close personal set of loyalties. You have now a territorial state where many people of various tribes exist together. The kingdom of Magadha ruled by Bimbisara in the time of the Buddha is an example of an emerging territorial state. Secondly, you have this nomadic pastoral lifestyle gradually changed into a more urbanized agricultural settled lifestyle so that the people were now living in urban centers, and were removed from the natural forces that had been personified in the gods. Economically, commerce became important. So while in the early days of the Aryan Civilization the priests and warriors were the most important figures - the priest because he communicated with the gods, the warrior because he waged wars against the enemy and brought spoils into the community - now the merchants became increasingly important. We can see this in the days of the Buddha, the famous disciples who were merchants - Anathapindika to name only one. These social, economic and political changes contributed to an openness on the part of the Aryans to accept the religious ideas of the Indus Valley Civilization. While the Aryans conquered the Indus Valley people militarily, the subsequent 1000 to 2000 years saw them coming increasingly under the influence of ideas taken from the Indus Valley Civilization. So that by the 1st few centuries of the Common Era, the distinction between the Aryan tradition and the Indus Valley tradition became more and more difficult to draw. In fact, this fact is at the bottom of the misconception when it is said that Buddhism is a protest against Hinduism, or that Buddhism is a branch of Hinduism.

In Buddhism we have a religion which draws most of its inspiration from the Indus Valley religion, the ideas of renunciation, meditation, karma and rebirth, ultimate liberation - ideas which were important to the Indus Valley Civilization. The Buddha Himself indicated the Indus Valley origins of His tradition when He said that the path which He taught was an ancient path and the goal to which He pointed to was an ancient goal. We also have a Buddhist belief in six Buddhas prior to the Buddha Shakyamuni within this aeon. All these point to a continuity between the tradition of the Indus Valley Civilization and the teachings of the Buddha. If we look at Buddhism and Hinduism we will find a greater or lesser proportion of elements taken from either of the two traditions of the Indus Valley Civilization and Aryan Civilization. For instance, if we look at Buddhism, the greater proportion was taken from the Indus Valley Civilization religion, a lesser proportion from the Aryan tradition. That is why we find mention of the Aryan gods in Buddhist scripture, though their role is peripheral, an example of an Aryan element in the Buddhism tradition. On the other hand, if we look at some schools of Hinduism, we find a greater proportion of elements taken from the Aryan tradition and a lesser proportion from the Indus Valley Civilization. We find caste emphasized, the authority of the revealed scripture of the Aryans - the Vedas emphasized and sacrifices emphasized. Alongside, we find a place made for renunciation, meditation, karma and rebirth.

LIFE OF THE BUDDHA

Today I would like to spend a little bit of time on the life of the Buddha. I do not intend to spend too much time on the life and career of the Buddha since most of the biography is essentially narrative. But I would like to take the opportunity today to draw attention to a few important Buddhist values which come through strikingly in the life of the Buddha.

Last week we talked about the two traditions and how the two traditions which were originally very distinct gradually began to interact and eventually fused in India and we said that the beginning of this process of interaction can be placed about the time of the Buddha. In fact during the time of the Buddha, we can see the beginning of the interaction and it was a process that continued until a thousand years later when the two traditions fused and became difficult to differentiate. It is not perhaps a coincidence that one of the primary areas where the two traditions came into the most active contact was in the area known as Madhyadesha, the area around what is now Eastern Uttar Pradesh and Bihar. This area was regarded by the Brahmins as an area of challenge to the Aryan tradition. It happens that when two traditions of this nature meet, it creates an atmosphere where there is a great potential for the growth of new religious directions. To a large extent we can see the life and teachings of the Buddha in this context. In addition to the interaction of the two religious traditions, there were also significant social, economic and political changes that were taking place and which we have touched on last week. All these contributed to a heightened level of religious consciousness. It always happens in time of political and social upheavals that man looks inward, that man turns to religion. When they see the institutions that their fore-fathers took as stable and unchanging shaken, there is a natural tendency to turn to religion, and this con-tributes to heightened religious consciousness and activ-ities. This is very much the case in the 6th century B.C.

The values that emerge from the Buddha's life that I would like to highlight are essentially three, and they are renunciation, loving-kindness and compassion, and wisdom. These three values emerge very clearly through episodes in the Buddha's own life. Incidentally it is no coincidence that these three qualities between them equal the attainment of Nirvana because as you know there are three defilements (Klesha) that cause us to be born again and again - the defilements of desire, ill-will and ignorance. In this context we might also remember that renunciation is the antidote for desire, loving-kindness and compassion is the antidote for ill-will, and wisdom is the antidote for ignorance. Through cultivating these three qualities one is able to eliminate the defilements and attain enlightenment. So it is no accident that these qualities should stand out so prominently in the life of the Buddha.

Let us look at them one by one and let us start with renunciation. As often happens, some of the very first evidence of the Buddha's renunciation manifested itself while He was still very young. Renunciation is basically a recognition that all existence is suffering. When one recognizes the fact that all existence is suffering, this brings about what we might call a turning about, in other words, seeing that life is full of suffering one begins to look for something more. This is why suffering is the First Noble Truth. This recognition that existence is suffering is the essence of renunciation. You may know of Prince Siddhartha's visit to the annual ploughing ceremony at the age of seven. It was there that while watching the ploughing the prince noticed a worm that had been unearthed by the plough devoured by a bird. This sight led the prince to contemplate the realities of life, to recognize the fact that all living beings kill each other for food and this is a great source of suffering. Already we see at this tender age in the biography of the Buddha the beginning of this recognition that existence is suffering. If we look a little bit later in the life of the Buddha, we will come to the famous episode of the four sights which moved the prince to renounce the household life and to follow a life of asceticism to seek the truth. The sights of old age, sickness, death and an ascetic led Him to consider why it was that He should feel uneasy when in fact He was Himself not free from, was subject to old age, sickness and death. This consideration led Him to develop a sense of detachment from pleasure, led Him to seek the truth by way of renunciation. It is interesting to note that Prince Siddhartha's renunciation is not renunciation out of despair. He enjoyed the greatest happiness and yet saw these sufferings of life, recognizing that no matter how great one's indulgence in pleasures of the senses might be, eventually one would have to face these sufferings. Recognizing this, He was moved to renounce the household life and seek enlightenment for the sake of all living beings.

Let us next look at the quality of loving-kindness and compassion. Here too we can see this quality manifested very early in the life of the Buddha. The most striking example of this is the episode of the wounded swan. We are told that He and His cousin Devadatta were roaming in the park surrounding the palace when Devadatta shot down a swan with his bow and arrow. Both boys ran towards the spot where the swan had fallen, but Siddhartha being the faster runner came to the place where the wounded bird lay. Gathering the bird in His arms, He nursed the bird and this brought about a reaction from Devadatta who insisted that the bird ought to be his since he was the one who shot it down. The boys brought this dispute to the wise man of the court who decided that life belonged rightly to the one who preserved it, not to one who destroyed it. Here we have a striking example of the Buddha's attitude of loving-kindness and com-passion which grows directly out of this recognition that the nature of life is suffering. Later too after His enlightenment, the Buddha continued to display this quality, as for instance in the famous episode in which the Buddha nursed the sick Tissa whose illness was such that the other members of the Order shunned him.

Let us look at wisdom which is the third of the three qualities. Wisdom is the most important of the three qualities because after all it is wisdom that opens the door to enlightenment. It is wisdom that uproots ignorance, the underlying cause of suffering. It is said that just as one can cut off the branches and trunk of a tree and yet if the root of the tree is not taken out the branches and trunk will grow again. So in the same way one can eliminate desire through renunciation, ill-will through loving-kindness and compassion, but so long as ignorance is not eliminated, this desire and ill-will are liable to grow again.

Wisdom is achieved primarily through meditation. We have an episode again early in the life of the Buddha in which we see His early development of skill in concentrating the mind and this episode in fact occurred at the same time as the incident we considered a moment ago involving the bird and the worm. We are told that after having witnessed the bird devouring the worm, having recognized the unhappy nature of life, the young prince sat under a tree and began to meditate spontaneously. He achieved the first level of meditation through concentrating the mind on the process of in-breathing and out-breathing. So we have this experience of meditation in the early life of the Buddha, and later when He renounced the household life and went forth to seek the truth, one of the first discipline which He tried was again the discipline of mental concentration. We are told that He studied with two foremost teachers of the time, Arada Kalama and Udraka Ramaputra and He learned from these teachers the methods of mental concentration. Last week we said that amongst the discoveries made at Mohenjodaro and Harappa were images of the figures sitting in postures of meditation. We have very good reasons to believe that the methods of mental concentration go as far back as the 3rd Millennium B.C. and it is very likely that these two teachers were exponents of this tradition of mental concentration. Yet we find that the prince left the two teachers because He found that meditation alone could not permanently end suffering. This is important because, although in its emphasis on mental development Buddhism is very much in the tradition of the Indus Valley Civilization, yet the Buddha goes beyond the tradition of mere meditation. This is what distinguishes the Buddha's teachings from the teachings of many other Indian schools, particularly the teachings of the tradition of Yoga. It is also what distinguishes Buddhism from some of the contemplative traditions of other religions, because in Buddhism meditation by itself is not enough. Meditation is like sharpening a pencil, sharpening the mind so to speak. Just as when we sharpen a pencil we sharpen it for a purpose, so that we can write with it, so in sharpening the mind we have a purpose and that purpose is wisdom. Sometimes this relationship between meditation and wisdom is exemplified by the example of a torch. Suppose we want to see a picture in a darkened room with a torch. If there are many draughts in the room, we will find that the light of the torch will flicker. Similarly, if our hand shakes, the light cast by the torch will be unsteady, and we will be unable to see the image. In the same way, if we want to penetrate into the real nature of things, if our mind is unsteady, distracted, wavers as a result of emotional disturbances, then we will not be able to penetrate into the real nature of things. The Buddha applied this discovery on the night of His enlightenment when we are told that with His mind concentrated, made one-pointed and supple by meditation, He directed it to the understanding of the nature of reality and penetrated the real nature of things. So the Buddha's enlightenment is the direct result of this combination of meditation and wisdom - concentration and insight.

We also find other aspects of wisdom expressed in the life of the Buddha, and one of the more important ones is of course the Middle Way. We do not have time today to discuss all the various levels of the meaning of the Middle Way but suffice it to say that the most basic significance of the Middle Way is the avoidance of the extreme of indulgence in pleasures of the senses and the extreme of tormenting the body. The Middle Way is exemplified in the life of the Buddha by His own experience of a life of luxury as a prince and by the six years of vigorous asceticism which He practiced after He left His father's palace. After realizing the futility of these extremes in His own experiences, He then hit upon the Middle Way which avoids these extremes.

There are many other important episodes in the life of the Buddha. But if we can begin to see and understand the life of the Buddha as a lesson and not simply as a biography containing a number of names and places; if we can begin to appreciate the values and qualities that are exemplified in the life of the Buddha, we will have gained greater insight into the real significance of the life of the Buddha.

FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS PART I

This is the third in the series of lectures and we are getting into the real heart of Buddhism with today's lecture because in the next hour or so I would like to say a few words regarding the Four Noble Truths. The Four Noble Truths are a very important aspect of the teachings of the Buddha. Their importance has been stated in no uncertain terms by the Buddha. He has said that it is because we fail to understand the Four Noble Truths that we have run on so long in this cycle of birth and death. This indicates how important the Four Noble Truths are to the understanding of the Buddha's teachings and to the realization of the goal of His teachings. Similarly, it is no coincidence that in the Buddha's first sermon the Dhammachakkappavattana Sutra to the five monks at the deer park near Benares, the Buddha spoke primarily about the Four Noble Truths and the Middle Path. Here we have two very significant indications of the importance of the Four Noble Truths. The Four Noble Truths in a sense are a summary of the Buddha's teachings both from the point of view of doctrine or theory and also from the point of view of practice. So here in the Four Noble Truths which are the truth of suffering, the truth of the cause of suffering, the truth of the end of suffering and the truth of the path that leads to the end of suffering, we have the foundation of the teachings of the Buddha for understanding and practice.

Before we consider the Four Noble Truths individually, I would like to say a few words about the nature of the scheme that the Four Noble Truths represent and in this context we can perhaps remember that medical science had enjoyed a certain amount of development in ancient India. One of the structures that had been developed by medical science in ancient India was the four fold structure of disease, diagnosis, cure and treatment. Now if you think carefully about these four steps in the practice of medicine, the practice of the art of healing, you will see that they correspond quite closely to the Four Noble Truths. In other words, suffering corresponds to the illness; the cause of suffering corresponds to the diagnosis, in other words identifying the cause of the illness; the end of suffering corresponds to the cure; and the path to the end of suffering corresponds to the treatment whereby one is cured of the illness.

Now having said this about the therapeutic nature of the Four Noble Truths and the stages that they represent, I would like to say something slightly more conceptual but nonetheless very important for the correct understanding of the Four Noble Truths. When Shariputra, one of the foremost disciples of the Buddha came upon Ashvajit (who was one of the first five monks to whom the Buddha delivered the first sermon) and spoke to Ashvajit about the Buddha's teachings, Ashvajit said, "I cannot tell you in great detail as I am relatively new to the teachings, but I will tell you briefly." So Shariputra said, "Very well, tell me briefly then," and Ashvajit replied with a very brief summary of the Buddha's teachings which is as follows - Of things that proceed from a cause, their cause the Tathagata has told, and also their cessation: Thus teaches the Great Ascetic. Shariputra was greatly impressed by this summary and he went to find his friend Maudgalyayana and the two of them soon joined the Order and became prominent disciples of the Buddha. This summary of the Buddha's teachings tells us something about the central concept that lies behind the Four Noble Truths. It indicates the importance of the relationship between cause and effect. The idea of cause and effect is at the heart of the Buddha's teachings and is at the heart of the Four Noble Truths. Now in what sense? Specifically there is a starting point, the problem of suffering. This problem arises from causes. Finally just as there is suffering and the causes of suffering, so too there is an end of suffering and a cause for the end of suffering. In this case it is a negative process. In other words, when the causes of suffering are removed then suffering ends.

If you look at the Four Noble Truths you can see that they divide quite naturally into two groups. The first two, suffering and the cause of suffering belong to the realm of birth and death. Symbolically they can be represented as a circle, in the sense that they are circular. The causes of suffering lead to suffering, suffering produces the causes of suffering which again produce suffering. They are circular. They belong to samsara. The second two, the end of suffering and the path to the end of suffering can be symbolized in terms of a spiral. Movement is no longer circular. It is now directed upwards. If we keep this structure, the idea of cause and effect at the back of our mind when we look at the Four Noble Truths, I think we can find them easier to understand. Similarly, if we remember the principle of cause and effect it will be of great value to us as we continue to study the Buddha's teachings when we come to consider karma and rebirth or when we come to consider dependent origination. In short, throughout all the Buddha's teachings we will see that the principle of cause and effect runs like a thread.
Let us now look at the first of the Four Noble Truths, the truth of suffering (Duhkha). Many non-Buddhists and even some Buddhists have felt disturbed by the choice of suffering as the first of the Four Noble Truths and many have said that this is an indication of pessimism. I often find non-Buddhists saying to me "Why is Buddhism so pessimistic? Why does it begin with and emphasize suffering?" There are a number of answers to this question. Some of you may be familiar with the distinction between pessimism, optimism and realism. Let us put it this way. If one is suffering from a disease and one refuses to recognize the fact that one is ill this is not being optimistic, this is merely being foolish. It is analogous to the ostrich burying its head in the sand. If there is a problem the only sensible thing to do is to recognize the problem and see what can be done to eliminate it. Secondly, if the Buddha had taught only the truth of suffering and had stopped at that, then there might be some truth in the charge that the teachings of the Buddha are pessimistic. But the teachings of the Buddha do not end with the truth of suffering because the Buddha taught not only the truth of suffering but also the truth of its cause and more importantly in this context the truth of its cessation.

All of us, I am quite sure, if we are honest with ourselves, will admit that there is a fundamental problem with life. Things are not as they should be. Something in somewhere is not quite right. And no matter how much we may try to run away from it, at some time or other, perhaps in the middle of the night, or perhaps in the middle of a crowd, or perhaps in the moment during one's work, we do come face to face with ourselves, the realization that things are not all as they should be, that something is wrong somewhere. This is what in fact impels people to seek solutions. They may seek solutions in more material things or they may seek solutions in various therapies.

In Buddhism, specifically the truth of suffering can be divided into two categories, broadly speaking, physical and mental. Here the physical sufferings are the sufferings of birth, old age, sickness and death. You can recall that last week we touched upon the Buddha's encounter with sickness, old age and death in the form of the three sights - the sick man, old man and the corpse. Here we find a fourth suffering, the suffering of birth. Birth is suffering because of the physical pain suffered by the infant and because birth impels all the other sufferings. Birth in a sense is the gateway to the other sufferings of sickness, old age and death which follow inevitably upon birth. I think one need hardly spend much time on the suffering of sickness, old age and death. Most of us have experience of suffering from sickness and we have also observed the suffering of sickness in our friends and relatives. We have all observed the suffering of old age, the inability to work, to function and to think coherently. We have all observed the suffering of death, the pain, and the fear experienced by the dying. These sufferings are an inevitable part of life. No matter how happy and contented our lives may be, the sufferings of birth, old age, sickness and death are absolutely unavoidable.

In addition to these physical sufferings there are mental sufferings. There is the suffering of separation from our loved ones, separation either due to reasons of work or because those whom we love die or because those whom we love have to go away, or because we have to leave them. Then there is the suffering of contact with those whom we dislike or those who dislike us. It can take very mild forms such as a colleague at work who is antagonistic to us and we dread to go to work because we know that this person whom we dislike somehow always wants to find fault with us. It can take more radical forms such as persecution, torture and so forth. Finally there is the suffering of frustrated desire, when we cannot get what we want, when we cannot get that job, the position that we want, when we cannot win over this or that person. These physical and mental sufferings are woven into the fabric of our existence. But what about happiness? Is there no happiness or enjoyment in life? Of course there is. But the pleasure or happiness which we experience in life is impermanent. We may enjoy a happy situation, we may enjoy the company of someone we love, we may enjoy youth and health and yet all these forms of happiness are impermanent. Sooner or later we will experience suffering.

If we really want to do something about suffering, to solve the problem of suffering, we must identify its cause. If the lights go out and we want to set it right we have to identify its cause. We have to find out whether it is a short circuit or whether a fuse has blown or whether perhaps the power supply has been cut off. Similarly, when we recognize the problem of suffering we have to look for the cause. It is by understanding the cause of suffering that we can do something to solve the problem. What is the cause of suffering according to the Buddha? The Buddha has taught that craving or desire (Trishna or Raga) is a great cause of suffering - craving for pleasant experiences, craving for material things, craving for eternal life and craving for eternal death. We all enjoy good food, we all enjoy fine music, pleasant company. We enjoy all these things and we want more and more of these things. We try to prolong these pleasant experiences. We try to Bet more and more of these pleasures. And yet somehow we are never completely satisfied. We may find that we are fond of a particular kind of food and yet if we eat it again and again we get bored with it. We try another kind of food. We like it, enjoy it and again we get bored with it. We go on to look for something else, we get tired of our favourite piece of music. We get tired of our friends. We look for more and more. Sometimes this chase after pleasant experiences leads one to extremely negative forms of behavior such as alcoholism and drug addiction. All of these are the cravings for satisfaction of our desires for pleasant experiences. It is said that trying to satisfy one's desire for pleasant experiences is like drinking salt water when one is thirsty. If one drinks salt water to satisfy one's thirst, one's thirst, rather than being quenched, is only increased.

Not only do we crave for pleasant experiences but we also crave for material things. You can see this clearly in children. I have a five year old son. Take him into a toy shop and he will want every toy in the shop. And perhaps he will buy a toy. Almost as soon as he has bought the toy he begins to lose interest in it, and without fail, within a few days the toy will be neglected in the corner of the room and he will want another toy. While this can be seen very clearly in young children, are we any different? After we have bought that new car don't we want another one? After we have got a new house don't we think "Well, this house is quite nice, but it will be even nicer if I can get a better one, one with a little garden or one with four rooms, or a point block, or a condominium." And it goes on and on, whether it is a train set or a bicycle or a video recorder or a Mercedes Benz. It is said that the desire for acquiring wealth or possession is involved with three major sufferings, or problems. The first one is the problem of getting it. You have to work, and save enough to buy that car or that house. Secondly, there is the suffering of protecting it. You worry that someone might bang your car, you worry that your house may burn down or be damaged by the rain. Finally there is the suffering of losing them, because sooner or later they will fall apart.

Craving for existence or eternal life is a cause of suffering. We all crave for existence, we all crave for life. Despite all the suffering and frustration of life we all crave for life. And it is this craving which causes us to be born again and again. Then there is the desire for annihilation, the desire for non-existence, what we might call the desire for eternal death. This expresses itself in nihilism and in suicide. Craving for existence is one extreme. Craving for non-existence is another extreme.

You may ask, "Is craving alone a sufficient cause of suffering? Is craving alone enough to explain suffering? Is the answer as simple as that?" The answer is no. There is something that goes deeper than craving. There is something which in a sense is the foundation of craving. And that something is ignorance (Avidya).

Ignorance is not seeing things as they really are, or failing to understand the reality of experience or the reality of life. All those who are well educated may feel uneasy about being told that they are ignorant. I can recall what Professor Lancaster who visited Singapore a few months ago said regarding this. He said this is one of the most difficult things to explain to university students in the United States when they begin a course in Buddhist studies because they are all very happy and proud to be in the university. Here you have to tell them that they are ignorant. He says always the hands shoot up immediately, "How are we ignorant? In what sense are we ignorant?" Let me say this. Without the right conditions, without the right training and without the right instruments we are unable to see things as they really are. None of us would be aware of radio waves if it were not for the radio receiver. None of us would be aware of bacteria in a drop of water if it were not for microscopes, and none of us would be aware of molecular structure if it were not for the latest techniques of electron microscopy. All these facts about the world in which we live in are known and observed only because of special training, special conditions and special instruments. When we say that ignorance is failure to see things as they really are, what we mean is that so long as one has not developed one's ability to concentrate one's mind and insight so one is ignorant of the true nature of things. We are familiar with the fear that we experience when we see a shape in the darkness by the side of the road while walking home alone late at night. That shape by the side of the road may be a tree stump. Yet it is our ignorance that causes us to quicken our steps, perhaps our palms may begin to perspire, we may reach home in a panic. If there were a light there would be no fear and no suffering because there would be no ignorance. We would have seen the tree stump for what it is.

Specifically in Buddhism, we are speaking about ignorance regarding the self, taking the self as real. This is the fundamental cause of suffering. We take our body or ideas or feelings as a self, as a real independent ego just as we take the tree stump for a potential assailant. Once we have this idea of self we have an idea of something that is apart from or different from ourselves. Once we have this idea of something that is apart or different from ourselves, then it is either helpful or hostile. It is either pleasant or unpleasant to ourselves. From this notion of self we have craving and ill-will. Once we believe in the real existence of ourselves, that "we" exist in reality, independently, apart from all others, apart from all the physical objects that surround us, we crave and desire and want those things which benefit us and we are averse towards those things which do not benefit us, which damage us or which are unhelpful to us. Because of this failure to see that in this body and mind there is no independent, permanent self, desire and ill-will inevitably thrive. Out of the root and the trunk of ignorance grow the branches of craving - desire, greed, ill-will, anger, hatred, envy, jealousy, pride and the whole lot. All these branches grow out of the root and trunk of ignorance and these branches bear the fruits of suffering. So here, ignorance is the under-lying cause, and craving, ill-will, greed and anger are the secondary or subsequent causes.

After having identified the causes of suffering one is in a position to put out an end to suffering. Just as when one might identify the cause of that pain in one's lower abdomen on the left side as appendicitis, one would then be in a position to remove the cause of the pain. One can put an end to suffering by eliminating the cause of suffering, by eliminating craving, ill-will and ignorance. Here we come to the Third Noble Truth, the truth of the end of suffering.

In dealing with the truth of the end of suffering, the first obstacle that we have to overcome is the doubt that exists in some minds of whether an end of suffering is really possible. Whether one can really end suffering, or whether one can really be cured. It is in this context that confidence or faith plays an important role in Buddhism. When we speak of confidence or faith we do not speak of faith in the sense of blind acceptance. We speak of faith in the sense of recognizing or admitting the possibility of achieving the goal of the end of suffering. If you do not believe that a doctor can cure you of that pain in your abdomen you will never go to a doctor, you will never take the medicine or have the operation and as a result you may die of that illness which could be cured. So confidence, belief in the possibility of being cured is an indispensable pre-requisite. Here too, as in other cases, people may say, "How can I believe in the possibility of Nirvana? How can I believe that the end of suffering is really possible when I have never experienced it?" Well, as I said a moment ago, none of us would have experienced radio waves were it not for the development of radio receivers, and none of us would have experienced microscopic life were it not for the invention of the microscope. Even now none of us here, unless there is any physicist in this room, have actually observed electrons and yet we accept them because there are those among us with the special training, and special instruments who have observed electrons. So here too as regards the possibility of the end of suffering and the possibility of attaining Nirvana, we ought not to reject the possibility of attaining Nirvana outright simply because we have not experienced it, simply because we have not seen it for ourselves. Many of you may be familiar with the old story of the turtle and the fish. One day the turtle left the pond and spent a few hours on the bank. When he returned to the water he told the fish of his experiences on the bank. The fish would not believe him. The fish would not believe that there existed a place known as dry land because it was totally unlike what the fish knew, what the fish was familiar with. The fish would not believe that there was a place where creatures walked rather than swam, where one breathed air rather than water, and so forth. There are many historical examples of this tendency to reject information that does not tally with what we already believe, or what we are already familiar with. When Marco Polo returned to Italy from his travels to the Far East, he was imprisoned because his account did not tally with what was then believed about the nature of the Universe. When Copernicus advanced the theory that the sun did not circle the earth but in fact that the case was the opposite, he was disbelieved and ridiculed. We ought to be on guard against dismissing the possibility of the complete end of suffering or the possibility of attaining Nirvana simply because we have not ex-perienced it ourselves. Once we accept that the end of suffering is possible, that we can be cured of an illness, then we can proceed with the steps that are necessary in order to achieve that cure. But unless and until we believe that that cure is possible there is no question of successfully completing the treatment. In order therefore to realize progress on the path, to realize eventually the end of suffering one has to have at least confidence in the possibility of achieving the goal, in the possibility of attaining Nirvana.

FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS PART II

When we speak of the end of suffering, the truth of the cessation of suffering, we are speaking of the goal of the Buddhist path. In one place the Buddha says that just as the ocean, though vast, is of one taste - the taste of salt, so is in His teachings. Although there are many items, all these teachings as vast as the ocean have only one taste, and that is the taste of Nirvana. As you will see, although there are many items of Buddhist teachings - the Four Noble Truths, the three ways of practice, dependent origination, the three characteristics and so on, all these teachings have one goal in view and that goal is the cessation of suffering. It is the goal that gives all the various teachings that we find in Buddhism their directions and purposes. The end of suffering is the goal of Buddhist practice and yet this end of suffering is not something which is only transcendental, which is only ultimate. This is interesting because yesterday I was asked to speak on the origin and development of the Semitic religions and at the end of the session one of the questions raised was "What is the final goal of the Semitic religions and what is the distinction between the spiritual goal offered by the Semitic religions and the goal offered by Buddhism?" In the case of the Semitic religions, I think it is fair to say that there are two goals. One refers to this life, and is expressed in the sense of building a kingdom of love, prosperity and justice in this world. The other higher goal refers to attaining heaven in the after-life. But in Buddhism we have a much more comprehensive treatment. In other words, this goal of the end of suffering that the Buddha speaks of is very broad and comprehensive in its meaning. Because when we speak of the end of suffering, we can mean the end of suffering here and now, either temporarily or permanently. Let us see whether we can explain this in greater detail. Suppose we happen to be in dire poverty - insufficient food, medicine, schools and so forth. There are sufferings such as birth, sickness, disease and old age, separation from one's loved ones, contact with those whom we do not. When we remedy the situation here and now through achieving prosperity, through developing our medical and educational systems, our sufferings are reduced. Buddhism teaches that the particular happiness or suffering that is experienced in this life is the result of our actions done in the past. In other words, if we are in fortunate conditions, these conditions are the results of good or wholesome actions done in the past. Similarly, those who find themselves in less fortunate conditions, those conditions are the results of unwholesome actions done in the past.

What does Buddhism offer in the way of the end of suffering? Practicing Buddhism results in the short term in relative happiness in this life. This happiness can be of a material variety in the sense of better material conditions or it can be of a spiritual variety in the sense of greater peace or happiness of mind. All of these are achievable in this very life here and now. This is one dimension of the end of suffering in this life. And this is equivalent to what the Semitic religions call the king-dom on earth. In addition to this, the end of suffering means happiness and good fortune in the next life, in the sense of rebirth in fortunate circumstances, in circum-stances of happiness, prosperity, health, well-being, success and so on. And this can be as a human being on this earth or it can be in the heavens. We can liken it to the Heaven that the Semitic religions speak of. The goal of Buddhism initially means happiness and prosperity in this life and next. But the goal of Buddhism is more than just that and it is here that Buddhism differs from the Semitic religions because not only does Buddhism promise happiness and prosperity in this life and next, Buddhism also offers liberation - Nirvana, the total, absolute and permanent cessation of suffering. This is the ultimate and final goal of Buddhism.

When we speak of Nirvana, we encounter certain problems of expression because when we are speaking of an experience, the exact nature of that experience cannot be communicated. It has to be experienced directly. This is true of all experiences whether they be the experiences of the taste of salt, sugar, chocolate or whatever. All these experiences cannot be exactly described. I often ask people here in Singapore in order to make this point. Imagine I have just recently arrived in Singapore and I have not eaten a durian. How would you describe to me the taste of a durian. Would it be possible to describe accurately the taste of a durian if I have not eaten one myself? We can describe it by means of comparison or simile or by means of negation. So, for instance, you might say that a durian is slightly sour, that it has a mealy texture. You might say a durian is something like a jackfruit or you might say a durian is not like a banana. So we have a similar kind of problem when we come to try to describe Nirvana. We find that the Buddha and Buddhist teachers have used these kinds of device to describe Nirvana.

The Buddha described Nirvana as supreme happiness, as peace, as immortal. Similarly, He has described Nirvana as uncreated, unformed, as beyond the earth, as beyond water, fire, air, beyond the sun and moon, unfathomable, unmeasurable. So we have two approaches to the description of Nirvana. One is the positive approach where we liken Nirvana to something which we experience in this world where, say, when one experiences intense happiness accompanied by pro-found peace of mind one can imagine that one is experiencing a faint glimpse of Nirvana. But a jackfruit is not really like a durian. Similarly, we can say that Nirvana is not like anything in this world, is not like any experience that we have from day to day. It is uncreated. It is beyond the sun and the moon. It is beyond all these names and forms which we are used to thinking in terms of, through which we experience the world. The point of all these is that to understand what Nirvana is really like one has to experience it for oneself. To know what a durian is really like, one has to eat it. No amount of essays, no amount of descriptions of durians will even approach the experience of eating one. One has to experience the end of suffering for oneself and the way that one does it is through eliminating the causes of suffering - the defilements of desire (Rage) ill-will (Dosha) and ignorance (Avidya). When one has totally eliminated these causes of suffering, then one will experience for oneself Nirvana.

How does one remove these causes of suffering? What are the means through which one can remove the defilements that lead to suffering? This is the path taught by the Buddha. It is the Middle Path, the path of moderation. You will recall that the life of the Buddha before His Enlightenment falls into two quite distinct periods. The period before renunciation was a period when He enjoyed all the luxury possible. For instance, we are told that He had three palaces, one for each season. He experienced luxury to an extent which we can scarcely imagine. This period of luxury was superseded by six years of extreme asceticism and self-mortification when He abandoned the essential amenities of life, a period in which He lived in the open, wore the poorest garments and fasted for lengthy periods. In addition to these privations, He experienced the suffering of torturing His body through various practices of self-mortification - sleeping on beds of thorns and sitting in the midst of fires in the heat of the noon-day sun. Having experienced the extremes of luxury and privations, having reached the limits of these extremes, He saw their futility and He discovered the Middle Way that avoids the extremes of indulgence in pleasures of the senses and self-mortification. It was through realizing the nature of the extremes in His own experience that He was able to arrive at the Middle Path, the path that avoids the two extremes. As we shall see in the subsequent weeks, the Middle Path is capable of many profound and significant interpretations, but most importantly and most essentially, it means moderation in one's approach to life, in one's attitude, in all things. We use the example of the three strings of the lute to illustrate the Middle Path. The Buddha once had a disciple by the name of Sona who practiced meditation so intensely that he could not progress in his meditation. He began to think of abandoning his life as a monk. The Buddha, who understood his problem, said to him, "Sona, before you became a monk you were a musician". Sona said that was true. So the Buddha said, "As a musician which string of the lute produces a pleasant and harmonious sound. The over-tight string?" "No," said Sona, "The over-tight string produces an unpleasant sound and is moreover likely to break at any moment." "The string that is too loose?" Again, "No, the string that is too loose does not produce a tuneful sound. The string that produces a tuneful sound is the string that is not too tight and not too loose." So here the life of luxury is too loose, without discipline. The life of mortification is too tight, too tense, too likely to cause the breakdown of the mind and body just as the oversight string is likely to break at any moment.

Specifically, the path to the Buddhist goal is like a medical prescription. When a competent doctor treats a patient for a serious illness, his prescription is not only physical, it is also psychological. If one is suffering, for instance, from heart disease, one is not only given medication. One is also asked to control one's diet and to avoid stressful situations. Here too when we look at the specific instructions with regard to following the path to the end of suffering, we can see that the instructions refer not only to one's body actions and words, but also to one's thoughts. In other words, the Noble Eightfold Path, the path to the end of suffering is a comprehensive path, an integrated therapy. It is designed to cure the disease through eliminating the causes, through treatment that applies not only to the body but also to the mind.

Right understanding is the first step of the Noble Eightfold Path and it is followed by Right Thought, Right Speech, Right Action, Right Livelihood, Right Effort, Right Mindfulness and Right Concentration. Why do we begin with Right Understanding? It is because in order to climb a mountain we have to have the summit clearly in view. In this sense, the first step depends on the last. We have to have our goal in view if we are to travel a path to reach that goal. In this sense, Right Understanding gives direction and an orientation to the other steps of the path. We see here that the first two steps of the path, Right Understanding and Right Thought refer to the mind. Through Right Under-standing and Right Thought we eliminate ignorance, greed and anger. But it is not enough to say that through Right Understanding and Right Thought we eliminate ignorance, greed and anger because in order to achieve Right Understanding and Right Thought we also need to cultivate, to purify our mind and our body. The way that this is done is through the other six steps of the path. We purify our physical existence so that it will be easier to purify our mind, and we purify our mind so that it will be easier to attain Right Understanding.

For convenience' sake, the Noble Eightfold Path has been traditionally divided into the three groups of training or the three ways of practice and they are morality or good conduct (Shila), meditation or mental development (Samadhi), and wisdom or insight (Prajna). The eight steps of the path are divided into these three ways of practice as follows - Right Speech, Right Action and Right Livelihood belong to the way of good conduct; Right Effort, Right Mindfulness and Right Concentration belong to the way of mental develop-ment, and Right Understanding and Right Thought belong to the way of wisdom. Because it is necessary to purify our words and actions before we can purify our mind, we begin our progress along the path with good conduct. As the Noble Eightfold Path is the means of arriving at the goal of Buddhism, we will be spending the next three weeks dealing with these three ways of practice.

MORALITY

Last week we completed our survey of the Four Noble Truths and in so doing the last topic that we dealt with was the Noble Eightfold Path to the end of suffering. We used the analogy of mountain climbing when we talked about treading the Eightfold Path to the end of suffering. We have said that just as when one climbs a mountain the first step depends on the last, the last depends on the first because we have to have our eyes firmly fixed on the summit of the mountain and yet we also have to be careful not to stumble while taking the first few steps up to the mountain path. So here in climbing a mountain, each portion of the path depends on the other portions. In this sense, regarding the Noble Eightfold Path, all the steps of the path are interrelated, are dependent on one another. We cannot do away with any one step. Nonetheless, for practical purposes the eight steps of the path have been divided into three ways of practice, or three divisions of training. These three divisions are good conduct or morality (Shila), mental development or meditation (Samadhi) and finally wisdom or insight (Prajna). Although conceptually and structurally, the first step depends upon the last and the last depends upon the first; although they are dependent on one another, still in practical terms when one climbs a mountain one has to climb the lowest slope first. One may be attracted to the summit, but in order to get there one has to cover the lower slope first. It is for this very practical reason that we find the eight steps of the Eight-fold Path grouped into these three ways of practice.

The first of these three ways is good conduct. Good conduct forms a foundation for further progress on the path, for further personal development. It is said that just as the earth is the base of all animate and inanimate things, so is morality the foundation of all qualities. When we look around us we can see that everything rests upon the earth, whether it be the building, whether it be the tree and bush, or whether it be the animal. The earth is the foundation, and in the same manner morality is the foundation of all qualities, all virtues, all attainments ranging from the mundane to the supra-mundane, ranging from success, good fortune all the way up to skill in meditation, wisdom and enlightenment. Through this metaphor, we can under-stand the importance of good conduct as a foundation for following the path, as a basis for achieving results on the path.

Why do we take time to stress the importance of good conduct as a foundation for progress on the path? The reason is that there is a tendency to think of good conduct as rather boring, rather dull. Meditation sounds more exciting and interesting. Philosophy has a kind of fascination about it. There is a dangerous tendency to neglect the importance of good conduct and to go to the more exciting parts of the path. But if we do not create this foundation of good conduct, we will not succeed in treading the other parts of the path.

We have to understand the way in which the precepts or the rules of good conduct are established within Buddhism because there are various ways in which moral or ethical codes are established. If you look at the moral codes of the major religions, you will find that there is a surprising correspondence. If you look at the moral teachings of Confucius, of Lao Tzu, of the Buddha, of Hindu teachers, Christians, Muslims, and Jews, you will find that regarding the basic rules of morality, there is a large degree of correspondence. But while the rules in many cases correspond, the attitude, the ways in which the rules are presented, understood and interpreted differ considerably from religion to religion. Essentially, to generalize, there are two ways in which moral codes can be established. One way we might call the authoritarian way, and the other we might call the democratic way. And a good example of the first is God's handing down the Ten Commandments to Moses on the mountain. On the other hand in Buddhism, I think what we have here might be called a democratic way of establishing the rules of good conduct. You might wonder why I say that. After all we do have the rules of good conduct laid down in scriptures. So you might ask is this not similar to God's handing down the tablets to Moses? But I think this is not really so because if we look closely at the scriptures, we do find what lies behind the rules of good conduct, and the principles that lie behind that are the foundation of the rules of good conduct, are the principles of equality and reciprocity.

What equality means is that all living beings are equal in their essential attitudes. In other words, all living beings want to be happy. They fear pain, death and suffering. All want to live, to enjoy happiness and security. And this is also true to all living beings just as it is true to ourselves. We can call this equality the great universality of the Buddhist vision in which all living beings are equal. On the basis of this equality, we are encouraged to act with the awareness of reciprocity.

Reciprocity means that just as we would not like to be killed, robbed, abused and so forth, so would all other living beings not like to have these things happen to them. One can put this principle of reciprocity quite simply by saying "do not act towards others in a way which you would not want them to act towards you". Given these principles of equality and reciprocity, it is not hard to see how they stand behind, how they create the foundation for the rules of good conduct.

Let us now look specifically at the contents of good conduct in Buddhism. The way of practice of good conduct includes three parts of the Noble Eightfold Path, and these three parts are Right Speech, Right Action, and Right Livelihood. Speech is an extremely important part of our life. We often tend to under-estimate the power of speech. We often tend to exercise very little control over our faculty of speech. This should not be so. We have all been very greatly hurt by someone's words at some time of our life. And similarly, we have been encouraged by the words of another. In the sphere of politics, we can see how those who are able to communicate effectively are able to influence people tremendously for better or for worse. Hitler, Churchill, Martin Luther King were all accomplished speakers who were able to influence millions of people with their words. It is said that a harsh word can wound more deeply than weapons. A gentle word can change the heart and mind of the most hardened criminal. Probably more than anything else, the faculty of speech differentiates man from animals. So if one is to develop a society in which harmony, well-being, communication and co-operation are goals which are to be realized, one must control, cultivate and utilize one's faculty of speech positively.

All the rules of good conduct involve respect that is founded upon the understanding of equality and reciprocity. In this context, right speech involves respect for truth and respect for the welfare of others. If one speaks with these criteria in mind, one will be cultivating right speech and through this one will achieve greater harmony within society. Traditionally we speak of four aspects of right speech. Right speech means to avoid lying, to avoid back biting or slander, to avoid harsh speech, and to avoid idle talk. Some of you may recall the Buddha's instruction to Rahula regarding the importance of avoiding lying. He used the example of a vessel. The vessel had a tiny bit of water in the bottom and He asked, "Rahula, see the small amount of water in the bottom of the vessel. Those who are not ashamed of lying, their virtue is small, their renunciation is small like the small amount of water in the vessel." Then the Buddha threw away the water and said, "those who are not ashamed of lying throw away their virtue just as this water is thrown away." Then the Buddha showed Rahula the empty vessel and said, "just so empty is the virtue, the renunciation of those who habitually tell lies."

Thus He used the vessel as a means to illustrate the point that lying is intimately associated with one's practice of wholesome actions, with one's good conduct, with one's character. Once we are confident that we can act in one way and speak in another, then we will not be afraid to act badly, because we will be confident that we can cover up our bad actions by lying. Lying therefore opens the door to all kinds of unwholesome actions. Slander is divisive. It creates quarrels between friends. It creates pain and discord. So just as one would not want to be divided from one's friend by slander, so ought one not to slander another. So also one ought not to abuse others with harsh words, but on the contrary should speak courteously to others as one would like to be spoken to oneself. Regarding idle talk, often you hear of people saying that we cannot even indulge in a bit of idle talk. It is not quite that bad. Here the kind of idle talk that is particularly indicated refers to malicious gossips, diverting oneself, entertain-ing oneself, recounting the faults and failings of others. Rather than use this faculty of speech which is so powerful for deception, for dividing others, for abusing others, for idling away time at the expense of others, why not use it constructively, to communicate meaning-fully, to unite others, to encourage understanding between neighbors and friends, and to communicate helpful, meaningful advice. The Buddha once said, "Pleasant speech is as sweet as honey, truthful speech is as beautiful as a flower, and wrong speech is unwhole-some and filthy". So let us try for our own good and that of others to cultivate Right Speech, respect for truth, and respect for the welfare of others.

The next part of the path that falls under good conduct is Right Action. Right Action entails respect for life, respect for property, and respect for personal relationships. We will recall what was said a moment ago about life being dear to all. It is said in the Dharmapada that all tremble at punishment, all fear death, and that all living beings love life. So again, keeping in mind the principles of equality and reciprocity, we ought not to kill living beings. One might be ready to accept this in regard to human beings, but we might demur with regard to other living creatures. Some of the developments that we have seen taking place in the world of science and technology in recent years ought to give the most skeptical free-thinker food for thought. When one destroys a certain strain of insects, is one absolutely sure of accomplishing the greatest good, the long-term good of the environment? Or do we more often than not contribute unwittingly to an imbalance which creates even greater problems in the future? Respect for property - not to steal from or cheat others. This is important because those who take what is not given by stealth, by treachery are as guilty of breaking this precept as those who steal by force. In other words, the employer who does not pay his employee an honest wage that is commensurate with his work is guilty of taking what is not given. Similarly, the employee who collects a salary and shirks his duties is guilty of lack of respect for property. Finally respect for personal relationship means to avoid adultery, to avoid sexual misconduct. You can see how, if these guidelines are sincerely cultivated within a society, such a society will be a better place to live in.

The third step of the Noble Eightfold Path included in the way of good conduct is Right Livelihood. Right Livelihood is an extension of the rules of Right Action to one's role as a breadwinner in a society. We have seen that with regard to Right Speech and Right Action the underlying principles behind the rules are respect for truth, life, property and personal relationships. Right Livelihood means that one ought not to earn a living in such a way as to violate these principles which are underlying principles of good conduct. Specifically, there are five kinds of livelihood that are discouraged for Buddhists. These are trading in animals for slaughter, dealing in slaves, dealing in weapons, dealing in poisons, and dealing in intoxicants, those are drugs and alcoholic drinks. These five kinds of livelihood are discouraged because they contribute to the ills of society and because they violate the principles of respect for life and so forth. Dealing in the slaughter of animals violates respect for life. Dealing in slaves violates respect for life and personal relationships. Dealing in deadly weapons violates the principle of respect for life. Dealing in poisons violates the principle of respect for life. Dealing in intoxicants violates the principle of respect for the welfare of others. All these trades contribute to the insecurity, to the suffering and discord in society.

How does good conduct function? We have said that, in regard to society, following the rules of good conduct creates a society characterized by harmony and peace. All social goals can be achieved through the principles and rules of good conduct based upon the fundamental recognition of equality and reciprocity. In addition, the individual also benefits through the practice of good conduct. In one Sutra, the Buddha said, "he who has practiced respect for life and so forth, he feels as a king duly crowned and his enemies subdued. He feels at peace, at ease." The practice of good conduct creates within the individual an inner sense of peace, of stability, of security and of strength. Once he has created that inner peace, he can then fruitfully and successfully practice the other steps of the path. He can cultivate and develop meditation. He can achieve wisdom only when he has created both inwardly and outwardly in his relationships with others and in himself the necessary foundation of good conduct.

Very briefly, these are the origin, contents and goal of good conduct.
I would like to touch on one point before I stop today, and that is when people look at the rules of good conduct, they often say how can they possibly follow the rules of good conduct. It is terribly difficult to observe the precepts. For instance, even the precept against taking life can sometimes seem awfully difficult to follow. When you clean up you kitchen, you quite likely may kill some ants. Again, it may seem difficult to always observe the precept of Right Speech. How are we to deal with this problem which is a genuine one? It is not the point whether we can observe all the rules of good conduct all the time. The point is, if the rules of good conduct are well founded, if we can accept that equality and reciprocity are principles we believe in, if we acknowledge that the rules are appropriate to implementing those principles, then it is our duty to practice, to follow the rules of good conduct as much as we can. That is not to say that we will be able to follow the rules absolutely all the time. But it is to say that if we accept that in order to live at peace with ourselves and others, we ought to respect the life of other living beings, respect their property and so forth. And if a situation arises in which we find ourselves unable to apply a particular rule in a particular situation, then that is not the fault of the rule. That simply is the gap between our own practice and the ideal.

When a navigator steers his ship across the ocean by the stars, he is not able to follow precisely the course indicated by the stars. Yet the stars are his guide and by following the stars however inaccurately or approxi-mately, he reaches his destination. In the same way, when we follow the rules of good conduct we do not pretend that we can observe them all the time. This is why for instance the five precepts are called the training precepts and that is why we take them again and again. What we have in the rules of good conduct is a framework through which we can try to live in accord with the fundamental principles that illuminate the Buddhist teachings, the principle of the equality of all living beings and the principle of respect for others.

MENTAL DEVELOPMENT

Our topic today is mental development. We are going to look at the steps of the Noble Eightfold Path that fall into the group known as mental development, meditation or Samadhi. We have spoken about how the steps of the path are interrelated and in this context it is particularly interesting to understand the position of mental development because standing as it is between good conduct and wisdom it is relevant and important for both of them. You may ask why this is the case. In fact sometimes people have said to me regarding the need for meditation. If one simply follows the moral precepts, is that not sufficient to lead a moral life?

I think there are several answers to this question. First of all, in Buddhism there is not only one goal. Besides the goal of happiness and good fortune, there is also the goal of freedom. If one wants to attain the goal of freedom, the only way that can be achieved is through wisdom. And in order to achieve wisdom one has to purify the mind, develop the mind through meditation. Even for the practice of good conduct, for the observance of moral rules, mental development is necessary. Why? Because it is relatively easy to follow the rules of good conduct when things are going well. If we have a good job, if we live in a stable society, if we earn sufficiently to support ourselves and our families, it is relatively easy to observe the precepts. But when we find ourselves in circumstances of stress, of instability, as for instance when we lose our job, when we find ourselves in a situation where lawlessness prevails, this is the point at which the observance of good conduct comes under attack. In this kind of circumstances, the only thing that can safeguard our practice of good conduct is mental development, strengthening of the mind, attaining control over the mind. In that way, mental development on the one hand serves as a safeguard of our practice and on the other hand it serves to prepare the mind to see things as they really are, to prepare the mind to attain wisdom which will open the door to freedom, to enlightenment. Mental development therefore has an extremely important role in the practice of the Noble Eightfold Path.

This emphasis on mental development is not surprising if we remember the importance of the role of the mind in experience in Buddhism. I remember a week before last, someone in the audience remarked that it seemed as though the mind was the most important thing in regard to the steps of the Noble Eightfold Path. I remarked that this was a very significant and true statement. We find this very clearly in the Buddha's own words. The Buddha has said that the mind is the source of all mental states, that all mental states are fashioned by the mind. It is also said that the mind is the source of all virtues, of all qualities. In order to attain these virtues, one must discipline the mind. Mind is the key to changing the nature of our experience. It was once said that if we had to cover the whole surface of the earth in order to protect our feet from being cut by sticks and stones, if we had to cover the whole surface of the earth with leather, this would be a very difficult undertaking. But by covering only the surface of our feet with leather it is as if the whole surface of the earth were covered with leather. In the same way if we had to purify the whole universe of greed, anger and delusion, it would be a very difficult task. Simply by purifying our own mind of greed, anger and delusion it is as if the whole universe were purified of these defilements. That is why in Buddhism we focus upon the mind as the key to achieving a change in the way we experience life, in the way we relate to other people.
The importance of the mind has recently been recognized by scientists, psychologists and doctors. Some of you may be aware of some of the techniques that are being used by medical practitioners in the West. A number of doctors have successfully employed techniques very similar to the techniques of meditation in order to help patients overcome chronic diseases and disorders. This is now a recognized fact within the medical profession. Not long ago I was told of a case involving the wife of a professor. Their family doctor has begun to use techniques of mental development to treat patients. who are suffering from certain complaints.. The lady was told that she would need an operation to correct a certain disorder. Alternatively, it was suggested that she practice this technique of mental development twice a day for a period of two months. Having practiced this, it was found that she no longer required the operation. We can all understand the influence the mind has on our attitude by looking at our own experience. We know how we occasionally feel happy and have a positive attitude towards our activities, and when this happens we are efficient, we respond and we are able to carry out our activities in the best possible way. On other occasions when our mind is disturbed and depressed, we find that we cannot even discharge simple tasks efficiently. In this way, we can see how important the mind is in all spheres of activity.

There are three steps of the Noble Eightfold Path that are included in this mental development group and they are Right Effort, Right Mindfulness and Right Concentration. Together these three steps encourage and enable one to be self reliant, attentive and calm. First of all, in its most general sense Right Effort means cultivating a positive attitude towards our undertakings. We can call Right Effort enthusiasm as well. It means undertaking our tasks with energy, with a will to carry them through. It is said in one text that we ought to embark upon our tasks in the same way as an elephant enters a cool lake during the heat of the midday sun. With this kind of effort, we can then be successful in whatever we plan to do, whether in our career, in our study, or in our practice of the Dharma. In this sense effort is also related to confidence. It is a practical application of confidence. If we fail to put effort into whatever we do, we cannot hope to succeed. But effort must be controlled, must be balanced, and here we can recall what we said regarding the Middle Path, the strings of the lute, the overly tight string and the overly loose string. So effort should never become too tense, too extreme, and similarly, it should not become too slack, should not be abandoned. This is what we mean by Right Effort, a controlled, sustained, enthusiastic, cheerful determination.

Right Effort is defined as four fold. It is the effort to prevent unwholesome thoughts from arising. It is the effort to reject unwholesome thoughts once they have arisen. It is the effort to cultivate wholesome thoughts. It is the effort to maintain wholesome thoughts. This last is particularly important because it is often the case that even when we have succeeded in cultivating wholesome attitudes, all too often these are short-lived. Between them, these four aspects of Right Effort focus the energy of Right Effort upon our mental states in such a way as to reduce and eventually eliminate the number of unwholesome mental states that we entertain in our mind and to increase and firmly establish wholesome thoughts as a natural integral part of our mental states.

The second step of the Noble Eightfold Path that is included in the group of mental development is Right Mindfulness. Right Mindfulness is essential even in our daily life. This Buddhist teaching, in fact I would venture to say all Buddhist teachings can be explained, can be exemplified with situations that belong to everyday life, that are familiar to all of us. In fact if you look at the Buddha's own teachings, you will find that He always used examples that were familiar to his audience when teaching the Dharma. So here too in regard to mindfulness, we may do well to look at the importance of mindfulness in our ordinary mundane activities. Mindfulness is awareness or attention, avoid-ing a distracted and clouded state of mind. There would be many fewer accidents if everyone were mindful. So whether one is driving a car, or crossing a busy street, or doing accounts, whatever one is doing, that task would be more effectively carried out if one is attentive and mindful. It will increase one's efficiency, productivity, and similarly it will reduce the number of accidents that occur due to inattention, due to the failure to be aware.

Specifically, in regard to the practice of the Dharma, mindfulness acts as a rein upon our mind. In this sense, if we consider how our mind normally behaves, we can see a need for a rein, a control upon our mind. A moment ago, there was a gust of wind which caused a window over here on my right to bang. I am sure that most of our minds immediately focussed upon that sound. Similarly, at almost every moment of our life, our minds are running after objects of the senses. The mind is never concentrated, or still. The objects of the senses may be sounds, or they may be sights. As you drive down the streets, your eyes may be caught by an attractive advertisement, your mind will be attracted to that advertisement. When you smell someone's perfume, your mind will become entangled with that object. All these are the causes of distraction. So in order to control, to minimize this distraction, we need a kind of guard which can protect the mind from becoming entangled with objects of the senses, from becoming entangled in unwholesome thoughts. This guard is mindfulness. The Buddha once told a story about two acrobats - master and apprentice. On one occasion the master said to the apprentice, "You protect me, and I will protect you. In this way we will perform our tricks and come down safely." But the apprentice said, "No master, that will not do. I will protect myself and you will protect yourself." In the same way we have to guard our own mind. Some people may say this is rather selfish. What about teamwork? But I think that is a fundamental misunderstanding. A chain is only as strong at its weakest link. A team is only as efficient as its members. A team of distracted persons who are incapable of discharging their own responsibilities will be an inefficient team. Similarly, in order that we can play an effective role in relation to our fellow beings, we must first guard our mind. Suppose you have a fine car. You will be careful to park the car in such a place so that it will not be hit by another motorist. Even at work or at home, you will occasionally look out of the window to make sure the car is all right. You will be sure to take it to the mechanic regularly. You will be sure to wash it regularly. In the same way all of us possess one thing which is far more valuable than any other possession. That one thing is our mind.

Recognizing the value of our mind, we ought to guard it. This is being mindful. This is an aspect of mental development which we can practice at any time and in any place. Sometimes I find people saying to me that it is extremely difficult to practice meditation, and often people are also somewhat afraid to practice meditation. By and large, they are thinking of concen-tration meditation or sitting meditation. But even if one is not prepared to practice concentration meditation, certainly Right Effort and Right Mindfulness can be practiced without any fear of any adverse consequences. It simply entails being aware and attentive, watching your mind, seeing where it is going, seeing what it is doing. Just as when I am talking to you now, with one corner of my mind I can watch my mind, keep an eye on my mind. What am I thinking of? Is my mind on what I am saying to you, or am I thinking about what happened this morning, or last week, or what I will be doing tomorrow. I once heard a teacher saying that if you are making a cup of tea, Buddhism means making a cup of tea well, focussing, concentrating the mind on what one is doing. This is true no matter what one is doing - cleaning the house, going to school, or cooking. No matter what one is doing, one can practice mindfulness, the practice of watching the mind, of keeping an eye on the mind.

The practice of mindfulness traditionally has played an important role in Buddhism. At one place, the Buddha has called the practice of mindfulness the one way to achieve the end of suffering. Specifically, the practice of mindfulness has been developed to include four particular applications. These are application of mindfulness with regard to body-awareness of the positions of one's limbs and so forth; mindfulness with regard to feelings pleasant, unpleasant or neutral; mindfulness with regard to moments of consciousness; and lastly mindfulness with regard to objects. These four stations of mindfulness have continued to play an important role in the practice of Buddhist meditation.

Let us go on to consider the third step, and that is concentration, or it is sometimes called meditation, or tranquility. You will recall that we traced the origin of meditation all the way back to the Indus Valley Civilization. Concentration has nothing to do with frenzy, or torpor, or semi-consciousness. Concentration is the practice of focussing the mind single-pointedly on a single object. The object may be physical or mental. When total single-pointedness of the mind upon a single object is achieved through concentration, the mind is totally absorbed in the object to the exclusion of all thoughts, distractions, wavering, agitation, or drowsi-ness. This is the object of the practice of Right Concen-tration, to focus the mind single-pointedly upon one object. Most of us have had intimations of these kind of states. Occasionally something approaching single-pointedness of mind occurs spontaneously when listening to a favourite piece of music, or watching the sea or sky. One may have experienced the moment when the mind rests single-pointedly, undistractedly upon that object, that sound or that form.

Concentration may be practiced in a number of ways. The object of concentration may be a sight such as a flame, an image, or a flower, or it may be an idea, an immaterial thing such as space, such as loving-kindness. When one practices concentration, one repeatedly focuses the mind on the object. This eventually, gradually leads to the ability to rest the mind upon the object without distraction. When this can be achieved for a protracted period, then one has achieved single-pointedness. It is important to note that this aspect of mental development has to be practiced with the guidance of an experienced teacher. This is because there are a number of technical factors that condition success or failure and they include posture, attitude, duration and occasion of practice. And it is difficult for anyone to get all these right simply by reading a book. Nonetheless, one need not become a monk to practice this kind of meditation, one need not live in a forest, and one need not abandon one's daily activities. One can begin with relatively short periods, as short as ten to fifteen minutes a day.

When one's ability in this kind of meditation is developed, it has two principal benefits. Firstly, it leads to mental and physical well-being, comfort, joy, calm, tranquility. Secondly, it turns the mind into an instrument capable of seeing things as they really are. It prepares the mind to attain wisdom. When we talk about seeing things as they really are, we liken the development towards this ability to the development of specialized instruments in science through which we have been able to observe atomic particles and so forth. Had it not been for the development of the radio receiver we would not be aware of radio waves. Similarly, if we do not develop our mind through the cultivation of Right Effort and Right Mindfulness and especially single-pointedness of the mind, our understanding of the real state of things, of truth will remain an intellectual knowledge. In order to turn our understanding of the Four Noble Truths from book knowledge into direct experience we have to achieve one-pointedness of the mind. It is at this point that mental development is ready to turn its attention to wisdom. It is at this point that we see the role of concentration in Buddhism. I touched upon this briefly when. I spoke of the Buddha's decision to leave the two teachers Arada Kalama and Udraka Ramaputra and of His combination of concentration or meditation with penetrative insight on the night of His enlightenment. So here too, single-pointedness of the mind is not enough. It is similar to sharpening the pencil to write with, or the sharpening of the axe which we use to cut off the roots of greed, hatred and delusion. When we achieve single-pointedness of the mind, we are then ready to conjoin tranquility with penetrative under-standing, meditation with wisdom.

WISDOM

Today we are going to complete our survey of the Noble Eightfold Path. In the last two weeks, we have looked at good conduct and mental development. Today, we have the third group to look at, and that is the wisdom group. Here we have an interesting situation which we attended to sometime ago when we discussed the Four Noble Truths. When one sees the Noble Eightfold Path listed in sequence, one begins with Right Understanding and yet in the context of the three fold division of good conduct, mental development and wisdom, wisdom comes at the end. One tries to explain this by using the analogy of climbing a mountain. When one sets out to climb a mountain one has the summit in view and it is the sight of the summit that gives direction to one's path. In that sense, even when one begins to climb the mountain, one has one's eyes on the summit. As such, right understanding is necessary right at the beginning of the path. Yet in practical terms one has to climb the lower steps, scale the intermediate ridges before one reaches the summit, the attainment of wisdom. In practical terms, therefore, wisdom comes at the end of one's practice of the path.

Wisdom is described as the understanding of the Four Noble Truths, or the understanding of dependent origination and so forth. What is meant by this is that when we speak of the attainment of wisdom, we are concerned with transforming these items of the doctrine from simple intellectual facts to real personal facts. We are interested in changing this knowledge from mere book learning to real living experience. And the way this is done is through the cultivation of good conduct and specifically through the cultivation of mental development. Otherwise, anyone can read in a book the explanation of the Four Noble Truths and so forth and yet this is not the same as attaining wisdom. As the Buddha Himself said, it is through failing to understand the Four Noble Truths and dependent origination that we have all run on in this cycle of birth and death. Obviously when He said this, He meant something deeper than simply failure to be acquainted intellect-ually with these items of doctrine. Understanding here has to be taken in the sense of Right Understanding, direct understanding, in the sense of seeing. This is perhaps why so frequently the language of seeing is used to describe the attainment of wisdom. We speak in terms of seeing the Truth, of seeing things as they really are. Because the attainment of wisdom is not an intel-lectual or academic exercise. It is seeing, understanding these truths directly. When this kind of direct understanding of the truth is gained, this is equivalent to gaining enlightenment. This opens the door to freedom, freedom from suffering and to Nirvana. Wisdom is the key thing in Buddhism. In other religions, we find that faith is paramount. In still other religions, we find that meditation is supreme as for instance in Yoga. In Buddhism, faith is preliminary, meditation is instru-mental. The real heart of Buddhism is wisdom.

The two steps of the Noble Eightfold Path that are included in wisdom are Right Understanding and Right Thought. Right Understanding can be said to be seeing things as they really are. Understanding the truth about things rather than simply seeing them as they appear to be. What this means is insight, penetrative under-standing, seeing beyond the surface of things. If we want to explain this in doctrinal terms, we will have to speak about the Four Noble Truths, dependent origination, impermanence, not-self and so forth. But for the moment let us just speak about the means of gaining Right Understanding. Here we can again see the scientific attitude of the teachings of the Buddha. Because when we come to look at the means of acquiring Right Understanding, we see that we begin with objective observation of the situation and of ourselves. We join objective observation with enquiry, examination and consideration.

In acquiring Right Understanding, we find that there are two types of understanding. One is the understanding that we acquire by ourselves. The other is the understanding that we acquire through others, that we are shown by others. Ultimately, these two types of understanding merge because in the final analysis real understanding of Right Understanding has to be our own. But in the meantime, one can distinguish between Right Understanding that we achieve through obser-vation of the environment and the Right Understanding that we achieve through the study of the teachings. Just as with regard to our situation, we are asked to observe objectively what we see, what we experience and then examine and consider its significance, so when we approach the teachings of the Buddha we are asked to study them, to listen to them and then to consider them, to examine them. Whether we speak in terms of observation and enquiry, or whether we refer to study of the doctrine and we speak in terms of reading, or listen-ing and consideration, the third step in this process of acquiring understanding is meditation. It is on this third stage of the process of acquiring Right Understanding that the two types of understanding merge. To summar-ize, the means of acquiring Right Understanding is as follows - on the first stage, one has to observe, study and read. On the second stage, one has to examine intellectually what one has observed, studied and read. On the third stage, one has to meditate upon what one has examined, considered and determined. Let us use a practical example. Let us say we intend to travel to a certain destination. In order to do 50, we acquire a road map which shows the route to reach the destination. We look first at the map for the directions. Then we must review what we have seen, review the map, examine the map to be certain that we understand the directions. Only then do we actually travel to our destination. This is analogous to meditation. Again supposing we have bought a new piece of equipment. It is not enough to read the instructions. We have to reread the instructions, examine them to be certain that we understand them intellectually. When we are certain that we have clari-fied our intellectual understanding, we can then proceed to actually operate the new piece of equipment. This is analogous to meditation, to meditating upon what we have acquired through observation, learning, consider-ation and examination. On the third stage, through medi-tation these facts become part of our living experience.

Perhaps we might spend a few moments discussing the attitude that one can do well to cultivate in approaching the teachings of the Buddha. It is said that one who approaches the teachings ought to seek to avoid three faults in his attitude and these faults are illustrated with the example of a vessel. In this context, we are the vessel, the teachings are what are to be filled into the vessel. Suppose the vessel is covered with a lid, we will not be very successful in filling the vessel, say with milk. This is similar to one who listens to the teachings with a closed mind, a mind that is already made up. The Dharma cannot enter, fill the vessel. Again supposing we have a vessel that has a hole in the bottom. If we fill the vessel with milk, the milk will run out of the hole. This is similar to those of us who find that what we hear does not stay with us. And finally there is the case of the vessel in which there are impurities. Suppose we fill the vessel with milk before having cleaned it. Suppose there is some spoiled milk left in the vessel. The fresh milk that we fill into the vessel will be spoilt. In the same way if we listen to the teachings with an impure mind, with impure attitudes, because for instance we want to achieve a certain amount of honor, or fame, with these kinds of selfish attitudes or desires, we are like a vessel tainted by impurities. We must seek to avoid these faults in our approach to the teachings of the Buddha, in the study of the Dharma. Alternatively, it is said that one might listen to the Dharma in the way that a patient listens to the instructions of the physician. In this context, the Buddha is the physician, the Dharma is the medicine, we are the patients and the practice of the Dharma is the means by which we can be cured of the disease, the disease of the defilements - greed, anger and delusion that produce suffering. We will surely achieve some degree of Right Understanding if we approach the study of the Dharma with this notion in mind.

We often divide Right Understanding into two aspects. The first relates to the ordinary level while the second relates to a deeper level. Sometime ago, we spoke about the goals that Buddhism offers, in the sense of two levels of goals - happiness and good fortune in this life and the next, and ultimate liberation. Here too, in discussing Right Understanding, we see that there are two levels, two aspects of Right

Understanding. The first aspect corresponds to the first type of goal, and the second corresponds to attaining liberation. The first aspect of Right Understanding is the understanding of the relation between cause and effect in the sphere of moral responsibility of our actions and our behavior. This briefly stated means that we will experience the effects of our actions. If we act well, if we observe the principles of respect for life, property, truth and so forth, if we act in these wholesome ways we will experience the good effects of our actions. We will enjoy happiness and fortunate circumstances in this life and the next. Conversely, if we act badly, we will experience un-happiness, miseries and unfortunate circumstances in this life and the next.

On the level of understanding as it relates to the ultimate goal of the teachings of the Buddha, we are concerned with Right Understanding in terms of seeing things as they really are. When we say seeing things as they really are, what do we mean? Again one can get doctrinal answers to this question. It can mean seeing things as impermanent, as dependently originated, as not-self, as impersonal, as seeing the Four Noble Truths. All these answers are correct. All express something about seeing things as they really are, seeing the reality of things. In order to arrive at an understanding of this first and in a sense the last step of the Noble Eightfold Path, we have to look for something that all these expressions of Right Understanding have in common. When we describe Right Understanding in all these various ways, all these descriptions are opposed to ignorance, to bondage, to entanglement in the cycle of birth and death. When the Buddha attained enlighten-ment, His experience was essentially an experience of destruction of ignorance. This experience is described by the Buddha Himself most frequently in terms of understanding the Four Noble Truths and understanding dependent origination. Both the Four Noble Truths and dependent origination are concerned with the destruction of ignorance. In this sense, ignorance is the central problem, the central idea in both the formula of the Four Noble Truths and dependent origination. Let us look at the Four Noble Truths again for a moment. The key to transforming one's experience from the experience of suffering to the experience of the end of suffering is understanding the Second Noble Truth, the truth of the cause of suffering. Once we understand the cause of suffering, we can then act to achieve the end of suffering.

The Four Noble Truths as we have discussed are divided into two groups, two of them to be abandoned, and two of them to be gained - the truth of suffering and the truth of the cause of suffering are to be abandoned, and the truth of the end of suffering and the truth of the path to the end of suffering are to be gained. Understanding the cause of suffering enables one to do this. We can see this clearly in the Buddha's description of His experience on the night of His enlightenment. When He saw the cause of suffering, when He under-stood that desire, ill-will and ignorance were the causes of suffering, this opened the door to His enlightenment. Ignorance, desire and ill-will are the causes of suffering. If we want to reduce our examination to the most essential concept, we must focus upon ignorance be-cause it is due to ignorance that desire and ill-will arise.

Essentially, ignorance is the idea of a permanent, independent self. It is this conception of an 'I' opposed and separate from the people and things around us. Once we have the notion of an 'I', we have an inclination to favor those things that sustain this 'I' and to be averse to those things that we think threaten this 'I'. It is this conception of the self that is the funda-mental cause of suffering, the root of the various negative emotions - desire, anger, ill-will, envy, greed and jealousy. It is ignorant of the fact that the so-called 'I', the self, is just a convenient name for a collection of ever-changing, dependent, contingent factors. Is there a forest apart from the trees? The self is just a convenient name for a collection of processes. The self is a cause of suffering and fear. In this context the self is likened to mistaking a rope for a snake in the semi-darkness. If we come upon a rope in the darkness, we may assume the rope is in fact a snake and this assumption is a cause of fear. Similarly, in ignorance we take the impersonal, impermanent processes of feelings, perceptions, and so forth to be a self, and as a result we respond to situations with hope and fear. We desire certain things, we are averse to others. We are fond of certain people, we dislike others. So ignorance in this sense is the mistaken notion of a permanent ego, of a real self. This teaching of not-self does not contradict the law of moral responsibility, the Law of karma. In fact, you will recall that we described Right Understanding in terms of two aspects, understanding the Law of Karma, and here in terms of seeing things as they really are, understanding the nature of existence. Once this egoism is removed, once this erroneous notion of the self is dispelled by Right Understanding, greed, anger and the rest do not occur. When this is stopped the end of suffering is gained. I do not expect this to be completely clear to everyone immediately. We shall be spending several sessions in the next few weeks deepening and expand-ing the examination of the nature of ignorance.

Let us go on to the next part of the path that belongs to the wisdom group and that is Right Thought. Here we begin to see the reintegration, the reapplication of the wisdom group to the sphere of good conduct because thought has an immense influence on one's behavior. The Buddha has said if one acts and speaks with a pure mind, then happiness follows as one's shadow that never leaves. And if one speaks and acts with an impure mind, then suffering follows as the wheel follows the hoof of the ox. Thought has a tremendous influence on one's behavior. Right Thought means avoiding desire and ill-will. So you can see how important wisdom is because the cause of suffering is described in terms of desire, ill-will and ignorance. Right Understanding removes ignorance. Right Thought removes desire and ill-will. So Right Understanding and Right Thought remove the causes of suffering.

To remove desire and greed we need to cultivate renunciation or detachment. To remove ill-will, we need to cultivate loving-kindness and compassion. How does one cultivate the attitudes of renunciation, loving-kindness and compassion which will act as antidotes for desire and ill-will? Firstly, renunciation is cultivated by meditating upon the unsatisfactory nature of existence, particularly the unsatisfactoriness of pleasures of the senses. We liken pleasures of the senses to salt water. A thirsty man who drinks salt water only finds that his thirst increases. He achieves no satisfaction. The Buddha also likened pleasures of the senses to a certain fruit called the Kimbu fruit. It is a fruit that is very pleasant in appearance. It has an attractive skin. It is fragrant and tasty. But it causes disaster as it is poisonous when eaten. Similarly, pleasures of the senses are attractive, enjoyable and yet they cause disaster. So in order to cultivate detachment, one has to consider the undesirable consequences of pleasures of the senses. In addition, one has to contemplate, to understand that the nature of samsara is suffering. That no matter where one may be born within the confines of the cycle of birth and death, that situation is pervaded by suffering. The nature of samsara is suffering just as the nature of fire is heat. Through understanding the unsatisfactory nature of existence, and through recognizing the undesirable consequences of pleasures of the senses one can cultivate detachment.

One can cultivate loving-kindness and compassion through recognizing the essential equality of all living beings. All fear death, all tremble at punishments. Recognizing this, one should not kill or cause others to be killed. All desire happiness, all fear pain. In this, we are all alike. All living beings are alike. Recognizing this, one should not place oneself above others, one should not regard oneself differently from the way in which one would regard others. This recognition of the fundamental equality of all living beings is basic to the cultivation of loving-kindness and compassion. All want happiness just as I want happiness. Understanding this, one ought to regard all living beings with loving-kindness and compassion. One ought to cultivate this wish that all living beings may be happy. Just as I fear suffering and pain, and wish to avoid it, so do all living beings fear suffering and pain, and wish to avoid it. Understanding this, one develops and cultivates an atti-tude that wishes to see all living beings free from suffering.

In this way, we can develop and cultivate the attitudes of renunciation, loving-kindness and com-passion which between them counteract and eventually eliminate greed and anger. Finally through wisdom, having eliminated ignorance, greed and anger, having purified ourselves of those three defilements, we can attain freedom, the final goal that is the purpose of the Noble Eightfold Path, the bliss of Nirvana.

KARMA

Today we have come to a couple of related ideas which are common in Buddhism and they are the ideas of karma and rebirth. These ideas are closely inter-related, but because the subject is a fairly wide one, we will begin to deal with the idea of karma today and rebirth in the following lecture.

We know that what binds us in samsara are the defilements - desire, ill-will and ignorance. We spoke about this when we talked about the Second Noble Truth - the truth of the cause of suffering. These defilements are something which every living being in samsara shares, whether we speak of human beings or animals or beings who live in the other realms which we do not normally perceive. In this, all living beings are alike and yet amongst all the living beings that we can normally perceive, there are many differences. For instance, some of us are wealthy, some are less wealthy, some are strong and healthy, others are disabled and so forth. There are many differences amongst living beings and even more so there are differences between animals and human beings. These differences are due to karma. What we all share - desire, ill-will and ignorance are common to all living beings, but the particular condition in which we find ourselves is the result of our particular karma that conditions the situation in which we find ourselves, the situation in which we may be wealthy, strong and so forth. These circumstances are decided by karma. It is in this sense that karma explains the differences amongst living beings. It explains why some beings are fortunate while others are less fortunate, some are happy while others are less happy. The Buddha has specifically stated that karma explains the differences between living beings. You might also recall that the understanding of how karma affects the birth of living beings in happy or unhappy circumstances - the knowledge of how living beings move from happy circumstances to unhappy circumstances, and vice versa, from unhappy to happy circumstances as a result of their karma - was part of the Buddha's experience on the night of His enlightenment. It is karma that explains the circumstances that living beings find themselves in.

Having said this much about the function of karma, let us look more closely at what karma is. Let us define karma. Maybe we can define karma best by first deciding what karma is not. It is quite often the case that we find people misunderstanding the idea of karma. This is particularly true in our daily casual use of the term. We find people saying that one cannot change one's situation because of one's karma. In this sense, karma becomes a sort of escape. It becomes similar to predestination or fatalism. This is emphatically not the correct understanding of karma. It is possible that this misunderstanding of karma has come about because of the popular idea that we have about luck and fate. It may be for this reason that our idea of karma has become overlaid in popular thought with the notion of predestination. Karma is not fate or predestination.

If karma is not fate or predestination, then what is it? Let us look at the term itself. Karma means action, means 'to do'. Immediately we have an indication that the real meaning of karma is not fate because karma is action. It is dynamic. But it is more than simply action because it is not mechanical action. It is not unconscious or involuntary action. It is intentional, conscious, deliberate, wilful action. How is it that this intentional, wilful action conditions or determines our situation? It is because every action must have a reaction, an effect. This truth has been expressed in regard to the physical Universe by the great physicist Newton who formulated the law which states that every action must have an equal and opposite reaction. In the moral sphere of conscious actions, we have a counterpart to the physical law of action and reaction, the law that every intentional, wilful action must have its effect. This is why we sometimes speak either of Karma-Vipaka, intentional action and its ripened effect, or we speak of Karma-Phala, intentional action and its fruit. It is when we speak of intentional action together with its effect or fruit that we speak of the Law of Karma. In its most basic sense, the Law of Karma in the moral sphere teaches that similar actions will lead to similar results. Let us take an example. If we plant a mango seed, the plant that springs up will be a mango tree, and eventually it will bear a mango fruit. Alternatively, if we plant a Pong Pong seed, the tree that will spring up will be a Pong Pong tree and the fruit a Pong Pong. As one sows, so shall one reap. According to one's action, so shall be the fruit. Similarly, in the Law of Karma, if we do a wholesome action, eventually we will get a wholesome fruit, and if we do an unwholesome action eventually we will get an unwholesome, painful result. This is what we mean when we say that causes bring about effects that are similar to the causes. This we will see very clearly when we come to specific examples of wholesome and unwholesome actions.

We can understand by means of this general introduction that karma can be of two varieties - wholesome karma or good karma and unwholesome karma or bad karma. In order that we should not misunderstand this description of karma, it is useful for us to look at the original term. In this case, it is kushala or akushala karma, karma that is wholesome or unwholesome. In order that we understand how these terms are being used, it is important that we know the real meaning of kushala and akushala. Kushala means intelligent or skillful, whereas akushala means not intelligent, not skillful. This helps us to understand how these terms are being used, not in terms of good and evil but in terms of skillful and unskillful, in terms of intelligent and unintelligent, in terms of wholesome and unwholesome. Now how wholesome and how un-wholesome? Wholesome in the sense that those actions which are beneficial to oneself and others, those actions that spring not out of desire, ill-will and ignorance, but out of renunciation, loving-kindness and compassion, and wisdom.

One may ask how does one know whether an action that is wholesome or unwholesome will produce happiness or unhappiness. The answer is time will tell. The Buddha Himself answered the question. He has explained that so long as an unwholesome action does not bear its fruit of suffering, for so long a foolish person will consider that action good. But when that unwholesome action bears its fruit of suffering then he will realize that the action is unwholesome. Similarly, so long as a wholesome action does not bear its fruit of happiness, a good person may consider that action unwholesome. When it bears its fruit of happiness, then he will realize that the action is good. So one needs to judge wholesome and unwholesome action from the point of view of long-term effect. Very simply, whole-some actions result in eventual happiness for oneself and others, while unwholesome actions have the oppo-site result, they result in suffering for oneself and others.

Specifically, the unwholesome actions which are to be avoided relate to the three doors or means of action, and these are body, speech and mind. There are three unwholesome actions of the body, four of speech and three of mind that are to be avoided. The three unwholesome actions of body that are to be avoided are killing, stealing and sexual misconduct. The four unwholesome actions of speech that are to be avoided are lying, slander, harsh speech and malicious gossip. The three unwholesome actions of mind that are to be avoided are greed, anger and delusion. By avoiding these ten unwholesome actions we will avoid their consequences. The unwholesome actions have suffering as their fruit. The fruit of these unwholesome actions can take various forms. The fully ripened fruit of the unwholesome actions consists of rebirth in the lower realms, in the realms of suffering - hell, hungry ghosts and animals. If these unwholesome actions are not sufficient to result in rebirth in these lower realms, they will result in unhappiness in this life as a human being. Here we can see at work the principle of a cause resulting in a similar effect. For example, habitual killing which is motivated by ill-will and anger and which results in the taking of the life of other beings will result in rebirth in the hells where one's experience is saturated by anger and ill-will and where one may be repeatedly killed. If killing is not sufficiently habitual or weighty to result in rebirth in the hells, killing will result in shortened life as a human being, separation from loved ones, fear or paranoia. Here too we can see how the effect is similar to the cause. Killing shortens the life of others, deprives others of their loved ones and so forth, and so if we kill we will be liable to experience these effects. Similarly, stealing which is borne of the defilement of desire may lead to rebirth as a hungry ghost where one is totally destitute of desired objects. If it does not result in rebirth as a ghost, it will result in poverty, dependence upon others for one's livelihood and so forth. Sexual misconduct results in martial distress or unhappy marriages.

While unwholesome actions produce unwhole-some results - suffering, wholesome actions produce wholesome results - happiness. One can interpret wholesome actions in two ways. One can simply regard wholesome actions as avoiding the unwholesome actions, avoiding killing, stealing, sexual misconduct and the rest. Or one can speak of wholesome actions in positive terms. Here one can refer to the list of whole-some actions that includes generosity, good conduct, meditation, reverence, service, transference of merits, rejoicing in the merit of others, hearing the Dharma, teaching the Dharma and straightening of one's own views. Just as unwholesome actions produce suffering, these wholesome actions produce benefits. Again effects here are similar to the actions. For example, generosity results in wealth. Hearing of the Dharma results in wisdom. The wholesome actions have as their conse-quences similar wholesome effects just as unwholesome actions have similar unwholesome effects.

Karma, be it wholesome or unwholesome, is modified by the conditions under which the actions are performed. In other words, a wholesome or unwhole-some action may be more or less strong depending upon the conditions under which it is done. The conditions which determine the weight or strength of karma may be divided into those which refer to the subject the doer of the action, and those which refer to the object - the being to whom the action is done. So the conditions that determine the weight of karma apply to the subject and object of the action. Specifically, if we take the example of killing, in order for the act of killing to have its complete and unmitigated power, five conditions must be present - a living being, the awareness of the existence of a living being, the intention to kill the living being, the effort or action of killing the living being, and the consequent death of the living being. Here too, we can see the subjective and the objective conditions. The subjective conditions are the awareness of the living being, the intention to kill and the action of killing. The objective conditions are the presence of the living being and the consequent death of the living being. Similarly, there are five conditions that modify the weight of karma and they are persistent, repeated action; action done with great intention and determin-ation; action done without regret; action done towards those who possess extraordinary qualities; and action done towards those who have benefited one in the past. Here too there are subjective and objective conditions. The subjective conditions are persistent action, action done with intention and action done without regret. If one does an unwholesome action again and again with great intention and without regret, the weight of the action will be enhanced. The objective conditions are the quality of the object to whom actions are done and the nature of the relationship. In other words, if one does a wholesome or unwholesome action towards living beings who possess extraordinary qualities such as the arhats, or the Buddha, the wholesome or unwholesome action done will have greater weight. Finally the power of wholesome or unwholesome action done towards those who have benefited one in the past, such as one's parents, teachers and friends, will be greater. The objective and subjective conditions together determine the weight of karma. This is important because understanding this will help us to understand that karma is not simply a matter of black and white, or good and bad. Karma is moral action and moral responsibility. But the working of the Law of Karma is very finely tuned and balanced so as to match effect with cause, so as to take into account the subjective and objective conditions that determine the nature of an action. This ensures that the effects of actions be equal to and similar to the nature of the causes.

The effects of karma may be evident either in the short term or in the long term. Traditionally we divide karma into three varieties related to the amount of time that is required for the effects of these actions to manifest themselves. Karma can either manifest its effects in this very life or in the next life or only after several lives. When karma manifests its effects in this life, we can see the fruit of karma within a relatively short length of time. This variety of karma is easily verifiable by any of us. For instance, when someone refuses to study, when someone indulges in harmful distractions like alcohol and drugs, when someone begins to steal to support his harmful habits; the effects will be evident within a short time. They will be evident in loss of livelihood and friendship, health and so forth. We cannot see the long-term effect of karma, but the Buddha and His prominent disciples who have develop-ed their minds are able to perceive directly the long-term effects. For instance, when Maudgalyayana was beaten to death by bandits, the Buddha was able to tell that this event was the effect of something Maudgalyayana had done in a previous life when he had taken his aged parents to the forest and having beaten them to death, had then reported that they had been killed by bandits. The effect of this unwholesome action done many lives before was manifested only in his last life. At death we have to leave everything behind - our property and our loved ones, but our karma will accompany us like a shadow. The Buddha has said that no where on earth or in heaven can one escape one's karma. So when the conditions are correct, dependent upon mind and body, the effects of karma will manifest themselves just as dependent on certain conditions a mango will appear on a mango tree. We can see that even in the world of nature certain effects take longer to appear than others. If for instance, we plant the seed of a papaya, we will obtain the fruit in shorter period than if we plant the seed of a durian. Similarly, the effects of karma manifest either in the short term or in the long term.

Besides the two varieties of karma, wholesome and unwholesome karma, we should mention neutral or ineffective karma. Neutral karma is karma that has no moral consequence either because the very nature of the action is such as to have no moral consequence or because it is done involuntarily and unintentionally. For example, sleeping, walking, breathing, eating, handi-craft and so forth in themselves have no moral consequence. Similarly, unintentional action is ineffect-ive karma. In other words, if one accidentally steps on an insect, being unconscious of its existence, this also constitutes neutral karma because there is no intention - the intentional element is not there.

The benefits of understanding the Law of Karma are that this understanding discourages one from per-forming unwholesome actions which have suffering as their fruit. Once we understand that in our own life every action will have a similar and equal reaction, once we understand that we will experience the effect of that action, wholesome or unwholesome, we will refrain from unwholesome behavior, not wanting to experience the effects of these unwholesome actions. And similarly, understanding that wholesome actions have happiness as their fruit, we will cultivate these wholesome actions. Reflecting on the Law of Karma, of action and reaction in the moral sphere encourages us to renounce unwhole-some actions and cultivate wholesome actions. We will look more closely at the specific effects of karma in future lives and how karma conditions and determines the nature of rebirth in our lecture next week.

REBIRTH

Today we are going to continue a theme that we began two weeks ago when we talked about the teaching of karma. We are going to consider the results of karma in the next life, in other words rebirth. But before I begin to consider specifically the Buddhist teaching regarding rebirth, I think we need to spend a little bit of time on the concept of rebirth in general. This is because it is a concept which many people have difficulty with, particularly over the last few decades when we have become increasingly conditioned to think in what passes for scientific terms, in what most people would naively believe to be scientific terms. Thinking in this way has caused many people to discard the idea of rebirth as something that smacks of superstition, that is a part of an old-fashioned way of looking at the world. So I think we need to redress the balance and create a certain amount of openness to the concept of rebirth before we treat specifically the Buddhist teaching on rebirth.

There are a number of approaches that we can take to what we might call outlining the case for the reality of rebirth. One line which we might take would be to recall that in almost all the major cultures of the world, at one time or another, there had been a strong belief in the reality of rebirth. This is particularly true in India where the idea of rebirth can be traced back to the very earliest period of Indian civilization where all the major Indian religions, be they theism or atheism, be they schools of Hinduism or non-Hindu doctrines like Jainism, believe in the reality of rebirth. Similarly, in other cultures there has been a belief in rebirth, as for instance even in the Mediterranean world, there is a lot of evidence that belief in rebirth was quite common before and during the first few centuries of the Common Era. So the belief in rebirth has been an important part of the human way of thinking about one's situation.

Specifically, within the Buddhist tradition, we have the testimony of the Buddha on the matter of rebirth. On the night of His enlightenment, the Buddha acquired three varieties of knowledge and the first of these was the detailed knowledge of His past lives. He was able to recollect the conditions in which He had been born in His past lives. He was able to remember what His names had been, what His occupations had been and so on. Besides the Buddha's testimony, His prominent disciples were also able to recollect their past lives. Ananda, for instance, acquired the ability to recollect his past life soon after his ordination. Similarly, throughout the history of Buddhism, saints, scholars and meditators have been able to recollect their past lives.

Nonetheless, neither of these two arguments for rebirth can be expected to be completely convincing in a scientific and rational environment. So perhaps we need to look a bit closer to home so to speak, and here we get help from a very unexpected direction. Most of us may be aware that in the past twenty or thirty years there have been a huge amount of scientific investigations of the question of rebirth and these investigations have been pursued by psychologists and parapsychologists. Gradually through these investigations, we have built up a very convincing case for the reality of rebirth, a case which is developed along scientific lines. There have been many books published in which the details of these investigations have been described and discussed. One scholar who has been particularly active in this area in recent years is Professor Ian Stevenson of the University of Virginia, USA. He has published findings on more than twenty cases of rebirth. Some of us may be familiar with the case of the woman who was able to recall her past life more than a hundred years before as Bridey Murphy in a foreign land which she had never visited in her present life. I am not going to go through these specific cases in detail because if one is interested in this scientific evidence for rebirth one can read about it for oneself. Nonetheless, I think we are now at a point where even the most skeptical of us will have to admit that there is a lot of circumstantial evidence in favor of the reality of rebirth.

But in making the case for rebirth, we can look even closer to our own experience, and here we need to recall and examine it in the true Buddhist way to see what meaning we can distill from our own experience. All of us in this room have our own particular capabil-ities, our own particular likes and dislikes, and I think it is fair to ask whether these are all merely the result of chance. For instance, some of us are more capable at sport than others, some of us have a talent for mathe-matics, others have a talent for music, some of us like swimming, others are afraid of water. Are all these differences in our abilities and attitudes merely the result of chance? There are incredible peculiarities in the nature of our experiences. Let me take my own case. I was born in a Roman Catholic family in the United States. There was absolutely nothing in my early background to indicate that by the age of twenty I would have travelled to India and that I would spend the next fourteen years of my life predominantly in Asia, and that I would become deeply involved in Buddhist studies.

Then, too, there are those situations in which we sometimes feel a strong presentiment that we have been in a particular place before although we have not visited this place in our present life. Or, sometimes we feel that we have known someone before. Sometimes we meet a person and within a very short space of time we feel that we have known that person thoroughly. Alternatively, sometimes we have known a person for years and yet we are not close to that person. These experiences of feeling that we have been to a place before or have known a person before are so common and universal that even in a culture which knows almost nothing of rebirth. There is a particular phrase for this experience, the French words 'deja vu' which mean 'already seen or experienced'. If we are not dogmatic, when we add up all the evidence of rebirth - the persistent belief in rebirth in many cultures in many different times throughout history, the Buddha's own testimony, the testimony of His prominent disciples, the evidence presented by scientific investigations, and our own personal intimations that we have been here before, we have to admit that there is at least a good possibility that rebirth is a reality.

In Buddhism, rebirth is part of the continuous process of change. In fact, we are not only reborn at the time of death, we are born and reborn at every moment. This too, like many other Buddhist teachings, is easily verifiable by reference to our own experience and by reference to the teachings of science. For instance, the majority of the cells in the human body die and are replaced many times during the course of one's life. Even those few cells which last one's entire life undergo constant internal changes. This is part of the process of birth, death and rebirth. If we look at the mind too, we find that mental states of worry, happiness and so forth are changing every moment. They die and are replaced by new states. So whether we look at the body or the mind, our experience is characterized by continuous birth, death and rebirth.

In Buddhism, it is taught that there are various realms, spheres or dimensions of existence. There are thirty-one planes of existence listed, but for our purposes, we are going to utilize a simpler scheme which enumerates six realms of existence. In general, the six realms may be divided into two groups, one of which is relatively fortunate and the other relatively miserable. The first group includes three of the six realms and they are the realm of the gods, the realm of the demigods and the realm of human beings. Rebirth in these fortunate realms is the result of wholesome karma. The second group includes the three realms that are considered relatively miserable. They are sometimes called the realms of woe, and they are the realm of animals, the realm of hungry ghosts and the realm of hell beings. Rebirth in these states of woe is the result of unwholesome karma.

Let us look at each of these realms individually and starting from the realm at the bottom, let us look at the realm of the hell beings (Niraya). There are various hells in Buddhism, and they are principally eight hot hells and eight cold hells. In the hells, beings suffer incalculable and inexpressible pain. It is said that the suffering experienced as a result of being pierced by three hundred spears in a single day in this life is only a minute fraction of the suffering experienced in hell. The cause of rebirth in hell is continuous, habitual violent actions - habitual killing, cruelty and so forth, actions that are borne of ill-will. Beings born in the hells suffer the pain of hell until their unwholesome karma is exhausted. This is important because we must note that in Buddhism no one suffers eternal damnation. When their unwholesome karma is exhausted, beings in hell are reborn in a more fortunate realm of existence.

The next realm is the realm of the hungry ghosts (Pretas). Beings in this realm suffer chiefly from hunger and thirst, and from heat and cold. They are completely bereft of the objects of their desire. It is said that when the hungry ghosts perceive a mountain of rice or a river of fresh water, and rush towards that vision, they find the mountain of rice is only a heap of pebbles, and the river of fresh water only a ribbon of blue slate. Similarly, it is said that in the summer even the moon is hot, while in the winter even the sun is cold for them. The foremost cause of rebirth as a hungry ghost is avarice and miserliness borne of greed. As with the hells, the beings in this realm are not condemned to eternal existence in the form of hungry ghosts, for when their unwholesome karma is exhausted, they will be reborn in a higher realm.

In the next realm which is the realm of animals (Tiryak), the living beings suffer from a variety of unhappy circumstances. They suffer from the fear and pain that is the result of constantly killing and eating one another. They suffer from the depredations of man who kills them for food or for their hides, horns or teeth. Even if they are not killed, domestic animals are forced to work for man and are driven on by hooks and whips. All these is a source of suffering. The principal cause of rebirth as an animal is ignorance. In other words, the blind, heedless pursuit of one's animal-like desires, the preoccupation with eating, sleeping and sexual desire, and the disregard of developing one's mind to the practice of virtue and so forth lead one to be reborn as an animal. Now when I say for instance that habitual killing is the cause of rebirth in the hells, or that greed is the cause of rebirth in the realm of the hungry ghosts, or that ignorance is the cause of rebirth in the realm of animals, it does not mean that a specific hateful, greedy or ignorant action will result in rebirth amongst the appropriate clasp of beings - the hells, the realms of hungry ghosts or the realm of animals. What it does mean is that there is a relationship between hatred and rebirth in the hells, and between greed and rebirth in the realm of hungry ghosts, and between ignorance and rebirth in the realm of the animals. If unimpeded, if unbalanced by other virtuous actions, such actions if habitual are likely to result in rebirth in these three states of woe.

I am going to skip the realm of human beings for the moment and go on to the realm of demigods (Asuras). The Asuras are more powerful physically and are more intelligent mentally than human beings. Yet they suffer because of jealousy and conflict. Mytho-logically, it is said that the Asuras and the gods share a celestial tree. While the gods enjoy the fruits of this celestial tree, the Asuras are custodians of the roots of the tree. The Asuras are envious of the gods and constantly attempt to take the fruits of the tree from the gods. As a result of this, they fight with the gods, and are defeated by the gods and suffer greatly as a consequence. Because of this constant jealousy, envy and conflict, existence amongst the Asuras is unhappy and unfortunate. As with the other realms, there is a cause of rebirth amongst the demigods. On the positive side, the cause is generosity. On the negative side, the causes are anger, envy and jealousy.

The sixth realm, the realm of the gods (Devas) is the happiest amongst the six realms. As a result of having done wholesome actions, of having observed the moral precepts and having practiced meditation, living beings are reborn amongst the gods where they enjoy sensual pleasure or spiritual pleasure, or tranquillity depending upon the level within the realm of the gods in which they are born. Nonetheless, the realm of the gods is not to be desired because the happiness of the gods is impermanent. No matter how much they may enjoy their existence as a god, when the force of their karma is exhausted, when the merits of their good conduct and the power of their experience in meditation are exhausted, the gods fall from heaven and are reborn in another realm. At this moment, at the moment of their death, it is said that the gods suffer even more mental anguish than the physical pain suffered by beings in the other realms. The negative factor associated with birth in the realm of the gods is pride.

So here, as you can see, we have an affliction or defilement associated with the five realms - hell beings, hungry ghosts, animals, demigods and the gods, and they are ill-will, desire, ignorance, jealousy and pride. Birth in any of these five realms is undesirable. Birth in the three lower realms is undesirable for obvious reasons, because of the intense suffering and because of the total ignorance of the beings who inhabit these realms. Even rebirth in the realms of the demigods and the gods too is undesirable. This is because, although one experiences a certain degree of happiness and power, existence amongst the demigods and gods is impermanent. Besides, because of the distractions and pleasures in these realms, beings there never think of looking for a way out of the cycle of birth and death. This is why it is said that of the six realms, the most fortunate, opportune and favored is the human realm. This is why I have left the human realm to the last.

The human realm (Manushya) is the most favored of the six realms because as a human being one has the motivation and the opportunity to practice the Dharma and to achieve enlightenment. One has this motivation and opportunity because the conditions conductive to practicing the path are present. In the human realm, one experiences both happiness and suffering. The suffering in this realm, though terrible, is not so great as the suffering in the three realms of woe. The pleasure and happiness experienced in the human realm is not so great as the pleasure and happiness experienced in the heavens. As a result, human beings are neither blinded by the intense happiness experienced by the beings in the heavens, nor distracted by the unbearable suffering that beings in the hells experience. Again, unlike the animals, human beings possess sufficient intelligence to recognize the necessity to look for a means to achieve the total end of suffering.

Human birth is difficult to gain from a number of points of view. First of all, it is difficult to gain from the point of view of its cause. Good conduct is the foremost cause of rebirth as a human being, but how rare is truly good conduct. Again, human birth is difficult to gain from the point of view of number, for human beings are only a small fraction of the living beings who inhabit the six realms. Moreover it is not enough simply to be born as a human being because there are countless human beings who do not have the opportunity to practice the Dharma. It is therefore not only necessary to be born as a human being, it is also necessary to have the opportunity to practice the Dharma, to develop one's qualities of morality, mental development and wisdom. The Buddha spoke about the rarity and the precious nature of opportune birth amongst human beings. He used a simile to illustrate this point. Suppose the whole world were a vast ocean, and on the surface of this ocean there were a yoke floating about, blown about by the wind, and suppose at the bottom of the ocean there lived a blind tortoise which came to the surface of the ocean once every hundred years. Just as difficult as it would be for that tortoise to place its neck through the opening in that yoke floating about in the ocean, just so difficult is it to attain opportune birth as a human being. Elsewhere, it is said that just as if one were to throw a handful of dried peas against a stone wall, and just as if one of these peas were to stick in a crack in the wall, so to be born as a human being with the opportunity to practice the Dharma is similarly difficult.

It is foolish to waste human existence along with the conducive conditions that we enjoy in free societies, the opportunity that we have to practice the Dharma. It is extremely important that having this opportunity we make use of it. If we fail to practice the Dharma in this life, there is no way of knowing where in the six realms we will be reborn, and when we shall have such a chance again. We must strive to free ourselves from the cycle of rebirth because failing to do so means that we will continue to circle endlessly amongst these six realms of existence. When the karma, wholesome or unwholesome, that causes us to be born in any of the six realms is exhausted, rebirth will occur, and we will find ourselves again in another realm. In fact, it is said that all of us have circled in the these six realms since beginningless time, that if all the skeletons that we have had in our various lives were heaped up, the pile would exceed the height of Mount Sumeru. If all the mothers' milk that we have drunk throughout our countless existences were collected, the amount would exceed the amount of water in all the oceans. So now that we have the opportunity to practice the Dharma, we must do so without delay.

In recent years, there has been a tendency to interpret the six realms in psychological terms. Some teachers have suggested that the experience of the six realms is available to us in this very life. Undoubtedly, this is true so far as it goes. Those men and women who find themselves in prisons, tortured, killed, and so forth are undoubtedly experiencing a situation similar to that of the hell beings. Similarly, those who are miserly and avaricious experience a state of mind similar to that of the hungry ghosts. And those who are animal-like experience a state of mind similar to that of the animals. Those who are quarrelsome, powerful and jealous experience a state of mind similar to that of the Asuras. Those who are proud, tranquil, serene and exalted experience a state of mind similar to that of the gods. Yet, while it is undoubtedly true that the experience of the six realms is to some extent available to us in this human existence, I think it would be a mistake to assume or to believe that the six realms of existence do not have a reality which is as real as our human experience. The hells, the realm of the hungry ghosts, animals, demigods and gods are as real as our human realm. We will recall that mind is the creator of all mental states. Actions done with a pure mind motivated by generosity, love and so forth result in happy mental states or states of existence like the human realm and the realm of the gods. But actions done with an impure mind affected by greed, ill-will and so forth result in unhappy lives like those of the hungry ghosts and hell beings.

Finally, I would like to distinguish rebirth from transmigration. You may have noticed that in Buddhism, we consistently speak of rebirth and not transmigration. This is because in Buddhism we do not believe in an abiding entity, in a substance that trans-migrates. We do not believe in a self that is reborn. This is why when we explain rebirth, we make use of examples which do not require the transmigration of an essence or a substance. For example, when a sprout is born from a seed, there is no substance that trans-migrates. The seed and the sprout are not identical. Similarly, when we light one candle from another candle, no substance travels from one to the other, and yet the first is the cause of the second. When one billiard ball strikes another, there is a continuity, the energy and direction of the first ball is imparted to the second. It is the cause of the second billiard ball moving in a particular direction and at a particular speed. When we step twice into a river, it is not the same river and yet there is continuity, the continuity of cause and effect. So there is rebirth, but not transmigration. There is moral responsibility, but not an independent, permanent self. There is the continuity of cause and effect, but not permanence. I want to end with this point because we will be considering the example of the seed and the sprout, and the example of the flame in an oil lamp next week when we discuss dependent origination. And with the help of the teaching of dependent origination, we will understand better how dependent origination makes moral responsibility and not-self compatible.

DEPENDENT ORIGINATION

Today, in this tenth session, we are going to take up a very important topic in Buddhist studies and this is the teaching of dependent origination. I am aware of the fact that many people believe that dependent origination is a very difficult subject and I would not say that there is no truth in that belief. In fact, on one occasion Ananda remarked that despite its apparent difficulty, the teaching of dependent origination was actually quite simple; and the Buddha rebuked Ananda saying that in fact the teaching of dependent origination was very deep. Certainly in the teaching of dependent origination we have one of the most important and profound teachings in Buddhism. Yet I sometimes feel that our fear of dependent origination is to some extent unwarranted. There is nothing particularly difficult, for instance, in the term dependent origination. After all, we all know what dependent means, and what birth, origination or arising means. It is only when we begin to examine the function and application of dependent origination that we have to recognize the fact that we have a very profound and significant teaching. Some indication of this can be gained from the Buddha's own statements. Very frequently, we find that the Buddha expressed His experience of enlightenment in one of two ways, either in terms of having under stood the Four Noble Truths, or in terms of having understood the nature of dependent origination. Again, the Buddha has often mentioned that in order to attain enlightenment one has to understand the Four Noble Truths; or similarly, one has to understand dependent origination.

On the basis of the Buddha's own statements, we can see a very close relationship between the Four Noble Truths and dependent origination. What is it that the Four Noble Truths and dependent origination have in common? The principle that both have in common is the principle of causality - the law of cause and effect, of action and consequence. In one of our earlier lectures we have mentioned that the Four Noble Truths are divided into two groups. The first two - suffering and the causes of suffering, and the last two - the end of suffering and the path to the end of suffering. In both of these groups, it is the law of cause and effect that governs the relationship between the two. In other words, suffering is the effect of the cause of suffering; and similarly, the end of suffering is the effect of the path to the end of suffering. Here too in regard to depen-dent origination, the fundamental principle at work is that of cause and effect. In dependent origination, we have a more detailed description of what actually takes place in the causal process. Let us take a few examples that establish the nature of dependent origination. Let us take first an example used by the Buddha Himself. The Buddha has said the flame in an oil lamp burns depen-dent upon the oil and the wick. When the oil and the wick are present, the flame in an oil lamp burns. If either of these is absent, the flame will cease to burn. This example illustrates the principle of dependent origin-ation with respect to a flame in an oil lamp. Let us take the example of the sprout. Dependent upon the seed, earth, water, air and sunlight the sprout arises. There are in fact innumerable examples of dependent origination because there is no existing phenomenon that is not the effect of dependent origination. All these phenomena arise dependent upon a number of casual factors. Very simply, this is the principle of dependent origination.

Particularly, we are interested in the principle of dependent origination as it applies to the problem of suffering and rebirth. We are interested in how dependent origination explains the situation in which we find ourselves here. In this sense, it is important to remember that dependent origination is essentially and primarily a teaching that has to do with the problem of suffering and how to free ourselves from suffering, and not a description of the evolution of the Universe. Let me briefly list the twelve components or links that make up dependent origination. They are ignorance, mental formation, consciousness, name and form, the six senses, contact, feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, birth, and old age and death.

There are two principal ways in which we can understand these twelve components. One way to understand them is sequentially, over a period of three life-times: the past life, the present life and the future life. In this case, ignorance and mental formation belong to the past life. They represent the conditions that are responsible for the occurrence of this life. The following components of dependent origination - consciousness, name and form, the six senses, contact, feeling, craving, clinging and becoming belong to this life. In brief, these eight components constitute the process of evolution within this life. The last two components - birth and old age and death belong to the future life. According to this scheme, we can see how the twelve components of dependent origination are distributed over the period of three life-times, and how the first two - ignorance and mental formation result in the emergence of this life with its psycho-physical personality and how in turn, the actions performed in this life result in rebirth in the future life. This is one popular and authoritative way of interpreting the twelve components of dependent origination.

But for today, I am going to focus on another interpretation of the relation between the twelve com-ponents of dependent origination. This interpretation too is authoritative and has the support of recognized Buddhist masters and saints. This interpretation might be called a cyclical interpretation because it does not depend upon a distribution of the twelve components amongst three life-times. Rather, it divides the twelve components into three groups, and these are defilements (Klesha), actions (Karma), and sufferings (Duhkha). This scheme has the advantage of not relying upon a temporal distribution amongst three life-times. According to this scheme, ignorance, craving and clinging belong to the group of defilements. Mental formation and becoming belong to the group of actions. The remaining seven, that is, consciousness, name and form, the six senses, contact, feeling, birth, and old age and death belong to the group of sufferings. Through this interpretation we can see how the teaching of the Four Noble Truths and particularly the teaching of the Second Noble Truth - the truth of the cause of suffering, is conjoined with the teaching of karma and rebirth; and how together these two important teachings explain in a more complete way the process of rebirth and the origination of suffering.

You may recall that in the context of the Four Noble Truths, we have said that ignorance, desire and ill-will are the causes of suffering. If we look here at the three components of dependent origination that are included in the group of defilements, we will find ig-norance, craving and clinging. Here too, ignorance is the most basic. It is because of ignorance that we crave for pleasures of the senses, for existence and for non-existence. Similarly, it is because of ignorance that we cling to pleasures of the senses, to pleasant experiences, to ideas and, perhaps most significantly, to the idea of an independent, permanent self. This ignorance - craving and clinging, is the cause of actions.

The two components of dependent origination that are included in the group of actions are mental formation and becoming. Mental formation refers to the impressions or habits that we have formed in our stream of conscious moments - our conscious continuum. These impressions or habits are formed by repeated actions. We can illustrate this by means of an example taken from Geography. We know that rivers form their course by means of a process of repeated erosion. As rain falls on a hillside, that rain gathers into a rivulet. That rivulet gradually creates a channel for itself, and gradually grows into a stream. Eventually, as the channel of the stream is deepened and widened by re-peated flows of water, the stream becomes a river which develops well-defined banks and a definite course. In the same way, our actions become habitual. These habits become part of our personality and we take these habits with us from life to life in the form of mental formation or habit energy. Our actions in this life are conditioned by the habits which we have formulated over countless previous lives. So to return to the analogy of the channel of the river and the water in it, we might say that mental formations are the channel of the river, and the actions that we perform in this life are the fresh water that flow again through the eroded channel created by previous actions. The actions that we perform in this life are represented by the component known as becoming. So here, as regards mental formation and becoming, we have the habits that we have developed over the course of countless lives combined with new actions performed in this life, and these two together result in rebirth and suffering.

To summarize, we have the defilements which may be described as impurities of the mind - ignorance, craving and clinging. These mental impurities result in actions, actions done in previous lives which have resulted in the formulation of habit energy, and actions done in the present life which on the whole are liable to conform to the patterns established in previous lives. Together, these impurities of the mind and these actions result in rebirth. In other words, they result in con-sciousness, in name and form, in the six senses, in contact between the six senses and the objects of the six senses, in feeling which is born of that contact, in birth, and in old age and death. In this interpretation, the five components of dependent origination included in the groups of defilements and actions - ignorance, craving, clinging, mental formation and becoming are the causes of rebirth and suffering. Consciousness, name and form, the six senses, contact, feeling, birth, and old age and death are the effects of the defilements and actions. Together, the defilements and actions explain the origin of suffering and the particular circumstances in which each of us find ourselves, in which we are born. You may recall that in one of our earlier lectures, we refer to the fact that whereas the defilements are common to all living beings, actions differ from individual to individual. So whereas the defilements account for the fact that all of us are prisoners within samsara, yet actions account for the fact that some are born as human beings, another are born as gods, and others as animals. In this sense, the twelve components of dependent origination present a picture of samsara with its causes and its effects.

There would be no point in painting this picture of samsara if we do not intend to use this picture to change our situation, to get out of samsara. It is in this sense that recognizing the circularity of samsara, the circularity of dependent origination is the beginning of liberation. How is this so? So long as defilements and actions are present, rebirth and suffering will occur. When we see that repeatedly, ignorance, craving, clinging and actions will lead to rebirth and suffering, we will recognize the need to break this vicious circle. Let us take a practical example. Suppose you are looking for the home of an acquaintance whom you have never visited before. Suppose you have been driving about for half an hour or more and have failed to find the home of your friend, and suppose suddenly you recognize a landmark that you saw half an hour pre-viously. Suppose you again come upon the landmark, and it dawns upon you that you have passed the landmark half an hour ago. At that moment it will also probably dawn upon you that you have been going around in circles, and you will stop and look at your road guide, or enquire the way from a passer-by so as to stop going around in circles and reach your destination. This is why the Buddha has said that he who sees dependent origination sees the Dharma and he who sees the Dharma sees the Buddha. This is why the Buddha has, as I have mentioned earlier, said that understanding dependent origination is the key to liberation. So once we see the functioning of dependent origination, we can then set about breaking this vicious circle of dependent origination. We can do this by removing the impurities of the mind ignorance, craving and clinging. Once these impurities are eliminated, actions will not be performed, and habit energy will not be produced. Once actions cease, rebirth and suffering will also cease.

I would like to spend a little bit of time on another important meaning of dependent origination and that is dependent origination as an expression of the Middle Way. During one of our earlier lectures, we had occasion to refer to the Middle Way, and on that occasion we confined ourselves to only perhaps the most basic meaning. We have said that the Middle Way means avoiding the extreme of indulgence in pleasures of the senses and the extreme of self-mortification. In that context the Middle Way is synonymous with mod-eration. Now in the context of dependent origination, the Middle Way has another meaning which is related to the earlier meaning but deeper. In this context the Middle Way means avoiding the extremes of eternalism and nihilism. How is this so? The flame in the oil lamp exists dependent upon the oil and the wick. When either of these are absent, the flame will be extinguished. Therefore, the flame is neither permanent nor indepen-dent. Similarly, this personality of ours depends upon a combination of conditions defilements and actions. It is neither permanent nor independent. Recognizing the conditioned nature of our personality, we avoid the extreme of eternalism, of affirming the existence of an independent, permanent self. Alternatively, recognizing that this personality, this life does not arise through accident, or mere chance, but is instead conditioned by corresponding causes, we avoid the extreme of nihilism, the extreme of denying the relation between action and consequence. While nihilism is the primary cause of rebirth in states of woe and is to be rejected, eternalise too is not conducive to liberation. One who clings to the extreme of eternalism will perform wholesome actions and will be reborn in states of happiness, as a human being or even as a god, but he will never attain liber-ation. Through avoiding these two extremes, through understanding the Middle Way, we can achieve happi-ness in this life and in the future life by performing wholesome actions and avoiding unwholesome actions, and eventually we can achieve liberation.

The Buddha has constructed His teachings with infinite care. The Buddha's teachings are sometimes likened to the behavior of a tigress towards her young. When a tigress carries her young in her teeth, she is most careful to see that her grip is neither too tight nor too loose. If her grip on the neck of her young is too tight, it will injure or kill the cub. If her grip is too loose, the cub will fall and will be injured. Similarly, the Buddha was careful to see that we should avoid the extremes of eternalism and nihilism. Because He saw that clinging to the extreme of eternalism would be like a chain that would bind us in samsara, the Buddha was careful to teach us to avoid belief in an independent and permanent self. Because He saw the possibility of freedom destroyed by the sharp teeth of belief in the self, the Buddha asked us to avoid the extreme of eternalism. Yet understanding that clinging to the extreme of nihilism would lead to catastrophe rebirth in the states of woe, He was careful to teach the reality of the law of cause and effect, of moral responsibility.
Because He saw that one would fall into the misery of the lower realms by denying the law of moral respon-sibility, He taught us to avoid the extreme of nihilism. This objective is admirably achieved through the teaching of dependent origination which safeguards our understanding of the conditioned, dependent and imper-manent nature of this personality and our understanding of the reality of the law of cause and effect.
In the context of dependent origination, we have established the dependent, impermanent nature of the personality, the self, by means of underlining its dependent nature. In the two weeks to follow, we are going to arrive at the impermanence and impersonality of the self through examining its composite nature and through analyzing it into its constituent parts. By these means, we will elucidate the truth of not-self that opens the door to enlightenment.

THE THREE UNIVERSAL CHARACTERISTICS

The subject today is the three universal characteristics of existence. This is an important part of the teachings of the Buddha. Like the Four Noble Truths, karma, the teaching of dependent origination and the five aggregates, the teaching of the three characteristics is part of what we might call the doctrinal contents of wisdom. In other words, when we talk about the knowledge and the understanding that is implied by wisdom, we have this teaching in mind.

Before we examine the characteristics individually, let us come to an understanding of what they mean and in what way they are useful. First of all, what is a characteristic and what is not. A characteristic is some-thing which is necessarily connected with something else. Because the characteristic is necessarily connected with something, it can tell us about the nature of that thing. Let us take an example. Heat for instance is a characteristic of fire but not a characteristic of water. Heat is the characteristic of fire because the heat of the fire is always and invariably connected with fire. On the other hand, the heat of water depends on external factors - an electric stove, the heat of the sun and so forth. But the heat of fire is natural to fire. It is in this sense that the Buddha uses the term characteristic to refer to facts about the nature of existence, that are always connected with existence and that are always found in existence. The characteristic heat is always connected with fire. So we can understand something about the nature of fire from heat. We can understand that fire is hot. We can understand that we can use fire to cook our food, to warm ourselves and so forth. The characteristic of heat tells us something about fire, how to use fire and what to do with fire. If we were to think of the characteristic of heat as connected with water, it would not help us to use water because heat is not always connected with water. We cannot cook our food with water. We cannot warm ourselves with water. So when the Buddha said that there are three characteristics of existence, He meant that these characteristics are always present in existence, and that they help us to understand what to do with existence.

The three characteristics of existence that we have in mind are the characteristics of impermanence (Anitya), suffering (Duhkha) and not-self (Anatma). These three characteristics are always present in or are connected with existence, and they tell us about the nature of existence. They help us to know what to do with existence. What we learn to develop as a result of understanding the three characteristics is renunciation. Once we understand that existence is universally characterized by impermanence, suffering and not-self, we eliminate our attachment to existence. Once we eliminate our attachment to existence, we gain the threshold of Nirvana. This is the purpose that understanding the three characteristics serves. It removes attachment by removing delusions, the misunderstanding that existence is permanent, is pleasant and has something to do with the self. This is why understanding the three characteristics is part of the contents of wisdom.

Let us look at the first of the three characteristics of existence, the characteristic of impermanence. The fact of impermanence has been recognized not only in Buddhist thought but also elsewhere in the history of philosophy. It was the ancient Greek philosopher Heraclitus who remarked that one could not step into the same river twice. This remark, which implies the ever-changing and transient nature of things is a very buddhistic remark. In the Buddhist scriptures, it is said that the three worlds (Dhatus) are impermanent like autumn clouds; that birth and death are like a dance; and that human life is like a flash of lightning or a waterfall. All these are compelling images of impermanence and they help us to understand that all things are marked or characterized by impermanence.

If we look at our own personality, we will find that our bodies are impermanent. They are subject to constant change. We grow thin. We grow old and grey - our teeth fall out, our hair falls out. If one needs any proof of the impermanence of the physical form, one need only look at one's own photograph on one's own driving licence or passport over the years. Similarly, our mental states are impermanent. At one moment we are happy, and at another moment we are sad. As infants, we hardly understand anything. As adults, in the prime of life we understand a great deal more. And again in old age we lose the power of our mental faculties and become like infants. Our minds are also characterized by impermanence. This is true also of the things that we see around us. Every thing we see around us is imper-manent. Not one thing will last forever - not the office blocks, nor the temples, nor the rivers and islands, nor the mountain chains, nor the oceans. We know for a fact that all these natural phenomena, even those that appear to be the most durable, even the solar system itself will one day decline and become extinct.

This process of constant change of all things - personal and impersonal, internal and external, goes on constantly even without our noticing it, and it affects us intimately in our daily life. Our relations with other individuals are subject to the characteristic of impermanence and change. Friends become enemies, enemies become friends. Enemies even become relatives. Relatives become enemies. If we look closely at our life, we can see how all our relationships with other people are marked by impermanence. Our possessions are also impermanent. Those things that we dearly love - our homes, our automobiles, our clothes, all these are impermanent. All of them will decay and eventually be destroyed. So in every aspect of our life, whether it be personal or material, or whether with regard to our relationships with others, or whether it be our possess-ions, impermanence is a fact, verified by direct imme-diate observation. Understanding impermanence is important not simply for our practice of the Dharma but also in our daily life. How often do friendships deteriorate and end because one of the persons involved has failed to take account of the fact that his friend's attitudes, interests and so forth have changed. How often do marriages fail because one, or both, of the parties fails to take account of the fact that his or her partner has changed. It is because we lock ourselves into fixed, artificial unchang-ing ideas of the character and personality of our friends and relatives that we fail to develop our relationships with them positively and because of this failure we often fail to understand one another. Similarly, in one's career or public life, one cannot hope to succeed if one does not keep abreast of changing situations like, for instance, new trends in one's profession or discipline. So whether it is in regard to our personal life or in regard to our public life, understanding impermanence is necessary if we are to be effective and creative in the way that we handle our personal or professional affairs.

While understanding impermanence yields these immediate benefits, here and now, it is particularly effective as an aid to our practice of the Dharma. The understanding of impermanence is an antidote to desire and ill-will. It is also an encouragement to our practice of the Dharma And finally, it is a key to understanding the ultimate nature of things, the way things really are.

Remembering death especially is said to be like a friend and a teacher to one who wishes to practice the Dharma. Remembering death acts as a discouragement to excessive desire and ill-will. How many quarrels, petty disagreements, life-long ambitions and enmities fade into insignificance before the recognition of the inevitability of death. Throughout the centuries, Buddhist teachers have encouraged sincere practitioners of the Dharma to remember death, to remember the impermanence of this personality. Some years ago, I had a friend who went to India to study meditation. He approached a very renowned and learned Buddhist teacher and asked him for some meditation instructions. The teacher was reluctant to teach him because he was not convinced of his sincerity. My friend persisted and asked him again and again. Finally, the teacher said to him, "You will die, meditate upon that." Meditation on death is extremely beneficial. We all need to remember the certainty of our death. From the moment of our birth, we move inexorably towards death. Remembering this, and remembering that at the time of death, wealth, family and fame will be of no use to us, we must turn our mind to the practice of the Dharma. We know that death is absolutely certain. There has never been a single living being who has escaped death.

Yet, while death itself is certain, the time of death is uncertain. We can die at any moment. It is said that life is like a candle in the wind, or a bubble of water. At any moment it may be snuffed out. At any moment it may burst. Understanding that the time of death is uncertain, and that we have now the conditions and opportunity to practice the Dharma, we ought to practice it quickly so that we may not waste this opportunity and this precious human life.

Finally, understanding impermanence is an aid to the understanding of the ultimate nature of things. Seeing that all things are perishable, and change every moment, we also begin to see that things have no substantial existence of their own. That in our persons and in the things around us, there is nothing like a self. So in this sense, impermanence is directly related to the third of the three characteristics, the characteristic of not-self. Understanding impermanence is a key to understanding not-self. We will talk more about this later. For the moment, let us now go on to the second of the three characteristics, the characteristic of suffering.

The Buddha has said that whatever is impermanent is suffering, and whatever is impermanent and suffering is also not-self. Whatever is impermanent is suffering because impermanence is an occasion for suffering. It is an occasion for suffering and not a cause of suffering because impermanence is only an occasion for suffering so long as ignorance, craving and clinging are present. How is that so? In our ignorance of the real nature of things, we crave and cling to objects in the forlorn hope that they may be permanent, that they may yield permanent happiness. Failing to understand that youth, health and life itself are impermanent, we crave for them, we cling to them. We long to hold on to our youth and to prolonging our life and yet because they are impermanent by nature, they slip through our fingers like sand. When this occurs, impermanence is an occasion for suffering. Similarly, we fail to recognize the impermanent nature of possessions, power and prestige. We crave and cling to them. Once they end, impermanence is an occasion for suffering. The impermanence of all situations in samsara is a particular occasion for suffering when it occurs in the so-called fortunate realm. It is said that the suffering of the gods is even greater than the suffering of living beings dwelling in the lower realms of existence when they see that they are about to fall from the heavens into lower realms of existence. Even the gods trembled when the Buddha reminded them of impermanence. So because even those pleasant experiences which we crave and cling to are impermanent, so impermanence is an occasion for suffering and whatever is impermanent is also suffering.

Now we come to the third universal characteristic of existence, the characteristic of not-self, or imperson-ality, or insubstantiality. This is in a sense one of the really distinctive features of Buddhist thought and of the teachings of the Buddha. During the later development of religion and philosophy in India, some Hindu schools became increasingly similar to the teachings of the Buddha, in their techniques of meditation and in some of their philosophical ideas. So it became necessary for Buddhist masters to point out that there was still one distinctive feature that set Buddhism apart from the Hindu schools that so closely resembled it. That distinctive feature is the teaching of not-self.

Sometimes, this teaching of not-self is an occasion for confusion because often we wonder how one can deny the self. After all, we do say "I am speaking" or "I am walking," or "I am called so and so", or "I am the father or the son of such and such a person." So how can we deny the reality of that "I"? In order to clarify this, I think it is important to remember that the Buddhist rejection of the "I" is not a rejection of this convenient designation, the name "I". Rather, it is a rejection of the idea that this name "I" stands for a substantial, permanent and changeless reality. When the Buddha said that the five factors of personal experience were not the self, and that the self was not to be found within them He meant that on analysis, this name 'I' did not correspond to any essence or entity. The Buddha has used the example of the chariot and the forest to explain the relation between the term 'I' and the components of personal experience. The Buddha has explained that the term chariot is simply a convenient name for a collection of parts that is assembled in a particular way. The wheels are not the chariot. Neither is the axle, and neither is the carriage, and so forth. Similarly, an individual tree is not a forest. Neither is a number of individual trees a forest. There is no forest apart from the individual trees. The term forest is just a convenient name for an assembly of individual trees. This is the thrust of the Buddha's rejection of the self. The Buddha's rejection is a rejection of the belief in a real, independent, permanent entity that is represented by the term 'I'. Such a permanent entity would have to be independent, would have to be sovereign in the way that a king is master of those around him. It would have to be permanent, immutable and impervious to change, and such a permanent entity, such a self is nowhere to be found.

The Buddha has applied the following analysis to the body and mind to indicate that the self is nowhere to be found either in the body or the mind. The body is not the self. For if the body were the self, the self would be impermanent, would be subject to change, decay, destruction, and death. So the body cannot be the self. The self does not possess the body, in the sense that I possess a car or a television, because the self cannot control the body. The body falls ill, gets tired and old against our wishes. The body has a shape which often does not agree with our wishes. So in no way does the self possess the body. The self is not in the body. If we search our body from the top of our head to the tip of our toes, we can nowhere locate the self. The self is not in the bone, nor in the blood, nor in the marrow, nor in the hair, nor in the spittle. The self is nowhere to be found within the body.

Similarly, the mind is not the self. The mind is subject to constant change. The mind is forever jumping about like a monkey. The mind is happy at one moment and unhappy at the next. So the mind cannot be the self for the mind is constantly changing. The self does not possess the mind because the mind becomes excited or depressed against our wishes. Although we know that certain thoughts are wholesome, and certain thoughts are unwholesome, the mind pursues unwholesome thoughts and is indifferent towards wholesome thoughts. So the self does not possess the mind because the mind acts independently of the self. The self is not in the mind. No matter how carefully we search the contents of our mind, no matter how carefully we search our thoughts, feelings, and ideas, we can nowhere find the self. There is a very simple exercise that anyone of us can perform. We can all sit quietly for a brief period of time and look within our body and mind, and without exception we will find that we cannot locate the self anywhere within the body nor the mind. The conclusion remains that the self is just a convenient name for a collection of factors. There is no self, no soul, no essence, no core of personal ex-perience apart from the ever-changing, interdependent, impermanent physical and mental factors of personal experience such as our feelings, ideas, thoughts, habits, and attitudes.

Why should we care to reject the idea of self? How can we benefit by rejecting the idea of self? Here too, we can benefit in two important ways. First of all, in our everyday life, on a mundane level we can benefit in that we will become more creative, more comfortable, and more open people. So long as we cling to the self, we will always have to defend ourselves, to defend our possessions, property, prestige, opinions and even our words. But once we give up this belief in an indepen-dent and permanent self, we will be able to relate to other people and situations without paranoia. We will be able to relate freely, spontaneously and creatively. Understanding not-self is therefore an aid to living.

Even more importantly, understanding not-self is a key to enlightenment. The belief in a self is synonymous with ignorance, and ignorance is the most basic of the three defilements. Once we identify, imagine, or con-ceive of ourselves as an entity, we immediately create a schism, a separation between ourselves and the people and things around us. Once we have this conception of self, we respond to the persons and things around us either with desire or with aversion. In this sense, the self is the real villain of the piece. Seeing that the self is the source and the cause of all suffering, and seeing that the rejection of the self is the cause of the end of suffering, rather than trying to defend, protect and preserve the self, why should we not do our best to reject and eliminate this idea of the self? Why should we not recognize that personal experience is like a banana tree or like an onion, that when we take it apart piece by piece, that when we examine it critically and analytic-ally, we find that it is empty of any essential, substantial core, that it is devoid of the self?

When we understand that all things are impermanent, are full of suffering, and are not-self, and when our understanding of these truths is not merely in-tellectual or academic but through study, consideration and meditation, the facts of impermanence, suffering and not-self become part of our immediate experience. Through the understanding of impermanence, suffering, and not-self, we will have freed ourselves of the fundamental errors that imprison us within the cycle of birth and death - the error of seeing things as permanent, the error of seeing things as pleasant and the error of seeing things as self. When these delusions are removed, wisdom arises. Just as when darkness is removed, light arises. And when wisdom arises, one experiences the peace and freedom of Nirvana.

This week we have confined ourselves to looking at personal experience in terms of body and mind. Next week we will look more deeply into the Buddhist analysis of personal experience in terms of the elements of our physical and mental universe.

THE FIVE AGGREGATES

This is the last in the series of twelve sessions that we have spent together, and in this last session we are going to look at the teaching of the five aggregates (Skandhas Rupa, Vedana, Samjna, Samskara and Vijnana). In other words, we are going to look at the Buddhist analysis of personal experience or the Buddhist analysis of the personality. Throughout the last lectures, I have had occasions a number of times to make the point that Buddhist teachings have been found relevant to modern life and thought in the fields of science, psychology and so forth. Here, in regard to the analysis of personal ex-perience into the five aggregates, this is also the case. Modern psychologists and psychiatrists have been par-ticularly interested in this analysis. It has even been suggested that in the Abhidharma and in the analysis of personal experience into the five aggregates, we have a psychological equivalent to the table of elements work-ed out in modern science. What we have in the Buddhist analysis of personal experience is a very careful inven-tory and evaluation of the elements of our experience. What we are going to do today is basically an extension and a refinement of what we were doing at the end of last week's lecture. There, we spent some time on the teachings of impermanence, suffering and not-self. In the course of looking at the teaching on not-self, we have explored briefly how the analysis of personal experience can be carried out along two lines, and that is with regard to the body, and with regard to the mind. You will recall that we have examined the body and mind to see whether in either of them we can locate the self, and we have found that the self is not to be found in either of them. We have concluded that the name 'self' is just a convenient term for a collection of physical and mental factors, in the same way that the name 'forest' is just a convenient term for a collection of trees. This week, we are going to take our analysis still further, and rather than looking at personal experience simply in terms of body and mind, we are going to analyze personal experience in terms of the five aggregates.

Let us first look at the aggregate of matter or form (Rupa). The aggregate of form corresponds to what we would call material or physical factors. It includes not only our own bodies, but also the material objects that surround us - the earth, the oceans, the trees, the buildings, and so forth. Specifically, the aggregate of form includes the five physical sense organs and the corresponding physical objects of the sense organs. These are the eyes and visible objects, the ears and sound, the nose and smell, the tongue and taste, and the skin and tangible objects.

But physical elements by themselves are not enough to produce experience. The simple contact between the eyes and visible objects, or between the ears and sound cannot result in experience without consciousness (Vijnana). The eyes can be in conjunction with the visible object indefinitely without producing experience. The ears too can be exposed to sound indefinitely without producing experience. Only the co-presence of consciousness together with the sense organ and the object of the sense organ produces experience. In other words, it is when the eyes, the visible object and consciousness come together that the experience of a visible object is produced. Conscious-ness is therefore an indispensable element in the pro-duction of experience. Before we go on to our consideration of the mental factors of personal experience, I would like to mention briefly the existence of one more set of an organ and its object, and here I speak of the sixth-sense - the mind. This is in addition to the five physical sense organs - eyes, ears, nose, tongue and skin. Just as the five physical sense organs have their corresponding physical objects, the mind has for its object ideas or properties (dharmas). And as in the case of the five physical sense organs, consciousness is present to unite the mind and its object so as to produce experience.

Let us now look at the mental factors of experience and let us see if we can understand how consciousness turns the physical factors of experience into personal conscious experience. First of all, we must remember that consciousness is mere awareness, or mere sensitivity to an object. When the physical factors of experience, as for example the eyes and a visible object, come into contact, and when consciousness too becomes associated with the physical factors of experience, visual consciousness arises. This is mere awareness of a visible object, not anything like what we could call personal experience. The way that our personal experience is produced is through the functioning of the other three major mental factors of experience and they are the aggregate of feeling, the aggregate of perception and the aggregate of mental formation or volition. These three aggregates function to turn this mere awareness of the object into personal experience.

The aggregate of feeling or sensation (Vedana) is of three kinds - pleasant, unpleasant and indifferent. When an object is experienced, that experience takes on one of these emotional tones, either the tone of pleasure, or the tone of displeasure, or the tone of indifference.

Let us next look at the aggregate of perception (Samjna). This is an aggregate which many people find difficult to understand. When we speak of perception, we have in mind the activity of recognition, or identifi-cation. In a sense, we are talking about the attaching of a name to an object of experience. The function of per-ception is to turn an indefinite experience into an identified and recognized experience. Here, we are speaking of the formulation of a conception of an idea about a particular object. Just as with feeling where we have a emotional element in terms of pleasure, dis-pleasure or indifference; with perception, we have a conceptual element in the sense of introducing a definite, determinate idea about the object of experience.

Finally, there is the aggregate of mental formation or volition (Samskara). This aggregate may be described as a conditioned response to the object of experience. In this sense, it partakes of the meaning of habit as well. We have spent some time discussing the component of mental formation when we considered the twelve com-ponents of dependent origination. You will remember that on that occasion, we described mental formation as the impression created by previous actions, the habit energy stored up from countless former lives. Here, as one of the five aggregates also, the aggregate of mental formation plays a similar role. But it has not only a static value, it also has a dynamic value because just as our reactions are conditioned by former deeds, so are our responses here and now motivated and directed in a particular way by our mental formation or volition. Mental formation or volition therefore has a moral dimension just as perception has a conceptual dimen-sion, and feeling has a emotional dimension. You will notice I use the terms mental formation and volition together. This is because each of these terms represents one half of the meaning of Samskara - mental formation represents the half that comes from the past, and volition represents the half that functions here and now. So mental formation and volition function to determine our responses to the objects of experience and these responses have moral consequences in the sense of wholesome, unwholesome or neutral.

We can now see how the physical and mental factors of experience worked together to produce personal experience. To make this a little clearer, let us take the help of a couple of concrete examples. Let us say after today's lecture you decide to take a walk in the garden. As you walk in the garden, your eyes come into contact with a visible object. As your attention focuses on that visible object, your consciousness becomes aware of visible object as yet indeterminate. Your aggregate of perception will identify that visible object as, let us say, a snake. Once that happens, you will respond to that visible object with the aggregate of feeling - the feeling of displeasure, or more specifically that of fear. Finally, you will react to that visible object with the aggregate of mental formation or volition, with the intentional action of perhaps running away or perhaps picking up a stone. In all our daily activities, we can see how all the five aggregates work together to produce personal experience. At this very moment, for instance, there is contact between two elements of the aggregate of form - the sound of my voice and your ears. Your consciousness becomes aware of the sound of my voice. Your aggregate of perception identifies the words that I am speaking. Your aggregate of feeling responds with an emotional response - pleasure, displeasure or indifference. Your aggregate of mental formation or volition responds with a conditioned reaction sitting in attention, daydreaming or perhaps yawning. We can analyze all our personal experience in terms of the five aggregates.

There is one point that has to be remembered regarding the nature of the five aggregates, and that is that each and all of them are in constant change. The elements that constitute the aggregate of form are impermanent and are in a state of constant change. We discussed this last week - the body grows old, weak, sick and so forth. The things around us are also impermanent and change constantly. Our feelings too are constantly changing. We may respond today to a particular situation with a feeling of pleasure. To-morrow, we may respond to that same situation with the feeling of displeasure. Today we may perceive an object in a particular way. At a later time, under different cir-cumstances, our perception will change. In semi-darkness we perceive a rope to be a snake. The moment the light of the torch falls upon that object, we perceive it to be a rope. So our perceptions like our feelings and like the material objects of our experience are ever changing and impermanent. So too, our mental form-ations are impermanent and ever-changing. We alter our habits. We can learn to be kind and compassionate. We can acquire the attitudes of renunciation and equanimity and so forth. Consciousness too is impermanent and constantly changing. Consciousness arises dependent upon an object and a sense organ. It cannot exist independently. As we have seen, all the physical and mental factors of our experience like our bodies, the physical objects around us, our minds and our ideas are impermanent and constantly changing. All these aggre-gates are constantly changing and impermanent. They are processes, not things. They are dynamic, not static.

What is the use of this analysis of personal experience in terms of the five aggregates? What is the use of this reduction of the apparent unity of personal experience into the various elements of form, feeling, perception, mental formation or volition, and conscious-ness? The purpose of this analysis is to create the wisdom of not-self. What we wish to achieve is to arrive at a way of experiencing the world which is not constructed upon and around the idea of a self. We want to see personal experience in terms of processes, in terms of impersonal functions rather than in terms of a self and what affects a self because this will create an attitude of equanimity, an attitude which will help us overcome the emotional disturbances of hope and fear. We hope for happiness, we fear pain. We hope for praise, we fear blame. We hope for gain, we fear loss. We hope for fame, we fear infamy. We live in a state of alternating between hope and fear. We experience these hopes and fears because we understand happiness and pain and so forth in terms of the self. We understand them as personal happiness and pain, as personal praise and blame, and so forth. But once we understand them in terms of impersonal processes, and once through this understanding we get rid of the idea of the self, we can overcome hope and fear. We can regard happiness and pain, praise and blame and all the rest with equanimity, with even-mindedness, and we will then no longer be subject to the imbalance of alternating between hope and fear.

CONCLUSION

I would like to spend a few moments by way of conclusion to reflect upon what we have done over the past weeks and relate it to what we can do now and in the future.

The teachings of the Buddha are exceedingly vast and very profound. In fact, over the past weeks, we have only managed to survey a few of the fundamental teachings of the Buddha, and these too only superficially. Yet, you may feel that what we have covered is a lot, and you may feel that it is impossible to practice all that we have discussed. In fact, it is said that it is difficult even for a monk living in isolation to practice all of the fundamental teachings of the Buddha. No small wonder that it is difficult for laymen and women like ourselves who have many secular responsibilities. Nonetheless, if one succeeds in sincere-ly cultivating and practicing even a few of the many teachings of the Buddha, then one will have succeeded in making this life more meaningful. One will be certain that one will again in the future encounter circumstances favorable to the practice of the Dharma and to the eventual realization of liberation.

Everyone can achieve the highest goal in Buddhism, be he a layman or a monk. All we need to do is to make an honest effort to follow the Noble Eight-fold Path. It is said that those who have realized the truth, like the Buddha Shakyamuni and His prominent disciples did not do so accidentally. They did not fall from the sky like rain, nor did they spring up from the earth like grain. The Buddha and His disciples were once ordinary sentient beings like you and me. They were once afflicted by the impurities of the mind, desire, ill-will and ignorance. It is through contacting the Dharma, through purifying their words and deeds, through developing their minds and through acquiring wisdom that they became free, exalted beings able to teach and help others to realize the truth. There is therefore no doubt that if we apply ourselves to the teachings of the Buddha, we too can attain the ultimate goal of Buddhism. We too can become like the Buddha or like His prominent disciples.

It is of no use merely to listen to the Dharma or to read the Dharma. Similarly, it is of no use merely to write articles about the Dharma, or to give lectures about the Dharma if we do not put it into practice. It has been said that those of us who call themselves Buddhists can profit by occasionally taking stock. If we see that over the past years our practice of the Buddha's teachings has brought about a slight change in the quality of our experience (and it will be a slight change), then we will know that the teachings are having some effect. If all of us put the teachings into practice, there is no doubt that we will realize their benefits. If we seek to avoid harming others, if we try our best to help others whenever possible, if we learn to be mindful, if we learn to develop our ability to concentrate our mind, if we cultivate wisdom through study, careful consideration and meditation, there is no doubt that the Dharma will benefit us. It will first lead us to happiness and prosperity in this life and in the next. Eventually, it will lead us to the ultimate goal of liberation, the everlasting bliss of Nirvana.

<end of file>

FUNDAMENTALS OF BUDDHISM
Four Lectures

by Nyanatiloka Mahathera

ISBN 955-24-0120-8

Originally published by Bauddha Sahitya Sabha: 1949, 1956, 1968

Wheel Publication no. 394/396

Copyright 1994 by the Buddhist Publication Society

BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
KANDY Sri Lanka

* * *

DharmaNet Edition 1995

Transcribed directly from BPS Pagemaker files
Formatting: John Bullitt

This electronic edition is offered for free distribution
via DharmaNet by arrangement with the publisher.

DharmaNet International
P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley CA 94704-4951

* * * * * * * *

CONTENTS

I. The Essence of Buddhism (Radio Lecture, Colombo, 1933)

II. Kamma & Rebirth (Lecture, Ceylon University, 1947)

III. Paticca-Samuppada: Dependent Origination (Second Lecture under the Dona Alphina Ratnayaka Trust, University College, Colombo, 1938)

IV. Mental Culture (Based on a lecture delivered in Tokyo, 1920)

About the Author

* * * * * * * *

I

THE ESSENCE OF BUDDHISM

I shall give a short exposition of the essence of the genuine teaching of the Buddha, such as we still find it in the Buddhist scriptures handed down to us in the Pali language.

There are many among the listeners who are not Buddhists, and to whom therefore, in many cases, the original teaching of the Buddha is a thing almost unknown. It goes without saying that it will not be possible for these, within the limits of the time allowed to my talk, to gain a thorough and full understanding of such a profound and wide subject. Yet some of you may pick up and take hold of certain ideas that appear important; and these may prove an inducement to further inquiry into this immensely profound world of thought. Even should these words have no other effect than to remove at least some of the many prejudices and false ideas about the Buddha's doctrine, it would be ample reward.

Does it not, for instance, appear ironical that this most sober of all the religious doctrines is still considered by many Westerners as some sort of idolatry or mysticism? Did not the German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, already long years ago, understand and lay stress upon this //absolute soberness// and clearness of Buddhism when he said:

> Buddhism is a hundred times more realistic than Christianity. It has entered upon the inheritance of objectively and coolly putting problems. It came to life after several hundred years of philosophical development. The notion of "God" is done away with as soon as it appears. Prayer is out of the question. So is asceticism. No categorical imperative. No coercion at all, not even within the monastic community. Hence it also does not challenge to fight against those of a different faith. Its teaching turns against nothing so impressively as against the feeling of revengefulness, animosity and resentment.

Now, before beginning with the exposition of the Buddha's teaching, we should get acquainted in a few words with the personality of the Buddha. The term "Buddha" literally means the "Enlightened One." It is a name won by the Indian sage Gotama on his enlightenment under the Bodhi-tree at Buddhagaya in India. He was born as the son of an Indian king on the borders of modern Nepal, about 600 years before Christ. In his 29th year he renounced the worldly life and exchanged his princely career for that of a homeless mendicant. After six years of hard striving he at last attained his goal: deliverance from the round of rebirths, or Samsara. The Buddha describes this time in his own words as follows:

> Bhikkhus, before I had attained to full enlightenment, myself being still subject to birth, decay, disease, death, sorrow and impurity, I too was seeking after that which is subject to birth, decay, disease, death, sorrow and impurity. And so, bhikkhus, after a time, while still young, a black-haired lad, in my youthful prime, just come to budding manhood's years, against the wishes of father and mother weeping and lamenting, I cut off hair and beard and, clad in the yellow robe, went forth from home to homelessness. Thus vowed to homelessness, I was striving after the highest good, the incomparable path to supreme peace.

At first the future Buddha learnt under two great yogis who had attained to a high state of supernormal psychical powers and faculties. But neither of them could satisfy him, as their teachings did not lead to real everlasting peace and deliverance of mind. So he left them again after having fully realized their teaching. Thereafter he met five ascetics, who were practising the severest forms of self-torture and mortification of the flesh, with the hope of gaining deliverance in this way. The future Buddha became one of their party. He subjected himself with utmost perseverance to extreme fasting and self-torture, till at last he looked like a mere skeleton. And utterly exhausted, he broke down and collapsed. He now came to understand that bodily mortification is vain and useless, and will never lead to peace of heart and to deliverance. He henceforth gave up fasting and bodily mortification and sought refuge in moral and mental development. And with calm and serene mind he began to look into the true nature of existence.

Wherever he turned his eyes, he found only one great reality: the law of suffering, the unsatisfactoriness of all forms of existence. He understood that the destiny of beings is not the outcome of mere blind chance, nor does it depend upon the arbitrary action of an imaginary creator, but that our destiny is to be traced back to our own former actions, or kamma. He beheld the sick and the leper, and he saw in their misery and suffering only the result of actions, or kamma, done in former lives. He beheld the blind and the lame, and he saw in their debility and helplessness only the painful harvest of seeds sown by themselves in former lives. He beheld the rich and the poor, the happy and the unhappy; and wherever he turned his eyes, there he saw this law of retribution, the moral law of cause and effect, the Dhamma.

This Dhamma, or universal moral law discovered by the Buddha, is summed up in the //Four Noble Truths//: the truths about the universal sway of suffering, about its origin, its extinction, and the path leading to its extinction.

(I) The first truth, about the universality of //suffering//, teaches, in short, that all forms of existence are of necessity subject to suffering.

(II) The second truth, about the //origin of suffering//, teaches that all suffering is rooted in selfish //craving// and //ignorance//, in //tanha// and //avijja//. It further explains the cause of this seeming injustice in nature, by teaching that nothing in the world can come into existence without reason or cause; and that not only all our latent tendencies, but our whole destiny, all weal and woe, results from causes which we have to seek partly in this life, partly in former states of existence.

The second truth further teaches us that the future life, with all its weal and woe, must result from the seeds sown in this and former lives.

(III) The third truth, or the truth about the //extinction of suffering//, shows how, through the extinction of craving and ignorance, all suffering will vanish and liberation from this Samsara be attained.

(IV) The fourth truth shows the way, or the means by which this goal is reached. It is the //Noble Eightfold Path// of right understanding, right thought, right speech, right bodily action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness and right concentration of mind.

From these Four Noble Truths we shall pick out and clear up such points as are essential for a general knowledge of the Dhamma. In doing so, we shall at the same time refute a number of widespread prejudices concerning the Buddha's teaching.

Let us, however, first outline the Noble Eightfold Path, for it is this path of righteousness and wisdom that really constitutes the //essence of Buddhist practice// -- the mode of living and thinking to be followed by any true follower of the Buddha.

(1) The first stage of the Eightfold Path is, as already stated, //right understanding//, i.e. understanding the true nature of existence, and the moral laws governing the same. In other words, it is the right understanding of the Dhamma, i.e. of the Four Noble Truths.

(2) The second stage of the Eightfold Path is //right thought//, i.e. a pure state of mind, free from sensual lust, from ill-will, and from cruelty; in other words, thoughts of self-renunciation, of goodness, and of mercy.

(3) The third stage is //right speech//. It consists of words which are not false, not harsh, not scandalous, not frivolous, i.e. truthful words, mild words, pacifying words, and wise words.

(4) The fourth stage is //right bodily action//, i.e. abstaining from intentional killing or harming of any living creature, abstaining from dishonest taking of others' property, abstaining from adultery.

(5) The fifth stage is //right livelihood//, i.e. such a livelihood as does not bring harm and suffering to other beings.

(6) The sixth stage is //right effort//. It is the fourfold effort which we make in //overcoming// old and //avoiding// fresh bad actions by body, speech and mind; and the effort which we make in //developing// fresh actions of righteousness, inner peace and wisdom, and in //cultivating// them to perfection.

(7) The seventh stage is //right mindfulness//, or alertness of mind. It is the ever-ready mental clarity whatever we are doing, speaking, or thinking and in keeping before our mind the realities of existence, i.e. the impermanence, unsatisfactoriness and phenomenality (//anicca//, //dukkha//, //anatta//) of all forms of existence.

(8) The eighth stage is //right concentration// of mind. Such a kind of mental concentration is meant, as is directed towards a morally wholesome object, and always bound up with right thought, right effort and right mindfulness.

Thus the Eightfold Path is a path of morality (//sila//), of mental training (//samadhi//), and of wisdom (//panna//).

//Morality// therein is indicated by right speech, right bodily action, and right livelihood. //Mental training// is indicated by right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration of mind. And //wisdom// is indicated by right understanding and right thought.

Thus this liberating Eightfold Path is a path of inner culture, of inner progress. By merely external worship, mere ceremonies and selfish prayers, one can never make any real progress in righteousness and insight. The Buddha says: "Be your own isle of refuge, be your own shelter, seek not for any other protection! Let the truth be your isle of refuge, let the truth be your shelter, seek not after any other protection!" To be of real effect, to ensure an absolute inner progress, all our efforts must be based upon our own understanding and insight. All absolute inward progress is rooted in right understanding, and without right understanding there is no attainment of perfection and of the unshakable peace of Nibbana.

Belief in the moral efficacy of mere external rite and ritual (//silabbata-paramasa//) constitutes, according to the Buddha's teaching, //a mighty obstacle to inner progress//. One who takes refuge in mere external practices is on the wrong path. For, in order to gain real inner progress, all our efforts must necessarily be based on our own understanding and insight. Any real progress is rooted in right understanding, and without right understanding there will be no attainment of unshakable peace and holiness. Moreover, this blind belief in mere external practices is the cause of much misery and wretchedness in the world. It leads to mental stagnation, to fanaticism and intolerance, to self-exaltation and contempt for others, to contention, discord, war, strife and bloodshed, as the history of the Middle Ages quite sufficiently testifies. This belief in mere externals dulls and deadens one's power of thought, stifles every higher emotion in man. It makes him a mental slave, and favours the growth of all kinds of hypocrisy.

The Buddha has clearly and positively expressed himself on this point. He says: "The man enmeshed in delusion will never be purified through the mere study of holy books, or sacrifices to gods, or through fasts, or sleeping on the ground, or difficult and strenuous vigils, or the repetition of prayers. Neither gifts to priests, nor self-castigation, nor performance of rites and ceremonies can work purification in him who is filled with craving. It is not through the partaking of meat or fish that man becomes impure, but through drunkenness, obstinacy, bigotry, deceit, envy, self-exaltation, disparagement of others and evil intentions -- through these things man becomes impure."

"There are two extremes: addiction to sensual enjoyment, and addiction to bodily mortification. These two extremes the Perfect One has rejected, and discovered the //Middle Path// which makes one both to see and to know, which leads to peace, to penetration, enlightenment and liberation. It is that Noble Eightfold Path leading to the end of suffering, namely right understanding, right thought, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration of mind."

Inasmuch as the Buddha teaches that all genuine progress on the path of virtue is necessarily dependent upon one's own understanding and insight, all //dogmatism is excluded// from the Buddha's teaching. //Blind faith// in authority is //rejected// by the Buddha, and is entirely opposed to the spirit of his teaching. In the Kalama Sutta the Buddha says:

> Do not go merely by hearsay or tradition, by what has been handed down from olden time, by rumours, by mere reasoning and logical deductions, by outward appearances, by cherished opinions and speculations, by mere possibilities, and do not believe merely because I am your master. But when you yourselves have seen that a thing is evil and leads to harm and suffering, then you should reject it. And when you see that a thing is good and blameless, and leads to blessing and welfare, then you should do such a thing.

One who merely believes or repeats what others have found out, such a one the Buddha compares with a blind man. One who desires to make progress upon the path of deliverance must experience and understand the truth for himself. Lacking one's own understanding, no absolute progress is possible.

The teaching of the Buddha is perhaps the only religious teaching that requires //no belief in traditions//, or in certain historical events. It appeals solely to the understanding of each individual. For wherever there are beings capable of thinking, there the truths proclaimed by the Buddha may be understood and realized, without regard to race, country, nationality or station in life. These truths are universal, not bound up with any particular country, or any particular epoch. And in everyone, even in the lowest, there lies latent the capacity for seeing and realizing these truths, and attaining to the Highest Perfection. And whosoever lives a noble life, such a one has already tasted of the truth and, in greater or lesser degree, travels on the Eightfold Path of Peace which all noble and holy ones have trod, are treading now, and shall in future tread. The universal laws of morality hold good without variation everywhere and at all times, whether one may call oneself a Buddhist, Hindu, Christian or Muslim, or by any other name.

It is the //inward condition// of a person and his deeds that count, not a mere name. The true disciple of the Buddha is far removed from all dogmatism. He is //a free thinker in the noblest sense of the word//. He falls neither into positive nor negative dogmas, for he knows: both are mere opinions, mere views, rooted in blindness and self-deception. Therefore the Buddha has said of himself. "The Perfect One is //free from any theory//, for the Perfect One //has seen//:

Thus is //corporeality//, thus it arises, thus it passes away; thus is //feeling//, thus it arises, thus it passes away; thus is //perception//, thus it arises, thus it passes away; thus are the //mental formations//, thus they arise, thus they pass away; thus is //consciousness//, thus it arises thus it passes away."

I. This important truth of the //phenomenality// and emptiness of all existence can be, and ought to be, understood by everyone for oneself.

According to the Buddha's teaching, our so-called individual existence is in reality nothing but //a mere process of physical and mental phenomena//, a process which since time immemorial was already going on before one's apparent birth, and which also after death will continue for immemorial periods of time. In the following we shall see that the above five //khandhas//, or //groups of existence//, in no way constitute any real ego-entity, or //atta//, and that no ego-entity exists apart from them, and hence that //the belief in an ego-entity is merely an illusion//.

That which we call our physical body is merely a name for a combination of manifold component parts, and in reality constitutes no entity, no personality. This is clear to everyone without further argument. Everybody knows that the body is changing from moment to moment, that old cells are continually breaking down and new ones arising; in brief, that the body will be quite another body after a few years, that nothing will have remained of the former flesh, bones, blood, etc. Consequently, the body of the baby is not the body of the school boy, and the body of the young man is not the body of the grey-haired old man. Hence the body is not a persisting something, but rather a continually changing process of arising and passing away, consisting of a perpetual dying out and arising anew of cells. That, however, which we call our mental life is a continually changing process of feeling, perceptions, mental formations and states of consciousness. At this moment a pleasant feeling arises, the next moment a painful feeling; this moment one state of consciousness, the next moment another. That which we call a being, an individual, a person does not in itself, as such, possess any independent abiding reality. In the absolute sense (//paramattha//) no individual, no person, is there to be found, but merely perpetually changing combinations of physical states, of feelings, volitions and states of consciousness.

What we call "chariot" has no existence apart from and independent of axle, wheels, shaft, etc. What we call "house" is merely a convenient name for stone, wood, iron, etc., put together after a certain fashion, so as to enclose a portion of space, but there is no separate house-entity as such in existence.

In exactly the same way, that which we call a "being," or an "individual," or "person," or by the name "I" or "he," etc., is //nothing but a changing combination of physical and mental phenomena//, and has no real existence in itself.

The words "I," "you," "he," etc., are merely terms found useful in conventional or current (//vohara//) speech, but do not designate realities (//paramattha-dhamma//). For neither do these physical and mental phenomena constitute an absolute ego-entity, nor yet does there exist, outside these phenomena, any ego-entity, self, or soul, who is the possessor or owner of the same. Thus, when the Buddhist scriptures speak of persons, or even of the rebirth of persons, this is done only for the sake of easier understanding, and is not to be taken in the sense of ultimate truth. This so-called "being," or "I," is in the absolute sense nothing but a perpetually changing process. Therefore also, to speak of the suffering of a "person," or "being," is in the absolute sense incorrect. For it is //not a "person," but a physico-mental process// that is subject to transiency and suffering.

In the absolute sense there are only numberless processes, countless life-waves, in this vast ever-surging ocean of bodily states, of feelings, perceptions, volitions and states of consciousness. Within these phenomena there exists nothing that is persistent, not even for the brief span of two consecutive moments.

These phenomena have merely momentary duration. They die every moment, and every moment new phenomena are born; a perpetual dying and coming to birth, a ceaseless heaving of waves up and down. All is in a state of perpetual flux; "//panta rhei//" -- //all things are flowing// -- says the Greek philosopher Heraclitus. The old forms fall to pieces, and new ones are born. One feeling disappears, another appears in its place. One state of consciousness exists this moment, another the following moment. Everywhere is found a perpetual change of material and mental phenomena. In this way, moment follows upon moment, day upon day, year upon year, life upon life. And so this ceaselessly changing process goes on for thousands, even aeons of years. An eternally surging sea of feelings, perceptions, volitions and states of consciousness: such is existence, such is Samsara, the world of arising and passing away, of growing and decaying, a world of sorrow, misery, lamentation and despair.

Without a real insight into this phenomenality, or //egolessness// (//anatta//) or //impersonality// of all existence, it will be impossible to understand the Four Noble Truths rightly.

II. In this connection let us come back to the second noble truth, the origin of suffering, rooted in selfish craving and ignorance (//tanha// and //avijja//). In order to understand this truth better, it will be necessary to speak of a doctrine which so often is wrongly interpreted and misunderstood. It is the Buddhist doctrine of rebirth (see Chapter II). With regard to this teaching, Buddhism is often accused of self-contradiction. Thus it is said that Buddhism on the one hand denies the existence of the soul, while on the other hand it teaches the transmigration of the soul. Nothing could be more mistaken than this. For //Buddhism teaches no transmigration at all//. The Buddhist doctrine of rebirth -- which is really the same as the //law of causality// extended to the mental and moral domain -- has nothing whatever to do with the brahmin doctrine of reincarnation, or transmigration. There exists a fundamental difference between these two doctrines.

According to the brahmanical teaching, there exists a soul independently of the body which, after death, leaves its physical envelope and passes over into a new body, exactly as one might throw off an old garment and put on a new one. Quite otherwise, however, is it with the Buddhist doctrine of rebirth. Buddhism does not recognize in this world any existence of mind apart from matter. //All mental phenomena are conditioned// through the six organs of sense, and without these they cannot exist. According to Buddhism, //mind without matter is an impossibility//. And, as we have seen, the mental phenomena, just as all bodily phenomena, are subject to change, and no persisting element, no ego-entity, no soul, is there to be found. But where there is no real unchanging entity, no soul, there one cannot speak of the transmigration of such a thing.

How then is rebirth possible without something to be reborn, without an ego, or soul? Here I have to point out that even the word "rebirth," in this connection, is really not quite correct, but used as a mere makeshift. What the Buddha teaches is, correctly speaking, the //law of cause and effect// working in the moral domain. For just as everything in the physical world happens in accordance with law, as the arising of any physical state is dependent on some preceding state as its cause, in just the same way must this law have universal application in the mental and moral domain too. If every physical state is preceded by another state as its cause, so also must //this present physico-mental life be dependent upon causes anterior to its birth//. Thus, according to Buddhism, the present life-process is the result of the craving for life in a former birth, and the craving for life in this birth is the cause of the life-process that continues after death.

But, as there is nothing that persists from one moment of consciousness to the next, so also no abiding element exists in this ever changing life-process that can pass over from one life to another.

//Nothing transmigrates// from this moment to the next, nothing from one life to another life. This process of continually producing and being produced may best be compared with a wave on the ocean. In the case of a wave there is not the smallest quantity of water that actually travels over the surface of the sea. The wave-structure that seems to hasten over the surface of the water, though creating the appearance of one and the same mass of water, is in reality nothing but a continued rising and falling of ever new masses of water. And the rising and falling is produced by the transmission of force originally generated by wind. Just so the Buddha did not teach that it is an ego-entity, or a soul, that hastens through the ocean of rebirth, but that it is in reality merely a life-wave which, according to its nature and activities, appears here as man, there as animal, and elsewhere as invisible being.

III. There is another teaching of the Buddha which often gives rise to serious misunderstanding. It is the teaching of //Nibbana, or the extinction of suffering//. This third noble truth points out that, through the cessation of all selfish craving and all ignorance, of necessity all suffering comes to an end, to extinction, and no new rebirth will take place. For if the seed is destroyed, it can never sprout again. If the selfish craving that clutches convulsively at life is destroyed, then, after death, there can never again take place a fresh shooting up, a continuation of this process of existence, a so-called rebirth. Where, however, there is no birth, there can be no death. Where there is no arising, there can be no passing away. Where no life exists, no suffering can exist. Now, because with the extinction of all selfish craving, all its concurrent phenomena, such as conceit, self-seeking, greed, hate, anger and cruelty, come to extinction, this freedom from selfish craving signifies //the highest state of selflessness, wisdom and holiness//.

Now this fact -- that after the death of the Holy One, the Arahat, this physico-mental life-process no longer continues -- is erroneously believed by many to be identical with annihilation of self, annihilation of a real being, and it is therefore maintained that the goal of Buddhism is simply annihilation. Against such a misleading statement one must enter an emphatic protest. How is it ever possible to speak of the annihilation of a self, or soul, or ego, where no such thing is to be found? We have seen that in reality there does not exist any ego-entity, or soul, and therefore also no "transmigration" of such a thing into a new mother's womb.

That bodily process starting anew in the mother's womb is in no way a continuation of a former bodily process, but merely a result, or effect, caused by selfish craving and clinging to life of the so-called dying individual. Thus one who says that the non-producing of any new life-process is identical with annihilation of a self, should also say that abstention from sexual intercourse is identical with annihilation of a child -- which, of course, is absurd.

Here, once more, we may expressly emphasize that without a clear perception of the phenomenality or egolessness (//anatta//) of all existence, it will be impossible to obtain a real understanding of the Buddha's teaching, especially that of rebirth and Nibbana. This teaching of //anatta// is in fact //the only characteristic Buddhist doctrine//, with which the entire teaching stands or falls.

IV. A further reproach, so often heard against Buddhism, that it is a gloomy and "pessimistic" teaching, proves entirely unfounded by the statements already made. For, as we have seen, the Buddha not only discloses and explains the fact of misery, but he also shows the way to find total release from it. In view of this fact, one is rather entitled to call //the Buddha's teaching the boldest optimism ever proclaimed to the world.//

Truly, Buddhism is a teaching that //assures hope, comfort and happiness//, even to the most unfortunate. It is a teaching that offers, even to the most wretched of criminals, prospects of final perfection and peace, and this, not through blind belief, or prayers, or asceticism, or outward ceremonies, rites and rituals, but through walking and earnestly persevering on that Noble Eightfold Path of inward perfection, purity and emancipation of heart, consisting in right understanding, right thought, right speech, right bodily action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration and peace of mind.

The Noble Eightfold Path
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

```
                    -+
1. Right Understanding   | ---- Wisdom
2. Right Thought         |
                    -+

                    -+
3. Right Speech          |
4. Right Bodily Action   | ---- Morality
5. Right Livelihood      |
                    -+

                    -+
6. Right Effort          |
7. Right Mindfulness     | ---- Concentration
8. Right Concentration   |
                    -+
```

* * * * * * * *

II

KAMMA AND REBIRTH

When beholding this world and thinking about the destinies of beings, it will appear to most people as if everything in nature was unjust. Why, they will say, is one person rich and powerful, but another person poor and distressed? Why is one person all his life well and healthy, but another person from his very birth sickly or infirm? Why is one person endowed with attractive appearance, intelligence and perfect senses, while another person is repulsive and ugly, an idiot, blind, or deaf and dumb? Why is one child born amid utter misery and among wretched people, and brought up as a criminal, while another child is born in the midst of plenty and comfort, of noble-minded parents, and enjoys all the advantages of kindly treatment and the best mental and moral education, and sees nothing but good things all around? Why does one person, often without the slightest effort, succeed in all his enterprises, while to another person all his plans fail? Why do some live in luxury, while others have to live in poverty and distress? Why is one person happy, but another person unhappy? Why does one person enjoy long life, while another person in the prime of life is carried away by death? Why is this so? Why do such differences exist in nature?
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Christianity does not provide us with any reasonable answer to these questions, nor does it try to find an explanation for them. Quite to the contrary! Take, for example, the poor, wretched child, born in misery and among criminals, and actually trained to become a criminal. Under such circumstances, and without the slightest moral advice, will such a being ever be able to distinguish between moral and immoral, between crime and virtue? No, under such conditions the only way open for him is to become a criminal. And of such a poor and pitiable being Christianity says -- apart from his present misery and suffering -- that it is destined after death to eternal punishment in hell. Could there be found in this world anything more unjust and cruel than this kind of thinking? It is really the worst form of fatalism and injustice! For how could a being under those conditions ever be made responsible for his deeds? Now, as to the question why such differences exist in the destiny of beings, this question is satisfactorily answered solely by Buddhism.

Of all those circumstances and conditions constituting the destiny of a being, none, according to the Buddha's Teaching, can come into existence without a previous cause and the presence of a number of necessary conditions. Just as, for example, from a rotten mango seed a healthy mango tree with healthy and sweet fruits never will come, just so the evil volitional actions, or evil kamma, produced in former births, are the seeds, or root-causes, of an evil destiny in a later birth. It is a necessary postulate of thinking that the good and bad destiny of a being, as well as its latent character, cannot be the product of mere chance, but must of necessity have its causes in a previous birth.

According to Buddhism, no organic entity, physical or psychical, can come into existence without a previous cause, i.e. without a preceding congenial state out of which it has developed. Also, no living organic entity can ever be produced by something altogether outside of it. It can originate only out of itself, i.e. it must have already existed in the bud, or germ, as it were. To be sure, besides this cause, or root-condition, or seed, there are still many minor conditions required for its actual arising and its development, just as the mango tree besides its main cause, the seed, requires for its germinating, growth and development such further conditions as earth, water, light, heat, etc. Thus the true cause of the birth of a being, together with its character and destiny, goes back to the kamma-volitions produced in a former birth.

According to Buddhism, there are three factors necessary for the rebirth of a human being, that is, for the formation of the embryo in the mother's womb. They are: the female ovum, the male sperm, and the karma-energy (//kamma-vega//), which in the Suttas is metaphorically called "//gandhabba//," i.e. "ghost," or "soul." This kamma-energy is sent forth by a dying individual at the moment of his death. The father and mother only provide the necessary physical material for the formation of the embryonic body. With regard to the characteristic features, the tendencies and faculties lying latent in the embryo, the Buddha's teaching may be explained in the following way: The dying individual, with his whole being convulsively clinging to life, at the very moment of his death sends forth kammic energies which, like a flash of lightning, hit at a new mother's womb ready for conception. Thus, through the impinging of the kamma-energies on ovum and sperm, there appears just as a precipitate the so-called primary cell.

This process may be compared with the functioning of the air-vibrations produced through speech, which, by impinging on the acoustic organ of another man, produce a sound, which is a purely subjective sensation. On this occasion no transmigration of a sound-sensation takes place, but simply a transference of energy, called the air vibrations. In a similar way, the kamma-energies, sent out by the dying individual, produce from the material furnished by the parents the new embryonic being. But no transmigration of a real being, or a soul-entity, takes place on that occasion, but simply the transmission of kamma-energy.

Hence we may say that the present life-process (//upapatti-bhava//) is the objectification of the corresponding pre-natal kamma-process (//kamma-bhava//), and that the future life-process is the objectification of the corresponding present kamma-process. Thus nothing transmigrates from one life to the next. And what we call our ego is in reality only this process of continual change, of continual arising and passing away. Thus follows moment after moment, day after day, year after year, life after life. Just as the wave that apparently hastens over the surface of the pond is in reality nothing but a continuous rising and falling of ever new masses of water, each time called forth through the transmission of energy, even so, closely considered, in the ultimate sense there is no permanent ego-entity that passes through the ocean of Samsara, but merely a process of physical and psychical phenomena takes place, ever and again being whipped up by the impulse and will for life.

It is undoubtedly true that the mental condition of the parents at the moment of conception has a considerable influence upon the character of the embryonic being, and that the nature of the mother may make a deep impression on the character of the child she bears in her womb. The indivisible unity of the psychic individuality of the child, however, can in no way be produced by the parents. One must here never confound the actual cause -- the preceding state out of which the later state arises -- with the influences and conditions from without. If it were really the case that the new individual, as an inseparable whole, was begotten by its parents, twins could never exhibit totally opposite tendencies. In such a case, children, especially twins, would, with positively no exception, always be found to possess the same character as the parents.

At all times, and in probably all the countries on earth, the belief in rebirth has been held by many people; and this belief seems to be due to an intuitional instinct that lies dormant in all beings. At all times many great thinkers too have taught a continuation of life after death. Already from time immemorial there was taught some form of metempsychosis, i.e. "transformation of soul," or metamorphosis, i.e. "transformation of body," etc., thus by the esoteric doctrines of old Egypt, by Pythagoras, Empedocles, Plato, Plotinus, Pindaros, Vergil, also by the African negroes. Many modern thinkers too teach a continuation of the life-process after death.

The great German scientist Edgar Dacque, in his book //The Primeval World, Saga and Mankind//, speaking about the widespread belief shared by all peoples of the world in a transmigration after death, gives the following warning:

> Peoples with culture and acquaintance with science, such as the old Egyptians and wise Indians, acted and lived in accordance with this belief. They lost this belief only after the rise of the naively realistic and rationalistic Hellenism and Judaism. For this reason it would be better, concerning this problem, not to assume the bloodless attitude of modern sham-civilization, but rather adopt a reverential attitude in trying to solve this problem and grasp it in its profundity.

This law of rebirth can be made comprehensible only by the subconscious life-stream (in Pali, //bhavanga-sota//), which is mentioned in the Abhidhamma Pitaka and further explained in the commentaries, especially the //Visuddhimagga//. The fundamental import of //bhavanga-sota//, or the subconscious life-stream, as a working hypothesis for the explanation of the various Buddhist doctrines, such as rebirth, kamma, remembrance of former births, etc., has up to now not yet sufficiently been recognized, or understood, by Western scholars. The term //bhavanga-sota//, is identical with what the modern psychologists, such as Jung, etc., call the soul, or the unconscious, thereby not meaning, of course, the eternal soul-entity of Christian teaching but an ever-changing subconscious process. This subconscious life-stream is the necessary condition of all life. In it, all impressions and experiences are stored up, or better said, appear as a multiple process of past images, or memory pictures, which however, as such, are hidden to full consciousness, but which, especially in dreams, cross the threshold of consciousness and make themselves fully conscious.

Professor James (whose words I here retranslate from the German version) says: "Many achievements of genius have here their beginning. In conversion, mystical experience, and as prayer, it co-operates with religious life. It contains all momentarily inactive reminiscences and sources of all our dimly motivated passions, impulses, intuitions, hypotheses, fancies, superstitions; in short, all our non-rational operations result therefrom. It is the source of dreams, etc."

Jung, in his //Soul Problems of the Present Day//, says: "From the living source of instinct springs forth everything creative." And in another place: "Whatever has been created by the human mind, results from contents which were really unconscious (or subconscious) germs." And: "The term 'instinct' is of course nothing but a collective term for all possible organic and psychic factors, whose nature is for the greater part unknown to us."

The existence of the subconscious life-stream, or //bhavanga-sota//, is a necessary postulate of our thinking. If whatever we have seen, heard, felt, perceived, thought, experienced and done were not, without exception, registered somewhere and in some way, either in the extremely complex nervous system (comparable to a phonograph record or photographic plate) or in the subconscious or unconscious, we would not even be able to remember what we were thinking at the preceding moment; we would not know anything of the existence of other beings and things; we would not know our parents, teachers, friends, and so on; we would not even be able to think at all, as thinking is conditioned by the remembrance of former experiences; and our mind would be a complete //tabula rasa// and emptier than the actual mind of an infant just born, nay even of the embryo in the mother's womb.

Thus this subconscious life-stream, or //bhavanga-sota//, can be called the precipitate of all our former actions and experiences, which must have been going on since time immemorial and must continue for still immeasurable periods of time to come. Therefore what constitutes the true and innermost nature of man, or any other being, is this subconscious life-stream, of which we do not know whence it came and whither it will go. As Heraclitus says: "We never enter the same stream. We are identical with it, and we are not." Just so it is said in the //Milindapanha//: "//na ca so, na ca anno//; neither is it the same, nor is it another (that is reborn)." All life, be it corporeal, conscious or subconscious, is a flowing, a continual process of becoming, change and transformation. No persistent element is there to be discovered in this process. Hence there is no permanent ego, or personality, to be found, but merely these transitory phenomena.

About this unreality of the ego, the Hungarian psychologist Volgyesi in his //Message to the Nervous World// says:

> Under the influence of the newest knowledge the psychologists already begin to realize the truth about the delusive nature of the ego-entity, the mere relative value of the ego-feeling, the great dependency of this tiny man on the inexhaustible and complex working factors of the whole world. ... The idea of an independent ego, and of a self-reliant free will: these ideas we should give up and reconcile ourselves to the truth that there does not exist any real ego at all. What we take for our ego-feeling, is in reality nothing but one of the most wonderful //fata-morgana// plays of nature.

In the ultimate sense, there do not even exist such things as mental states, i.e. stationary things. Feeling, perception, consciousness, etc., are in reality mere passing processes of feeling, perceiving, becoming conscious, etc., within which and outside of which no separate or permanent entity lies hidden.

Thus a real understanding of the Buddha's doctrine of kamma and rebirth is possible only to one who has caught a glimpse of the egoless nature, or //anattata//, and of the conditionality, or //idappaccayata//, of all phenomena of existence. Therefore it is said in the //Visuddhimagga// (Chap. XIX):

> Everywhere, in all the realms of existence, the noble disciple sees only mental and corporeal phenomena kept going through the concatenation of causes and effects. No producer of the volitional act or kamma does he see apart from the kamma, no recipient of the kamma-result apart from the result. And he is well aware that wise men are using merely conventional language, when, with regard to a kammical act, they speak of a doer, or with regard to a kamma-result, they speak of the recipient of the result.
>
> No doer of the deeds is found,
> No one who ever reaps their fruits;
> Empty phenomena roll on:
> This only is the correct view.
>
> And while the deeds and their results
> Roll on and on, conditioned all,
> There is no first beginning found,
> Just as it is with seed and tree. ...
>
> No god, no Brahma, can be called
> The maker of this wheel of life:
> Empty phenomena roll on,
> Dependent on conditions all.

In the //Milindapanha// the King asks Nagasena:

> "What is it, Venerable Sir, that will be reborn?"
>
> "A psycho-physical combination (//nama-rupa//), O King."
>
> "But how, Venerable Sir? Is it the same psycho-physical combination as this present one?"

"No, O King. But the present psycho-physical combination produces kammically wholesome and unwholesome volitional activities, and through such kamma a new psycho-physical combination will be born."

As in the ultimate sense (//paramatthavasena//) there is no such thing as a real ego-entity, or personality, one cannot properly speak of the rebirth of such a one. What we are here concerned with is this psycho-physical process, which is cut off at death, in order to continue immediately thereafter somewhere else.

Similarly we read in the //Milindapanha//:

"Does, Venerable Sir, rebirth take place without transmigration?"

"Yes, O King."

"But how, Venerable Sir, can rebirth take place without the passing over of anything? Please, illustrate this matter for me."

"If, O King, a man should light a lamp with the help of another lamp, does the light of the one lamp pass over to the other lamp?"

"No, Venerable Sir."

"Just so, O King, does rebirth take place without transmigration."

Further, in the //Visuddhimagga// (Chap. XVII) it is said:

Whosoever has no clear idea about death and does not know that death consists in the dissolution of the five groups of existence (i.e. corporeality, feeling, perception, mental formations, consciousness), he thinks that it is a person, or being, that dies and transmigrates to a new body, etc. And whosoever has no clear idea about rebirth, and does not know that rebirth consists in the arising of the five groups of existence, he thinks that it is a person, or being, that is reborn, or that the person reappears in a new body. And whosoever has no clear idea about Samsara, the round of rebirths, he thinks that a real person wanders from this world to another world, comes from that world to this world, etc. And whosoever has no clear idea about the phenomena of existence, he thinks that the phenomena are his ego or something appertaining to the ego, or something permanent, joyful, or pleasant. And whosoever has no clear idea about the conditional arising of the phenomena of existence, and about the arising of kammic volitions conditioned through ignorance, he thinks that it is the ego that understands or fails to understand, that acts or causes to act, that enters into a new existence at rebirth. Or he thinks that the atoms or the Creator, etc., with the help of the embryonic process, shape the body, provide it with various faculties; that it is the ego that receives the sensuous impression, that feels, that desires, that becomes attached, that enters into existence again in another world. Or he thinks that all beings come to life through fate or chance.

A mere phenomenon it is, a thing conditioned,
That rises in the following existence.
But not from a previous life does it transmigrate there,
And yet it cannot rise without a previous cause.

When this conditionally arisen bodily-mental phenomenon (the fetus) arises, one says that it has entered into (the next) existence. However, no being (//satta//), or life-principle (//jiva//), has transmigrated from the previous existence into this existence, and yet this embryo could not have come into existence without a previous cause.

This fact may be compared with the reflection of one's face in the mirror, or with the calling forth of an echo by one's voice. Now, just as the image in the mirror or the echo are produced by one's face or voice without any passing over of face or voice, just so it is with the arising of rebirth-consciousness. Should there exist a full identity or sameness between the earlier and the later birth, in that case milk could never turn into curd; and should there exist an entire otherness, curd could never be conditioned through milk. Therefore one should admit neither a full identity, nor an entire otherness of the different stages of existence. Hence //na ca so, na ca anno//: "neither is it the same, nor is it another one." As already said above: all life, be it corporeal, conscious or subconscious, is a flowing, a continual process of becoming, change and transformation.

To sum up the foregoing, we may say: There are in the ultimate sense no real beings or things, neither creators nor created; there is but this process of corporeal and mental phenomena. This whole process of existence has an active side and a passive side. The active or causal side of existence consists of the kamma-process (//kamma-bhava//), i.e. of wholesome and unwholesome kamma-activity, while the passive or caused side consists of kamma-results, or //vipaka//, the so-called rebirth-process (//upapatti-bhava//), i.e. the arising, growing, decaying and passing away of all these kammically neutral phenomena of existence.

Thus, in the absolute sense, there exists no real being that wanders through this round of rebirths, but merely this ever-changing twofold process of kamma-activities and kamma-results takes place. The present life is, as it were, the reflection of the past one, and the future life the reflection of the present one. The present life is the result of the past kammic activity, and the future life the result of the present kammic activity. Therefore, nowhere is there to be found an ego-entity that could be the performer of the kammic activity or the recipient of the kamma-result. Hence Buddhism does not teach any real transmigration, as in the highest sense there is no such thing as a being, or ego-entity, much less the transmigration of such a one.

In every person, as already mentioned, there seems to lie dormant the dim instinctive feeling that death cannot be the end of all things, but that somehow continuation must follow. In which way this may be, however, is not immediately clear.

It is perhaps quite true that a direct proof for rebirth cannot be given. We have, however, the authentic reports about children in Burma and elsewhere, who sometimes are able to remember quite distinctly (probably in dreams) events of their previous life. By the way, what we see in dreams are mostly distorted reflexes of real things and happenings experienced in this or a previous life. And how could we ever explain the birth of such prodigies as Jeremy Bentham, who already in his fourth year could read and write Latin and Greek; or John Stuart Mill, who at the age of three read Greek and at the age of six wrote a history of Rome; or Babington Macaulay, who in his sixth year wrote a compendium of world history; or Beethoven, who gave public concerts when he was seven; or Mozart, who already before his sixth year had written musical compositions; or Voltaire, who read the fables of Lafontaine when he was three years old. Should all these prodigies and geniuses, who for the most part came from illiterate parents, not already in previous births have laid the foundations to their extraordinary faculties? "//Natura non facit saltus//: nature makes no leaps."

How could we further explain that a child of righteous and bodily and mentally healthy parents and ancestors, sometimes already immediately after birth, shows signs of the criminal type, of criminal tendencies, perceptible by the shape of the skull, by facial expression, by attitude, movement, etc., recognizable to phrenologists, physiognomists, etc.?

In any case, we may rightly state that the Buddhist doctrine of kamma and rebirth offers the only plausible explanation for all the variations and dissimilarities in nature. From the apple seed only an apple tree may come, no mango tree; from a mango seed only a mango tree, no apple tree. Just so, all animate things, as man, animal, etc., probably even plants, nay even crystals, must of necessity be manifestations or objectifications of some specific kind of subconscious impulse or will for life. Buddhism says nothing on the last-mentioned points; it simply states that all vegetable life belongs to the germinal order, or //bija-niyama//.

Buddhism teaches that if in previous births the bodily, verbal and mental kamma, or volitional activities, have been evil and low and thus have unfavourably influenced the subconscious life-stream (//bhavanga-sota//), then also the results, manifested in the present life, must be disagreeable and evil; and so must be the character and the new actions induced or conditioned through the evil pictures and images of the subconscious life-stream. If the beings, however, have in former lives sown good seeds, then they will reap good fruits in the present life.

In Majjhima Nikaya 135 a brahmin raises the problem:

> There are found people who are short-lived, and those that are long-lived; there are found people who are very sick, and those that are healthy; there are found people who are hideous, and those that are beautiful; there are found people who are powerless, and those that are powerful; there are found people who are poor, and those that are rich; there are found people who are of low family, and those that are of high family; there are found people who are stupid, and those that are intelligent. What then, Master Gotama, is the reason that among human beings such inferiority and superiority are found?

The Blessed One gave the reply:

> Beings are owners of their kamma, heirs of their kamma; kamma is the womb from which they have sprung, kamma is their friend and refuge. Thus kamma divides beings into the high and low.

In Anguttara Nikaya III,40 it is said: "Killing, stealing, adultery, lying, backbiting, harsh speech and empty prattling, practised, cultivated and frequently engaged in, will lead to hell, the animal world or the realm of ghosts." Further: "Whoso kills and is cruel, will either go to hell, or if reborn as a human, will be short-lived. Whoso tortures other beings, will be afflicted with disease. The hater will be hideous, the envious will be without influence, the stubborn will be of low rank, the indolent will be ignorant." In the reverse case, a person will be reborn in a heavenly world; or, if reborn as a human being, will be endowed with health, beauty, influence, riches, noble rank and intelligence.

George Grimm, in his book //The Doctrine of the Buddha//, tries to show how the law of affinity may at the moment of death regulate the grasping of the new germ. He says:

> Whoso, devoid of compassion can kill men, or even animals, carries deep within himself the inclination to shorten life. He finds satisfaction, or even pleasure, in the short-livedness of other creatures. Short-lived germs have therefore some affinity for him, an affinity which makes itself known after his death in the grasping of another germ, which then takes place to his own detriment. Even so, germs bearing within themselves the power of developing into a deformed body, have an affinity for one who finds pleasure in ill-treating and disfiguring other.
>
> Any angry person begets within himself an affinity for ugly bodies and their respective germs, since it is the characteristic mark of anger to disfigure the face.
>
> Whoever is jealous, niggardly, haughty, carries within himself the tendency to grudge everything to others, and to despise them. Accordingly, germs that are destined to develop in poor outward circumstances, possess affinity for him.

Here I should like to rectify several wrong applications of the term "kamma" prevailing in the West, and to state once for all: Pali //kamma//, comes from the root //kar//, to do, to make, to act, and thus means "deed, action," etc. As a Buddhist technical term, kamma is a name for wholesome and unwholesome volition or will (//kusala//- and //akusala//-cetana//) and the consciousness and mental factors associated therewith, manifested as bodily, verbal or mere mental action. Already in the Suttas it is said: "Volition (//cetana//), monks, do I call kamma. Through volition one does the kamma by means of body, speech or mind" (//cetanaham bhikkhave kammam vadami; cetayitva kammam karoti kayena vacaya manasa//). Thus kamma is volitional action, nothing more, nothing less.

From this fact result the following three statements:

1. The term "kamma" never comprises the result of action, as most people in the West, misled by Theosophy, wish this term to be understood. Kamma is wholesome or unwholesome volitional action and //kamma-vipaka// is the result of action.

2. There are some who consider every happening, even our new wholesome and unwholesome actions, as the result of our prenatal kamma. In other words, they believe that the results again become the causes of new results, and so //ad infinitum//. Thus they are stamping Buddhism as fatalism; and they will have to come to the conclusion that, in this case, our destiny can never be influenced or changed, and no deliverance ever be attained.

3. There is a third wrong application of the term "kamma," being an amplification of the first view, i.e. that the term "kamma" comprises also the result of action. It is the assumption of a so-called joint kamma, mass-kamma, or group-kamma, or collective kamma. According to this view, a group of people, e.g. a nation, should be responsible for the bad deeds formerly done by this so-called "same" people. In reality, however, this present people may not consist at all of the same individuals who did these bad deeds. According to Buddhism it is of course quite true that anybody who suffers bodily, suffers for his past or present bad deeds. Thus also each of those individuals born within that suffering nation must, if actually suffering bodily, have done evil somewhere, here or in one of the innumerable spheres of existence, but he may not have had anything to do with the bad deeds of the so-called nation. We might say that through his evil kamma he was attracted to the hellish condition befitting him. In short, the term "kamma" applies, in each instance, only to wholesome and unwholesome volitional activity of the single individual. Kamma thus forms the cause, or seed, from which the results will accrue to the individual, be it in this life or hereafter. [1]

Hence man has it in his power to shape his future destiny by means of his will and actions. It depends on his actions, or kamma, whether his destiny will lead him up or down, either to happiness or to misery. Moreover, kamma is the cause and seed not only for the continuation of the life-process after death, i.e. for the so-called rebirth, but already in this present life-process our actions, or kamma, may produce good and bad results, and exercise a decisive influence on our present character and destiny. Thus, for instance, if day by day we are practising kindness towards all living beings, humans as well as animals, we will grow in goodness, while hatred, and all evil actions done through hatred, as well as all the evil and agonizing mental states produced thereby, will not so easily rise again in us; and our nature and character will become firm, happy, peaceful and calm.

If we practise unselfishness and liberality, greed and avarice will become less. If we practise love and kindness, anger and hatred will vanish. If we develop wisdom and knowledge, ignorance and delusion will more and more disappear. The less greed, hatred and ignorance (//lobha//, //dosa//, //moha//) dwell in our hearts, the less will we commit evil and unwholesome actions of body, speech and mind. For all evil things, and all evil destiny, are really rooted in greed, hate and ignorance; and of these three things ignorance or delusion (//moha, avijja//) is the chief root and the primary cause of all evil and misery in the world. If there is no more ignorance, there will be no more greed and hatred, no more rebirth, no more suffering.

This goal, however, in the ultimate sense, will be realized only by the Holy Ones (Arahats), i.e. by those who, forever and all time, are freed from these three roots; and this is accomplished through the penetrating insight, or //vipassana//, into the impermanency, unsatisfactoriness and egolessness of this whole life-process, and through the detachment from all forms of existence resulting therefrom. As soon as greed, hate and ignorance have become fully and forever extinguished, and thereby the will for life, convulsively clinging to existence, and the thirsting for life have come to an end, then there will be no more rebirth, and there will have been realized the goal shown by the Enlightened One, namely: extinction of all rebirth and suffering. Thus, the Arahat performs no more kamma, i.e. no more kammically wholesome or unwholesome volitional actions. He is freed from this life-affirming will expressed in bodily actions, words or thoughts, freed from this seed, or cause, of all existence and life.

Now what is called character is in reality the sum of these subconscious tendencies produced partly by the prenatal, partly by the present volitional activity, or kamma. And these tendencies may, during life, become an inducement to wholesome or unwholesome volitional activity by body, speech or mind. If, however, this thirst for life rooted in ignorance is fully extinguished, then there will be no new entering again into existence. Once the root of a coconut tree has been fully destroyed, the tree will die off. In exactly the same way, there will be no entering again into a new existence once the life-affirming three evil roots -- greed, hate and ignorance -- have been forever destroyed. Here one should not forget that all such personal expressions as "I," "He," "Holy One," etc., are merely conventional names for this really impersonal life-process.

In this connection I have to state that, according to Buddhism, it is merely the last kammical volition just before death, the so-called death-proximate kamma, that decides the immediately following rebirth. In Buddhist countries it is therefore the custom to recall to the dying man's memory the good actions performed by him, in order to rouse in him a happy and pure kammical state of mind, as a preparation for a favourable rebirth. Or his relations let him see beautiful things which they, for his good and benefit, wish to offer to the Buddha, saying: "This, my dear, we shall offer to the Buddha for your good and welfare." Or they let him hear a religious sermon, or let him smell the odour of flowers, or give him sweets to taste, or let him touch precious cloth, saying: "This we shall offer to the Buddha for your own good and welfare."

In the //Visuddhimagga// (Chap. XVII) it is said that, at the moment before death, as a rule, there will appear to the memory of the evil-doer the mental image of any evil deed, //kamma//, formerly done; or that there will appear before his mental eyes an attendant circumstance, or object, called //kamma-nimitta//, connected with that bad deed, such as blood or a blood-stained dagger, etc.; or he may see before his mind an indication of his imminent miserable rebirth, //gati-nimitta//, such as fiery flames, etc. To another dying man there may appear before his mind the image of a voluptuous object inciting his sensual lust.

To a good man there may appear before his mind any noble deed, //kamma//, formerly done by him; or an object that was present at that time, the so-called //kamma-nimitta//; or he may see in his mind an indication of his imminent rebirth, //gati-nimitta//, such as heavenly palaces, etc.

Already in the Suttas there are distinguished three kinds of kamma, or volitional actions, with regard to the time of their bearing fruit, namely: (1) kamma bearing fruit in this life-time (//ditthadhamma-vedaniya-kamma//); (2) kamma bearing fruit in the next life (//upapajja-vedaniya-kamma//); (3) kamma bearing fruit in later lives (//aparapariya-vedaniya-kamma//). The explanations of this subject are somewhat too technical for the general reader. They imply the following: The kamma-volitional stage of the process in mind consists of a number of impulsive thought moments, or //javana-citta//, which flash up, one after the other, in rapid succession. Now, of these impulsive moments, the first one will bear fruit in this life-time, the last one in the next birth, and those between these two moments will bear fruit in later lives. The two kinds of kamma bearing fruit in this life-time and in the next birth may sometimes become ineffective (//ahosi-kamma//). Kamma, however, that bears fruit in later lives will, whenever and wherever there is an opportunity, be productive of kamma-result; and as long as this life-process continues, this kamma will never become ineffective.

The //Visuddhimagga// divides kamma, according to its functions, into four kinds: generative kamma, supportive kamma, counteractive kamma and destructive kamma, which all may be either wholesome or unwholesome.

Amongst these four kinds, the "generative" (//janaka-kamma//) generates at rebirth, and during the succeeding life-continuity, corporeal and neutral mental phenomena, such as the five kinds of sense-consciousness and the mental factors associated therewith, such as feeling, perception, sense-impression, etc.

The "supportive" (//upatthambhaka-kamma//), however, does not generate any kamma-result; but as soon as any other kamma-volition has effected rebirth and a kamma-result been produced, then it //supports//, according to its nature, the agreeable or disagreeable phenomena and keeps them going.

The "counteractive" (//upapilaka-kamma//) also does not generate any kamma-result; but as soon as any other kamma-volition has effected rebirth and a kamma-result been produced, then it //counteracts//, according to its nature, the agreeable or disagreeable phenomena and does not allow them to keep going on.

Again, the "destructive" (//upaghataka-kamma//) does not generate any kamma-result; but as soon as any other kamma-volition has effected rebirth and a kamma-result been produced, then it destroys the weaker kamma and admits only its own agreeable or disagreeable kamma-results.

In the Commentary to Majjhima Nikaya 135, generative kamma is compared with a farmer sowing the seeds; supportive kamma, with irrigating, manuring, and watching the field, etc.; counteractive kamma,with the drought that causes a poor harvest; destructive kamma, with a fire that destroys the whole harvest.

Another illustration is this: The rebirth of Devadatta in a royal family was due to his good generative kamma. His becoming a monk and attaining high spiritual powers was a good supportive kamma. His intention of killing the Buddha was a counteractive kamma, while his causing a split in the Order of monks was destructive kamma, owing to which he was born in a world of misery. It lies outside the scope of this short exposition to give detailed descriptions of all the manifold divisions of kamma found in the Commentaries. What I chiefly wanted to make clear by this lecture is: that the Buddhist doctrine of rebirth has nothing to do with the transmigration of any soul or ego-entity, as in the ultimate sense there does not exist any such ego or I, but merely a continually changing process of psychic and corporeal phenomena. And further I wanted to point out that the kamma-process and rebirth-process may both be made comprehensible only by the assumption of a subconscious stream of life underlying everything in living nature.

* * *

Notes to Chapter II

[1] Here I should add that the Pali term //vipaka//, which I generally translate by "effect," or "result," is not really identical with these two English terms. According to the //Kathavatthu//, it refers only to the kamma-produced "mental" results, such as pleasurable and painful bodily feeling and all other primary mental phenomena, while all the corporeal phenomena, such as the five physical sense-organs, etc., are not called //vipaka//, but "//kammaja//" or "//kamma-samutthana//," i.e. "kamma-born" or "kamma-produced."

* * * * * * * *

III

PATICCA-SAMUPPADA: DEPENDENT ORIGINATION

It is rather with some hesitation that I dare to speak to you on that profoundest of all Buddhist doctrines, //paticca-samuppada//, "dependent origination," that is to say, the conditional arising of all those mental and physical phenomena generally summed up by the conventional names "living being," or "individual," or "person." Thus, being well aware of the great difficulty of speaking on this most intricate subject before an audience perhaps only little acquainted with Buddhist philosophy, I shall try my utmost to avoid, as far as possible, all the highly technical or confusing details. I shall use very plain and simple language, so that any one of you may be able to follow my explanations. At the same time I shall not lose sight of the real goal and purpose for which the Buddha taught this doctrine to the world. Thus I would beg you to listen carefully and give my words full and undivided attention. And I further beg you to try to retain in mind those very few technical terms in Pali and English which in the course of my talk I shall be repeatedly using.

You may not be aware that, up to this day, the real significance and purpose of //paticca-samuppada// are practically unknown to Western scholars. By this, however, I do not mean to say that nobody in the West has ever written or spoken on this doctrine. No, quite the contrary is the case. For there is no other Buddhist doctrine about which Western scholars, and would-be scholars, have written and discussed so much -- but understood so little -- as just this doctrine of //paticca-samuppada//. If you wish to get a fair idea of those mostly absurd and immature speculations and fanciful interpretations, often based on mere imagination, you may read the Appendix to my //Guide through the Abhidhamma Pitaka//. [1] It seems that scarcely one of those Western authors and lecturers has ever put to himself the question, for what earthly reason the Buddha ever should have thought it necessary to teach such a doctrine. It was surely not for the sake of mental gymnastics and dialectics. No, quite to the contrary! For //paticca-samuppada// shows the causes and conditions of all the suffering in the world; and how, through the removal of these conditions, suffering may rise no more in the future. P.S. in fact shows that our present existence, with all its woe and suffering, is conditioned, or more exactly said caused, by the life-affirming volitions or kamma in a former life, and that again our future life depends on the present life-affirming volitions or kamma; and that without these life-affirming volitions, no more future rebirth will take place; and that thereby deliverance will have been found from the round of rebirths, from the restless cycle of Samsara. And this is the final goal and purpose of the Buddha's message, namely, deliverance from rebirth and suffering.

I think that after what you have heard just now, it will not be necessary to tell you that P.S. is not intended, as various scholars in the West have imagined, as an explanation of the primary beginning of all things; and that its first link, //avijja// or ignorance, is not to be considered the causeless first principle out of which, in the course of time, all physical and conscious life has evolved. P.S. simply teaches the conditionality, or dependent nature, of all the manifold mental and physical phenomena of existence; of everything that happens, be it in the realm of the physical or the mental. P.S. shows that the sum of mental and physical phenomena known by the conventional name "person" or "individual" is not at all the mere play of blind chance; but that each phenomenon in this process of existence is entirely dependent upon other phenomena as conditions; and that therefore with the removal of those phenomena that form the conditions for rebirth and suffering, rebirth and therewith all suffering will necessarily cease and come to an end. And this, as already stated, is the vital point and goal of the Buddha's teaching: deliverance from the cycle of rebirth with all its woe and suffering. Thus P.S. serves in the elucidation of the second and third noble truths about the origin and extinction of suffering, by explaining these two truths from their very foundations upwards, and giving them a fixed philosophical form. [2]

In the discourses of the Buddha, P.S. is usually expounded by way of twelve links arranged in eleven propositions. They are as follows:

1. //Avijjapaccaya sankhara//: "Through ignorance the rebirth-producing volitions, or kamma-formations, are conditioned."

2. //Sankhara-paccaya vinnanam//:"Through the kamma-formations (in the past life, the present) consciousness is conditioned."

3. //Vinnana-paccaya nama-rupam//:"Through consciousness the mental and physical phenomena (which make up our so-called individual existence) are conditioned."

4. //Nama-rupa-paccaya salayatanam//:"Through the mental and physical phenomena the six bases (of mental life, i.e. the five physical sense-organs and consciousness as the sixth) are conditioned."

5. //Salayatana-paccaya phasso//:"Through the six bases the (sensory and mental) impression is conditioned."

6. //Phassa-paccaya vedana//: "Through (the sensory or mental) impression feeling is conditioned."

7. //Vedana-paccaya tanha//: "Through feeling craving is conditioned."

8. //Tanha-paccaya upadanam//:"Through craving clinging is conditioned."

9. //Upadana-paccaya bhavo//:"Through clinging the process of becoming (consisting of the //active// and the passive// life-process, that is to say, the rebirth-producing kammic process, and as its result, the rebirth-process) is conditioned."

10. //Bhava-paccaya jati//:"Through the (rebirth-producing //kammic//) process of becoming rebirth is conditioned."

11. //Jati-paccaya jaramaranam//, etc.: "Through rebirth, decay and death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief and despair are conditioned. Thus arises this whole mass of suffering (in the future)."

This is in brief the whole P.S. or dependent origination. Now let us carefully examine the eleven propositions one by one.

* * *

1

Our first proposition was: //Avijja-paccaya sankhara//: "Through ignorance the kamma-formations are conditioned."

//Avijja//, [3] also called //moha//, is delusion, infatuation: regarding fleeting things as permanent, miserable things as enjoyment, and egoless things as a self or ego. //Avijja// is ignorance, not understanding that all our existence is merely an ever-changing process of mental and physical phenomena; it is not understanding that these phenomena, in the ultimate sense, do not form any real permanent entity, or person, or ego; and that there does not exist any permanent entity in, or behind, these fleeting physical and mental phenomena; that therefore what we call "I," or "you," or "he," or "person," or "Buddha," etc., does not, in the ultimate sense (//paramattha//), possess any reality apart from these ever-changing physical and mental phenomena of existence. //Avijja//, or //moha//, is the primary root-condition underlying all moral defilement and depravity. In //avijja// are rooted all the greed, hatred, conceit, envy and misery in the world. And the overcoming and extinction of //avijja//, and therewith of all evil and misery, is the final aim of the Buddha's teaching, the ideal for any true Buddhist. And it is for these reasons that //avijja// is mentioned first in the formula of P.S.

By //sankhara//, lit. "formations," are here meant the rebirth-producing, kammically unwholesome or wholesome volitions (//cetana//), or volitional activities. Let us therefore remember //sankhara// as kamma-formations, or simply as kamma. [4]

Now, all such evil volitions manifested by body, speech or mind, as above alluded to, are called //akusala// or unwholesome kamma-formations, as they bring unhappy results, here and in the after-life. //Kusala// or wholesome kamma-formations, however, are such volitions, or //cetana//, as will bring happy and pleasant results, here and in the after-life. But even these wholesome kamma-formations are still conditioned and influenced by //avijja//, as otherwise they would not produce future rebirth. And there is only one individual who no longer performs any wholesome or unwholesome kamma-formation, any life-affirming kamma. It is the Arahat, the holy and fully enlightened disciple of the Buddha. For through deep insight into the true nature of this empty and evanescent process of existence, he has become utterly detached from life; and he is forever freed from ignorance together with all its evil consequences, freed from any further rebirth.

//Avijja// is to all unwholesome kamma-formations, or volitional activities, an indispensable condition by way of its presence and simultaneous arising. For example, whenever an evil manifestation of will, an evil kamma-formation, arises, at that very same moment its arising is conditioned through the simultaneous arising and presence of //avijja//. Without the co-arising of //avijja//, there is no evil kamma-formation. When, for example, an infatuated man, filled with greed or anger, commits various evil deeds by body, speech or mind, at that time these evil kamma-formations are all entirely conditioned through the //co-arising// and //presence// of //avijja//, or ignorance. Thus if there is no //avijja//, there are no evil kamma-formations. Therefore it is said that //avijja// is to its associated kamma-formations a condition by way of //co-nascence//, or simultaneous arising (//sahajata//). Further, as there is no evil kamma-formation without the presence of //avijja//, and no //avijja// without the presence of evil kamma-formations, therefore both are at any time, and under all circumstances, also //mutual conditions// to each other (//annam-anna-paccaya//); and thus //avijja// and the evil kamma-formations are inseparable. In so far as //avijja// is an ever-present root of all evil kamma-formations, we say that //avijja// is to the unwholesome kamma-formations an indispensable condition by way of //root// (//hetu//).

But there is still another and entirely different way in which //avijja// may be a condition to unwholesome kamma-formations, that is, as //inducement//. For example, if a man, being filled with greed or anger, is induced by his infatuation and delusive thoughts to commit various crimes, such as murder, theft, adultery, etc., in that case //avijja// is the direct inducement and driving power for the subsequent arising of all those bad manifestations of will, i.e. of all those unwholesome kamma-formations. In other words, those bad unwholesome kamma-formations are conditioned by a preceding state of //avijja// as a //direct inducement (pakat' upanissaya-paccaya//).

There is still another way in which //avijja// may become an inducement to unwholesome kamma-formations, namely, as object of thinking. Suppose somebody remembers some evil and foolish pleasure once enjoyed by him; and while he is pondering over that former foolish state, he finds delight in it and becomes again filled with infatuation and greed for it; or he becomes sad and despondent that he cannot enjoy it any more. In consequence of wrongly brooding over such a foolish object, over such a state of ignorance, many evil, unwholesome states arise in his mind. In such a way, //avijja// may be to unwholesome kamma-formations a condition by way of //inducement as object (aramman'upanissaya-paccaya//).

Here I have to point out that for a detailed understanding of P.S., we should have to know at least something about those twenty- four different modes in which mental or physical phenomena may be the condition to other mental and physical phenomena. The entire //Patthana//, the last book of the Abhidhamma Pitaka, which fills six bulky volumes, treats exclusively of these twenty-four conditions, or //paccaya//, which it first describes and then applies to all the innumerable mental and physical phenomena of existence. [5] Here we shall consider only those most prominent ones, which we have already alluded to and applied to //avijja//, namely: //hetu-paccaya//, root condition; //sahajata-paccaya//, condition by way of co-nascence, i.e. co-arising; //annam-anna-paccaya//, condition by way of mutuality; //upanissaya-paccaya//, condition by way of either direct inducement (//pakat' upanissaya//), or inducement through object (//aramman' upanissaya//). Here, it may be mentioned that all these translations of technical Pali terms are only very inadequate makeshifts, and should be taken as such. I am therefore giving those technical terms repeatedly in both languages, in English as well as in Pali.

The //Patthana// Commentary compares the //hetu-paccaya//, or //root condition//, to the root of a tree. The tree rests on its roots; and it has life only as long as these roots are not destroyed. In the same way, all kammically wholesome and unwholesome kamma-formations are at any time conditioned through the presence and co-nascence, or simultaneity, of their respective wholesome or unwholesome roots. The three unwholesome roots are //lobha//, //dosa//, //moha//, i.e. greed, hate and delusion. The three wholesome roots are //alobha//, //adosa//, //amoha//, i.e. non-greed, or unselfishness; non-hate, or kindness; non-delusion, or knowledge.

Let us now consider //sahajata-paccaya//, the condition by way of co-nascence. //Sahajata//, literally means: "arisen together" or "arising together," hence our term "co-nascence," or simultaneous arising. This condition of co-nascence applies, above all, to consciousness and its concomitant mental phenomena, such as feeling, perception, volition, sense-impression, attention, etc. For consciousness and all these mental phenomena are mutually conditioned through their simultaneous arising. One cannot arise or exist without the other. All are inseparably associated. Thus if we say that feeling is to consciousness a condition by way of co-nascence, we mean to say that without the simultaneous arising of feeling, consciousness will never be able to arise. In exactly the same way it is with all the other mental phenomena.

Once a well-known Buddhist author, in a discussion with me, to my greatest surprise positively declared that there may be painful feeling without consciousness, for example during a painful operation whilst being under chloroform. This indeed is a most extraordinary blunder. How will it ever be possible to feel pain without being conscious of it? Painful feeling is a mental phenomenon and as such inseparable from consciousness and the other mental phenomena. If we do not perceive pain, and are not conscious of pain, how can we feel pain? Thus consciousness, feeling, perception and all the other mental phenomena are mutually conditioned by way of co-nascence.

Now let us consider //upanissaya-paccaya//, the condition by way of //inducement//. This condition is of various kinds, and it forms combinations with certain other conditions. [6] It applies to a very wide field, in fact to anything whatsoever. We shall treat this condition here only in a very general way, without making any distinctions. Anything past or future, physical or mental, real or imaginary, may become an inducement to the arising of mental phenomena, or of actions, or occurrences.

So, for example, the Buddha and his Dhamma had been a condition for my coming to the East. So were the Pali scholars whose translations I had read. So was the first Buddhist lecture I had heard in Germany in 1899. Or Nibbana, as object of our thinking, may become an inducement to our joining the Order, or living a pure life, etc. Also all those past thinkers, scientists and artists were by their works and activities an inducement to the developed culture of later generations. Money, as object of our desire, may become an inducement to our making the necessary exertions to get it; or it also may become an inducement to theft and robbery. Faith, knowledge, mental concentration, etc., may be a direct inducement to various noble and unselfish actions. Good or bad friends may be a direct inducement to good or bad conduct. Suitable or unsuitable climate, food, dwelling, etc., may be an inducement to physical health or ill-health; physical health or ill-health to mental health or ill-health. Thus all these things are conditioned through other things by way of inducement.

Now we shall consider //arammana-paccaya//, the condition by way of object. The object may be either one of the five sense-objects, as visible object, sound, smell, taste, or bodily impression; or it may be any object of the mind. Anything whatever may become the object of mind, be it physical or mental, past, present or future, real or imaginary. Thus the visible object, consisting in differences of colour, light and dark, is called the object-condition to eye-consciousness, or the visual sense. Similar it is with the four other senses. Without a physical sense-object no sense-consciousness ever will arise. Further, past evil deeds, through being the object of our thinking, may, as we already have seen, become an inducement, or //upanissaya//, to repeat the same evil deeds; or they may arouse our disgust or repentance. Thus past evil deeds, by wrong thinking about them, may become an inducement to an immoral life by way of object; and by right thinking about them, the same past evil deeds may become an inducement to a moral life. In a similar way, good deeds, by right thinking about them, may become an inducement to further noble deeds; but by wrong thinking about one's own good deeds, they may become an inducement to self-conceit and vanity, and many other unwholesome states. [7]

Hence, also such an immoral thing as //avijja// may become a condition to noble and wholesome kamma-formations. To show this, let us return to our first proposition: "Through //avijja// are conditioned the kamma-formations." How may such an evil state as //avijja// become a condition to noble and wholesome kamma-formations? It may become so in two ways, either by way of direct inducement, or inducement as mental object. I shall illustrate this statement by an example. At the Buddha's time many a heretic, induced by mere vanity and delusion, went to the Buddha and tried by dialectics to defeat the Master. However, after a short controversy he was converted: he became a virtuous follower and life-long supporter of the Blessed One, or even attained Arahatship. Here, all these virtuous actions, even the attainment of Arahatship of the new convert, were conditioned by his former //avijja// as an inducement; had this delusive idea of defeating the Buddha not arisen in his mind, he perhaps might have never in his life even visited the Blessed One. Thus //avijja// was to his noble and wholesome kamma-formations a condition by way of direct inducement (//pakat'-upanissaya//). Further, suppose we take //avijja// as object of our contemplation, considering it as something evil and rejectable, as the root-cause of all misery in the world, then we thereby may produce many noble and wholesome kamma-formations. In this case, //avijja// is to these wholesome kamma-formations a condition by way of inducement as object (//aramman' upanissaya//). [8]

Before proceeding to the second proposition, I wish to call your attention to the fact that //avijja//, or ignorance, though the main condition for kamma-formations, is in no way the only condition for them; and so are the kamma-formations to consciousness, etc. Each of the conditionally arising phenomena of P.S. is dependent on various conditions besides those given in the formula, and all may be interrelated and interdependent in manifold ways.

You may have noticed that nearly always I speak only of //conditions//, and rarely have I used the word "cause." This word "cause" is often used in a very vague or wrong sense. "Cause" refers really to that thing which -- if all the necessary conditions are present -- by inner necessity is in time followed by another thing as its "result," so that already in the cause the future result is lying latent, as it were, just as in the mango seed the future mango tree lies latent.

And just as from the mango seed only a mango tree may result, never an apple tree nor any other tree, just so may a cause result only in just one single thing of a similar character, never in various things nor in things of a different character. If, for example, a man grows furious on being scolded, people generally would say that the scolding man was the cause of the fury. But this is a very vague statement. The cause of the man's fury really lies in himself, in his own character, not in the person scolding him. The scolder's words were merely an inducement to the manifestation of his latent fury. The word "cause" signifies only one of the many kinds of conditions, and it should, in Buddhist philosophy, be reserved for kamma, i.e. the rebirth-producing volitional activities bound up with wholesome or unwholesome roots (//hetu//), constituting the cause of rebirth, and resulting in rebirth as their effect, or //vipaka//.

* * *

2

Herewith we come to the second proposition: //Sankhara-paccaya vinnanam//: "Through the kamma-formations consciousness is conditioned." In other words: through kamma, or the volitional activities, in the past birth, the conscious life in this present birth is conditioned.

Here the following has to be stated: The five links -- consciousness, mental and physical phenomena, the six bases of mental life, impression, and feeling (//vinnana//, //nama-rupa//, //salayatana//, //phassa//, //vedana//) -- refer here only to kamma-resultant (//vipaka//), neutral phenomena, thus representing the "passive" side of life. However, the five links -- ignorance, kamma-formations, craving, clinging, and kammical life-process (//avijja//, //sankhara//, //tanha//, //upadana//, //kamma-bhava//) -- constitute kamma, thus representing the "active" side of life. [9] Hence the five passive links, as consciousness, etc., are to be considered the five results (//vipaka//), and the five active links, as //avijja//, etc., the five causes. Thus the life-affirming will, or volition (//cetana//), manifested in these five kammic causes, is the seed from which all life has sprung, and from which it will spring again in the future. Our second proposition therefore shows that our present conscious life is the result of our kamma-formations produced in the past life, and that without these prenatal kamma-formations as the necessary cause, no conscious life would ever have sprung up in our mother's womb.

Hence, the kamma-formations are to the rebirth-consciousness of the embryonic being, at its conception in the mother's womb, a condition by way of //kamma//, or cause. And so are the kamma-formations to all the morally neutral elements of consciousness. Hence, also the five kinds of sense-consciousness with desirable and agreeable objects are the result, or //vipaka//, of the prenatal wholesome kamma-formations; and those with undesirable and disagreeable objects are the result of unwholesome kamma-formations. [10]

* * *

3

Now we come to the third proposition, namely: //Vinnana-paccaya nama-rupam//: "Through consciousness the mental and physical phenomena are conditioned." The meaning of this proposition can be inferred from the Mahanidana Sutta (DN 15), where it is said: "If //consciousness// (//vinnana//) were not to appear in the mother's womb, would the //mental and physical phenomena// (//nama-rupa//) arise?" [11]

The //mental// phenomena (//nama//) refer here to those seven universal mental phenomena inseparably bound up with all kamma-resultant consciousness, even with the five kinds of sense-consciousness. These seven inseparable universal mental phenomena are: feeling, perception, impression, volition, vitality, attention, concentration; in kamma-resultant mind-consciousness they are increased by three or four further phenomena. The //physical// phenomena (//rupa//) refer to this body and its various organs, faculties and functions. [12]

Now, how are the mental phenomena, or //nama//, conditioned through consciousness? And how the physical phenomena, or //rupa//?

Any state of //consciousness//, as already explained, is to its concomitant //mental// phenomena, such as feeling, etc., a condition by way of //co-nascence//, or simultaneous arising (//sahajata-paccaya//). Consciousness cannot arise and exist without feeling, nor feeling without consciousness; and also all the other mental phenomena which belong to the same state of consciousness are inseparably bound up with it into a single unit, and have no independent existence. These mental phenomena are, as it were, only the different aspects of those units of consciousness which, like lightning, every moment flash up and immediately thereafter disappear forever.

But how may //consciousness// (//vinnana)// be a condition for the various //physical// (//rupa//) phenomena?

In planes of existence where both matter and mind exist, e.g. in the human realm, at the moment of conception consciousness is an absolutely necessary condition for the arising of organic physical phenomena; it is a condition by way of //co-nascence//. If there is no consciousness, no conception takes place, and no organic material phenomena appear. During life-continuity, however, consciousness

(//vinnana//) is to the already arisen physical phenomena (//rupa//) a condition by way of //post-nascence//, or later-arising (//pacchajata-paccaya//), and also by way of //nutriment// (//ahara//), because consciousness forms a prop and support for the upkeep of the body. Just as the feeling of hunger is a condition for the feeding and upkeep of this already arisen body, just so is consciousness to this already arisen body a condition and support by its post-nascence, or later arising. If consciousness would rise no more, the physical organs would gradually cease their functioning, lose their faculties, and the body would die. In this way we have to understand the proposition: //vinnana-paccaya nama-rupam//: "Through consciousness the mental and physical phenomena are conditioned."

* * *

4

Now, we come to the fourth proposition: //Nama-rupa-paccaya salayatanam//: "Through the mental and physical phenomena the six bases of mental life are conditioned." The first five of these bases are the five physical sense-organs, eye, ear, nose, tongue, body; the sixth base, the mind base (//manayatana//), is a collective term for the many different classes of consciousness, i.e. for the five kinds of sense-consciousness and the many kinds of mind-consciousness. Hence five bases are physical phenomena, namely, eye, ear, etc., and the sixth base is identical with consciousness.

In which way, now, are the mental and physical phenomena a condition for the five physical bases, or sense-organs, and how for the sixth base, or consciousness? Here we really get four chief questions:

The first question is: How are the mental phenomena (//nama//) a condition for the five physical bases (//ayatana//), or sense-organs? The seven inseparable mental phenomena associated with sense-consciousness, such as feeling, perception, etc., are to the five physical bases, or sense-organs, a condition by way of post-nascence, and in other ways. The mental activity during life, namely, is a necessary support to the five physical bases, or sense organs, already produced at birth, as explained before.

The second question is: How are mental phenomena a condition to the mind-base (//manayatana//) or consciousness? The mental phenomena, as feeling, perception, volition, etc., are at any time to the mind-base, or consciousness, a condition by way of simultaneous arising, or co-nascence (//sahajata-paccaya//).

You will remember that I repeatedly said that consciousness cannot arise without the co-arising of feeling and the other phenomena, because consciousness and all its mental concomitants are inseparably bound up together, and mutually dependent upon one another. Thus I have shown how the mental phenomena are a condition to the five physical bases or sense-organs, as well as to the mind-base or consciousness (//manayatana//).

Now we come to the third question: How are the physical (//rupa//) phenomena a condition for the five physical bases (//ayatana//), or sense-organs? The four primary physical elements, i.e. the solid, fluid, heat, and motion, are to any of the five physical bases, or sense-organs, at the very moment of their first coming into existence, a condition by way of simultaneous arising (//sahajata-paccaya//); but during life these four physical elements are to the five bases, or sense-organs, a condition by way of foundation (//nissaya//) on which the sense-organs are entirely dependent. Further, the physical phenomenon "vitality" (//rupa-jivit' indriya//) is to the five bases, or sense-organs, a condition by way of presence (//atthi-paccaya//), etc.; in other words, the five bases, or sense-organs, depend on the presence of physical life, without which the five sense organs could not exist.

The physical phenomenon "nutrition" (//ahara//) is to the five physical bases a condition by way of presence, because the five sense-organs can only exist as long as they get their necessary nutriment. Thus I have shown how the physical phenomena, or //rupa//, are a condition for the five physical bases, or //ayatana//.

There remains only the fourth question: How are the physical phenomena (//rupa//) a condition for the mind-base (//manayatana//), or consciousness? The five physical phenomena, as eye, ear, nose, etc., are to the five kinds of sense-consciousness, i.e. to seeing, hearing, etc., a condition by way of foundation (//nissaya//) and by way of pre-nascence, presence, etc. These five kinds of sense-consciousness, during life, cannot arise without the pre-arising (//purejata) of the five physical sense-organs as their foundation (//nissaya//); therefore without the pre-arising and presence of the eye, no seeing; without the pre-arising and presence of the ear, no hearing, etc.; so that, if these five sense-organs are destroyed, no corresponding sense-consciousness can arise any longer.

In a similar way is the physical organ of mind the condition for the various stages of mind-consciousness. [13] In the canonical books no special physical organ is mentioned by name as the physical foundation of the mind-consciousness, neither the brain nor the heart, though the heart is taught as such by all the commentaries, as well as by the general Buddhist tradition. I think it is my Burmese friend Shwe Zan Aung who first made this fact known in his //Compendium of Philosophy//. [14] For the Buddhist it matters little whether it is the heart or the brain or any other organ that constitutes the physical base of mind.

Thus we have seen how the physical (//rupa//) phenomena are a condition to the mind-base (//manayatana//), or consciousness. And herewith we have settled the meaning of the proposition: "Through the mental and physical phenomena the six bases of mental life are conditioned."

* * *

Now we come to the fifth propostion: //Salayatana-paccaya phasso//: "Through the six bases sense-impression is conditioned." [15] In other words: Conditioned through the physical eye is visual impression, conditioned through the ear sound impression, conditioned through the nose smell impression, conditioned through the tongue taste impression, conditioned through the body bodily impression, conditioned through the mind-base or consciousness (//manayatana//) mental impression.

The five physical bases (//ayatana//) are to their corresponding sense-impressions (//phassa//) a condition by way of foundation (//nissaya//) and by way of pre-nascence (//purejata//) and in other ways besides. The five sense-organs are not only the foundation for consciousness, as we have seen, but also for all its mental concomitants, hence also for sense-impression. And as these five bases, or sense-organs, have already come into existence at birth, they are called a pre-nascent condition (//purejata-paccaya//) to the later arising five sense-impressions.

The mind-base or consciousness is at any time to its concomitant sensory or mental impression a condition by way of simultaneous arising or co-nascence, etc. In other words, eye-consciousness arises simultaneously with visual impression, ear-consciousness with sound impression, etc., and mind-consciousness with mental impression.

Also the external physical bases -- the five sense-objects, as the visual object, sound, smell, etc. -- these too are an indispensable condition to the arising of sense-impression. So visual impression could never arise without the pre-arising of the visible object, sound impression never without the pre-arising of the sound-object, etc. Hence the arising of the five sense-impressions (//phassa//) depends on the pre-arising of the visual object, the sound-object, etc. Therefore the arising of the five sense-impressions depends just as much on the pre-arising and presence of the five physical sense-objects as on the pre-arising of the five sense-organs, as already stated. Thus sense-impression is also conditioned through the five external physical bases, i.e. through the five sense-objects.

Further, as all the physical sense-objects may also become objects of mind-consciousness, therefore they are also a condition for mind-consciousness as well as for its concomitant phenomena, such as mental impression (//phassa//), etc. Thus without physical sense-organ and physical sense-object there is no sense-impression; and without mind and mind-object no mental impression. Therefore it is said: "Through the six sense bases sense-impression is conditioned."

* * *

6

Thereafter follows the sixth proposition: //Phassa-paccaya vedana//: "Through impression feeling is conditioned." There are six kinds of feeling: feeling associated with visual impression, feeling associated with sound impression, feeling associated with smell impression, feeling associated with taste impression, feeling associated with bodily impression, and feeling associated with mental impression. //Bodily// feeling may be either agreeable or disagreeable, according to whether it is the result of wholesome or unwholesome kamma. //Mental// feeling may be either agreeable, i.e. joy, or disagreeable, i.e. sadness; or it may be indifferent. The feelings associated with visual, sound, smell and taste impression, are, as such, always indifferent, but they may have either desirable or undesirable objects, according to the kamma in a previous life. Whatever the feeling may be -- pleasant or painful, happy or unhappy or indifferent, whether feeling of body or of mind -- any feeling is conditioned either through one of the five sense-impressions or through mental impression. And these impressions (//phassa//) are a condition to their associated feeling (//vedana//) by way of co-nascence or simultaneous arising, and in many other ways.

Here you will again remember that all the mental phenomena in one and the same state of consciousness, hence also impression (//phassa//) and feeling (//vedana//), are necessarily dependent one upon another by their simultaneous arising, their presence, their association, etc. But to any feeling associated with the different stages of mind-consciousness following upon a sense-impression, the preceding visual or other sense-impression is an inducement by way of proximity (//anantar' upanissaya-paccaya//). In other words, the preceding sense-impression is a decisive support, or inducement, to any feeling bound up with the succeeding mind-consciousness.

Thus we have seen how through sensory and mental impression, or //phassa//, feeling, or //vedana//, is conditioned.

* * *

7

Now comes the seventh proposition: //Vedana-paccaya tanha//: "Through feeling craving is conditioned."

Corresponding to the six senses, there are six kinds of //craving// (//tanha//), namely: craving for visible objects, craving for sounds, craving for odours, craving for tastes, craving for bodily impressions, craving for mind-objects. If the craving for any of these objects is connected with the desire for sensual enjoyment, it is called "sensuous craving" (//kama-tanha//). If connected with the belief in eternal personal existence (//sassata-ditthi//), it is called "craving for existence" (//bhava-tanha//). If connected with the belief in self-annihilation (//uccheda-ditthi//) at death, it is called "craving for self-annihilation" (//vibhava-tanha//).

Any (kamma-resultant and morally) neutral feeling (//vedana//), whether agreeable, disagreeable or indifferent, whether happy or unhappy feeling, may be to the subsequent craving (//tanha//) a condition either by way of simple inducement, or of inducement as object. For example, conditioned through pleasurable feeling due to the beautiful appearance of persons or things, there may arise craving for such visible objects. Or conditioned through pleasurable feeling due to pleasant food, craving for tastes may arise. Or thinking of those feelings of pleasure and enjoyment procurable by money, people may become filled with craving for money and pleasure. Or pondering over past pleasures and feelings of happiness, people may again become filled with craving and longing for such pleasures. Or thinking of heavenly bliss and joy, people may become filled with craving for rebirth in such heavenly worlds. In all these cases pleasant feeling (//vedana//) is to craving (//tanha//) either a condition by way of simple inducement, or inducement as object of thinking.

But not only agreeable and happy feeling, but even disagreeable and unhappy feeling may become a condition for craving. For example, to a man being tormented with bodily pain or oppressed in mind, the craving may arise to be released from such misery. Thus, through feeling unhappy and dissatisfied with his miserable lot, a poor man, or a beggar, or an outcast, or a sick man, or a prisoner, may become filled with longing and craving for release from such a condition. In all these cases unpleasant and miserable feeling (//vedana//) of body and mind forms for craving (//tanha//) a condition by way of inducement, without which such craving might never have arisen. Even expected //future// feeling of happiness may, by thinking about it, become a mighty incentive, or inducement, to craving. Thus, whatever craving arises depends in some way or other on feeling, be it past, present, or even future feeling. Therefore it is said: //Vedana-paccaya tanha//: "Through feeling craving is conditioned."

* * *

8

Now we have reached the eighth proposition: //Tanha-paccaya upadanam//: "Through craving clinging is conditioned." //Upadana//, or clinging, is said to be a name for developed or intensified craving. In the texts we find four kinds of clinging: sensuous clinging, clinging to wrong views, clinging to faith in the moral efficacy of mere outward rules and rituals, and clinging to the belief in either an eternal or a temporary ego-entity. [16] The first one, sensuous clinging, refers to objects of sensuous enjoyment, while the three other kinds of clinging are connected with wrong views.

Whenever clinging to views or rituals arises, at that very moment also craving must arise; without the simultaneous arising of craving, there would be no such attachments to these views and rituals. Hence craving, or //tanha//, is for these kinds of clinging, or //upadana//, a condition by way of co-nascence (//sahajata-paccaya//). But besides this, craving may be to such kind of clinging also a condition by way of inducement (//upanissaya-paccaya//). Suppose a fool, who is craving for rebirth in heaven, thinks that by following certain outward moral rules, or by mere belief in a creator, he will attain the object of his desire. So he firmly attaches himself to the practice of mere outward rules and rituals, or to the belief in a creator. In this case, craving is for such kind of clinging a condition by way of inducement, or //upanissaya-paccaya//.

To sensuous clinging, or //kamupadana//, however, craving may only be a condition by way of direct inducement. The craving for sense-objects itself gradually develops and turns into strong sensuous clinging and attachment, or //kamupadana//. For example, craving and desire for objects of sensual enjoyment, for money, food, gambling, drinking, etc. may gradually grow into a strong habit, into a firm attachment and clinging.

Thus I have shown how craving is the condition for clinging. As it is said: //Tanha-paccaya upadanam//: "Through craving clinging is conditioned."

* * *

9

Next we come to the ninth proposition: //Upadana-paccaya bhavo//:"Through clinging the process of becoming is conditioned." Now this process of becoming or existence really consists of two processes: (1) the kamma-process (//kamma-bhava//), i.e. the kammically //active// side of life; and (2) the kamma-resultant rebirth-process (//upapatti-bhava//), i.e. the kammically //passive// and morally neutral side of life. The kammically active side of this life-process is, as we have seen, represented by five links, namely: ignorance, kamma-formations, craving, clinging, kamma-process (//avijja//, //sankhara//, //tanha//, //upadana//, //kamma-bhava//). The passive side of life is represented by five links, namely: consciousness, mental and physical phenomena, the six bases, impression, feeling (//vinnana//, //nama-rupa//, //salayatana//, //phassa//, //vedana//). Thus the five //passive// links, as consciousness, etc., refer here only to kamma-resultant phenomena, and not to such as are associated with active kamma. The five //active// links, as ignorance, etc., are the causes of the five //passive// links of the future, as kamma-resultant consciousness, etc.; and thus these five passive links are the results of the five active links. In that way, the P.S. may be represented by twenty links: five causes in the past life, and five results in the present one; five causes in the present life, and five results in the future one. [17]

As it is said in the //Visuddhimagga// (Chap. XVII):

> Five causes were there in the past,
> Five fruits are found in present life;
> Five causes which are now produced,
> Five fruits are reaped in future life.

Let me here recall to you my definition of the term "cause" as "that which by inner necessity is followed in time by its result." There are twenty-four modes of conditioning, but only one of them should be called //cause//, namely, kamma.

Though this kammic cause is in time followed by its result, it nevertheless may depend on (but not be produced by) a preceding kamma-result as its inducement condition. Thus for example, feeling, within the P.S., is a kamma-result; but still, at the same time, it is an inducement-condition to the subsequent arising of craving, which latter is a kamma cause.

Now, let us return to our proposition: //upadana-paccaya bhavo//:"Through clinging the process of becoming is conditioned," that is, (1) the kamma-process (//kamma-bhava//), and thereafter, in the next life, (2) the kamma-resultant rebirth-process (//upapatti-bhava//). The kamma-process (//kamma-bhava//) in this ninth proposition is, correctly speaking, a collective name for rebirth-producing volition (//cetana//) together with all the mental phenomena associated therewith; while the second link, "kamma-formations" (//sankhara//), designates as such merely rebirth-producing volition. But in reality both links amount to one and the same thing, namely kamma.

Clinging, or //upadana//, may be an inducement to all kinds of evil and unwholesome kamma. Sensuous clinging, or attachment to sense-objects and sensual enjoyment, may be a direct inducement to murder, robbery, theft, adultery, to envy, hatred, revenge; to many evil actions of body, speech and mind. Clinging to the blind belief in mere outward rules and rituals may lead to self-complacency, mental torpor and stagnation, to contempt of others, presumption, intolerance, fanaticism and cruelty. In all these cases, clinging (//upadana//) is to the kamma-process (//kamma-bhava//) a condition by way of inducement, and is a direct inducement to evil volitional activities of body, speech or mind. Moreover, clinging is to any evil kamma-process also a condition by way of simultaneous arising.

Thus I have shown how clinging (//upadana//) is the condition of the kamma-process (//kamma-bhava//). Now I shall show how the kamma-process (//kamma-bhava//) is the condition for the kamma-resultant rebirth-process (//upapatti-bhava//). Here we come to the tenth proposition.

* * *

10

//Bhava-paccaya jati//:"Through the process of becoming (here kamma-process) rebirth is conditioned." That means: the kamma-process dominated by the life-affirming volitions (//cetana//) is the cause of rebirth. Rebirth includes here the entire embryonic process which in the human world begins with conception in the mother's womb and ends with parturition. Thus kamma volition is the seed from which all life germinates, just as from the mango seed germinates the little mango plant, which in the course of time turns into a mighty mango tree. But how does one know that the kamma-process, or kamma volition, is really the cause of rebirth? The //Visuddhimagga// (XVII) gives the following answer:

Though the outward conditions at the birth of beings may be absolutely the same, there still can be seen a difference in beings with regard to their character, as wretched or noble, etc. Even though the outward conditions, such as sperm, or blood of father and mother, may be the same, there still can be seen that difference between beings, even if they be twins. This difference cannot be without reason, as it can be noticed at any time, and in any being. It can have no other cause than the pre-natal kamma-process. As also for the life of those beings which have been reborn, no other reason can be found, therefore that difference must be due to the pre-natal kamma-process. Kamma, or volition, indeed, is the cause for the difference among beings with regard to their character, as high, low, etc. Therefore the Buddha has said: "kamma divides beings into high and low." In this way we should understand that the kammic process is the cause of rebirth.

Thus, according to Buddhism, the present rebirth is the result of the craving, clinging and kamma volitions in the past birth. And the craving, clinging and kamma volitions in this present birth are the cause of future rebirth. But just as in this ever-changing mental and physical process of existence nothing can be found that passes even from one moment to the next, just so no abiding element can be found, no entity, no ego, that would pass from one birth to the next. In this ever repeated process of rebirth, in the absolute sense, no ego-entity is to be found besides these conditionally arising and passing phenomena. Thus, correctly speaking, it is not myself and not my person that is reborn; nor is it another person that is reborn. All such terms as "person" or "individual" or "man" or "I" or "you" or "mine," etc., do not refer to any real entity; they are merely terms used for convenience sake, in Pali //vohara-vacana//, "conventional terms"; and there is really nothing to be found beside these conditionally arising and passing mental and physical phenomena. Therefore the Buddha has said:

> To believe that the doer of the deed will be the same, as the one who experiences its result (in the next life): this is the one extreme. To believe that the doer of the deed, and the one who experiences its result, are two different persons: this is the other extreme. Both these extremes the Perfect One has avoided and taught the truth that lies in the middle of both, that is: Through ignorance the kamma-formations are conditioned; through the kamma-formations, consciousness (in the subsequent birth); through consciousness, the mental and physical phenomena; through the mental and physical phenomena, the six bases; through the six bases, impression; through impression, feeling; through feeling, craving; through craving, clinging; through clinging, the life-process; through the (kammic) life-process, rebirth; through rebirth, decay and death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief and despair. Thus arises this whole mass of suffering.

This phenomenality and egolessness of existence has been beautifully expressed in two verses of the //Visuddhimagga//:

> No doer of the deeds is found,
> No one who ever reaps their fruits.
> Empty phenomena roll on.
> This only is the correct view.
> No god nor Brahma can be called
> The maker of this wheel of life:
> Empty phenomena roll on,
> Dependent on conditions all.

In hearing that Buddhism teaches that everything is determined by conditions, someone might come to the conclusion that Buddhism teaches some sort of fatalism, or that man has no free will, or that will is not free. Now, with regard to the two questions: (1) "Has man a free will?" and (2) "Is will free?" the Buddhist will say that both these questions are to be rejected for being wrongly put, and therefore unanswerable.

The first question "Has man a free will?" is to be rejected for the reason that, beside these ever-changing mental and physical phenomena, in the absolute sense no such thing or entity can be found that we could call "man," so that "man" as such is merely a name without any reality.

The second question "Is will free?" is to be rejected for the reason that "will" is only a momentary mental phenomenon, just like feeling, consciousness, etc., and thus does not yet exist before it arises, and that therefore of a non-existent thing -- of a thing which is not -- one could, properly speaking, not ask whether it is free or unfree. The only admissible question would be: "Is the arising of will independent of conditions, or is it conditioned?" But the same question would equally apply also to all the other mental phenomena, as well as to all the physical phenomena, in other words, to everything and every occurrence whatever. And the answer would be: Be it "will," or "feeling," or any other mental or physical phenomenon, the arising of anything whatsoever depends on conditions; and without these conditions, nothing can ever arise or enter into existence.

According to Buddhism, everything mental and physical happens in accordance with laws and conditions; and if it were otherwise, chaos and blind chance would reign. But such a thing is impossible and contradicts all laws of thinking.

* * *

11

Now we have reached the eleventh and last proposition: //Jati-paccaya jara-maranam//: "Through rebirth decay and death are conditioned." Without birth there cannot be decay and death. If we had not been born, we would not have to die, and would not be exposed to all sorts of misery. Thus rebirth is a necessary condition for decay and death, and for all other forms of misery. Hence it was said: "Through rebirth decay and death are conditioned."

Herewith the explanation of the eleven propositions of the //paticca-samuppada// formula has been brought to a close. From my explanations you will have seen that the twelve links of the formula are distributed over three successive lives, and that they may be applied to our past, present and future lives. The first two links, //avijja// and kamma-formations, represent the kamma causes in the past life; the next five links, consciousness, etc., represent the kamma-results in the present life; the following three links, craving, clinging and kamma-process, represent the kammic causes in the present life; and the two last links, rebirth, and decay and death, represent the kamma-results in the future life.

You ought, however, to remember that the full kammic causes are five, namely: ignorance, kamma-formations, craving, clinging, kamma-process existence, and that thus we really get five causes in the past and five results in the present; five causes in the present and five results in the future. Therefore it was said:

Five causes were there in the past,
Five fruits are found in present life.
Five causes which are now produced,
Five fruits are reaped in future life.

Now, if there had been no ignorance and no kamma-formations or life-affirming volitions in the past life, no consciousness and new life would have sprung up in our mother's womb, and our present birth would not have taken place. However, if by deep penetration and deep insight into the evanescent nature and the egolessness of all existence, one becomes fully detached from all forms of existence, and freed from all ignorance, craving and clinging to existence, freed from all those selfish kamma-formations or volitions, then no further rebirth will follow, and the goal taught by the Buddha will have been realized, namely, deliverance from rebirth and suffering.

* * *

Dependent Origination

```
-------------+-------------------------------------------------------+
 3 Periods  |  12 Factors                    20 Modes & 4 Groups   |
-------------+-------------------------------------------------------+
   Past     |  1. Ignorance                    Past causes       |
            |  2. Kamma-formations                1, 2, 8, 9, 10  |
-------------+-------------------------------------------------------+
            |  3. Consciousness                                  |
            |  4. Mentality-&-Corporeality       Present effects 5:|
            |  5. Six  sense bases                3-7            |
            |  6. Impression                                    |
  Present   |  7. Feeling                                       |
            +-------------------------------------------------------+
            |  8.  Craving                      Present causes 5: |
            |  9.  Clinging                      8, 9, 10, 1, 2  |
-------------+-------------------------------------------------------+
   Future   | 11. Rebirth                       Future effects 5: |
            | 12. Decay-&-death                   3-7            |
-------------+-------------------------------------------------------+
```

Three Connections:

1. Past causes with present effects (between 2 & 3)
2. Present effects with present causes (between 7 & 8)
3. Present causes with future effects (between 10 & 11)

Three Rounds:

1. Round of defilements: 1, 8, 9
2. Round of kamma: 2, 10 (part)
3. Round of results: 3-7, 10 (part), 11, 12

Two Roots:

1. Ignorance: from past to present

2. Craving: from present to future

* * *

Notes to Chapter III

[1] Published by the BPS (1983).

[2] For a detailed exposition of the Four Noble Truths, see Nyanatiloka, //The Word of the Buddha// (BPS, 1981).

[3] Literally "not-knowing."

[4] Thus the Pali word //kamma// (Sanskrit: //karma//) designates in Buddhist philosophy only rebirth-producing or rebirth-influencing wholesome or unwholesome action, i.e. volition (//cetana//) manifested by body, speech, or mind. In no way, however, does kamma ever signify the //result// of action (//kamma-vipaka//), as the Theosophists and many Western Buddhists wish this term to be understood.

[5] Of this gigantic and very important, but most complicated of all the Abhidhamma works, not a single line had hitherto been translated into any of the modern languages. Even of the Pali text, only one sixth, partly in form of an abstract, has been published by the PTS, London. Mrs. Rhys Davids in her preface to the //Patthana// text says: "... the text remains very difficult and obscure to the uninitiated Western mind and I am far from pretending to solve any one of its problems." For a full synopsis of it see my //Guide through the Abhidhamma Pitaka//, VII. (Ed.: Two volumes of the //Patthana// have since been published by the PTS in English translation under the title //Conditional Relations//.)

[6] The three classes of //upanissaya-paccaya// are: (1) //pakat' upanissaya//, simple or direct inducement; (2) //aramman' upanissaya//, inducement by way of object; (3) //anantar' upanissaya//, inducement by way of proximity. About the latter see //Guide through the Abhidhamma Pitaka//, 2nd ed., pp. 119, 131, 139.

[7] In the //Guide// (p. 137) are given the following examples of how "a wholesome phenomenon may be to an unwholesome phenomenon a condition by way of object." This happens e.g., if after having given alms, etc., one indulges and delights in this act, and thereby arises greed, evil views, doubt, restlessness, or sadness ("either to oneself, or to others" says the Comy.). Or, if one indulges and delights in good deeds done formerly, and thereby arises greed, etc. Or, if after rising from the jhanas, one indulges and delights in this attainment, and thereby arises conceit, etc. Or if, while regretting that the jhana (which one had attained) has vanished, sadness springs up.

[8] For details of the twenty-four conditions, see Nyanatiloka, //Buddhist Dictionary// (BPS, 1988): //paccaya//.

[9] Cf. diagram p. 57.

[10] It is really the quality of the five sense-objects allotted to each being that, in the main, decides the degree of his worldly happiness or unhappiness.

[11] All such translations of //nama-rupa// as "name and form," etc., are totally out of place. //Nama-rupa// = //naman ca rupan ca// (Majjh. Nik. No. 9), i.e. "the mental and the physical," apart from its application in the //paticca-samuppada//, is a name for the five groups of existence, namely: the four //nama-kkhandhas// or mental groups (feeling, perception, mental formations, consciousness), and the //rupa-kkhandha//, or corporeality group. Here, in the //paticca-samuppada, nama// stands only for the three mental groups: feeling, perception, mental formations, whilst consciousness is singled out, in order to show that all mental and physical life of beings is dependent on it.

[12] In the canonical texts only twenty-seven physical phenomena are mentioned, whilst in the commentaries this number is increased by the physical seat of mind (lit. 'heart-base'; see pp. 45-46).

[13] //Mano-vinnana//, or mind-consciousness, does not depend upon the simultaneous function of any of the five physical sense-organs, although visible objects, sounds, etc. may nevertheless reappear as mental objects therein. Of this fact, dream-consciousness furnishes a vivid illustration.

[14] Shwe Zan Aung, //Compendium of Philosophy// (London, 1910), pp. 277f.

[15] The literal and usual translation of //phassa// as "contact" is very ambiguous and misleading. //Phassa// does not denote a physiological function, but a purely mental phenomenon. It is heading the list of those fifty phenomena which in Buddhist classification are summed up in the group of mental formations (//sankhara-kkhandha//). See Nyanatiloka, //Buddhist Dictionary// (BPS, 1988), Table II: The Formations Group.

[16] //Kamupadana//; //ditthupadana//; silabbatupadana; attavadupadana//.

[17] The past kamma-process (1-2) and the present kamma-process (8-10), though here represented by different links, are nevertheless throughout identical, and both therefore include the five kammic causes. In the same way, the two links (11-12) represent the five kamma-results (3-7). See diagram on p. 57.

* * * * * * * *

IV

Mental Culture

The whole of the Buddha's teachings may be summed up in three words: morality, mental concentration and wisdom, //sila//, //samadhi// and //panna//. This is the threefold division of the Noble Eightfold Path leading to deliverance from the misery of Samsara. And of this Eightfold Path, right speech, action and livelihood are included in morality, or //sila//; right effort, mindfulness and concentration in mental concentration, or //samadhi//; right understanding and thought in wisdom, or //panna//.

Of these three stages, morality constitutes the foundation without which no real progress along the Eightfold Path to purity and deliverance is possible. The two higher stages, concentration and wisdom, are brought to perfection by that which in the West usually, but rather ambiguously, is called "meditation." By this latter term, the Buddhist Pali term //bhavana// is usually translated.

The word //bhavana// is a verbal noun derived from the causative of the verb //bhavati//, to be, to become, and therefore literally means "the bringing into existence," i.e. producing, development. Thus the development of mind is twofold:

1. Development of mental concentration (//samadhi-bhavana//), or tranquillity (//samatha-bhavana//);

2. Development of wisdom (//panna-bhavana//), or clear insight (//vipassana-bhavana//).

In this popular exposition I only wish to give a general idea of the authentic method of this twofold mental culture, and I shall not be going much into details. It is to be regretted that in Sri Lanka one very rarely meets with laymen, or even monks, who are earnestly devoting themselves to these two higher stages of Buddhist life. In Burma and Siam, however, the other two strongholds of original Buddhism, we still find quite a number of monks and hermits, who are living in the solitudes of deep forests or in caves, and who, detached from all worldly wishes and anxieties, are striving for the goal set forth by our Master, and are training themselves in tranquillity and insight. Undoubtedly, for the real development of higher life, solitude, at least temporarily, is an absolute necessity.

Though the concentration exercises may serve various preliminary purposes, their ultimate object is to reach that unshakable tranquillity and purity of the mind, which is the foundation of insight leading to deliverance from the cycle of rebirth and misery. The Buddha has said: "Now what, monks, is Nibbana? It is the extinction of greed, hate and delusion (//lobha//, //dosa//, //moha//). And what, monks, is the path leading to Nibbana? It is mental tranquillity and insight.

Mental tranquillity (//samatha//) is the unshakable state of mind gained through the persevering training in mental concentration. Tranquillity, according to the Commentary //Sankhepavannana//, bestows a threefold blessing: auspicious rebirth, bliss in this very life, and mental purity and fitness for insight.

Insight (//vipassana//) is a name for the flashing forth of the light of wisdom and insight into the true nature of existence, i.e. into the impermanency, suffering and egolessness (//anicca//, //dukkha//, //anatta//) of all corporeality, feelings, perceptions, mental formations and consciousness.

* * *

1

For the development of concentration and mental tranquillity, there exist many different exercises. In the //Visuddhimagga// (III-XI) forty such concentration-exercises are enumerated and minutely explained, namely: ten kasina exercises, ten cemetery meditations, ten reflections -- on the qualities of the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sangha; on morality, liberality, heavenly beings; further, on death, the body, in-and-out breathing, and the peace of detachment. Further, the development of the four divine abodes (all-embracing kindness, compassion, altruistic joy, equanimity); the four immaterial states; the perception of the filthiness of food; and the analysis of the four elements.

Before entering into a discussion of some of these forty concentration exercises, I have first to deal with the three grades of intensity of concentration, and further to speak of those higher states of mind called //jhanas//, or mental "absorptions," which may be attained by a great number of these exercises.

The three grades of intensity of concentration are:

1. Preliminary concentration (//parikamma-samadhi//);
2. Neighbourhood concentration (//upacara-samadhi//);
3. Attainment concentration (//appana-samadhi//).

(1) //Preliminary concentration// is present whenever one directs one's mind to any of the various objects of concentration.

(2) //Neighbourhood concentration// is that grade of concentration which approaches, or comes near, the first jhana, and is in many exercises marked by a mentally visible pure and unshakable mental image, the so-called reflex-mark, of which we shall speak later.

(3) //Attainment concentration// is that grade of concentration which is present during the jhanas.

By the jhanas are meant supersensual states of perfect mental absorption, in which the fivefold sense activity is suspended. The jhanas can only be attained in absolute solitude and by unremitting perseverance in the development of concentration. No visual or audible impressions arise at such a time, no bodily feeling is felt. In this state the monk appears to the outside world as if dead. But though all the outer sense-impressions, such as seeing, hearing, etc., have disappeared, the mind still remains active, perfectly alert and fully awake.

1. The first jhana is a stage of peace, ecstasy and joyful bliss, yet "thought conception and discursive thinking" (//vitakka-vicara//), i.e. the so-called "inner speech" or "verbal activities of the mind" (//vaci-sankhara//), are still at work.

2. As soon as these verbal activities of the mind have ceased, one has attained the second jhana, which is a state of highest "rapture and joyful bliss" (//piti//), free from thinking and pondering.

3. After the fading away of rapture and ecstasy, the third jhana is reached, marked by "equanimous joy" (//upekkha-sukha//).

4. After the complete fading away of joy, a state of perfect equanimity (//upekkha//) abides, called the fourth jhana.

The mind, after emerging from the fourth jhana, is again and again described in the suttas as "serene, pure, lucid, stainless, devoid of evil, pliable, able to act, firm and imperturbable."

Let us now deal separately with some of the concentration exercises. Amongst those forty exercises described in the //Visuddhimagga//, the ten kasina exercises resemble somewhat certain methods of inducing hypnotic sleep, etc., by gazing at bright objects. Therefore, in order to avoid such an outcome, one must beware of sleepiness and strive to keep the mind ever alert.

There are four colour kasinas, four element kasinas, space kasina, and light kasina. In the colour kasina, a blue, yellow, red or white disk may serve as the object at which to gaze, or flowers, cloth, etc. of these colours. In the earth kasina exercise the object of our gazing may be a ploughed field seen from a distance, or a circular piece of earth prepared for this purpose. In the water kasina exercise we may gaze at a pond seen from a higher elevation, or at water contained in a vessel. Similar it is with the fire kasina and wind kasina.

As an example how to practise such an exercise, let us consider the blue kasina exercise. For this purpose let us prepare a round disk made of paper or cloth, and fix it to the wall of our room. Then seated before the disk, we fix our whole attention upon this "preliminary mark" (//parikamma-nimitta//) and so produce "preliminary concentration" (//parikamma-samadhi//). Now, while constantly gazing at this blue disk, we must strive to remain mentally alert and steadfast, in order not to fall into hypnotic sleep, as already pointed out. At the same time we must keep from our mind all outside impressions and thoughts on other objects, as well as all those disturbing and often dangerous mental visions and hallucinations that may arise. While exclusively fixing our eyes and thoughts on the blue disk as our sole object, the things around the disk seem, as it were, to disappear, and the disk itself seems to become more and more a mere mental phantom. Now, whether the eyes are opened or closed, we perceive the mentalized kasina disk, which more and more assumes the appearance of the bright orb of the moon. This is the "acquired mark" (//uggaha-nimitta//) which, though apparently seen by means of our physical eyes, is nevertheless produced and perceived only by our mind, independently of the sense activity of the eye. As soon as this mentally produced image becomes steady and vanishes no longer, but remains safely fixed in the mind, we should (according to the //Visuddhimagga//) move to another place and there continue our exercise. In fixing our mental eye more and more upon the mentally produced image or light, it becomes continually steadier and brighter, till at last it may assume the appearance of the bright morning star, or something similar. Herewith the mental "reflex mark" (//patibhaga-nimitta//) is attained, and along with it "neighbourhood concentration" (//upacara-samadhi//).

Already during this stage all mental hindrances (//nivarana//) have, at least temporarily, disappeared and do not arise. No sensual lust (//kamacchanda//) arises in such a state. No ill-will (//vyapada//) can irritate the mind. All mental stiffness and dullness (//thina-middha//) is overcome. No restlessness and anxiety (//uddhacca-kukkucca//) and no wavering doubt and scepticism (//vicikiccha//) can any more divert the mind. As long as there is a possibility for the arising of these five mental hindrances, so long there can be no lasting tranquillity of the mind. By tenaciously fixing our mind to the reflex mark we eventually reach the attainment concentration (//appana-samadhi//) and thereby enter into the first jhana. And by becoming more and more absorbed, and by the gradual vanishing, one by one, of thought conception and discursive thinking, of rapture and joy, we consecutively pass through the three remaining jhanas, as described before.

Next let us touch upon the "cemetery contemplations." The goal of these exercises is to create a concentrated and tranquil state of mind by arousing disgust for the carnal desires and detachment from them. The objects of the cemetery contemplations, being either real or imaginary, are: a putrified corpse, a corpse gnawed by wild animals or by worms, a skeleton, scattered bones, bones crumbled to dust, etc.

Of the remaining concentration exercises, I intend to speak only of the four "divine abodes" (//brahma-vihara-bhavana//): all-embracing kindness, compassion altruistic joy and equanimity (//metta//, //karuna//, //mudita//, //upekkha//).

The development of all-embracing kindness (//metta-bhavana//) is, according to the //Visuddhimagga//, to be practised somewhat as follows:

First one should think of oneself: "May I be happy! May I be free from suffering!" Thus, beginning with oneself, one should then in the same way extend loving and benevolent thoughts to one's teacher, then to one's friends and companions, then to all persons living in and around the same house, then to the inhabitants of the nearest street, then by and by to the whole village or town, then to the whole country; and making not the slightest difference between friend and enemy, blood relation and stranger, good people and bad people, one should finally pervade the whole world with all-embracing kindness. And not only human beings, but also animals down to the tiniest insects, all should be embraced with kindness. Identifying ourselves with all that lives, we should pervade the whole world with all-embracing kindness, above, below, to all sides, and should rouse in our innermost heart the fervent wish: "O, that all beings may be happy! That all beings may be freed from greed, hate and delusion! That all beings may find deliverance from Samsara!"

By developing all-embracing kindness and goodwill, the heart will become purified of ill-feeling and anger, and filled with tranquillity, steadfastness and peace. During this exercise the mind may eventually reach the ecstasy of the first jhana, and even gradually pass through the first three jhanas. In a more or less similar way compassion (//karuna//) and altruistic joy (//mudita//) are to be developed.

In the Suttas we again and again find the stereotype words:

> There, O monks, the monk with all-embracing kindness ... or with compassion ... altruistic joy ... equanimity ... pervades first one direction, then the second, then the third, then the fourth, above, below, round about, in every quarter. And identifying himself with all, he pervades the entire universe with all-embracing kindness, with heart grown great, wide, deep, boundless, free from wrath and anger ... .

In the fourth divine abode, the "development of equanimity" (//upekkha-bhavana//), all persons and things are regarded with perfect equanimity and disinterestedness. With unshakable equanimity the mind looks upon wealth and poverty, happiness and misery, free from agitation, free from inclination and aversion, steadfast and unmoved, beyond love and hatred, beyond joy and sorrow.

It may here be mentioned that concentration does not reach the same degree of intensity in each of the forty exercises. For example, in some of them only neighbourhood concentration may be reached, as in the reflections on the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sangha, etc. The cemetery contemplations may induce entrance into the first jhana. The first three divine abodes may induce the first three jhanas. The ten kasina exercises, however, as well as the exercise of equanimity and the attention on in-and-out breathing may induce all the four jhanas.

With regard to the nature, or temperament, of the person practising concentration, it should be noted that the four colour kasinas are particularly suited to an angry nature, while for an unsteady nature the kasina disk should be of small size.

* * *

2

We have already stated that all the concentration exercises, as such, serve only the purpose of developing mental tranquillity (//samatha//). Mental tranquillity, however, is the fundamental and indispensable condition for the successful development of insight (//vipassana//). And this insight alone possesses the power to confer immediate entrance to the four stages of holiness, and thus to free us forever from the ten fetters (//samyojana//) that bind beings to the ever-turning wheel of existence.

Therefore our Master has said: "May you develop mental concentration, O monks. For whoso is concentrated in mind, sees things as they really are." Concerning insight (//vipassana//) we read in the //Milindapanha//: "Just as when a man brings a lamp into a dark chamber, the lamp produces light and renders all things visible, just so does insight, as soon as it arises, dispel the darkness of ignorance and bring forth the light of knowledge; and sending out its rays of wisdom, it renders clearly visible the Four Noble Truths. And thus the earnestly striving monk, with clear and bright insight, beholds the impermanence, suffering and egolessness of all existence." And in the //Puggalapannatti//: "Just as a man in a dark and gloomy night, at the sudden flash of lightning, may with his eyes clearly recognize objects; even so one may through deep insight, perceive all things as they really are: 'This is suffering, this is the origin of suffering, this is the extinction of suffering, this is the path leading to the extinction of suffering.' "

Hence, just as morality (//sila//) forms the indispensable foundation for the successful development of mental tranquillity and concentration, just so, supported by morality, mental tranquillity and concentration forms the necessary foundation for the development of wisdom and insight. And insight is the immediate condition for the entrance into the four stages of holiness.

For the successful development of insight, however, it is not an absolute necessity to have gained the jhanas. The attainment of neighbourhood concentration is sufficient for this purpose. Moreover, during the jhanas the development of insight is not possible, as the initial practice of this exercise requires abstract thinking and analysing, while in the first jhana abstract thinking is already weak, and totally absent in the three higher jhanas.

Insight, as already said, is induced by means of analysis and intense contemplation on all the phenomena of existence, i.e. on corporeal phenomena, feelings, perceptions, mental formations and states of consciousness; by the contemplation on their impersonality, futility, emptiness and unsubstantiality; by contemplating the fact that in reality, neither inside nor outside these fleeting phenomena, is there to be found any ego-entity (//atta//), and that "I" or "self" or "person," etc., are nothing but conventional names. Really, this teaching of unsubstantiality and egolessness (//anatta//), together with the teaching of the conditionedness of all phenomena of existence, are the only specific doctrines of Buddhism, and without insight into these profound truths nobody can ever rightly grasp the Four Noble Truths or enter the path.

All the other teachings of our Master may also be found in other philosophies or religions. The jhanas have already been attained before, and independently of, the Buddha. Love was preached by some other religions. Likewise the impermanency and miserable nature of existence was taught by others. But the liberating truths of //impersonality// and //conditionedness// of all existence have, of all religious teachers, been taught and revealed in full clarity only by the Buddha. And these are the only specific doctrines on which the whole Buddhist structure rests.

Hence, as the understanding of egolessness and conditionedness of existence is the indispensable condition for a real understanding of the Four Noble Truths, and for deliverance from Samsara, one may rightly say that none but the Enlightened One has shown the right method of mental culture, and therewith the right way to deliverance.

The exercises for developing insight (//vipassana-bhavana//) given in the //Visuddhimagga// (XIV-XXII) are extremely varied. Anyhow, I shall here briefly indicate the most essential ones. Before, however, the monk begins with developing his insight, he at first should acquire a thorough knowledge of the Dhamma and know that the only true or actual elements in this evanescent existence are the five groups of existence: corporeal phenomena, feelings, perceptions, mental formations and states of consciousness. And he should think of their impermanence, their unsatisfactoriness, their empty and conditioned nature, as well as of their twofold division into a mental and corporeal process (//nama-rupa//).

Thus, after attaining and rising again from one of the jhanas, the monk may analyse the just experienced state of jhana. And while doing so, he will realize that this mental state, called jhana, is nothing but a heap of rising and passing phenomena: thought conception, discursive thinking, joy, concentration, feeling, perception, mental formations and consciousness. And pondering over these phenomena, he will find that this entire mental process is dependent on corporeality, and that again corporeality is a name for the four physical elements and the corporeality depending on them, as e.g. the sense-organs, objects, etc.

Another monk may divide this mental-corporeal process into its eighteen elements, i.e. the six sense-organs, six objects, and six kinds of consciousness, as: eye, visible object, eye-consciousness; ear, sound, ear-consciousness ... mind, mind-object, mind-consciousness. And he will understand thus: "Mere mental and physical phenomena are there, but no being, no personality, can be found."

When certain things we find combined,
We speak of chariot, speak of car.
Just so, when these five groups appear,
We use the designation "being."

Or just as after building up walls and roof with various materials, the enclosed space is called a house, just so this bodily structure built up by bones, flesh, sinews, etc., is called "body."

Or just as a wooden swivel-doll is empty, lifeless and inactive, but may, by means of a pulling device, move or stand and appear to be full of life and activity, just so are mind and body as such something empty, lifeless and inactive; but through the mutual influence of mind and body upon one another, this psycho-physical structure may move or stand and appear full of life and activity.

As with the help and aid of ships
Men move across the mighty sea,
Just so conditioned by this body
The mental group is moving on.

As with the help and aid of men
Ships move across the mighty sea,
Just so conditioned by the mind
The body-group is moving on.

Thus the monk contemplates the conditionality of this psycho-physical process. And he understands how all those bodily and mental phenomena come to decay and dissolution. And he perceives the conditioned nature of the bodily and mental groups with regard to their dependent origination, namely: "Among the phenomena, old age and death can take place only if there is birth; birth only if there is the prenatal kamma-process, the kamma-process only if there is attachment to life ... the kamma-formations only if there is ignorance and delusion." In this way, all doubts vanish in the monk, such as: "Have I been in the past?" or: "Have I not been in the past?" etc.

Everywhere, in all the forms of existence, the monk sees only an ever-changing mental and bodily process, kept going through the concatenation of causes and effects and other conditions. No doer does he see beside the deed (kamma), no receiver of the kamma-result. And he rightly understands that it is only by way of conventional language (//vohara-vacana//) that the wise with regard to a deed speak of a "doer," or with regard to the kamma-result (//vipaka//) of a "receiver" of it.

The monk considers thus: "The kamma-produced five groups (corporeality, feeling, etc.) of the past have become extinguished then and there, but conditioned through the past kamma (actions) other groups have arisen in this existence; yet from the past existence nothing has passed over to this existence. Also the present groups produced through the past kamma, will become extinguished here, but conditioned through the present kamma other groups will arise in the future; yet from this existence nothing will pass over to the next existence.

"Whatever there is of corporeality ... feelings ... perceptions ... mental formations ... consciousness, whether past, present or future ... one's own or external ... gross or subtle ... lofty or low ... far or near: all these phenomena of existence are impermanent ... unsatisfactory ... non-self. For whatever is non-self is unsatisfactory and unable to ward off its own impermanence or oppression due to its arising and disappearing. How could these things ever assume the role of a feeler, an agent, an experiencer of consciousness, an abiding personality?"

All these things the monk considers as conditioned, subject to dissolution and disappearance.

All life and all existence here,
With all its joy and all its pain,
Depends all on a state of mind,
And quick passes that moment by.

The life-groups that have passed away,
At death as well as during life,
Have all alike become extinguished,
And never will they rise again.

Out of the unseen did they rise,
Into the unseen do they pass.
Just as the lightning flashes forth,
So do they flash and pass away.

Also in the external world the monk may observe the three characteristics. The shoot of the //asoka// tree is at first light-red, then after two or three days it becomes deep-red. Then it gets the appearance of a young sprout, then of a ripe sprout, then of a light-green leaf, then of a blue-green leaf. From this time, continually depending upon a similar physical continuity, it becomes after one year a yellow leaf, and detaching itself from the stalk, it drops to the ground. Thus each time, before the next following stage has appeared, the former stage dies off.

Further, by means of the eighteen kinds of insight the monk overcomes the wrong conceptions through their opposites, namely:

1. Through developing the contemplation on impermanence (//aniccanupassana//), he overcomes the wrong idea of permanence.

2. Through developing the contemplation on unsatisfactoriness (//dukkhanupassana//), he overcomes the wrong idea of real happiness.

3. Through developing the contemplation on non-self (//anattanupassana//), he overcomes the wrong idea of self.

4. Through developing the contemplation on turning away (//nibbidanupassana//), he overcomes affection.

5. Through developing the contemplation on detachment (//viraganupassana//), he overcomes greed.

6. Through developing the contemplation on cessation (//nirodhanupassana//), he overcomes the arising.

7. Through developing the contemplation on giving up (//patinissagganupassana//), he overcomes attachment.

8. Through developing the contemplation on dissolution (//khayanupassana//), he overcomes the wrong idea of something compact.

9. Through developing the contemplation on disappearance (//vayanupassana//), he overcomes kamma-accumulation.

10. Through developing the contemplation on changeablenes (//viparinamanupassana//), he overcomes the wrong idea of something immutable.

11. Through developing the contemplation on the signless (//animittanupassana//), he overcomes the conditions of rebirth.

12. Through developing the contemplation on the desireless (//appanihitanupassana//), he overcomes longing.

13. Through developing the contemplation on the void (//sunnatanupassana//), he overcomes clinging.

14. Through developing higher wisdom and insight (//adhipannadhamma vipassana//), he overcomes the wrong idea of something substantial.

15. Through developing the true eye of knowledge (//yathabhuta nanadassana//), he overcomes clinging to delusion.

16. Through developing the contemplation on misery (//adinavanupassana//), he overcomes clinging to desire.

17. Through developing the reflecting contemplation

(//patisankhanupassana)//, he overcomes thoughtlessness.

18. Through developing the contemplation on the standstill of existence (//vivattanupassana//), he overcomes being entangled in fetters.

Having thus, by means of the eighteen kinds of insight, understood the phenomena with regard to their three characteristics, he has penetrated the impermanence, unsatisfactoriness and egolessness of all existence.

1. Contemplation on arising and disappearing (//udayabbayanupassana//): Further, the monk trains himself in insight with regard to the arising and disappearing of things: "All the physical and mental phenomena, without having been previously, come to arise, and arisen they disappear again. Through the arising of the pre-natal ignorance, craving, kamma, and nutriment, there is conditioned the arising of corporeality; and through the extinction of these four causes, the extinction of corporeality takes place."

All life is like a dew drop that dissolves as soon as the sun rises. Life is like an empty bubble, or like a furrow drawn on the water which immediately disappears again. Life is something unsubstantial, unreal, an illusion, a mirage, a phantom, like a fire-wreath called forth by the circular swinging of a firebrand, or like a ghost-land, or foam, or a banana-stem (consisting of mere sheaths).

2. Contemplation on dissolution (//bhanganupassana//): Now, while knowing that all these formations of existence, once arisen, will soon again come to extinction, there arises in him the contemplation on dissolution. As consciousness is conditioned through the physical or mental objects, he considers it as impermanent. He turns away from it, no longer delights in it. He detaches himself from it, no longer has greed for it. He brings it to extinction, does not let it rise again. He lets it go, and no longer adheres to it. And considering it as transient, he overcomes the idea of something permanent.

The groups of life become dissolved,
There is no ego to be found.
The dissolution of the groups:
That's what most people would call death.

3. Knowledge consisting in awareness of terror (//bhayat' upatthana-nana//): Whoso knows how in the past all formations of existence have become extinguished, how the present ones are coming to extinction, and how also all the future ones will become extinguished, to him there arises on that occasion the knowledge consisting in awareness of terror.

4. Contemplation on misery (//adinavanupassana//): "The arising of existence is a terror": such knowledge consisting in awareness of terror, is called the knowledge of misery. "The continuity of existence ... the course of rebirth ... the entering into existence ... old age, disease, death, sorrow ... lamentation ... despair are a terror": such knowledge consisting in awareness of terror, is called the knowledge of misery.

5. Contemplation on turning away (//nibbidanupassana//): While the disciple in this way understands that all formations of existence are misery, his mind turns away from all formations, is weary of them, no longer delights in them.

6. Knowledge of the wish for deliverance (//muncitukamyata-nana//): Now, while finding no delight in the formations of existence, he wishes to get rid of them, seeks for escape from them.

7. Reflecting contemplation (//patisankhanupassana//): In order to find deliverance from all the formations of existence, he reflects on them and determines their three characteristics.

All formations he understands as impermanent (//anicca//) for their being without duration, persisting only for a short while, being limited by their arising and disappearance, perishable, transient, frail, unsteady, subject to change, without substance, unreal, conditioned, subject to death.

All formations he considers as unsatisfactory (//dukkha//) for their being again and again oppressed, their being hard to endure, and their being the root of all suffering.

All formations he considers as non-self (//anatta//) for their being something alien, unreal, void, empty, without owner, without master, without controller: "Empty are all formations, void are they of any self and of anything pertaining to a self ... I am not anything to anyone, nor does anything belong to me in any regard." Just as a reed is hollow and without pith, so also are corporeality, feeling, perception, mental formations and consciousness empty, void, impersonal, without master, unfree, something uncontrollable, impotent and alien.

8. Knowledge consisting in equanimity with regard to all formations (//sankharupekkha-nana//): While the monk is thus grasping all the formations by considering them as empty, and determining their three characteristics, he gives up fear and anguish and abides in equanimity with regard to all the formations, no more concerns himself about them, and no longer conceives the idea of "I" and "mine."

Whoever considers the formations of existence as impermanent (//anicca//), to him they appear as a passing away. Whoever considers them as unsatisfactory (//dukkha//), to him they appear as terror. Whoever considers them as non-self (//anatta//), to him they appear as empty.

9. Adaptation knowledge (//anuloma-nana//): "Now the path will reveal itself": thus thinking, the monk's mind reflects with equanimity on all the formations of existence as impermanent, unsatisfactory and non-self (//anicca//, //dukkha//, //anatta//) and thereupon his consciousness sinks into the subconscious stream (//bhavanga-sota//). Immediately thereafter arises awareness at the mind-door, taking as objects all phenomena just as before, regarding them as impermanent, unsatisfactory and non-self. Thereafter, in following up again the interrupted continuity of consciousness, the three impulsive moments (//javana//), known as the preliminary, access and adaptation moment (//parikamma//, //upacara//, //anuloma//), flash up one after the other, with the same phenomena as object. One speaks of "adaptation" because this knowledge adapts itself to the preceding eight kinds of insight knowledge performing the same functions, and to the following elements of enlightenment immediately thereafter.

Adaptation knowledge has the same functions, because it arises through contemplation of the formations of existence together with their three characteristics of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness and egolessness. The adaptation knowledge, however, forms the conclusion for those kinds of insight that have the formations as object, and are leading to the "ascent," i.e. to the path.

Maturity knowledge (//gotrabhu-nana//): immediately thereafter follows maturity knowledge, which consists in the turning of the mind to the supramundane path of "stream-entrance" (//sotapatti//). At that moment the mind is no longer driving towards all those phenomena, no longer clinging to them, no longer captivated by them; and transcending the sphere of the worldling, it enters the sphere of the noble ones. Just as in the cloudless sky the moon shines pure and bright, just so, as soon as the darkness of ignorance veiling the truth is dispersed, maturity knowledge beholds the purity of Nibbana.

Path knowledge (//magga-nana//): Now, following as immediate continuation upon adaptation knowledge, path consciousness arises by dispersing and demolishing, forever and all time, the three fetters of personality belief, sceptical doubt and clinging to rules and rituals (//sakkayaditthi//, //vicikiccha//, //silabbataparamasa//).

Fruition knowledge (//phala-nana//): immediately upon this path consciousness there arise, as results, those supramundane states of consciousness known as the fruits (//phala//) of the path, which during the life-time may be repeated innumerable times.

The corresponding process also takes place on attaining the three higher stages of holiness, of which the highest one is identical with perfect holiness, or Arahatship. [1]

Herewith we have arrived at the highest and final goal of the Buddha's teaching. I should, however, like to warn you of the wrong conclusion, as if, according to the Buddha's teaching, it would be necessary, for the realization of the paths, to be ever conscious of all those intricate workings of our mind. This is by no means the case. Let me tell you that in many places in the investigations contained in the //Visuddhimagga// the point is rather to give a scientific explanation of the whole process of gradual development on the path to deliverance. We have here mostly to do with theoretical knowledge and hypotheses gained by abstract reasoning, partly perhaps also with real knowledge gained through intuition by some extraordinary seers or mystics. In any case, deliverance may, under favourable circumstances, sometimes be realized already after a very short time, and with no previous knowledge.

At the conclusion of our subject, therefore, I should like to summarize the more popular and more intelligible exposition of the twofold development as given in the Satipatthana Sutta and its commentary:

There is only one way to the realization of deliverance, namely, the four foundations of mindfulness, i.e. the attentive contemplation of body, feeling, mind, and mind-objects.

For that purpose the monk retires to a solitary place; and sitting down and directing his whole attention in front of himself, he watches attentively his in-and-out breathing, and attains thereby mental concentration and the jhanas.

Or: In going, standing, sitting or lying down, he is well aware and knows that there is no living entity, no real ego, that moves about, but that it is a mere conventional mode of speaking, if one says: "I go, I stand," etc.

He is full of attention and clearly conscious in going and coming, looking forward and backward, in bending and stretching his body, in eating, drinking, speaking and keeping silent. Thus in all outer activities, he is clearly conscious of purpose, utility, duty and truth.

Further: He contemplates the manifold parts of the body, as hairs, nails, teeth, skin, flesh, sinews, bones, etc.

Further: He analyses the body with regard to the four elements, i.e. the solid, liquid, heat and motion.

Further: Just as if he would see a corpse thrown to the burial ground, swollen, blue-black in colour, he draws the conclusion: "Also this my body has the same nature, will become so, cannot escape it." Or: Just as if he would see a corpse, a framework of bones, stripped of flesh, bespattered with blood ... bones disconnected and scattered in all directions ... bones bleached and resembling shells ... bones heaped together ... bones weather-worn and crumbled to dust, he draws the conclusion: "Also this my body has the same nature, will become so, cannot escape it." Thus he contemplates his own body, other bodies, and both. He sees how these bodily phenomena are arising and passing away. And he understands that only corporeality is there to be found, but no ego-entity.

In contemplating the feelings, he notices the agreeable feeling, the disagreeable feeling, the indifferent feeling, he sees how these feelings are arising and passing away, and does not find any ego-entity within or without the feelings.

In contemplating the mind, he notices when it is filled with greed, or hate, or delusion, or when it is free from these things; he notices when the mind is cramped or scattered, concentrated or not. And he sees how these states of mind are arising and passing away, and knows that there is no ego-entity to be found.

In contemplating the mind-objects, he notices when one of the mental hindrances is present, or not present, how it arises, and how it is overcome. He contemplates the six sense-organs and the corresponding objects, and the mental fetters conditioned through them; contemplates the five groups of existence, their arising and passing away, the seven links of enlightenment, and the Four Noble Truths.

Thus he contemplates all the phenomena, sees how they arise and pass away, and how nowhere any ego-entity can be found.

The Satipatthana Sutta closes with the encouraging words that one who in this way practises the four foundations of mindfulness, sometimes even for only seven days, may find deliverance from all suffering.

* * *

Notes to Chapter IV

[1] About the four stages of holiness, see Nyanatiloka, //Buddhist Dictionary// (BPS, 1988): //ariya-puggala//.

* * * * * * * *

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Ven. Nyanatiloka Mahathera (1878-1957) was the first Continental European in modern times to become a Buddhist monk and one of the foremost Western exponents of Theravada Buddhism in the twentieth century. Born in Germany, he developed a keen interest in Buddhism in his youth and came to Asia intending to enter the Buddhist Order. He received ordination in Burma in 1903. The greatest part of his life as a monk was spent in Sri Lanka, where he established the Island Hermitage at Dodanduwa as a monastery for Western monks. His translations into German include the //Anguttara Nikaya//, the //Visuddhimagga//, and the //Milindapanha//. Ven. Nyanatiloka passed away in Colombo in 1957.

* * * * * * * *

THE BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY

The BPS is an approved charity dedicated to making known the Teaching of the Buddha, which has a vital message for people of all creeds. Founded in 1958, the BPS has published a wide variety of books and booklets covering a great range of topics. Its publications include accurate annotated translations of the Buddha's discourses, standard reference works, as well as original contemporary expositions of Buddhist thought and practice. These works present Buddhism as it truly is -- a dynamic force which has influenced receptive minds for the past 2500 years and is still as relevant today as it was when it first arose. A full list of our publications will be sent upon request with an enclosure of U.S. $1.00 or its equivalent to cover air mail postage.

Write to:

The Hony. Secretary
BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy Sri Lanka

or

The Barre Center for Buddhist Studies
Lockwood Road
Barre, MA 01005 USA
Tel: (508) 355-2347

* * * * * * * *

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
TITLE OF WORK: Fundamentals of Buddhism: Four Lectures (Wheel Publication No. 394/396)
FILENAME: WHEEL394.ZIP
AUTHOR: Nyanatiloka Mahathera
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: N/A (d. 1957)
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: Buddhist Publication Society
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy, Sri Lanka
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: Buddhist Publication Society (1994)
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1994
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: September 1995
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

[end]

Foundations of Wisdom_
The teachings of Zen Buddhism_

Written by Mark W. Vetanen
(C)1995

THE FIRST THREE CHAPTERS OUT OF THE BOOK, FOUNDATIONS OF WISDOM THE

TEACHINGS OF ZEN BUDDHISM. PLEASE DISTRIBUTE THIS TEXT FAR AND WIDE.

PRINT IT OUT AND GIVE IT TO YOUR FRIENDS, UPLOAD IT TO ALL BBS'. THIS

PORTION OF THE BOOK IS FREE OF CHARGE AND IF YOU WISH TO OBTAIN THE RE

OF THE BOOK, YOU MAY PURCHASE IT FOR A LOW COST. ORDERING INFORMATIO

LOCATED AT THE END OF THE TEXT.

- As the lotus sinks its long root into the murky mud, White pure blossom springs forth.

"When people jump directly into the study of Zen, they find often find it to be baffling and confusing, but when the basic Buddhist teachings are understood, much of the mystery disappears!" -From Zen Root, by Kyogen Carlson, Abbot of the Dharma Rain Zen Center, Portland Oregon.

All too often we jump right into the deep end of what we want. We tell each other of the benefits, the pleasures and the rewards of religious practice and faith. Quickly, we rush into what we perceive practice and enlightenment to be. Diving head first into the cold icy waters of our own desires we notice ourselves in an ocean of ignorance that we are drowning in!

Zen training lays its foundations on this very world we call everyday life. Zen teachers of present and past have skillfully help the students notice how they view this world, and the life they are living. This is like a mother teaching the child how to gain its first steps on their own. The potential for walking is already there and the mother just encourages that potential to arise. Once the student has gained the first steps, it is like a water spring that suddenly rises from the ground, for what that stream encounters and where it meanders, is the Dharma life of the Awakened one.

Zen Buddhist training often uses' an analogy, a container such as a form or story, to convey the teachings and meanings of Buddhist training. Here we shall use the analogy of building a ship. We will build our ship, the vessel that we use to seek out our sufferings, out of the understanding and actualization of the teachings of the Buddhist religious writings called Sutras, and the writings of Zen teachers of the past. Now the Zen Purest will says that there is no vessel, no water to sail in and no place to go, in meaning that all is just mind mentalization. That is true to a certain point of view, but for now lets engage in building a vessel, knowing that this vessel is only our mind mentialization engaging in dualistic thought and delusion. To engage in metaphor is just a vessel for our perceptions to be placed in, to learn about our held perceptions, about the nature of self and the meaning of the Buddhist words.

To start building our ship we must first build the keel, which is like a backbone. The entire frame work of the ship is resting on the strength and the shape of the keel. If the keel is rotten or built of unsound material, the ship will crumble in the first storm encountered.

The materials that we need to gather to make a Strong backbone for our ship are the Three states of being:

Impermanence(Anicca)
No self-nature(Anatta)
Discontent(Dukkha)

Anicca, Anatta and Dukkha are old Indian Pali words that Buddhist sutras have used throughout the ages. The meaning of each word cannot just be summed up in a paragraph or two. These words embody an experience just as the world love embodies an experience of mind and body.

Anicca_

Each moment of being is like a bubble rising to the surface of a flowing river, to only momentary ride on the surface then disappear, releasing the elements combined. Anicca is a term that shows the elements of the discriminating mind to the mind that perceives each part of the world in separateness. That is the same as discriminating between states of being, qualities of being and duration of being. The discrimination that Buddhist speak of is the mental activity of labeling a perceived arising, placing value on them in relationship to the self.

Temporary, transitory and illusionary are all words used to describe Anicca. For even this Vessel that we are building is subjected to the Law of Anicca. For the moment is appearing as if it is coming and will later appear that it is disappearing. Do not be fooled in thinking that Anicca cannot touch us. The proof is in our ever changing bodies. Through this body we have perceived the changes of our world and have seen our effects' in our world. Like our vessel that we are building, it will go through many changes and may seem at time non-vessel like. As we build our vessel, we begin to understand in a hand on way, the Nature of Anicca and the meaning of the Vessel.

Anatta_

As this body of ours changes through the passing of the seasons, from environmental changes and acts of humankind, we realize that we are not permanent. We also know that our thoughts and attitudes have change repeatedly, in response to this ever changing world. Their is no human body that is unchangeable, no human institution that is permanent. Anatta is the term that points to the mind that perceives things as self, such as personality and characteristics in the world. Zen Teacher Sekito states in his work called Identity of Relative and Absolute or Sandoki in Japanese, which we are only perceived by our senses and that like a mirror, for what we do perceive, there is the whole of what we don't perceive.

"It is as if one looks into a jeweled mirror, seeing both shadow and substance. You are not it, it is all of you. A baby of this world such as this, possesses five sense organs, yet goes not and neither comes, neither arises nor yet stays, has words and yet no words." - Sekito, Sando-ki; J. Kennet.

The baby of this world, has not yet formed attachment to personality or characteristics, does not see or perceive things yet to be separate from themselves. Sekito is saying that when we look at what we call our personality or characteristics we can see the substance reflected in the jeweled mirror, which is to say in the world around us. Every thing that we perceive is the reflection in the jeweled mirror; Our family, or work place, even our government is reflected back to us to perceive. When one looks into a mirror, such as one dos just before going out to make slight adjustments to ones appearance, the jeweled mirror reflects our own self as we have projected into the arising causation of the world. For example if one feels anger toward something or some idea, looking into the jeweled mirror shows the attachment we have made to the arising of the object of our perception. When we see the substance of our attachment, such as the concepts and meanings the object embraces and we also see the shadow. This dark shadow is the impermanence of the attachment and the object, and the understanding that the object has no-self of its own origin other that what we project into it. Even our friends and family is again the jeweled mirror that reflects our attachments, good or bad, to the characteristics and personalities that are perceived by the discriminating mind.

Dukkha_

Suffering or un-satisfaction called Dukkha, arose out of Anicca and Anatta. From this arises the First Noble Truth, that Suffering exist. Dukkha is pointing to the self attached to personality and characteristics as perceived in the world and wanting them to be conditional, which is to say pleasing to our sense of self, order and peace. This conditional perception causes friction or tension that is felt, sometimes as frustration, anger, hopelessness or even abandonment. This can lead to depression or even apathy in ones life, yet if one chooses to turn the mind inwards to look at the roots of the self, one embarks on the grandest adventure of all times. To grab hold of our suffering we use it like a paddle or sail, we can navigate the seas of causation and investigate the meaning of Anicca, Anatta and Dukkha.

From the Lankavartara Sutra:

Mahamati asked, what relation ego-personality bears to the mind system?

The Buddha said: To explain it, it is first necessary to speak of the self-nature of the five grasping aggregates that make up personality, although as I have already shown they are empty, unborn and with out self-nature. These five aggregates are: form, sensation, perception, discrimination, and consciousness. Of these, form belongs to the what is made of the so-called primary elements. The four remaining aggregates are without form and ought not to be reckoned as four, because they merge imperceptibly into one another. They are like space which cannot be numbered; it is only due to imagination that they are discriminated and likened to space. Because things are endowed with appearances of being, characteristic-marks, perceivableness, abode, work, one can say that they are born of effect-producing causes, but this can not be said of these four intangible aggregates for they are without form and marks. These four mental aggregates that make up personality are beyond calculability, they are not to be predicted as existing nor as not existing, but together they constitute what is known as mortal-mind. They are even more maya-like and dream like than are things, nevertheless, as discriminating mortal-mind they obstruct the self-realization of Noble Wisdom. But it is only by the ignorant that they are enumerated and thought of as the ego-personality; the wise do not do so. This discrimination of the five aggregates that make up personality and that serve as the basis for(creating) an ego-soul and ground for its desires and self-interest must be given up, and in its place the truth of imagelessness and solitude should be established.
_Lankavartara Sutra, Buddhist Bible, Dwight Goddard, pg 305.

It is pointed out quite clear that in ignorance of our true nature, our personality sees itself as separate and sets itself up as king of the five aggregates. In the Story of Enlightenment of the Sakyamuni Buddha, Mara the king of the material and nonmaterial world, launched his armies, daughters and beast at the coming of the Dharma. Yet, all of his efforts crumbled and Mara retreated to the east, which is to say to awaking. Mara, the King of the world, is a name that Buddhist use to describe the mind that hold the world in separateness, and sees existence only in the rising and falling of material and nonmaterial objects. Buddhist training first brings up the relationship that the student has with Mara the world king. At this discovery, the teachings of Buddha help to transform Mara with the bringing in of the Dharma.

Chapter 2

The Universe is the shedding of a single tear, Holding it back,
Is like the fish thinking he can swallow the sea.
_Mark Vetanen

The Five Skandhas_

To investigate the complete nature of dualistic thought we must bring to notice all the ways that we take in this universe. We call them the five skandhas, or the gates of in-flowing information. Form, Sensation, Thought, activity and consciousness are what Buddhist refer to the five Skandhas. A skandha is a term that we give to the way the mind perceives this world though the five senses.

Form - Fundamentally, we see and use things in its forms. A cup of water cannot be retained without some form to contain it in, or the rivers would not be without some forms to channel the river into being. Without this form of a body, where would you be? We may perceive form to be square, round, soft, hard, triangular. We also perceive form to be useful or useless, perhaps we perceive form to be meaning, or just profound. The words we speak, the gestures we use to suggest, the cultivating or the seeing illusion of, is all the nature of form.

Sensation - This is often underrated as Feeling, but it is more of the engagement into the arising form. Feelings of unbridled admiration and respect may by some fall into the form of love. Wile, feelings of rejection and disgust, may fall into the forms of hate, or even into the arising of the thought of Evil. When the senses perceive a form, the holding of numerous prior ideas and purposes arouses a sensation or opinion that is quickly attached to the newly perceived form.

Thought - The arising of form and sensation together arises with its third brother thought. Though our senses, thought picks our forms, or to say produces an opinion. These opinions are influenced by sensations, thus we apply label to things to give name to our opinions and discriminations. For example we may label things as good, bad, useful or useless all regarding our own view of purpose and meaning about ourselves.

Form, sensation and thought all arise together when information flows though the five sense organs.

Activity - Arising together with Consciences, activity is the noticing the discrimination of things, the sensations we form about each thing and the thoughts that label too. This we call activity.

Consciousness - is the noticing of activity. Consciousness can discriminate between present activity and the past activity. Consciousness notices the differences in activities that arise from moment to moment.

The Five skandhas together are the foundations to what we call "Myself."

Returning to our task of building a ship, we also find that we must study the sea that we wish to sail upon. Any experienced sailor will tell someone new, to watch how the sea moves and the way the currents, the swells and the seas interact with each other. Just as the sailor gives names to the different parts of the water that moves in what we call the ocean, the Buddhist also gives names to the different ways that the universe is perceived to move. The old sea captain will take new sailors out upon the vast oceans and teach them the various natures of the ocean. Buddhism uses meditation or called Tantra in much the same way. Liken to the young sailor upon the ocean watching and noticing the different seas, swells and currents, we to must know the nature of the five skandhas, or we will find our ship quickly dashed upon the jagged rocks of the ocean.

The Four Noble Truths

Now that we are well under way of building our ship, we also must build the mast. This particular vessel has four mast that reaches high into the sky, each being one of the Four Noble Truths.

Existence is Marked by Suffering.

This proclamation is true of all sentient beings who engage and maintain dualistic thought. When we understand the nature of existence(skandhas), and suffering(dukkha), we understand how we mark them with discriminating thought.

Suffering is caused by Craving.

Suffering(dukkha) arises together with anatta(no-self) and anicca(impermanence). Once we understand the nature of dukkha, anatta and anicca we start to make way for the third noble truth.

Suffering can be Extinguished.

This is the noticing of our already enlightened pure True Nature as viewed with the discriminating mind. Why set foot upon the Buddha Path? Why build such an ship? Because we know that the Dream of Nirvana(the extinguishing of suffering) speaks of a promise that echoes though out time and space. Already we had a glimpse, we have started to waken to our suffering.

The Means to End Suffering is the Noble Eightfold path.

When we engage in understand dukkha, anicca and anatta, it is called by Buddhist the Noble Eightfold Path. This path is the training that Buddhist teach and pass down from generation to generation. This teaching is like the old sea captain teaching the nature of the sea to the young sailor. Seas and oceans don't keep names, only the self that engages in discrimination hold names and labels. The Buddhists teach names and labels to help the student understand the Three Natures of Being and learn about the self. The path is broken down into eight parts labeled as: Right understanding Right views Right speech Right action Right livelihood Right effort Right mindfulness Right Meditation understanding the Four Noble Truths and understanding dukkha, anatta and anicca. Each stated "Path" is only an opportunity for the seeker to experience for themselves the teachings of Buddha. As the Buddhist explores one aspect of this path, all of the other aspects are also given perspective. This is like exploring a mountain. We first learn of the dangers of the mountain and what precautions we may need to take. As we explore the mountain, we learn how to successfully explore the many caves, valleys and overhangs that we come to. Buddhist training often uses analogy and stories to teach the students of the difficult traps, pits and discouragements that ones come to in study of the self.

The Eightfold path is seen, and often taught as a graduated path to

Buddhist refrain on stating exactly what each part of the Eightfold Path means, because each person will engage the Eightfold path differently. Buddhist training can bring a person to the learning of the names of the Eight Fold path and what each label reefers to, the knowledge of the Four Noble Truths, but in the end the person must enter into the Eightfold path in their own way, by themselves. It's like a door or barrier, once passed though, you understand the nature of the Eightfold path. One Zen commentary says that the Eightfold path is 1/3 part study, 1/3 part faith and 1/3 part guts!! Now their area also lots of dogmatist material that states that the Eightfold path is to act in certain moral ways in a particular manor described by the authors of such an text. We go back to the Sutras and they firmly state that Buddhas don't follow an Eightfold path. So at least we understood that the Eightfold path is not a set of rules or conditions to meet, but rather an door, or set of doors that allows us to open up to the Buddha way in any situation. When we start to understand dukkha, anatta and anicca, the statement, "Right" followed by an condition points directly to any dualistic reference to the universe. This is the opening the door to the Buddhas path and what is termed as "practice" by the old worthies of Buddhism. The first time we enter the door of the Eightfold path, we may resist and fight against the entering. Only until we are ready to just take a chance and enter into it. That is to say, we let the understanding of dukkha, anatta and anicca flow into our everyday problem.

Chapter - 3 Karma, Evil and Rebirth.

KARMA

"If a tree falls in the forest, and nobody is around to hear it, did the tree fall?"

From the Lankavatara Sutra Buddha teaches that five senses perceive arising causation. As stated by the Buddha causation is cause and effect. In the statement above, if the tree falls, it falls due to causation that arises from many other causation that may be hidden to our human perceptions. We may externally see the tree upon the ground, the broken branches and the crushed plants underneath. Internally, such things as ignorance, desire, purpose flow into the external causation that is at hand, thus the forming of karma.

Cause and effect known as causation is infinite and unending. If you look for the beginning, you will only find that there was a beginning before the beginning. If you look for the end, you again will find that there is an end after the end. If you look at movement of cause and effect you will see that it is surrounded by the infinite collation of cause and effects, and thus perceiving anicca or 'No-self' in cause and effect, which we will call causation.

If one is to look at causation and make discriminations about what is perceived this is called Karma, or the flowing of "self" into the external object. Discrimination of Causation is the flowing of your desires, ignorance and purposes into the perceived object or action. This flowing is the cognitive reflection of Greed, anger(hate) and delusion, known as the Three poisons. The external object may be of physical tangible things, or of intangible things such as thoughts and ideas. The flowing of Karma gives birth to the three worlds of past, present and future. Buddha teaches that this moment is not dependent upon the prior moments or future moments. That is to say that causation viewed with the karma afflicted mind will see past, present and future in respect to the discriminating views of the person.

Upon coming to a tree that fell in the woods, we may project our self into the falling of the tree and come up with all kinds of past histories for the falling of the tree, as well as future possibilities of the tree. Our perception of the falling of the tree is based upon our empirical observation. For example, if we are ignorant to the empirical evidence at hand, we may place that ignorance into the desire realm and perceive a GOD or mystical force that fell the tree. The desire of an external mystical force is projected into the falling of the tree though the opportunity of our ignorance.

EVIL

Generally the Term Evil is referred as actions afflicted by the tree poisons greed, hade and delusion. In detail, we find that Buddhism refers to evil as the inner workings of Greed, anger and delusion projected upon the Universe, the perceived arising and falling of causation. Evil out-flowing that affect mind, body and speech, arise from the mind that externalize the world, which becomes attached to it and is subjected to its rise and falls. In the gross cases, we can find this in the example of murders who kill because they view their victims as the cause of their suffering. In a subtle example, we may take disagreement with others who hold ideas that we find not pleasing to ourselves. Popular views refer to the term of Evil in a dualistic way that arises from the moral perceptions based upon virtues actions. Karma is not "Evil," we can find good men and women whom give aid to the suffering and comfort to the ill, but are still afflicted by karma. The "Evil nature" that Buddhist refer to is the internal action that views our delusions as the Truth, and set the ego-self as Mara-like king. It is likening to maintaining a dream, a fantasy that is wanting to be pleasing to your desires, ignorance and purpose. In this maintaining the Dreamlike state, we discriminate in the five ways by; maintaining views that cut off others "to kill," that covers over the cries of others "to steal," that engages in the prolific action of planting the seed of evil in others "to desire by procreation," to direct others in the views of the Dream-life "to lie," and to foster the hopes, wishes and desires of that the dream world is whispering to us as Truth "to spread delusion."

Buddhas Eight-fold path teaches us that in each of these evil ways, is door to wisdom that cuts away karmic suffering. The term "Right" or perhaps can also be stated as "turning into" is the method of self-realization. When we "turn into" we are allowing the nature of anicca(impermanence), anatta(no-self) and dukkha(suffering) to permeate our dream-world that we project externally and revel what mental habits we may have formed and the evil ways that have covered over the wisdom that was originally there. Buddhist call this, "Right" or "Turning into" when allowed to naturally flow into our karmicly created dream world, Dharma. Buddhist say, "That those who create no karma, obtain the Dharma." This means that when we realize the nature of Karma and the evil outflows associated with karma, it is transformed into Dharma that transforms our skandhas into Wisdom gates allowing the natural wisdom to flow in. So instead of the Mind objectifying the skandhas, that is called "Small Mind," Mind and skandhas drop away, are "forgotten" as some Zennist state and this is the being of the Bodhisattva.

Buddhist refer to the following of the Eight-fold path as the Bodhisattva path, or the Wisdom-beings path. The Teachings of this path are many and varied. We find that each teaching is likening to a door that fits the audience. For the learned and educated, we find teachings to match, such as written discourses and sutras, and for the ignorant and superstitious, again we find teachings that attract them, such as stories. Yet, it is stated that Bodhisattvas don't follow the Eight fold path. So we understand that the Eight-fold path is likening to a door of becoming. In a matter of speaking, following the eight-fold path is not the Eightfold path, only when we enter the Eight-fold path though its vast and many doors, do we transform into the Bohdisattva, or the Living Eight-fold path.

Is a ship its sails? Is it its hull, mast and deck? Is the ship a shape that is distinguishable from other forms? We can discuss this in great detail, fleshing out every nuance of how the mind may perceive the being of a ship. As we discuss this, we start to understand that the BEING of the ship is only mind. If we view the ship in its various parts, we find that we cannot find the ship in one certain part. This is so with the Bodhisattva path.

In understanding how the mind makes causation into BEING, we understand how our ignorance, desires and purpose flows into Causation (cause and effect) and a transposition occurs, that is to say the Phenomena that appears to our skandhas, takes on the form (objects and creations) and non-forms (thoughts and systems) that our desires, ignorance and purposes are reflected in (this is also known as karma). Desires, Ignorance and purpose that are the active notions of the three poisons, greed, anger and delusion.

The Bodhisattva is only a name that is given to mind that understands BEING. To understand BEING, is to study Being. When we study being we let go of Being or forget it, drop it. As we drop being, we the understand what makes us stand, sits and lie down.

Those that don't understand, see that such people are following a path, but those that understand follow no path.

Buddhas and Bodhisattvas don't teach, give lectures or write sutras. They don't make laws, paths or precepts to follow. If you don't understand BEING, then one may perceive that Buddhas teach, give lectures and write sutras. When one doesn't understand the Nature of Mind, they see Oneness and Otherness that make them sit, stand and lye down. When one does not understand Karma, then one is used by Rules, precepts and laws.

Study of BEING may be called Meditation (J. Zazen). Without this mediation there is no Wisdom. Wisdom may be looked at as the action of understanding Being, Oneness and otherness.

REBIRTH

This is a term that Buddhist use to describe a Karma afflicted being whom teaches their evil ways to others, directly or indirectly. That particular being may arise, and go, yet the their evil ways may carry on in others whom they have affected. If we look at our own Karma, we perhaps notice that some of our habitual ways of dealing with "things" have been taught to us by someone else, whom in turn learned from someone else. Some things such as language, knowledge and culture are things that must be taught to each new being are the canals of rebirth. Other things such as racial pride, nationalism and religious fundamentalism are the actualization of rebirth. When a person projects themselves into one of the tenants of rebirth, like racial pride, they allow the evil ways of that tenant to dwell(possession) with in them. Buddhist writings may refer to such beings as demons. Buddhist also state that if evil can be reborn, so can good. Self-realized beings may show people their virtues that they live by that may affect others in setting up of social morals and laws based upon those virtues displayed.

The Bodhisattva by their teachings and actions may affect many sentient beings. In the Tibetan Buddhist teachings, these actions will form around one particular sentient being and they are called reincarnates or emanations, they are the total embodiment of this good at rebirth. Though this notion is popular, Traditional Buddhism state that there is no soul, person or being to begin with, only the perception of a being a soul or person that dwells in the karmic world. Many self-realized beings have effected many sentient beings, but this is the nature of the Tathagatha, or some may call the Cosmic Buddha. Buddhist state that we are inherently enlightened, and when we "Forget" the reasons why we are not enlightened, we in a sense become emanations of the Tathagatha.

So, we can choose to be possessed, to cause rebirth in others of our evils or to transform into the eternal Tathagatha. There are no "other factors" guiding our lives, we are making this decision moment by moment. Our habitual ways perhaps fool us into thinking that there is no choice, but is not that the nature of Evil, to mimic truth? We may have become lazy, dependant on the fantasy world and all of its lofty ideas. We may have fooled ourselves in thinking that we are an person of a deeply afflicted nature. But we make that choice moment by moment, even now we are making that choice.

The Bodhisattva path is the path of choice. If you are unable to make that choice, you will forever be barred from the path!

Chapter - 4 Nirvana

As we have laid out the keel of our ship, built up the frame work, raised the mast and put our ship out to sea, we have noticed that in every step of the way, we had to engage with others in explaining what we are doing and how we are doing it. In this way, we begin to help others also understand the nature of our mission, and perhaps guide them to ponder their own wooden boats, build from Greed, anger and delusion, which they are using to sailing in this sea of causation. When we understand the nature of the vessel that we are building, we see that it does not just reside in the frame work of the ship we built. Only the selfish will try to set sail on that ship called the Bodhisattva, and proclaim it to be the One True ship.

Nirvana is the actualization of the Bodhisattva in this world. Free from Karma, understanding ignorance and with no selfish purpose, the Bodhisattva being walks across the waters of causation to help others who are adrift in their self-built wooden boats, teaching them in ways that they can relate to the nature of their wooden boat. There is not one or many Bodhisattva, those that understand the nature of this world and seek an Personal nirvana are the Arhats. Versed well in Buddhist lore, these are the ones that will set sail in the self-built ships called the "Bodhisattva," to seek a personal nirvana of bliss and peace, upon the seas of causation. The True Bodhisattva by the nature of understanding Anicca, anatta and Dukkha, appearers to make vows that state, "So long as they do not attain Nirvana, I will not attain it myself.", Yet this vow that is perceived by those engaged the dualistic world, is only the actualization of the Bodhisattva. For to attain nirvana is the Arhat, whom selfishly secludes themselves away from the world for personal bliss and peace. The True Bodhisattva, with understanding of impermanence, no-self and suffering, engages in full heatedly in this world, seemingly able to walk across the seas of causation to the ones that cry out in their various ways for help. The timid and the selfish are all served by the Bodhisattvas who are not one, or two or many.

A Bodhisattva does not wait for any personal condition to occur, certain knowledge to be learned or sectarian authorization to be given, in helping others understand the True nature of existence. When one is beginning to understand the nature of themselves and feels the selfish habits pulling at their desires and needs, to turn about and share this understanding with others, is the True Way of Buddha. Even if one is not versed in Buddhist lore or is clumsy with words, this sharing still occurs. Sharing with others open up the opens up the field of opportunity for all beings to hear the Dharma of that is already there before them.

We may begin to study wisdom for our own self, yet if we are unable to bring that wisdom to the people and communities that we live in, we find that we are always one step away from real wisdom. The way of the Arhat, the Saint or the Master is to live a selfish life that only creates a delusional world of doctrines, ritual and dogma.

HERE IS THE OUTLINE OF THE NEXT FOUR CHAPTERS.

Chapter 5 - Practices of the Eightfold path

This chapter will discuss the Buddhist teaching of Tantra, Meditation and precept training. Traditional Zen Buddhism bases it current forms on these fundamental training methods

Chapter 6 - Buddhist Religion

This chapter will discuss the religious views of Buddhism, in referring to training and helping others achieve the way.

Chapter 7 - Questions and Answers

Questions about the first three chapters that readers have asked to the author.

The questions and answers are developed from feedback by readers of this text. If you have a question, comment or response send them to: Mvetanen@aol.com, Subject Foundations of wisdom. Or send by postal mail to Mark Vetanen 6107 SW Murrey Bv, #289 Beaverton Oregon, 97008. This is an postal box, so please don't look for me there.

Chapter - 8 Resources and references of Buddhist Training

This chapter will outline study materials to use in the study of Buddhism, how to study and what places offer study programs.

ORDERING INFORMATION:

The book will come to you in a 8 x 11 format, bounded with an high quality cover.

Please send cash, check or money order for the amount of $15 to:

Mark Vetanen
6107 SW Murrey Bv. #289
Beaverton Oregon, 97008

The postal office protect the public from postal fraud, that is to say that if you send in your money and do not get what you paid for, you can file an complain against the vendor and the postal office will file an criminal charge against the offending party to either give back your money or give you the material paid for.

FEEDBACK WANTED

Do you have a question, comment or just want to state your take on what you have just read, you can contact me, though e-mail at Mvetanen@aol.com, in the subject box put "Foundations of Wisdom", or at write to me at the address stated above. I will only respond to questions and comments concerning the three chapters of this book. Though if you have an interesting idea or very original thought, ill will be willing to hear it out.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

"Mark Vetanen? Who is that?" Most people ask. I can see laying out a resume of my Buddhist training and study if my words do not speak for themselves. If my intention was to appeal to your sense of authority, then one can come across as such by laying out an line of credentials that may impress upon the ignorant and under educated that the author is a authority in their field. I prefer to let the words I write to stand upon their own and for you to find out for yourself if they make any sense to you. Some of the best works in the field of religion where simply sighed anonymous. I have found that once one gets past who the author is, or cannot find out who the author is, then the writings are looked at for what they have to say, rather than who said it.

DISTRIBUTE THIS TEXT

If you found anything in this text that helped you or sparked some interest in you to investigating the Buddhas path, then please pass this text to others whom can be similarly helped. Even if you found no value to this text, then perhaps someone who is trying to understand Buddhism or just has some interest in Buddhism may find the text helpful.

PLEASE KEEP THIS TEXT IN ALL OF ITS PARTS, DO NOT ALTER THE TEXT.

You may obtain an current copy of this text at America On-Line in the Buddhist File section or Send E-mail to Mvetanen@aol.com requesting the text.

FINDING YOUR PRIMARY POINT

by Zen Master Seung Sahn

Zen Master Seung Sahn gave the following Dharma Talk at the Providence Zen Center the evening before a Yong Maeng Jong Jin retreat, April 1977.

I often talk about primary point. What is primary point? When you have a scale, and there is nothing being weighed, the indicator points to zero. You put something on it, and the pointer swings to "one pound". You take it off; the pointer goes back to zero. This is primary point. After you find your primary point, then good feelings come, bad feelings come, so your pointer swings in one direction or the other. But this doesn't matter. Don't check it. When the feeling is over with, the pointer swings back to zero.

But, if you haven't found your primary point, then it is like taking a heavy object off the scale and having the pointer stay at "ten pounds". Or, the pointer moves back only part-way; it doesn't go back to zero. Then, you have a problem. Your scale does not weigh correctly. Maybe if you put a heavy object on it, it will break completely.

So first, you must find your primary point. Then, you must keep it very strongly. A taxi has weak shock absorbers, so it hits a small bump and bounces up and down. A train has strong shock absorbers, so it is very steady. If you keep your primary point, your mind-spring will become stronger and stronger. You will meet big problems, and your mind will move less and less. A big problem comes; your mind moves, but soon returns to primary point. Finally, your mind will be very strong; it will be able to carry any load. Then, saving all people is possible.

---

converted to digital format and included in the Teaching Library of MOUNT KAILAS BBS with permission of The Cambridge Zen Center
199 Auburn Street Cambridge MA 02139 (617) 576-3229

FAITH IN MIND
A Guide to Ch'an Practice

by Master Sheng-Yen

Copyright 1987 by Dharma Drum Publications
First Printing 1987
Second Printing 1993

Dharma Drum Publications is the publishing activity of

Institute of Chung-Hwa Buddhist Culture
90-56 Corona Avenue
Elmhurst, New York 11373
Tel: (718) 592-6593

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number 70292
ISBN 0-9609854-2-5

* * *

DharmaNet Edition 1994

This electronic edition is offered for free distribution via DharmaNet by arrangement with the publisher.

You may print a single copy of this work for your personal use without requesting permission from the publisher.
Otherwise, all rights reserved.

DharmaNet International
P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley CA 94704-4951

* * *

AKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Translator(poem): Master Sheng-Yen
Co-Translator(poem): Paul Kennedy Interpreter: Dan Stevenson (retreat lectures) Ming-Yee Wang
Karen Zinn
Transcriber: Dorothy Weiner Editorial Assistance: Ernest Heau
Richard Kent
Alan Rubinstein
Book Design: Trish Ing
Page Simon
Cover Design: Trish Ing

Karen Zinn, Editor

* * *

PREFACE

Master Sheng-yen is a renowned teacher of Ch'an (Zen) Buddhism. At the age of 13, he left his home near Shanghai to become a monk. During the period of Communist unrest, he went to southern Taiwan and spent six years in solitary retreat. Later, he continued his formal study, earning a doctorate in Buddhist Literature from Rissho University in Tokyo. He has received transmission in the two major branches of Ch'an: the Lin-chi (Rinzai) and Ts'ao-tung (Soto) schools.

He now divides his time between New York, where he is the Resident Teacher at the Ch'an Meditation Center he Founded, and Taipei, where he is the abbot of two monasteries.

Master Sheng-yen offers a guide to Ch'an practice based on the poem Faith in Mind. His words are transcribed from lectures given during a series of retreats spanning several years.

"Since the talks were given within the context of intensive meditation practice, I did not adopt a scholarly point of view or analytical approach. It is not a formal commentary on the text; rather, I use the poem as a taking-off point to inspire the practitioner and deal with certain issues that arise during the course of practice."

"The phrase 'faith in mind' contains the two meanings of 'believing in' and 'realizing' the mind. Faith in mind is the belief that we have a fundamental unmoving, unchanging mind. This mind is precisely Buddha mind."

* * * * * * * *

CONTENTS

Introduction INTRO.TXT

Faith in Mind (Verses) VERSES.TXT

Retreat One (Nov. 23, 1984 - Nov. 30, 1984)

1. Embarking on the practice FAITH1.TXT
2. Overcoming like and dislike FAITH2.TXT
3. Letting go of attachments FAITH3.TXT
4. Unifying the mind FAITH4.TXT
5. Stilling words and thoughts FAITH5.TXT

Retreat Two (Dec. 25, 1984 - Jan. 1, 1985)

6. Giving up expectations FAITH6.TXT
7. Beyond one mind FAITH7.TXT
8. Illusions FAITH8.TXT
9. Awareness of Vexation FAITH9.TXT
10. Making comparisons FAITH10.TXT

Retreat Three (May 24, 1985 - May 31, 1985)
11. Anxiety FAITH11.TXT
12. Being natural FAITH12.TXT
13. Accepting all realms FAITH13.TXT
14. Limiting the environment FAITH14.TXT
15. One dharma FAITH15.TXT

Retreat Four (June 28 - July 3, 1985)
16. The dreaming mind FAITH16.TXT
17. Climbing the crystal mountain FAITH17.TXT
18. Rest and activity FAITH18.TXT
19. Leaving no trace FAITH19.TXT
20. True suchness FAITH20.TXT

* * * * * * * *

INTRODUCTION

In the records of Ch'an masters, there is no full account of the life of Seng Ts'an, the Third Patriarch, who died in A.D. 606. He is mentioned, however, in the T'ang dynasty (618-907) Kao Seng Chua (Biographies of Eminent Monks) written by master Fa Ts'ung; "After Ch'an master (Hui) K'o, there was Ch'an master (Seng) Ts'an." The Leng

Ch'ieh Shih Tzu Chi (Records of the Masters of the Lankavatara Sutra), which contains early historical material of the Ch'an school, says that after entering retreat in the mountains Seng Ts'an never emerged, nor did he ever write about or transmit the Dharma. This statement is problematic considering that the Sui dynasty history, in Er Shih Wu Shih (The Twenty-five History Books) states that in 592 he transmitted the Dharma to Tao Hsin, the Fourth Patriarch. It also calls into question the authorship of the poem Faith in Mind, which has historically been attributed to Seng Ts'an. Contemporary scholars doubt whether he was, in fact, the author. Niu T'ou Fa Jung, a disciple of Tao Hsin, wrote a poem entitled Song of Mind. Noticing the similarity between the two poems, some suggest that Faith in Mind was actually written after the time of the Sixth Patriarch, Nui Neng, as an improved, condensed version of Song of Mind. The thought expressed in Faith in Mind is indeed better organized, more concise and seems complete compared to Niu T'ou's poem.

The question of attribution, however, has no relevance to my commentaries on Faith in Mind. The importance of the poem to us lies in its value as a guide to Ch'an meditation, and its significance in the history of Ch'an (Zen), both in China and Japan. Among the many poems on enlightenment, the most highly regarded are Yung Chia's Song of Enlightenment, and Faith in Mind, because of the clear guidance they provide on the method of Ch'an.

For this reason, I do not comment on Faith in Mind on ordinary occasions. I choose to lecture on it only during the seven-day Ch'an retreat. The twenty chapters of this book are based on translated lectures spanning four retreats, subsequently edited for publication. Since the talks were given within the context of intensive meditation practice, I did not adopt a scholarly point of view or analytical approach. It is not a formal commentary on the text; rather, I use the poem as a taking-off point to inspire the practitioner and deal with certain issues that arise during the course of practice.

There are at least five published English translations of Faith in Mind. All have their merits. I offer a new translation which is similar in many respects to previous ones; however, portions of it are quite different, reflecting my own understanding of the poem. When commenting on Faith in Mind, I often say to my students, "Now that you are practicing, it matters little whether or not I speak on Faith in Mind. But I am using the poem to instruct you on the method of practice." The progress and condition of a given group of practitioners differs from day to day and from retreat to retreat. Thus I adapt my discussion of the poem to the situation at hand, while remaining within the scope of the text. I believe these talks can serve as a helpful guide both to the aspiring and experienced practitioner. It has also helped me personally, by giving me new insights into the poem as various situations arose.

The phrase "faith in mind" contains the two meanings of "believing in" and "realizing" the mind. "Mind" is especially emphasized in Ch'an. True faith in mind is the belief grounded in realization that we have a fundamental, unmoving, unchanging mind. This mind is precisely Buddha mind; it is also Tathagatagarbha (womb of Tathagata) in every sentient being. But the mind experienced by ordinary beings in the midst of vexations is deluded mind, not true mind. Those who seek to rid themselves of vexations imagine that there is a true mind to attain. However, from the perspective of Buddha mind, there is only one mind, neither true nor false. There is no need to discriminate, for everything, everywhere, is mind everlasting. When we fully realize Buddha mind, the believing mind and the mind which is believed in merge into one; since they are the same, the need for mere belief in this mind disappears.

The paradox is that one must be enlightened to have true faith in this mind. The author is speaking from a deeply enlightened perspective to the practitioner who seeks to discover true mind. Seng Ts'an shows us how to transform our ordinary discriminating mind into the Buddha mind which does not discriminates; how to get from existence to emptiness, from defilement to purity. He tells us how we should practice and what kind of mental attitude to avoid during practice: we should not give in to our likes and dislikes, neither trying to negate our vexations nor seeking enlightenment. The practice should be pursued for its own sake, but while there should be no other purpose, in the end the mind of equanimity (ping deng hsin is realized -- there is no discrimination, no need for language (yen yu tao tuan), or, indeed, of practice.

The poem contains phrases that will later on assume importance in the Ts'ao Tung (Soto) sect of Ch'an, for instance, "One thought for ten thousand years" (i nien wan nien), which expresses the idea of one thought not moving and yet illuminating. This idea is to become the hallmark of Hung Chih Cheng Chueh's Silent Illumination Ch'an. This tendency is also repeated in the only other written record of Seng Ts'an's teachings which was found on a stone tablet commemorating him. The essence of the inscription is: Simultaneously practice stillness (chi) and illumination (chao). Carefully observe, but see no dharmas (phenomena), see no body, and see no mind. For the mind is nameless, the body is empty, and the dharmas are a dream. There is nothing to be attained, no enlightenment to be experienced. This is called liberation.

* * * * * * * *

Faith In Mind

The Supreme Way is not difficult
If only you do not pick and choose.
Neither love nor hate,
And you will clearly understand.
Be off by a hair,
And you are as far from it as heaven from earth.
If you want the Way to appear,
Be neither for nor against.
For and against opposing each other
This is the mind's disease.
Without recognizing the mysterious principle

It is useless to practice quietude.

The Way is perfect like great space,
Without lack, without excess.
Because of grasping and rejecting,
You cannot attain it.
Do not pursue conditioned existence;
Do not abide in acceptance of emptiness.
In oneness and equality,
Confusion vanishes of itself.
Stop activity and return to stillness,
And that stillness will be even more active.
Merely stagnating in duality,
How can you recognize oneness?

If you fail to penetrate oneness,
Both places lose their function.
Banish existence and you fall into existence;
Follow emptiness and you turn your back on it.
Excessive talking and thinking
Turn you from harmony with the Way.
Cut off talking and thinking,
And there is nowhere you cannot penetrate.
Return to the root and attain the principle;
Pursue illumination and you lose it.
One moment of reversing the light
Is greater than the previous emptiness.
The previous emptiness is transformed;
It was all a product of deluded views.
No need to seek the real;
Just extinguish your views.

Do not abide in dualistic views;
Take care not to seek after them.
As soon as there is right and wrong
The mind is scattered and lost.
Two comes from one,
Yet do not even keep the one.

When one mind does not arise,
Myriad dharmas are without defect.
Without defect, without dharmas,
No arising, no mind.
The subject is extinguished with the object.
The object sinks away with the subject.
Object is object because of the subject;
Subject is subject because of the object.
Know that the two
Are originally one emptiness.
In one emptiness the two are the same,
Containing all phenomena.
Not seeing fine or coarse,
How can there be any bias?

The Great Way is broad,
Neither easy nor difficult.
With narrow views and doubts,
Haste will slow you down.
Attach to it and you lose the measure;
The mind will enter a deviant path.
Let it go and be spontaneous,
Experience no going or staying.

Accord with your nature, unite with the Way,
Wander at ease, without vexation.
Bound by thoughts, you depart from the real;
And sinking into a stupor is as bad.
It is not good to weary the spirit.
Why alternate between aversion and affection?

If you wish to enter the one vehicle,
Do not be repelled by the sense realm.
With no aversion to the sense realm,
You become one with true enlightenment.
The wise have no motives;
Fools put themselves in bondage.
One dharma is not different from another.

The deluded mind clings to whatever it desires.
Using mind to cultivate mind
Is this not a great mistake?

The erring mind begets tranquillity and confusion;
In enlightenment there are no likes or dislikes.
The duality of all things
Issues from false discriminations.
A dream, an illusion, a flower in the sky
How could they be worth grasping?
Gain and loss, right and wrong
Discard them all at once.

If the eyes do not close in sleep,
All dreams will cease of themselves.
If the mind does not discriminate,
All dharmas are of one suchness.
The essence of one suchness is profound;
Unmoving, conditioned things are forgotten.
Contemplate all dharmas as equal,
And you return to things as they are.
When the subject disappears,
There can be no measuring or comparing.

Stop activity and there is no activity;
When activity stops, there is no rest.
Since two cannot be established,
How can there be one?
In the very ultimate,
Rules and standards do not exist.

Develop a mind of equanimity,
And all deeds are put to rest.
Anxious doubts are completely cleared.
Right faith is made upright.
Nothing lingers behind,
Nothing can be remembered.
Bright and empty, functioning naturally,

The mind does not exert itself.
It is not a place of thinking,
Difficult for reason and emotion to fathom.
In the Dharma Realm of true suchness,
There is no other, no self.

To accord with it is vitally important;
Only refer to not-two.
In not-two all things are in unity;
Nothing is excluded.
The wise throughout the ten directions
All enter this principle.
This principle is neither hurried nor slow
One thought for ten thousand years.

Abiding nowhere yet everywhere,
The ten directions are right before you.
The smallest is the same as the largest
In the realm where delusion is cut off.
The largest is the same as the smallest;
No boundaries are visible.
Existence is precisely emptiness;
Emptiness is precisely existence.
If it is not like this,
Then you must not preserve it.

One is everything;
Everything is one.
If you can be like this,
Why worry about not finishing?
Faith and mind are not two;
Non-duality is faith in mind.

The path of words is cut off;
There is no past, no future, no present.

* * * * * * * *

1

Embarking on the Practice

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The Supreme Way is not difficult
If only you do not pick and choose.
Neither love nor hate,
And you will clearly understand.
Be off by a hair,
And you are as far from it as heaven from earth.

The sole purpose of a Ch'an retreat is to meditate. You should keep your attention entirely on practice, without trying to attain any results. Since many of you have traveled far, or have worked hard to set aside the time, you have a great deal invested in this retreat. It is natural that you want to gain something. But once you enter the retreat, you must put aside any specific hopes.

Practicing with a goal in mind is like trying to catch a feather with a fan. The more you go after it, the more it eludes you. But if you sneak up on it slowly, you can grab it. The aim of practice is to develop patience and forbearance, to train your mind to become calm and stable. Any attachment or seeking will prevent your mind from settling down.

Today someone told me that the more he worked on the hua-t'ou [1] the more tense he felt. It was as though his mind had become knotted up. His problem is that he wants to see quick results. Pursuing the hua-t'ou intensely with a desire to get enlightened is like tying yourself up and then poking yourself with a knife. The more you drive yourself the more tense you will feel. The same principle applies to the body. If you react to pain by tensing the body, the pain will only get worse. If any part of your body feels painful, you should try to relax it. Any involuntary movement of the body while sitting in meditation is also due to tension. Thus it is important to constantly maintain a state of relaxation.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Related to this are the problems that may develop from fixing your attention on a particular part of the body. For instance, some people try to make their breath flow smoothly. But in trying to control the breath, it becomes abnormal.

Don't pay attention to any phenomenon that occurs to the body; if you are concerned with it, problems will arise. It is the same with the mind. You will be unable to practice unless you disregard everything that happens to you mentally. If you feel distressed or pained in any way, just ignore it. Let it go and return wholeheartedly to the method. Place your mind directly on the method itself; concern yourself with nothing else.

The Supreme Way in the first line of the poem refers to the stage of Buddhahood. The wisdom of the Buddha is not difficult to perceive; it can be attained in the instant between two thoughts. The reason for this is that it has never been separate from us. It is always present. In fact, we all desire to realize this Supreme Way. If so, why are we unable to attain it?

The second line explains what prevents us. It is because we are always trying to escape our vexations. Precisely because we want to acquire the Buddha's insight and merits, we are unable to perceive Buddha nature. Another reason why we cannot see our Buddha nature is that we are burdened with ideas. We make distinctions between samsara [2] and nirvana [3], sentient beings and the Buddha, vexations and enlightenment. These ideas obstruct our perception of Buddha nature.

To paraphrase lines three and four: As soon as you discard your likes and dislikes, the Way will immediately appear before you. Here, Seng-Ts'an has something in common with Tao-Hsin, the Fourth Patriarch, and Hui-Neng, the Sixth Patriarch. The latter two frequently said that when you stop discriminating between good and evil, you will immediately perceive your "original face." (In Ch'an "original face" refers to one's innate Buddha nature.) In other words, you will understand the Supreme Way.

When sitting, some of you are distracted with pain, or are trying to fight off drowsiness. At night, maybe you are angry at someone who is keeping you awake with his snoring. But instead of letting it annoy you, just observe the snoring. Soon the snores may become hypnotic and repetitive, actually pleasant sounding. If you start counting the snores, before you know it you will be asleep.

On the other hand, becoming attached to a certain pleasurable experience in meditation can also be an obstruction. One student I had would rock her body during sitting meditation. She felt that she had no control over the shaking; it just happened spontaneously. Actually, this was not caused by any physical tension but by a subconscious motive. The rocking was comfortable to her. You cannot practice effectively if you give in to such things. By examining them, you will be able to control the mind.

Holding on to various likes and dislikes keeps you apart from the Way. Discarding them will bring you in accord with the Way. But if there is the slightest misconception about this, the distance between you and the Way will be as great as that between heaven and earth. Don't misinterpret this and think that since you are not supposed to attach to likes and dislikes, you should therefore not cultivate the Way. With this attitude it is useless to come on a Ch'an retreat.

When you first set out to practice you will definitely have a goal in mind. You may be frustrated with your present condition and aim either to change yourself or to improve your circumstances. Certainly there is something you hope to achieve by practicing. You cannot just practice aimlessly. So practice itself implies some intention or desire. To fulfill your original intentions, you must constantly keep your mind on the method of practice. But as you focus on the method you should not be thinking of what you want to accomplish, what level you want to reach, or what problems you want to get rid of. Instead, your mind should be exclusively applied to the method itself, free from all other motives.

There is a saying that is useful for practitioners: "Put down the myriad thoughts. Take up the practice." The myriad thoughts are scattered, random, extraneous concerns. The practice is your method of cultivation. When your mind wanders to extraneous concerns, put them down as soon as they appear. But should you treat the method in the same way as a wandering thought -- putting it down as soon as it appears? No. From moment to moment, put down extraneous thoughts and return your mind to the method of practice.

One time I asked a student, "Are you having many extraneous thoughts?" He replied, "Not too many." I said, "I'll bet I know one of them. You're thinking of your girl friend all the time, aren't you?" He retorted, "How can you say that?" After the retreat he said, "Originally, I wasn't thinking of my girl friend at all. But after Shih-fu [4] mentioned her I couldn't stop thinking of her." I told him that he hadn't seen through his problem yet. He may have thought that his mind was not on his girl friend, but his concern was still there.

Perhaps you try to put down extraneous concerns but find that you just can't. Every time you put one down, it comes back again. This upsets you. You keep telling yourself, "Put it down. Put it down." Actually it doesn't matter if you can't put it down. If you eventually get to the point where you say to yourself, "It doesn't matter if I can't put it down," then you will be putting it down. You should not fear failure. Neither should you embrace it. You may conclude that the retreat is just not going well for you -- your body is uncomfortable, your mind is in tumult. You are unable to control yourself. You haven't made the proper preparations. So you think, why not forget this one and leave tomorrow? Maybe I'll try again the next time. But don't succumb to this defeatist attitude. A Chinese proverb says: "A hundred birds in a tree are not worth one bird in the palm." If you let go of that one bird to go after the hundred you will end up with nothing. Even though you feel unprepared and doomed to failure, being here still presents a wonderful opportunity to practice.

* * *

Notes
~~~~~

[1] hua-t'ou: (Japanese: wato). Literally, "the source of the words," a method used in the Ch'an school to arouse the great doubt sensation to induce the mind to break through to the enlightened state. The practitioner meditates on such baffling questions as: "What is wu?" "Where am I?" or "Who is reciting Buddha's name?" Often, the phrase is taken from a kung-an (Japanese: koan).

[2] samsara: (Sanskrit, "journeying"). The cycle of birth and death experienced by all sentient beings; the phenomenal world in which the cycle takes place. Liberation from the samsaric cycle results in entering the state of nirvana.

[3] Nirvana: (Sanskrit, "extinction"). In buddhism, the goal of spiritual practice is to liberate oneself from samsara, the cycle of birth and death, and to enter the state of unconditioned existence, nirvana.

[4] Shih-fu: ("teacher-father"). A term of respect used by a disciple when referring to or addressing his master.

* * * * * * * *
~~~~~

Overcoming Like and Dislike

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

If you want the Way to appear,
Be neither for nor against.
For and against opposing each other --
This is the mind's disease.

If you want the Buddha Way to manifest before your eyes, it is a mistake to harbor any preferences or aversions. This includes anything you hope to acquire, keep, discard, or avoid. When sitting seems to be going particularly well, the idea may pop into your mind that you are about to be enlightened. You begin to wait for this enlightenment experience. With this expectation, the mind has already abandoned its single-mindedness and has become confused and scattered. You will not be able to maintain your previous state of concentration. On a prior retreat, one student was progressing so well that there were notable changes in his mental state. At that point he became frightened. He thought, "I'm happy with the way I am now. I don't really want any drastic changes. What if my friends don't recognize me?" He did not sit as well for the rest of the retreat.

This contradictory mentality often afflicts the practitioner. He wants to enter the door of enlightenment but at the same time is really afraid of entering. You come to a retreat with the desire to transform yourself. Indeed, practice can make you more mature, calm, and stable. It will certainly not change you into something less human, or ghostlike. Since ancient times all of the numerous practitioners who have gotten deeply enlightened remained human, the only difference being that afterward they were more stable and filled with wisdom. There is no reason to fear changing that way.

Such a contradictory state of mind is common among ordinary people. When I left home as a young boy I was very excited about becoming a monk. But on the other hand, I had never been to a monastery and had some apprehension. I just did not know what would happen there. Many people who believe in heaven have similar fears about what it will be like after death. These contradictions point to inherent weaknesses in our personality, of which we are usually unaware. It is only in the context of practice that these weaknesses are exposed. Once we discover and understand our weaknesses, we can prevent them from further obstructing our practice.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Though "for" and "against" are opposites, they are also very much related. If there is something that you like, there must be something else that you dislike. And if you cannot get what you like, you will change your mind and dislike it. To be caught in this conflict between like and dislike is a serious disease of the mind. It is a barrier to practice. Practice is a process by which we recognize and treat the disease of our minds. When the disease completely disappears, the ultimate Way is revealed.

> Without recognizing the mysterious principle
> It is useless to practice quietude.

If you do not grasp the deep truth in the previous lines, no matter how hard you practice, your efforts will be futile. This is because there is a struggle within your mind. The previous thought is continually at war with the following thought. Under these circumstances, it is almost impossible to attain a peaceful state of mind.

Even if you do manage to overcome your scattered thoughts and reach a peaceful state, it would still be useless. You will be so happy to have entered this state that you will grasp it and not let it go. In the end, you will not have achieved a concentrated mind but an attached mind. Nonetheless, a peaceful state of mind is at least better than one involved in a constant internal struggle. As long as you live alone you may be able to maintain it. But if you have to interact with people, things may start bothering you. You may be disturbed by the noise of children, visits of friends or stress at work. Eventually, you will seek to avoid these things and meditate alone in a room.

Someone here has a habit of sometimes falling backwards while sitting. Today I cautioned her that if she does it hard enough, the shock may cause her to lose consciousness or even her ability to think rationally. She remarked, "That's not such a bad idea, after all. Now I have to struggle with all of the problems in my mind. If I get such a shock, my problems will simply disappear." I said, "That may be the case, but who will feed you and take care of you? Who will take care of your children?" A shock to your nervous system is not the same as enlightenment. Rather, it is a disease. Just because a person does not have any scattered thoughts does not mean that all his problems are resolved. If all you are interested in is a thoughtless state, just ask someone to hit you hard on the back of your head. There are too many people who cannot distinguish between true wisdom and a mere state of peacefulness. If you do not understand this distinction, even if you practice hard, at best you are being foolish.

You should not remain passively in peacefulness. Don't be afraid of difficulties. If your mind cannot settle down you should not feel any resentment. Cultivate non-aversion to the unpleasant and non-attachment to the pleasant. Taking a pleasurable state for enlightenment will get you into trouble. Enlightenment is not something we have to guard fiercely, not letting it go. If a pleasant state arises, don't get stuck on it, just continue to practice. On a past retreat one person sat through four thirty-minute periods without stirring. Seeing that his condition was "too good," I struck him with the incense board. [1] Thereupon he grabbed the board and hit me, saying, "I was in such a blissful state and now I have lost samadhi." [2] Aside from the fact that practitioners should not have any attachments, it is not the purpose of Ch'an to remain in samadhi. It is not necessarily good for the mind to settle down too quickly. Ch'an is a lively practice. It is not difficult to maintain a calm mind in a stationary situation. But in Ch'an one should be able to retain mental calmness even in a mobile state.

> The Way is perfect like great space,
> Without lack, without excess.
> Because of grasping and rejecting,
> You cannot attain it.

Great space does not refer to a nothingness, but rather to a totality.

Though it includes everything, there is no individual existence. There is only the total, universal existence. Even before attaining the Way, practitioners should train themselves in the proper attitudes of one who is already enlightened. That is, they should discard the mentality of liking and disliking. So long as you practice diligently, practice is the totality. After all, what you dislike and what you like are not separate from one another.

There was a landowner who hired many helping hands to work his fields. They were very good workers, but they had large appetites. On the one hand, he was pleased with their work and, on the other, he was annoyed that they ate so much. In the owner's mind this was a grave defect. To him it would be ideal if they would just do their job and not have to eat. Thus there is no need to rejoice when you think you have gotten what you like -it will bring with it things you dislike, and vice versa.

For example, a couple may spend a lot of time and energy courting each other. Eventually they are married and are very happy together. But along with the happiness there are also some restrictions. They feel stuck in the daily routine and lack the freedom to do whatever they want. They reflect that there is a certain merit to remaining single. But at this point, it is already too late.

When we think we have gotten something, we have not really gotten it and when we think we have lost something, we have not really lost it. This is because in the reality of totality, there is no gain and no loss. There is nothing outside of your mind. It is because you choose and reject that you are not free. It is for this reason that you have an excess or a lack. You have an excess of what you want to be rid of, and a lack of what you want to acquire. It is only when there is no grasping or rejecting that there will be neither excess nor lack.

* * *

Notes

~~~~~

[1] incense board: (Chinese: hsiang-pan; Japanese: kyosaku) A long, flat board used in the meditation hall to hit dozing practitioners or to help provide the final impetus to realization for those who are "ripe."

[2] samadhi: Refers to states of meditative absorption characterized by an expanded sense of self, or "one mind." The meditator loses normal awareness of body and surroundings.

* * * * * * * *

3

Letting Go of Attachments

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Do not pursue conditioned existence;
Do not abide in acceptance of emptiness.

People can be attached either to existence, the outer world, or emptiness, the inner void. Most of us are probably attached to existence, clinging to our thoughts, our body, the environment around us. On the other hand, someone attached to emptiness may think: "Since there is nothing after death, it is the simplest solution for everything. After I die, I won't have to worry about anything anymore." Another emptiness attitude may be: "Since the world is illusory, then nothing matters and I can stay detached from everything." Those who are attached to emptiness may have a devil-may-care attitude. They may refuse to take anything in life seriously. Or they may even be susceptible to committing suicide.

Attachment to either existence or to emptiness are improper attitudes. I have spoken of the dangers of attaching to existence -- grasping what you like and rejecting what you dislike. But to say that there is nothing to grasp and nothing to reject is also incorrect -- this would be attaching to emptiness. A person may be meditating with a blank mind, apparently free of all thoughts and concerns. While this may seem to be approaching enlightenment, it is actually quite different. In the enlightened state, a previous thought did not arise, a future thought will not arise, and a present thought does not arise. But someone in the blank state is just sitting there not thinking about or doing anything. In fact, he is not practicing. Indeed he does have a thought, which is: the previous thought arose, but it does not matter. A future thought may arise but, again, it does not matter. As to the present thought, let it be. This person may think that he has no attachment to his thoughts. But actually this is far from a true state of enlightenment. This kind of state is called "stubborn emptiness," as opposed to true emptiness, which is a lively state of mind, full of awareness.

If you practice to a point where you feel very tranquil, stable, and comfortable, that would be a peaceful state of mind. The best you can attain in this peaceful condition is a high samadhi state in the formless realm called the "emptiness samadhi." But if you become attached to such a state you would never see your self- nature. This would be considered an "outer path" practice.

> In oneness and equality,
> Confusion vanishes of itself.

Perceiving that all is one means making no distinction between sage and sentient being, or between subject and object. This is another way of describing the totality of space. When you experience everything as equal, all distinctions will naturally disappear. While remembering not to abide either in existence or emptiness, you should also know that existence and emptiness are not separate.

Yet is everything really the same? Once I said that the Buddha sees all sentient beings as the same, and is aware of every single thought in the universe. Someone raised the point that if the Buddha's mind was constantly being bombarded with such a tremendous influx of thoughts, it would not be a very comfortable state. This would mean that the Buddha's mind is like a garbage can and the thoughts of all sentient beings are being dumped into it. It would be a heavy burden on the Buddha.

If you take a snapshot with a high quality camera, everything in front of the lens will be imprinted on the film in minute detail. You can see the tip of each blade of grass and the outline of every leaf. Yet the camera does not think: "How annoying! All this junk is trying to get my attention." No. In one shot, it takes in everything without making distinctions among the objects -- whether they are good or bad, long or short, green or yellow. But just because the camera does not make distinctions does not mean that the images on the film will appear confused or in the wrong order. On the contrary, everything is there clearly, and in place.

The Buddha's mind is like this. Having an equal mind means that there is no conception of relativity between things. Everything is absolute in the sense that there is no separation between you and others, between past and future. Because you see everything as equal, you would not choose one thing over another. Yet as soon as there are no longer any differences, it is as if existence simply disappears. For example, if everybody were male, the label "men" would no longer be meaningful, since its only purpose is to distinguish men from women. Everyone being the same, there would be no need for names. If you take an equal attitude towards everything, all differences will disappear, along with existence itself.

Once I handed the incense board to a student and asked him, "What is this?" He grabbed the board and shook it a few times. He did that because there was no name for it. We may call it an incense board but this is only our mind making distinctions. Why must we call it "incense board"?

During a retreat, I stood in front of a certain person. I asked him, "Who is standing in front of you?" He replied, "An egg." I was very pleased to be an egg.

When the retreat was over, I asked him, "Why is Shih-fu an egg?" He answered, "When Shih-fu asked me the question I did not have any thought whatsoever in my mind. Since I had to give an answer, I just said something -- and the word "egg" spontaneously came out of my mouth. Later I thought: `That isn't quite right. How can Shih-fu be an egg? But I said it and it's said.'"

When he said "an egg," it was the correct answer. In fact, whatever he said at that moment would have been correct because he did not have any thought in his mind. He was in an absolute state, not making any distinctions. But once he began to entertain doubts, he lost the answer.

Perhaps in this retreat I will also stand in front of you and ask, "Who is standing in front of you?" Then, recalling the story I have just told, you may try to give a similar answer and call Shih-fu a horse. However, this would not be correct if you have the idea of giving a good answer. This is the mind of distinction. It is not the mind that treats everything as equal.

> Stop activity and return to stillness,
> And that stillness will be even more active.

Originally your mind may be in a relatively stable state. But when you realize that your mind is not completely unmoving, you may try to make it even calmer. However, the effort to still your mind will cause it to become more active. The mind that makes no distinctions is unmoving; there are no ups and downs. If you try to eliminate the ups and downs it would be like observing a pan of water. There are gentle ripples on its surface. But you want the surface to be completely still, so you blow on the water to flatten it out. This creates more ripples. Then you press the water with your hands to stop it from moving. The outcome is even more agitation. If you were to leave the water alone, the ripples would eventually subside and the surface would be still. Common sense tells us that we cannot force the water to become calm. When it comes to practice, however, it is difficult for us to apply the same principle.

When practicing, it is sufficient to just keep your mind on the method. It is unnecessary to reflect upon how well you are doing, or to compare whether you are in a better state now than you were half an hour ago. During the evening talk, I may ask you, "How are you doing today?" At this time you are allowed to express your feelings. But when you are practicing you should definitely not investigate your mental state and judge your practice.

Someone said to me, "Shih-fu, I feel very ashamed. I come to retreat time and again and yet I never make any progress." I said, "The very fact that you are still coming to retreat and practicing is proof that you are making progress."

Practice with an equal mind and don't distinguish between good and bad. Do not compare your condition before and after the retreat, or judge whether the method you are using is right or wrong. If you find you cannot use the method, you may change it, but first understand why you cannot use the method. You should not let curiosity dictate your practice, playing with one method today and another tomorrow, or switching methods from one sitting to the next. You should see that there are no real differences between the various methods. Hold on to one method and go into it as deeply as possible.

This is like your love relationships. When you love someone, you should persist in that relationship and not continually change partners. Likewise, keep to one method and do not keep changing your conception of practice. To change frequently will give you only trouble.

* * * * * * * *

4

Unifying the Mind

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Merely stagnating in duality,
How can you recognize oneness?
If you fail to penetrate oneness,
Both places lose their function.

Whenever you make distinctions, your mind is in opposition. Opposition implies duality. How is this relevant to practice? A practitioner usually wants to attain enlightenment or ultimately, Buddhahood. But this creates a duality of subject and object. The person who is seeking to attain is separate from the attainment, the object of his search. In seeking to become one with the Buddha, he separates himself from it. This is a state of opposition.

Or, perhaps the practitioner knows very well that he has never been separate from the Buddha. But since he has not yet experienced this unity, he seeks the Buddha within himself. Yet even seeking the Buddha within himself creates opposition between his searching mind and the Buddha within. This way, oneness can never be attained.

If that is true, is it correct to practice without seeking anything at all? Every day we chant the Four Great Vows. The fourth is: I vow to attain Supreme Buddhahood. What is the purpose of chanting this vow if aspiring to attain Buddhahood sets up an opposition? On the other hand, if we do not define our goal, is practice possible?

If you really believe there is no separation, then it is possible to practice without opposition. You must have faith in the fundamental unity to truly begin practicing. However, most people remain in duality. They acknowledge only one God, but they also see themselves as separate from God. There is still a duality. But in Ch'an, at the very beginning of your practice, you must have faith in non-duality. It is the same unity in the kung-an [1]: "The myriad dharmas return to one. To what does the One return?" In other words, if all existence comes from one God, where does God come from?
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The emphasis of Faith in Mind is on practice. Many of you are practicing counting the breath. The goal of this method is to reach a unified, or single-minded state. After you get to the point where there are no thoughts other than counting, eventually the counting just naturally stops. The numbers disappear, the breath disappears, and the idea of counting the breath is gone. The only thing left is a sense of existence. Using a Ch'an method such as the hua-t'ou may have a similar result in the beginning stages. At a certain point, the hua-t'ou may disappear, or you simply cannot use it anymore. But this does not always mean that you have reached a single-minded state. You may still have the thought of trying to use the hua-t'ou. Only when the thought of practicing is gone will your mind be in a peaceful state of oneness.

A person who has experienced oneness is different from an ordinary person. His faith is stronger than one who can at best intellectually understand what it means to have no distinctions in one's mind. To personally experience it is quite another thing.

In Taoism there is the saying that the one gives rise to the two, and the two give rise to the multiplicity of things. We should not think that the Third Patriarch is confusing Taoism with Buddhism. It is just that he employs Taoist terminology to express the teachings of Buddhism. The highest goal of Taoism is the attainment of the Way, but this is not the same goal as that described in Faith in Mind, for Ch'an transcends oneness. But we must get to the state of oneness before we can go beyond it.

The practice of Ch'an should progress in this sequence: scattered mind, simple mind, one mind, no mind. First we gather our scattered thoughts into a more concentrated, or simple, state of mind. From this concentrated state we can enter the mind of unity. Finally, we leap from the unified mind to the state of no mind. This final process can be accomplished more quickly using the Ch'an methods of hua-t'ou or kung-an.

To go from one mind to no mind does not mean that anything is lost; rather, it means that you are free of the unified state. Someone who dwells in one mind would either be attached to samadhi, or else would feel identified with a certain deity. It is only after you are freed from this unity and enter no mind that you return to your own nature, also called "wu," or Ch'an. Even though this progression in the practice takes place, while you are actually practicing you should not think to yourself: "I am striving to concentrate my mind. I want to get to the state of one mind, to the state of no mind." If you have such ideas of seeking, you will be in trouble. Just concern yourself with your method; persist with your method to the very end. This in itself is close to a state of unity. If you hold to it, eventually you will reach a point where the method disappears and you will experience one mind.

Once a meditator in his sixties said to me, "Shih-fu, I am very old. I may not have many years left. I really would like to get enlightened as soon as possible. If I don't get enlightened before I die, I will have wasted my life." I said, "Precisely because you are so old you shouldn't have any hopes of getting enlightened. Just practice." The man asked, "How can you tell me to practice and not show me how to get enlightened?" I replied, "If you have the idea of enlightenment, that is already your downfall; you cannot make much progress. If you do nothing but practice, at least you will approach the state of enlightenment. Even if you never get enlightened, the effort is never wasted."

> Banish existence and you fall into existence;
> Follow emptiness and you turn your back on it.

In the Sung dynasty there was a famous prime minister by the name of Chang Shang-Yin who was opposed to Buddhism. He wrote many essays purporting to refute Buddhism, and he would spend every evening pondering over how he could improve the essay he was then working on. His wife, observing his obsessive involvement and struggle with his writing, asked him, "What are you doing?" He said, "Buddhism is really hateful. I'm trying to prove there is no Buddha." His wife remarked, "How strange! If you say there is no Buddha, why bother to refute the Buddha? It is as if you are throwing punches into empty space." This comment turned his mind around. He reflected: There may be something to Buddhism after all. So he started studying Buddhism and became a well-known, accomplished lay practitioner of Ch'an. In fact, Chang Shang-Yin and Ch'an master Ta-Hui Tsung-Kao [2] had the same master, Yuan-Wu K'o-Ch'in.

Thus if you try to destroy something, you are still bound up by it. For instance, suppose you try to clear a blocked pipe by pushing another object into it. Whatever was originally in the pipe is pushed out, but the new object is now blocking the pipe. When you try to use existence to get rid of existence, you will always end up with existence.

When you throw something away, it is gone. But does it cease to exist? In local terms, yes. In the broader picture, however, that is not the case. On this earth, no matter how hard you try to throw anything away, it will still stay somewhere on the earth.

There is a Chinese novel called Monkey. The hero is a "supermonkey" who is so powerful that he can travel a distance of 180,000 miles in one somersault. In the story, he was journeying to the Western Paradise of Amitabha Buddha. On the way, he came upon five tall mountain peaks. He figured that it would take one leap to get to the other side. First he took a rest, urinating at that spot. Then he somersaulted over the mountains. After he landed, he noticed a funny smell. He thought, "Some shameless monkey must have taken a leak here." Actually, he had never gotten to the other side of the mountains. He had just somersaulted back to the original spot. The five mountains in the story symbolize the five skandhas[3] within which sentient beings are trapped. All of your actions will boomerang back to you and you will have to take the consequences. If you throw anything away, it will be you who has to clean it up. You may think that you can avoid responsibility by passing it on to another person. In the short term, it may work. But ultimately, you have to deal with it yourself, and in addition, you have caused trouble to others.

Therefore you should not try to get rid of your vexations. Rather, you should be willing to accept them. Once someone said, "Shih-fu, my karmic obstructions are too great. Please recite mantras to remove them from me." I replied, "And what will happen to these karmic obstructions when I remove them from you? Should they become Shih-fu's?" If you have difficulties you should not consider them problems. If you are obsessed with these difficulties and try to eliminate them, you are only getting yourself into greater trouble. Those who have just begun to practice experience many problems with their bodies and minds. They are constantly saying, "I have to overcome all these problems." But in trying to eliminate their problems, they struggle. This is what is meant by "Banish existence and you fall into existence."

The second line, "Follow emptiness and you turn your back on it," refers to practitioners who have experienced certain breakthroughs, and are approaching the state of emptiness. They may think, "I have eliminated all vexations. I no longer have any ignorance or attachment." But staying at this level would be considered "outer path" practice. The best these practitioners can do is reach the emptiness samadhi, the highest level of the formless realm.

I have known many people who were extremely diligent and took their practice very seriously in the beginning, but gave up too soon. It is just as if when one side senses it is losing the battle, suddenly all resistance is gone and they are defeated very quickly. As long as everything is going well, they continue normally; but as soon as something goes wrong, everything simply collapses. So it is with certain practitioners who have been working hard and then suddenly stop completely. They feel that practice is basically useless. They think it is a great deception, because they have put a lot of energy into overcoming their problems, and have not eliminated them at all. In fact, their efforts have only increased their mental vexations, and have created physical ones as well.

Because of this, many people consider serious or energetic practice demonic. They think it is not normal to devote oneself so completely to practice. Such criticism is usually unjustified. However, it is true that a practitioner who does not know what he is doing may get into deep trouble, especially without proper guidance. He may not be in a demonic state, but very likely his practice cannot last long. It is good to have a diligent and objective attitude towards practice. But to be attached to the idea of overcoming your problems will only lead to further trouble.

* * *

Notes
~~~~~

[1] kung-an: (Japanese: koan). Literally, a "public case," a Ch'an method of meditation in which the practitioner energetically and single-mindedly pursues the answer to an enigmatic question posed by the master, or ponders the meaning of a famous recorded encounter between a master and disciple of the past.

[2] Ta-Hui Tsung-Kao (1089-1163), known as the greatest advocate of kung-an practice, is often contrasted with his contemporary, Hung-Chih Cheng-Chueh, the greatest teacher of the silent illumination method. More disciples were enlightened under Ta-Hui than any other Ch'an master, and he is also noted for spreading the teachings of Ch'an among the laity. A compilation of his writings and talks is available in English under the title Swampland Flowers.

[3] the five skandhas: the five categories, or "heaps," of existence -- form, sensation, perception, volition, and consciousness.

* * * * * * * *
~~~~~

5

Stilling Words and Thoughts

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Excessive talking and thinking
Turn you from harmony with the Way.
Cut off talking and thinking,
And there is nowhere you cannot penetrate.

People like to talk, especially if they feel lonely. Those who tend to talk non-stop generally have difficulty with practice, and also make it difficult for others to practice. In our Ch'an retreat, talking is forbidden, but there are still some people who cannot resist covertly saying a few words. Others honor the rule and refrain from speaking, but that does not mean that they are not talking to themselves. All day long, while they are sitting, they come up with a theme, and then carry on a conversation with themselves. They ponder over all sorts of issues.

Once a certain writer attended a retreat. During the first day, he came up with the idea for a novel. While sitting, he sketched out the plot and the various characters. In the private interview the next day I asked him how he had been doing, and he said, "I've been making plans for my new novel." I said to him, "Perhaps you should go home and start writing your novel now. Otherwise, by the end of the retreat you will have forgotten all the great ideas you have come up with." If you talk too much, either with your mouth or in your head, it will be difficult to make progress. When you find it hard to concentrate, it is very easy to start talking to yourself. You may not even be able to control it.

There is a deeper interpretation of these four lines. You should not try to use logic or theory to answer certain questions in your practice. Some examples are: "Why have I come here for a retreat?"
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"What is the purpose of practice?" "What is enlightenment?" If you get involved in this kind of questioning to justify your practice, then you simply cannot practice.

After a few days of practice, many people completely stop thinking about themselves and their outside affairs. However, they keep dwelling on my words. Whatever I say is meant to guide your practice, but when you are actually practicing, you should just use the method and not think about what I may have said. The less you talk to yourself, the closer you will be to the highest Way.

I once told a student, "You really have to practice very hard to overcome ignorance." For two sitting periods she was constantly thinking, "How am I ignorant?" Unable to contain it any longer, she got up and said to me, "I can eat. I can sleep. So I am really not ignorant." I said, "Look at a dog, a cat, a mosquito. They can eat and rest. Are you saying that they don't have any ignorance?" Then she said, "Tell me what to do so that I won't be ignorant." I said, "Try to meditate and recite the Buddha's name." She went back to her cushion and meditated on the Buddha's name. But again, she thought to herself: "Since I am here meditating and reciting the Buddha's name, I am not ignorant." After another two periods, she came to me again and said, "In fact, I don't have any problems. I have been sitting here feeling very comfortable. It is you who have vexations." Her problem was that although she took my words seriously, she would turn them over and over in her mind instead of actually applying the method during practice.

It is only when you no longer have any words or thoughts that the perfect Way will manifest before you, and "there is nowhere you cannot penetrate." The meaning is not that you can go anywhere, but that there is no need to go anywhere, because in the state of no words and no thoughts you are in the midst of anywhere and every place. How do you get to the state of no words and no thoughts? By picking up the method and putting down your attachment to other things.

> Return to the root and attain the principle;
> Pursue illumination and you lose it.

One moment of reversing the light
Is greater than the previous emptiness.

In practice, you may try to penetrate to the emptiness of phenomena. But as long as illumination is directed towards outward appearances, you miss the primal source. It is only by turning the illumination inward that you return to the source, and get to the meaning of all things. If you can do this even for a split second, you will transcend the state of emptiness.

The source, or root, is Buddha nature. How do you return to the root? By letting go of all words and thoughts and eliminating all grasping and rejection. You must begin with a method, but at some point you must let it go. Likewise, you should not hold on to any experiences that may come up. When the method and experiences are no longer necessary to you, you will have returned to the source. This source, or Buddha nature, is the lively manifestation of great liberation and great wisdom. In great liberation, there is nothing left. But this is not the same as "stubborn emptiness." Liberation goes beyond both emptiness and form.

The previous emptiness is transformed;
It was all a product of deluded views.

Practitioners often go from attachment to existence, to attachment to emptiness. If one thinks that emptiness is true wisdom or liberation, under this delusion, one cannot attain the ultimate. It is natural for people to become attached to their experiences. One student who sat very well last night tried to repeat the experience today by recalling exactly what he did that resulted in that great sitting. But today the sitting went very poorly. This was due to his greed for the experience.

No need to seek the real;
Just extinguish your views.

We should not seek Buddha nature or enlightenment; rather, we should let it come about naturally. Such questions as "When will I get enlightened?" or "Is there a Buddha nature?" will take you even farther away from Buddha nature, which is a totality and not something you can grasp. Buddha nature is in the totality of your own self. Why should it be necessary to try to attain it? And how can you get hold of it? Don't practice with the thought of reaching Buddhahood, just put forth your best efforts.

* * * * * * * *

6

Giving Up Expectations

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Do not abide in dualistic views;
Take care not to seek after them.
As soon as there is right and wrong
The mind is scattered and lost.

Dualistic views refer to the discriminating mind. They include any doubts about the correctness of your method, or whether your decision to attend this retreat was a right or a wrong one. If you lack faith, you will doubt the method you are using. On the other hand, if your confidence is too strong, then you will be expecting something out of the practice. Neither extreme is beneficial.

To come to a retreat merely out of curiosity shows a lack of faith in yourself and in the practice; it would be impossible for you to get good results. From the very beginning you are denying yourself the possibility of doing well on retreat. At the same time, you may harbor certain resentments: you may get annoyed at the people around you, or even at your own body when your legs cause you pain. You may be critical of the food, or the style of the retreat.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Having too much faith in yourself is likewise a problem. Someone who was extremely confident came to one retreat. He was highly intelligent, and a top student. He thought: "If a person like me cannot get enlightened, then who can?" After one day of practice, his back ached, his legs hurt, and he began to question if this was the way to get enlightened. One evening in the Ch'an hall, he heard me say, "If you can do it, sit through the night." He concluded that in order to get enlightened, he should forgo sleep. By midnight his eyes were heavy, but he forced himself to continue sitting. After three days of this, he was totally exhausted and he said to me, "Now I have some idea of this enlightenment you are talking about. Basically you just have to go without sleep."

Practice is like cooking rice. If you use a gentle flame the rice will be perfect and easy to digest, whereas with a high flame, it will burn before it is done. One should practice with a very relaxed attitude. If you do not abide in duality, neither having too much nor too little confidence, then what should you do? You have not come here to get enlightened, but to practice. It is not important whether you have a good grasp of the matter and can enter the practice deeply or not. Just do not have any doubts about the method or whether you have the "right stuff" to practice. Do not underestimate yourself. If others can practice, then at least you can try.

Once a student who did well on her first retreat came a second time. At first everything went fine, but then a problem arose. While sitting it occurred to her that counting the breath was really boring. If she spent her time reciting the name of the Buddha, she thought, then at least she would be accumulating merit. But what was the use of counting from one to ten? Towards evening she said to me, "Shih-fu, I don't want to stay on this retreat.

One-two-three-four-five-six-seven-eight-nine-ten. Even a kid in kindergarten can do that. Why should I waste my time here?" When your mind strays from the method, problems will appear. In fact, the method is inherently meaningless. It is irrelevant to discuss whether it brings merit or not. The purpose of a method is to train your mind. You can raise the same objection about prostrating to the Buddha, or morning and evening chanting. Why should practice take these forms?

People often wonder: If Ch'an is a method of sudden enlightenment which does not depend on meditation, then why do we practice meditation and go on seven-day retreats? If someone objects that these things are unrelated to Ch'an, I say that if you want to study Ch'an I will instruct you in exactly these methods. In order to practice, you must believe in your teacher and in his methods. If you search for methods on your own, you may not find anything and eventually give up practicing. Or you may find something weird and end up in a demonic state, with mental and physical problems.

Someone once said to me, "I only believe in ancient Ch'an." I asked, "What do you mean by `ancient Ch'an'?" He replied, "Whereas the so-called Ch'an masters of today teach people to meditate, ancient Ch'an does not require any practice. My enlightenment experience came from the ancient, direct method, without any practice. I have been to many masters looking for one who would confirm my experience. Unfortunately, I have been unsuccessful so far." He was not actually interested in studying with a master, but in obtaining the credentials to spread the Dharma on his own. After a brief conversation, I realized that this person was not quite straight in his mind, and said to him, "I am not enlightened myself, so how can I tell whether you are enlightened or not?" He said, "Strange. If you say you are not enlightened, then how can you teach Ch'an?" I said, "I may not be enlightened myself, but I can teach others to get enlightened. For example, it is not necessary for a cardiologist to have heart problems to treat others successfully." He said, "In that case, am I capable of teaching Ch'an to others?" I replied, "Since I don't know anything about you I can't answer that question."

Meditation should just be a part of life. If you have other motivations, it will lead to problems. When you approach the practice with any expectations, you will not be able to sit well. Not only should you not have any expectations of getting enlightened or becoming a Ch'an master, but you should not even expect to be free from your pain. Do not hope that your legs or back will stop hurting. Do not try to overcome the pain as if you had to burst through a barrier. Simply accept the pain. You may not feel very happy about it, but at least do not resent it. If you cannot accept it, then ignore it and turn your mind to the method. When the pain becomes too great to ignore, place your attention on the pain itself. Disassociate yourself from the part of your body that is painful. Let it ache away. If you can take this attitude, eventually it will go away. When you really get into the practice, all bodily sensation will disappear.

The important thing is not to have any resentment against your suffering, or any expectations of happiness. As soon as ideas such as suffering versus happiness arise, your mind will already be straying from the method, caught up in duality.

You are all aware that this Center is not an ideal environment for practice. The neighbors hammer against the walls. Outside there is a continual stream of traffic and airplanes passing overhead. Yet even in the midst of this noisy and crowded world we are given a small area to practice. So we should not let our minds be distracted by what is going on outside or by what comes in contact with our senses.

On retreat you are living with many people which may create an uncomfortable environment. You don't feel free or find it as convenient as at home. On the other hand, the presence of others will encourage, almost force you to practice. Even if you are not practicing energetically, at least you will make an effort to appear to be practicing. When people sit together, they can be of great benefit to each other. Whether you practice well or not, treasure this rare opportunity and do your best.

* * * * * * * *

7

Beyond One Mind

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Two comes from one,
Yet do not even keep the one.
When one mind does not arise,
Myriad dharmas are without defect.

In yesterday's talk I cautioned against abiding in duality. Although we should not abide in duality, we still must hold on to the method. Method is that which helps us to unify our minds, to replace the constant stream of scattered thoughts. After the mind is concentrated by the method, we eventually reach a point where the method itself disappears and the mind is one. Today someone said during the interview, "I have been practicing for quite a few years but I have never had the experience of forgetting my body, or my method disappearing." I said, "You should not be too anxious about it. Just proceed naturally." The state of one mind has to come about naturally. Naturally, the method will leave you behind; it is not for you to think of leaving the method behind. The state of one mind is not easy to attain. But today I will go one step further and say that even the one mind has to be transcended and left behind.

In the Avatamsaka Sutra there are the following two lines: "With no exception everything comes from the Dharma Realm. With no exception everything will return to the Dharma Realm." Everything is generated by the one and will eventually return to the one. This concept can be found in both oriental and western philosophy. But in Buddha Dharma even that state is not good enough.

A disciple of Chao-Chou once asked his master, "If the myriad dharmas [1] return to one, to what does the one return?" Chao-Chou answered, "In Ch'ing-chou I had a robe made, weighing seven pounds."

To be attached to the one can either take the form of pure materialism
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

or monotheism. But in the course of practice it is necessary to first get to the one. It is only then that you realize that even this one is not ultimate. It is still on a worldly level. Only when you can transcend this unified state will you reach genuine Buddha Dharma.

You begin by concentrating the scattered mind. To say that the mind is concentrated does not mean that it is in a unified state, because there is still a distinction between subject and object, between you and the method. But when the method drops away, your mind will be very clear, without any thoughts, and you are left only with a sense of your own existence. This is the state of one mind, also called samadhi. However, this is only an elementary level of samadhi, and if you continue on the same course you can get into ever-deepening samadhi states. However, Ch'an practitioners do not dwell in samadhi, but attempt to drop even that state of one mind.

Today a student mentioned that when he sits he very often enters a very comfortable, enjoyable state. This type of sensation is really an expression of desire. As long as a person is attached to a desire for bodily or mental pleasure of any kind, there is no hope of entering into one mind. This is because your mind is divided into two, or even three: a sense of your self, of your body, and of the pleasure. If a pleasurable sensation arises while sitting, you should remain aloof from it. Yet this experience is not completely useless, because it at least motivates you to continue practicing and to attend retreats.

Indeed, an enjoyable meditation experience can exceed the pleasure that derives from food or sex. But as soon as you reach this stage, leave it behind.

Another term for one mind is "great self," because although the mind is enormously expanded, there is still a sense of self-centeredness, or "I." So long as you are attached to "I," there can be no liberation. If you feel that you are abiding in a state of "perfection," or think of yourself as a perfect master, this is at best the great self.

Thus there are two meanings of "one" referred to in this line: "Yet do not even keep the one." The first is samadhi and the second is the great self. These are the highest states that can be attained from the practice of worldly dharma. From the point of view of Ch'an, even though a person may reach samadhi or the great self, he will still be in samsara, the cycle of birth and death. The liberation that he feels is only transitory; it is not ultimate liberation. But "When one mind does not arise, myriad dharmas are without defect." That is to say, a person in the state of one mind is still subject to problems, but when he loses even that one mind nothing can cause him any trouble.

One thing should be clarified here. In the state of one mind, there are no vexations. Trouble can only develop in a state of discrimination. As long as you stay in a state of one mind, nothing can bother, tempt, or excite you. The problem with one mind is that it cannot last forever; inevitably, a thought will arise, and it will evolve into two, three, and many. The state of one can only be considered in relation to two. A true totality would not even be considered "one"; it can only be called "nothing." It is only when a distinction is made that the one can exist at all, and in that case it will lead to two. You can only feel lonely when you are aware of the possible existence of another person. In complete totality, there is no sense of loneliness.

> Without defect, without dharmas,
> No arising, no mind.

No mind, or Ch'an, is a state of non-arising and non-perishing. Not a single thought will arise, and even that unmoving mind fundamentally does not exist. There is nothing that can give you trouble, and nothing that you can give trouble to.

Both our body and mind need food to survive. There are two types of food for the body: nutrition and contact. "Contact food" includes the sensation of touching another person, and the feeling of changing into clean clothes after a shower. There is another kind of food for the mind, called "consciousness food," which satisfies the ordinary minds' hunger for experience and phenomena. If you can leave the first two kinds of food, you will be outside of the desire realm. But beyond the desire realm, there are the form realm and the formless realm. To go beyond them, you have to free yourself from the food of consciousness.

In the state of one mind, where only consciousness exists, you may have transcended the desire realm but are still in samsara. Only when you are free from all three types of food will you enter no mind, and be outside samsaric realms.

* * *

Note
~~~~

[1] dharma: a "thing" or "object," a physical or mental phenomenon. Capitalized, Dharma refers to the Buddhist "Law" or "teaching."

* * * * * * * *

8

Illusions
~~~~~~~~~

The subject is extinguished with the object.
The object sinks away with the subject.

The mind dharma cannot arise by itself or function alone. It always co-exists with the form dharma. The Zen expression "one hand clapping" illustrates the impossibility of such a thing. The mind can only be found in the realm of mental objects.

Once Master Nan-Ch'uan went to the farm of the monastery where he was abbot. The previous night, a local earth deity informed the farmers of Nan-Ch'uan's impending visit, so they had prepared a welcome feast. He asked them, "How did you know I was coming?" They answered, "Last night the earth deity told us you were coming today." Upon hearing this, the master said, "I am really very ashamed. My practice must be quite poor that even deities manage to peep into my mind." He meant that when he thought of going to the farm, the mind dharma had arisen in conjunction with the form dharma, or the concrete idea of the farm. When his mind moved, the deity was able to see it.

The same master was meditating in a hut next to a river. One night he heard two ghosts conversing. One of them was rejoicing that his term was coming to an end because the next day someone would be replacing him. The second ghost asked, "Who will be replacing you?" He replied, "A man wearing an iron hat." The master wondered to himself who this person could be. The next day there was heavy rain and the river rose to a higher level. The master looked out of his hut and saw a man about to cross the river. He had covered his head with a wok for protection against the rain. Immediately, the master knew that this was the man of the iron hat, so he cautioned him saying, "Don't cross the river today. It's too dangerous." The man asked, "Why?" "Because the water is very deep and running rapidly." The man listened to the old monk's advice and returned home.

You must understand that in Chinese lore, water ghosts are prisoners until another person drowns and takes their place. That night as he was meditating, the master heard the two ghosts again. This time the first ghost was complaining, "I have been stuck here for so many years, and I thought my chance for freedom had finally come. But now the old monk interfered and messed everything up. I'll show him what I can do." With that, the ghost broke a hole in the bank of the river, so that the water would run down and cover the hut. The master realized that the ghost was trying to drown him. Suddenly he disappeared from sight. The ghost looked around, but the hut was empty.

Actually, the master was still there and heard the ghost very clearly. He was invisible for the simple reason that his mind was not moving. It was not influenced by the environment, no longer tied to mental objects, which are shadows of the mind.

All of our thoughts are illusory; they depend on certain objects or symbols. If there are no objects, forms or symbols in your mind, there would be no illusory thoughts. It is possible, however, to have an illusory thought that is considered "right thought" if you maintain this one thought continually without interference. For instance, counting the breath is in itself an illusory thought, but if you maintain it without a break it would be the right thought, the method of your practice.

On the other hand, if your thoughts are constantly changing, they would be considered "wandering thoughts" rather than "right thought." But both of these situations are not the pure mind because your mind is still attached to mental realms. It is not the state of no mind; it is not even the state of one mind. With these mental objects in your mind it would be difficult to control your next birth at the time of death. Instead, where you go will be directed by the thrust of your karma. Karma leads you in the direction of your strongest desire or attachment. Thus your mind follows the mental realm that you are most attracted to. If your mind is free from the environment, not bounded by mental realms, then your next birth will not be dictated by karma but rather by your own decision. Being free to go wherever you wish, you are outside of the cycle of birth and death.

So long as your mind is filled with greed, hatred, or ignorance, you will be immersed in vexation and suffering. You will not even be reborn in the heavens, not to mention be liberated from birth and death. Heavenly states can only be attained by performing meritorious deeds with a minimum of desire. And you could not reach one mind, or samadhi, because of your strong attachment to certain objects.

Thus when you are practicing, all thoughts other than the method should be considered as demons, even if it feels like you have entered a "heavenly" state. Some people, as they are sitting, may suddenly enter a completely new world which is very beautiful and comfortable. Afterwards, they want to return to it in each meditation. They may be able to get into that state again, but nonetheless it is an attachment.

There are also other states that are terrifying. Such visions, good and bad, are generally manifestations of our own mental realms.

Now we can understand why the methods of kung-an and hua-t'ou are different than counting the breath, reciting the Buddha's name, or repeating a mantra. Though the latter are necessary in the beginning, they include relative objects (i.e. the breath, the Buddha's name, or the mantra). In these cases, the objects make up your mental realm. And where there is an object there must be a subject, namely, the self. But kung-an and hua-t'ou are objectless methods of practice. Other than the method, there is nothing in front of you. For example, the question "What is wu?" [1] does not have an answer you can grasp. There is nothing behind the question. You are just using it as a method to practice. If there is no object, then what about a subject? When you enter deeply into this method, even though you may not be enlightened, you will not have any sense of self. Your entire self will be enclosed in a great mass of doubt. No ghosts or deities would be able to find you.

* * *

Note
~~~~

[1] "What is wu?": (wu=Chinese, "nothing" or "there is not"; in Japanese, mu). Hua-t'ou based on the kung-an in which Master Chao-Chou was asked by a monk, "Does a dog have buddha nature?", to which Chao-Chou replied, "Wu." Alteratively practiced by just looking into the word wu/mu.

* * * * * * * *
~~~~

Awareness of Vexations

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Object is object because of the subject;
Subject is subject because of the object.
Know that the two
Are originally one emptiness.
In one emptiness the two are the same,
Containing all phenomena.

These lines describe a non-discriminating mind in which, nevertheless, there is perfectly clear discrimination.

In the course of practice, the more negative things you discover about yourself, the clearer you will be as to the road you should walk. After leaving mainland China, I was conscripted into the Nationalist army in Taiwan. At that time, everything was in a state of confusion and the troops were crowded together in a warehouse. In this warehouse there were no windows or lights, and at night people couldn't see their way to the toilet so many just relieved themselves where they were. Others who decided to feel their way outside ended up stepping on the mess in the dark. However, at daybreak one could see the shit very clearly and avoid it. It was a mistake to imagine that just because you couldn't see it, there was no shit on the floor.

Those who have never taken up the practice are like the people in that dark room. No matter where they walk, they step into shit. Coming to retreat is like putting a light into the room. Maybe the light will only stay on for a minute, but at least you can see some of the problem areas. Gradually, you will be able to tell exactly where the shit is and where it isn't. The more you know, the less likely you will step in it. But to get angry when you discover problems would just be adding trouble to trouble. It would be as if, after realizing you stepped on some shit, you did it again just to punish yourself. Retreats are like road repair. When there is a problem underneath the road, the workers break up the pavement in order to fix the cables, pipes, or whatever is faulty. After they finish the work, they pave over it again and everything is just as it was before. Likewise, in order to make our own repairs, we have to break up the road and mess things up temporarily. Thus discovering one's problems in the course of practice is very useful, but do these problems actually exist?
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Yes, the miseries of the retreat are quite real. You are truly tired and uncomfortable. You are definitely in this place and not some other. Yet you must look at non-existence from the point of view of existence. When you can't concentrate on the method, when you haven't gotten enough sleep, and when your legs are painful, it is all really happening. But originally your legs were not painful. It was only after you started sitting that they became painful. If you stretch out your legs they will no longer be painful. Thus when you experience pain you should keep in mind that it doesn't have a true existence. If it did, it would be there even when you were not meditating.

Though some of you have trouble concentrating, it cannot be that during the entire retreat there has not been at least once when you could concentrate to some extent. If you can use your method even for a very short time, that already lets you know that your scattered mind does not have true existence. Do not be fearful when your mind is scattered; just recognize that it is temporary. But when you succeed in concentrating, is that mind real? Of course not. If the mind were truly concentrated, it could not become scattered again. Now if both the scattered mind and the concentrated mind are unreal, that means there is originally no mind. If this is so, it should be very easy to progress in the practice. To be aware that mind does not exist will strengthen your faith, even though you have not experienced no mind. So long as you have faith in the non-existence of mind you can keep on practicing without any anxiety or disappointment.

A small setback does not mean that you have failed; it is just that the time has not yet arrived. If you climb half-way up a mountain, you cannot say that you have failed. You just need to continue climbing until you reach the summit. One time I was in a car with a few people, driving up a mountain. After two hours, I asked the driver, "What's going on? We don't seem to be getting anywhere on this mountain." He said, "Actually, we have reached the top. It was a very flat, gradual rise."

Now let us look at existence from the point of view of emptiness. For example, a monk cannot say that women do not exist just because he does not have relationships with them. There is a story I often tell from the kung-ans. A monk who was practicing Ch'an was being supported by an old woman, who provided him with a hut and daily offerings of food. One day she decided to test his practice. She told her beautiful daughter to bring the monk his food, and then embrace him. The next day, the old woman asked the monk, "How did you find my daughter?" He replied, "Like dry wood leaning against a cold rock." With that, she grabbed a broom and shooed him away, saying, "All this time I thought you were a man of Ch'an!"

Although this monk had reached a deep level of practice, he had not yet realized Ch'an. Being attached to emptiness, he denied existence. During a retreat, you can enter a state where you do not taste your food or know where you are walking. You do not recognize the person you are looking at. In this condition, your body follows the normal routine, but your mind is totally absorbed in the method. You have entered the great doubt sensation.

Prior to this, when your mind is still scattered, I tell you to concentrate carefully on whatever you are doing, and to maintain a total awareness of every action. When you are completely focused, you may slip into the next stage, where you lose awareness of your body, even as it continues to function smoothly and automatically. The third level is a return to total awareness. However, unlike the first level, there are no scattered thoughts whatsoever. When you are eating, you are just eating. When you are sleeping, you are just sleeping. No more, no less.

Originally you had to work very hard on your method, but when you get to the second level, everything flows naturally. The practice just keeps moving like a ball rolling down a hill. At that time, even though you are practicing very well, you would not think of yourself as practicing. This is called the true existence of emptiness. That is to say, you feel that nothing exists, but your mind is really there, working on the method. The experience of one's method and body disappearing can be due to two factors. On the one hand, one can slip into a kind of nebulous state out of pure laziness. On the other hand, a person using the method very well is just like someone so accustomed to riding a horse that they forget the horse beneath them. This is a good phenomenon.

A person who has arrived at enlightened mind is looking at existence from the standpoint of emptiness. Once a Ch'an master was asked by his disciple, "If many calamities were to appear before you at once, what would you do?" The master answered, "Red is not white and green is not yellow. Whatever it is, that's what it is." But isn't seeing whatever a thing is how everybody sees things all the time?

During the Sung Dynasty, China was invaded by the Mongols. When a band of warriors descended on a certain town, everyone fled, including the soldiers and the monks in the temples. When the Mongols entered the gates, they found that one Ch'an master had remained. Thinking that he stayed behind as part of a plot, they brought him before their general. When asked why he did not flee, he said, "Everybody has to die sometime. I could die here. I could die there. Why should I flee?" The general asked, "You are not afraid of death?" The monk replied, "I would not say that I am hoping to die. But if my time has come, then that's that." The general said, "I'm going to kill you." The monk replied, "All right. But I want to tell you something first. Don't think that you are killing me. Is your sword capable of killing wind or water? If you slice into water, you just separate it for an instant and then it comes together again. If you cut off my head, you just separate it from my body, but your killing me is your own business. It has nothing to do with me, because I neither desire nor fear death." That is to say, after enlightenment everything exists, but not the self.

We have talked of emptiness from the point of view of existence and existence from the point of view of emptiness. Both existence and emptiness are existing and non-existing. Do you understand? Don't worry if you don't. If you truly grasp the meaning, you are already enlightened.

* * * * * * * *

10

Making Comparisons

Not seeing fine or coarse,
How can there be any bias?

"Fine or coarse" refers to the deepness or shallowness of practice. I have often cautioned you against comparing your practice with that of others or your own self at different times. Such comparisons are only subjective. Today someone burst out crying in the meditation hall. One person may have thought, "Oh, she's not doing so well." Another, "I think she's becoming enlightened!" Or else, "Maybe she's going crazy." None of these thoughts may represent the true situation. Whether she felt pain or sorrow, became enlightened, or went crazy, it's her business. It has nothing to do with anyone else. Making comparisons inevitably means judging others.

When you are sitting, refrain from looking around and sizing people up. A common type of comparison people make on retreat is to see someone sitting through three periods and think, "How can he do that? Don't his legs hurt? Boy! My legs hurt all the time. I can barely get through one period." Sometime later, the person does move a little and they say to themselves, "Ha! Probably his legs are hurting now. So he's not so special after all."

These are examples of comparing yourself to others, but you can also compare yourself to yourself. Perhaps you are having a miserable time from day one. Your legs hurt, you are generally uncomfortable and cannot get into the spirit of practice. You feel plagued with problems, but there comes a day when suddenly you feel great. Your body is comfortable and your mind is calm. You are pleased by this change of affairs and say to yourself, "I finally got it." You have become so excited, you can no longer meditate. Later when your meditation is not as pleasurable, you may try to analyze how you sat so well that one time and why you are so uncomfortable now.

Comparing good and bad is just deluded thinking. As long as you are immersed in these wandering thoughts, you will not enter the proper conditions for practice. Do not concern yourself with anything going on around you. Nor should you be concerned with anything going on inside yourself. Focus fully on the method and do not make external or internal comparisons. If you can do that, your practice will be effective.

On the first night, I said that you must begin by isolating yourself. There are four stages of progressive isolation. First, isolate yourself from your affairs outside the retreat. Next, ignore the environment within the retreat itself. As far as you are concerned, you are the only person here. Take another step further and put aside all thoughts of the past and future. Finally, forget the thought that has just passed or the thought to come. Narrow yourself down to the thought of the present moment. You are reduced to a tiny, tiny point, which is concentrated on the method. Even so, a demon can come and grab you, because you still have that miniscule point left. But if you can continue to focus on the method single-mindedly, it will be easy for you to depart from even that one thought.

No matter how disturbing your surroundings or your inner mind, you should take clear note of it and avoid feeling any aversion. Any feelings of good or bad regarding the environment or ourselves are actually projections of our own deep-seated emotional attachments. Events and things have no intrinsic good or evil qualities.

For instance, this incense board is just a piece of wood. There is nothing good or bad about it, but when an inexperienced monitor hits someone in the wrong place -- say, the neck or shoulder blade -- the person may react to the board in a negative way. The monitor may also blame the incense board for being awkward to use. But someone who is hit by an adept monitor will feel very good and consider the board a great help. Likewise, the monitor may think that this is a particularly good incense board since it is easy to wield.

Today I cut my finger trying to open a stuck window. I may have thought that something was wrong with the window, but the window is an inert object. It is not its fault that I hurt my finger. Perhaps I should blame my hand instead, but a hand is only flesh and bone. When flesh and bone are applied to a window, there is nothing in that event itself that can be called good or bad.

The enlightened individual does not see things as bad, good, coarse or fine. There are no good or bad people in the world. Someone may think, "If a good person is the same as a bad person, wouldn't this create a lot of confusion?" This problem does not arise for one who is deeply enlightened. In the past, those who attained great enlightenment had strong hearts of compassion. They dedicated the remainder of their lives to saving other living beings. Sakyamuni Buddha himself devoted forty-odd years to teaching and saving sentient beings. It is not that the Buddha wants to save sentient beings. It is just that sentient beings need to be saved. Whether or not he saves particular beings is not up to him, but up to the beings themselves. If there are beings that are capable of being saved, then the Buddha saves them. If there are those who are too difficult to save, then he does not save them. He does not blame them for being too difficult to save, nor does he condemn them to hell. This is not the attitude of the Buddha or the patriarchs.

The Buddha's response to sentient beings can be likened to a mirror. In itself, a mirror contains no image or particular characteristic. It merely reflects whatever you put in front of it, as it is, without hindrance. Likewise, the Buddha teaches people according to their differing requirements. If someone needs a demon, a demon will appear; if they need the Buddha, then the Buddha will appear; if someone needs Ch'an practice, then Ch'an methods appear. The Buddha does not conceive these things and try to push them on others. Rather, his compassionate response is just an automatic reflection of a person's own mind.

This is why there are various levels in Buddhism. It is a recognition of the many different capacities of sentient beings. Whatever an individual's tendency, they can find a level of the teachings that is right for them.

One who is really involved in the practice becomes like a mirror, without discrimination or biases. When you reach the point where the method disappears and even you disappear, your mind will be a mirror -- containing nothing, reflecting perfectly.

> The Great Way is broad,
> Neither easy nor difficult.

The purpose of using Ch'an methods in training students is to sweep away any attachments that remain in their minds. If they desire to attain Buddhahood, the master may say, "There is no Buddha." No doubt, it is necessary to have a certain attachment to the method, to gain some result, such as samadhi or enlightenment. But when your mind is a steady stream, uninterrupted by extraneous thoughts, the Ch'an master will push you to let go of the idea of practice, to break your attachment to striving for an end.

There are a few stories of Ch'an patriarchs and their students which illustrate this. One student went up to his teacher and said, "I want to practice to attain the Way." The teacher said, "There is no Way to be attained by practice." Another student declared, "I want to attain liberation." His teacher replied, "Who is holding you back?" There was a student who said, "I have heard it said that Sakyamuni Buddha left home, practiced for many years, and attained enlightenment." His teacher commented, "Hah. What a pity. If I had seen him, I would have given him a good beating and thrown him to the dogs."

You may think that these teachers are destroying Buddhism by making such statements. But actually they are working to remove even the slightest attachment in the student's mind. When a person really understands what it is to have a mind free of discrimination, he can be considered capable of practice. To reach this point, faith is of the utmost importance. Some may think, "Sakyamuni Buddha and the patriarchs left the home life and cultivated for many years before they attained enlightenment. As for me, I don't think I'm up to becoming a monk (or a nun.) So what's the use of practicing?" If you consider practice to be difficult and painful, then practice is difficult and painful. But if you consider it easy, then it's very easy. Practice itself is neither difficult nor easy. As I said before, there is nothing inherently good or bad in events themselves. Discriminations of good and bad, difficult and easy, are in our own minds and have nothing to do with the phenomenon itself.

Someone asked me how you can be concerned about alleviating suffering if you hold the concept that there is nothing really good or bad. An illustration I gave previously may explain it. While you are sitting, your leg becomes painful. But as soon as you stretch it out, the pain goes away. There is no question that it hurts, but the pain is not real because it does not endure. It is capable of changing and disappearing. It is the same with good and bad. They are subject to change. Bad can become good. That bad exists is only a particular way of seeing and dealing with things. Pain is still pain, but what is important is your understanding of its nature. From that perspective, you can learn to alleviate your own suffering. When it comes to seeing the suffering of others, you can reflect on your own experience. Even though you tell yourself that suffering is empty, you still feel pain. Likewise, in teaching others, even though you may say that suffering is non-existent, you cannot deny their experience of suffering. As far as they are concerned, pain is direct and real. Thus, from the perspective that suffering is unreal, you still respond to that unreal experience. You strive out of compassion to alleviate the suffering of others.

There are two ways of understanding that practice is neither difficult nor easy. A beginning practitioner can only understand it intellectually. He may believe that practice is neither difficult nor easy, but this is quite different from knowing directly through experience that difficulties are just fabricated by the mind. There is nothing difficult about practice itself. The individuals themselves bring difficulty to the practice. During retreat, one person may find practice extremely difficult, and another may find it easy. It can even be different for the same person at different times. It has to do with our mental attitude, or the way we approach it.

People respond to difficulty in different ways. Some people become so overwhelmed by troubles in their practice, they end up without any discrimination, letting go of their hopes as well as their despair. As a result, the instant they turn their minds towards practice, they get a good result. Although this may happen, it is not the case that everybody needs to go through the same kind of process. In fact, when some people encounter trouble, it does not reinforce their practice at all. On the contrary, they are unable to practice. Their minds are filled with thoughts of misery and a sense of failure.

You should have faith that every method is a good method and every individual is good practitioner. After all, if you are not a good practitioner, why are you still here after five days?

* * * * * * * *

11

Anxiety
~~~~~~~
~~~~~~~

With narrow views and doubts,
Haste will slow you down.

Those who take up the study of Buddhism before their views have expanded are subject to fears and doubts. They doubt the method and whether they can reach their objective. Like those who have narrow views and only see what is in front of their eyes, it is a shallow and limited perspective.

This is a common problem on retreat. Everyone should believe that even if they cannot become enlightened this time, they can do so in the future, either in this lifetime or the next. Do you have faith that your method can lead you to enlightenment? Or do you think that it is just the beginning, that later you will learn more advanced methods? Do you believe that Ch'an practice is reliable? Some people may think: "I just came here to take a look. Later, there will be things to learn in other places."

Over the years I have met many people who lack faith. Because of this they reach a certain point and cannot go any further. They may have a partial faith. They may have confidence in themselves but do not trust the method. Or they have faith in the method but do not entirely trust the teacher. Some people may trust the teacher but doubt what levels can actually be reached with Ch'an. This mixture of faith and doubt prevents them from having a deep experience.

Of course, if there were no sense of doubt in the beginning, you would not be motivated to practice. After practicing diligently, you will gradually resolve the problem of doubt. It all depends on your karmic roots. When those with deep karmic roots come in contact with the teachings of Ch'an, they quickly accept them.

But those with shallow roots have obstacles which prevent them from believing in themselves, the method, or the teacher. The first requirement of Ch'an is faith. You should believe that you are the ones with deep karmic roots; otherwise, why would you have come to this Ch'an retreat? Compared to the multitude of people in the world, those who can undergo Ch'an training are very few.

Perhaps you still do not believe in yourself, the method, or what I am talking about. But, beginning now, I hope you will start having faith. It does not matter if you are not enlightened yet. Just like a blind person being guided by someone who sees, a person who is not enlightened can borrow a teacher's guidance and experience. It does not matter if you started out with narrow views, as long as you can emerge from them. When you try to understand or judge matters that are beyond your background and experience, it is natural to have some doubts. Use a mind of faith to cure your doubts. It is very important to give rise to a great faith to achieve results. You should have complete faith in what I am teaching. As to the environment, it does not matter whether this is the ideal place to practice.

But the sooner you want to get results, the longer it will take to get anywhere. Once someone was driving me to an appointment. Since he wanted to get me there as quickly as possible, he decided to take a short cut. Though the road was shorter, it turned out that the traffic was heavier than on the normal route. Another case was a person who was required to take the English equivalency exam in order to apply for a U.S. visa. She thought of a quick method: Before she actually wrote anything down, she would first skim through the entire test to weed out the answers she did not understand. But by the time she went through this first reading, the time was up and nothing was on the answer sheet.

It is the same with practice. If you keep asking yourself, "When am I going to get enlightened?" you will always be in that state of mind and never get anywhere. It is the same when you have trouble getting to sleep and you look at the other people sleeping soundly around you. If you become anxious and keep worrying, "Why can't I sleep? Let me sleep!" you will never get to sleep.

The more you want benefits from Ch'an, the further you will be from obtaining them. In fact, you will only increase your vexations. You may be a highly intelligent person who works very hard and has good karmic roots. But if you are anxious to get enlightened, you have created a barrier between yourself and enlightenment. A tree should be watered very gradually as it is growing. Do not be in a hurry to eat the fruit.

Consider the story about an inexperienced farmer who planted a field of rice. After the crop sprouted, he kept going out to look at it and saying, "Why isn't it growing any faster?" Then he thought of an idea to help it grow. He pulled each stalk out a little taller. The next day he said, "I think I'll go out and help them again." But when he surveyed the field, all the shoots had died.

There is a Chinese saying: "You can't dig a well with one scoop." Another one is: "You can't eat a cake in one bite." It is better for the digestion to chew food until very fine before swallowing. It is the same with practice. Don't try to swallow your practice in one gulp; chew it patiently. You have to be careful and meticulous.

> Attach to it and you lose the measure;
> The mind will enter a deviant path.

When you grasp onto something, find a happy medium. For example, if you grasp the incense board too tightly, you will hurt the person you are hitting, and may even break the board. But if you hold it too loosely, you cannot aim accurately. You have to hold it just right -- not too tight, not too loose. In any activity, you have to find just the right way to do it. This is difficult to accomplish without practice.

I constantly tell people on retreat to relax -- mentally and physically. But some people do not know how to do this. Others are too relaxed. As soon as they sit down, they slump over. You cannot practice this way.

Even though your mind is relaxed, you should hold tightly onto the method. Stick to the method and do not let it go. But sometimes people take this advice and become nervous and tense. For instance, in counting the breath, some may become so intent on holding to the method that they end up holding onto the breath itself, thus breathing unnaturally. Or they try to get rid of stray thoughts by counting and breathing faster and faster. This tenses the body. You should hold tight to the method, but at the same time you should not let yourself get tense. To illustrate this, suppose you are walking along a road and it starts bearing to the right. If you keep to a one-track frame of mind of just sticking to the present thought, you will not allow for the bend in the road and walk straight ahead into a tree.

Once I gave someone the hua-t'ou "What is wu?" I told her to keep her mind on this one thought, moment to moment, to never leave this question. After a while, her mind jumped to something else, and it became, "I am wu." Rather than correcting herself, she thought, "Shih-fu told me to stay on the present thought." She kept repeating the statement, "I am wu." Finally, she said to me, "There's really no point in this. I already know the answer. There is nothing." (The literal meaning of wu is "nothingness.")

When I tell you to hold onto the method, it does not mean to grasp it blindly. Sometimes you have to adjust. I am teaching one method but everyone is unique. Their background, physique, age, experience, are all different. If you just take what I say literally, it could be that you heard it wrong, or that you start practicing it wrong. Therefore, you cannot go by that entirely. You have to test it out by experience. You must be aware of what is going on. If your breath is not flowing smoothly, that should be a signal that you are not practicing correctly. Ask me about it. There was a student who was sitting in the "correct" posture, but his backside became very painful. He was putting too much pressure on his tailbone. I advised him to lean slightly forward and straighten his back so that this bone would not touch the cushion. If you come across a problem like this, you should not continue on in pain because you think that you are doing as I instructed. Of course I would not teach you something that causes you pain. You just sometimes have to make your own adjustments.

* * * * * * * *

12

Being Natural

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Let it go and be spontaneous,
Experience no going or staying.
Accord with your nature, unite with the Way,
Wander at ease, without vexation.

The most important thing in practice is to be natural and spontaneous. Being natural does not mean neglecting everything. It requires careful attention. In meditation, you should sit in a natural posture and use your mind in a natural way. Sitting in a natural posture means sitting just right. If you are comfortable when you first assume the sitting posture, even if pains develop in your legs later on, that is still natural. It is unnatural, however, to sit bent over or leaning to one side, or with your head tipped back. A natural posture should follow the demands of your physiology. It is not natural to tighten your stomach muscles or to straighten your back by protruding your chest. To use your mind in a natural way means to avoid trying to control it. The more you try to control your mind, the more stray thoughts will come up to bother you. In fact, the very fear of stray thoughts is another stray thought. Therefore, if you have many stray thoughts, consider it a natural phenomenon and do not despise them. But on the other hand, if you completely give in to a train of wandering thoughts, that is not correct either. What is the best approach? Pay close attention to the method. If you do that, stray thoughts will be kept to a minimum. It is not that they will not arise, but you will not worry about them. If you are really paying attention to the method, you will be aware of a stray thought as soon as it arises. When it comes up, just let it go. Do not be afraid that another thought may follow it. That fear is an extra stray thought. It is just like a person who is carrying a stack of bowls. If someone says to him, "Be careful! You're going to drop them!" he will drop them. But if nobody says anything, he will just keep going.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Do not fear failure. Whatever happened in the past is past; do not worry about it happening again. Before you meet with success, failure is natural and necessary. As a baby learns to walk, it keeps falling down. Is this failure? Throughout our life we go through similar processes: going to school, pursuing a career, practicing Ch'an. After my first book, someone said to me, "Now you're a success." I said, "No. That book was a failure. I would write it much better if I had to do it again." It is the same with practice; there is never a successful conclusion. When you are working hard, failure is natural. If you have never failed, you have never tried.

On the other hand, you should not have a defeatist attitude, thinking: "As long as I'm going to fail, let me fail." According to Buddhism, nothing can be a perfect, unqualified success. If you are elected president of the United States, would that be a success? Later on, you would most likely be criticized as a failure. Even President Lincoln would probably consider himself a failure. This is natural. It is when you do not feel successful that you put in the effort. When you no longer need to make an effort, that is true success, or liberation. At that point, there are no more vexations. Nevertheless, you have neither thrown away vexations nor grasped liberation. If you want to hold on to enlightenment and keep away vexations, that is not the true natural state.

But to follow your own nature, in this sense, is not the same as following your personal habits or whims, as in the expression "be natural." Nature here refers to your self-nature, or Buddha nature. Some people think that one can become a Buddha through meditation. This is wrong. The potential for Buddhahood is already within your own nature. If it were true that Buddhahood depended on meditation, then if you stopped meditating after becoming a Buddha, you would become a common person again. The objective of practice is to be in accord with the natural way, so that your true nature can manifest itself. Just practice according to the methods taught by the Buddha and do not worry about being a success. The Heart Sutra says, "There is no wisdom and no attainment." Although practice may be trying, even physically painful, if your heart is carefree, nothing will bother you. A carefree approach does not mean not caring about how you practice; it means considering anything that happens as natural. There may be some pain, but there will be no suffering. There is nothing in your mind that you cannot put down.

> Bound by thoughts, you depart from the real;
> And sinking into a stupor is as bad.

To be in bondage to your thoughts means to be influenced and carried away by various conditions in your surroundings. If you do this, you are grasping the false. You can try to limit your thoughts by using the method. But in fact, as long as the method is still in your mind, you are still abiding in the false, not in the real. But in that case, should you discard the method? The problem with discarding the method is that, while you may seem to have no thoughts, you may still fall into a foggy state. Even though the method is not real, it is even worse to be suspended in a nebulous frame of mind. The ideal state would be to drop the fogginess along with the method, to be unattached to conditions. What does it mean to be unattached to conditions? It means that there are no thoughts in your mind, but whatever appears is perfectly clear.

When you reach this state you will perceive everything as equal. This is because at that time, to you, nothing really exists. Reality cannot be divided into individual people and objects. When nothing is in front of you, it is the same as when there are many things there. In a room full of people, you would not feel crowded and, if the room were empty, you would not feel lonely. Though there is no discrimination in your mind, when relating to people, you distinguish between a monk and a lay person, or a man and a woman. You follow worldly conventions. However, if your mind is blank, this does not mean you have discarded conditions and reached the state of no thoughts. The blank state would be equivalent to the foggy state, rather than to the truly empty state. Sometimes when you are exhausted, your mind takes a rest and you are not thinking of anything in particular. Do not confuse this with enlightenment.

The method is another way of grasping onto thoughts, but it is a way that allows us to eventually overcome grasping. Using the method effectively is like knitting a sweater. You cannot drop one stitch, otherwise the whole piece will start unravelling. The method should be practiced in the same dense manner. "Dense" means that your attention is so continuous that there is no space in between for any interruptions.

* * * * * * * *

13

Accepting All Realms

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It is not good to weary the spirit.
Why alternate between aversion and affection?
If you wish to enter the one vehicle,
Do not be repelled by the sense realm.

Let's return to the opening lines of the poem, "The Supreme Way is not difficult if only you do not pick and choose." Actually, it is not hard to reach enlightenment if you do not grasp or reject. The poem encourages us to practice without attachment. As soon as you become attached to something, you lose the direction of the method.

Yesterday someone asked, "If attaining Buddhahood does not depend on practice, why must I practice?" From the time of Sakyamuni Buddha it was said that Buddhahood cannot be created by practice. This was especially emphasized by the Sixth Patriarch, Hui-Neng. However, practice will help you to discover the innate Buddha nature. Generally, people think of vexations as something inside that have to be destroyed. They think of the Buddha mind as something outside, beyond their reach, that has to be grasped. The constant effort to destroy vexations and grasp the Buddha mind is very burdensome.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Chinese Buddhists have an expression: "In life you don't practice yet on your death bed you would seize the Buddha's foot." In other words, at the last minute, such people are afraid they may drop down into the hells and thus implore the Buddha to take them up to the Pure Land. [1] Their attitude shows that they consider the hells and the Pure Land to be external realms. In reality, all realms lie within ourselves. But it is precisely the greed of someone who wants the Buddha to save him that prevents him from being reborn in the Pure Land. This is because whatever you grasp is false. If you were to succeed in grabbing the Buddha's foot and being transported to the Pure Land, it would turn out to be illusory. The true Pure Land is not located in any particular place and the true Buddha is formless. A Buddha with a form is just a single manifestation of Buddha, a transformation body. Thus you should not be greedy and seek enlightenment without, or be disgusted with vexations within. If you neither desire nor reject anything, you will feel at ease and joyful.

The one vehicle is the Buddha Way. What is the difference between Buddhahood and enlightenment? Buddhahood is attaining the ultimate, whereas enlightenment is seeing Buddha nature without encompassing it fully. You know the taste of the ocean but you have not yet become the ocean.

If you want to follow the Buddha Way, do not be "repelled by the sense realm," or feel any aversion towards your environment. Here at the Center we are bombarded with disturbances = traffic, radios, trains, even the birds and the wind. At first, it is difficult to remain impassive to these noises, but after three days or so you probably do not even hear the cars passing by.

Years ago I had a student who decided on her own to do a solitary retreat. She went to a bungalow colony in the country. At first, she picked the cabin closest to the road, thinking it would be more convenient for shopping. But finding the noise of the traffic too annoying, she kept switching to cabins farther back towards the wooded area. Finally, she got one right in the middle of the woods, only to discover that the sound of the birds was deafening. Later, she asked me, "How did you manage to practice in the mountains?" I told her, "The birds bothered me too, so I stuffed up my ears. But then I noticed the sound of my own heartbeat. The best way is to forget everything around you. That's why you use a method."

Before sitting, you should mentally prepare yourself not to be disturbed by anything that may happen around you. You should have the attitude that even if the house were burning, you would not get up from your seat. Someone usually asks, "But what if your house really does catch on fire?" I say, "If you are worried now that your house may someday catch on fire, you certainly won't sit successfully."

This also includes not being disturbed by the person sitting next to you. On one winter retreat a student wrapped herself in a blanket while sitting. Every time she sat to meditate, she swung the blanket around her body, accidentally striking her neighbor in the face. For three days he was annoyed by it. But he remembered that I had said one should not be influenced by other people. He then cultivated an attitude that whenever she struck him with her blanket it just meant that she was preparing to meditate; it had nothing to do with him.

* * *

Note
~~~~

[1] Pure Land. The Western Paradise of amitabha Buddha, one of many blissful realms in the Mahayana, each associated with a specific Buddha. The main requirement for entering the Pure Land after death is the wholehearted expression of faith in the compassion of amitabha Buddha. Belief in the Pure Land gave rise to the Pure Land School, whose primary method of practice is to recite Amitabha Buddha's name.
~~~~

* * * * * * * *

14

Limiting the Environment

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

With no aversion to the sense realm,
You become one with true enlightenment.

The true practitioner is not affected by the environment. If you enjoy your surroundings too much, you will not even think about practicing. But if you despise your surroundings, you will not be able to practice even if you try.

It is impossible to throw off your environment all at once. It must be peeled away like an onion. In order to do this, it would be helpful to think of the environment as three concentric circles. The outermost circle is the world around you, the middle one is your body, and the inner circle is your mind. On the first day of retreat, I said that you must forget your affairs in the world outside of the Ch'an Center; in other words, put aside all thoughts of past and future. But once you do that, new thoughts related to the world inside the Center will come up. It may be a smaller world, but it is still external to the body. You may be distracted by the others, or you may become attached to my words, or even to my presence. Some people take notice of where I am in the room, and anticipate what I am going to do next.

If you limit your attention to your body, either you feel comfortable or uncomfortable. It is difficult to totally forget the body. Your legs are painful, your back hurts, your head aches, your neck is strained, your skin itches, or you just feel tired. Ignore any sensations, pleasant or unpleasant, that may arise. On the other hand, if the pain is too great to ignore, consider your body as a corpse. To be able to conquer your pain and your fear of death requires great determination. If you can develop this will power in Ch'an training, you will be able to succeed in any other endeavor.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Once you narrow yourself down to the mental environment, there are two things you are involved with -- the method, and stray thoughts. You will find that your mind is just as full as the outside environment. As the Sutra of Complete Enlightenment says, "Mental activities are just a shadow of the sensory world." Thus if you manage to dispense with all your environments, you will attain the state of no mind, and you will reach a great realization.

> The wise have no motives;
> Fools put themselves in bondage.

The more you strive after liberation, the more you tie yourself up. This is also true of seeking safety, health and security. Once I was approached by a life insurance agent who did not know I was a monk. He said, "Our insurance policy is excellent. No matter what happens to you, your wife and children will be taken care of." I asked, "What if I don't have a wife and children?" He had nothing to say after that. He saw that I had no worries about death.

One monk I know actually took out a policy. I asked him, "Why did you do that?" He said, "So that after I die there will be money for my funeral rites and burial." I said, "Don't you think that a monk would be buried in any case? Even if he is not, maggots would eventually dispose of the body."

A practitioner should not consider his own security. Otherwise, he would not be able to practice in the mountains far away from society. Whatever fears or desires you can discard will give you that much more freedom. But whatever protection you seek will become your karmic obstruction.

This is why you should not look for something here you can take home with you. On the contrary, you should try to lose what you brought in. Why should you add to your burdens? After you learn something and absorb it, then it becomes part of you and you should be able to throw it away. Just as when you eat, you obtain the nutrients from the food and then eliminate the waste. If you carried it home with you, your bowels would be in serious trouble.

* * * * * * * *

15

One Dharma

~~~~~~~~~~

One dharma is not different from another.
The deluded mind clings to whatever it desires.

In complete enlightenment, there are no different dharmas, or objects of existence; there is only the one Dharma. But you cannot say that this one, perfect Dharma either exists or does not exist. To exist, it would have to be opposed to something else that does not, and vice versa. Buddhism does not speak in terms of opposites or of the absolute. Nothing can be absolutely affirmed or denied. When you attach to or reject anything, you are in a position of duality with that object.

In most religions, if you reach a stage where you identify completely with the universe, it would be considered the ultimate, or great harmony. But, according to Buddha Dharma, this is not the highest stage, since some thought still remains. After you concentrate your scattered mind, you reach the stage of unified mind. There are various levels of unified mind -- the unity of self and universe, the unity of body and mind, and beyond this, just one mind remaining. The unity of self and universe is a joyous experience. You feel at one with the flowers and the trees and with everyone around you. You may feel liberated. But this is still not Ch'an.
~~~~~~~~~~

If there is only one Dharma, it is erroneous to seek the Dharma outside or within yourself. That would create a duality. Some people imagine that getting enlightened is seeing a Buddha nature within themselves. I tell you that there is nothing to see. Whatever you see is an illusion. Buddha nature is empty nature. If you seek something, how can you get to emptiness? The Diamond Sutra says that there is no Dharma form and also that there is nothing that is not the form of the Dharma. Thus we should not become attached to either existence or emptiness.

> Using mind to cultivate mind --
> Is this not a great mistake?

When you practice, you are using your mind to work on your mind. You use a deluded thought, the method, to reduce your other deluded thoughts. But the real Ch'an is methodless. No-method is to practice with nothing in your mind, and to be clearly aware that there is nothing in your mind. Moment by moment, maintain the state of no-thought. If a thought arises, just return to no-thought. If I ask you a question while you were in this state you would answer spontaneously. If you have to think about what to say, your mind is already moving. Nowadays, it is impossible for most to maintain this state of mind. In the past, practitioners were able to put in twenty or more years of solid practice. It is difficult for one with a daily work routine to do this. But you should still be aware that although you rely on a method, whether it be breath counting, kung-an, or reciting the Buddha's name, it is not the true Ch'an. The true Ch'an transcends all methods.

> The erring mind begets tranquility and confusion;
> In enlightenment there are no likes or dislikes.

Before enlightenment, people distinguish between a quiescent state, which they call "nirvana," and a chaotic state, which they call "samsara." They want to leave samsara behind and enter nirvana. But seeking to leave the world of noise and confusion to get to a peaceful place is like looking for a rabbit with horns. There is no Buddha Dharma to be found outside of this world. In the Platform Sutra, the Sixth Patriarch says that to leave the world is to be in the world.

The true practitioner does not despise a chaotic environment, nor does he need to go deep into the mountains. He just flows with causes and conditions. Wherever he is, that is his place of practice. He does not feel cramped in a crowded place, nor does he feel lonely in an isolated place.

* * * * * * * *

16

The Dreaming Mind

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The duality of all things
Issues from false discriminations.

Some examples of dualities, or opposites, are: you and me, the Buddha and sentient beings, nirvana and samsara, wisdom and ignorance. In the Platform Sutra, the Sixth Patriarch enumerates thirty-six pairs of opposites. One who seeks wisdom and rejects ignorance as if they were opposites is deluded. A person who thinks of himself as wise is full of self-pride. On the other hand, a person who thinks of himself as ignorant is full of self-pity.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The Heart Sutra says: "There is no wisdom and no attainment; with nothing to attain, bodhisattvas,[1] relying on prajnaparamita,[2] have no obstructions in their minds." This is why you should come to retreat -- not to attain anything, but to practice. Some people approach retreat as if they were a caterpillar hoping to transform themselves into a beautiful butterfly. This kind of motivation is an obstacle to practice.

During retreat I use various means to inspire you to practice, including harsh language. To take this to heart and consider yourself a worthless, incapable person, or else to fight back and deny what I say are both incorrect attitudes. My aim is to whittle down your self-pride or self-pity. However harshly I may seem to treat you, do not dwell on it and feel sorry for yourself. Nor should you feel happy if I praise you. However, from my point of view, I have to discern between the types of practitioners. Some do not react well under pressure. They are like tender bean sprouts that have to be treated gently. Others, whose practice has matured somewhat, can handle more forceful techniques; the more they are pressured, the better they do.

> A dream, an illusion, a flower in the sky --
> How could they be worth grasping?

From the age of ten, I have always seen flower-like images in the sky. This is due to a malfunction of my eyesight. But I have learned not to pay any attention to them. Whatever you consider to be solid or real are only flowers in the sky. Even genuine achievements are still false in the sense that they are not permanent. There was an aerospace company that advertised an innovative way to continue on after death. They would shoot a satellite containing your ashes into orbit around the earth, and there it would spin for about 36,000 years. Even though this seems like an eternity, about nine times the length of civilized history, the time will eventually pass. The earth itself will disappear. There is no sense in trying to pretend otherwise.

From the time we were born, up to the present moment, not much time has elapsed. Not too long from now, we will die. Nothing much has really transpired in that period of time. Faced with this situation, and seeing how temporary everything is, we are impelled to seek something permanent and real. But there is nothing like that to be found.

People sometimes ask Ch'an masters, "What happened to you? What did you realize?" And the master will often give a cryptic reply, such as "Cows eating grass," or "I wonder where this clothing was made." Why don't they just say something like: "I had a great enlightenment experience! I really did! Now I understand what the Buddha is all about."? They do not answer this way because the idea of a special, incomparable enlightenment is an illusion, and they know that. At a retreat once a student had a small experience, and later I asked him, "How do you feel now?" He said, "Ah! The rice is really tasty."

But if nothing is real or lasting, what is the point of coming to retreat and practicing Ch'an? The point is that during the course of practice, you may come to realize that everything around you, as well as whatever you seek out of life, are illusory. The ordinary person does not know this. Even if you convince yourself intellectually that everything is illusory, you may still have a lurking concept of the reality of things and be attached to them. To be able to actually treat them as transient is another thing entirely.

> Gain and loss, right and wrong --
> Discard them all at once.

Some of you had pleasant experiences today, and others just ended up with aching legs. If you spend your time hoping that a pleasant experience will return, or trying to avoid pain, you will become more aware of the passing of time. You will feel restless and think, "Today has gone by already and I've wasted my time." Some people have this attitude when, after a day or two, they feel they have not made any progress. They tell themselves that they could be doing so many other things at home, or furthering their career. If you feel you have not gotten anywhere, discard this attitude immediately. If you continue to dwell on these things, you probably will give up and go home.

If the eyes do not close in sleep,
All dreams will cease of themselves.

"The eyes" are your awareness. The instant you lose awareness of just what you are doing at the moment, you are dreaming. Dreaming means being carried away by your wandering thoughts and unable to stop them. As in actual dreams, these wandering thoughts are either connected with the past, or anticipate the future. They are not concerned with the present, because the present is just keeping your mind on your method.

People often concentrate intensely on the method for a short time and then say, "Well, I'll take a break now. I'll just put the method aside and let my mind wander a little bit." This is a wrong way to practice. Using the method can be likened to pumping air into a tire. The minute you stop pumping, the air starts to leak and the tire will eventually go flat. You may think that by putting down the method and relaxing for a while, you are re-charging your energy. In fact what you are really doing is letting the air out of your tires.

This is common among beginners. They often make the mistake of exerting physical energy to fight against wandering thoughts. As a result their bodies become tense and the blood rushes to their heads, and after a time they feel a need to relax. But those who know how to work well summon up their concentration in a clear, relaxed manner. They do not belabor themselves with an excess of physical energy or struggle with their method. Instead, they maintain a natural moment-to-moment awareness.

This lucid awareness should not only be practiced while sitting, but also when you are eating and working. Let everything else drop away and concern yourself only with the method. If you can do this uninterruptedly for a period of time, I guarantee that all of your dreams will disappear, including your method. But in fact your mind is totally on the method then.

It is common for people to want a vacation after working hard. But during the vacation, their minds will scatter and their concentration will dissipate. If you alternate work and vacation in this way, you will never get beyond a certain level of practice. By practicing daily meditation and going on retreats, at least you are pumping the air into the tire to some extent. But you should be aware that this kind of interrupted practice is not the ideal approach to Ch'an.

* * *

Notes
~~~~~

[1] bodhisattva: (sanskrit, "awakened being"). In Mahayana Buddhism, an enlightened person on the path to Buddhahood, who renounces entry into nirvana until all sentient beings are saved. Contrasted to an arhat, who passes into nirvana after complete enlightenment.

[2] prajnaparamita: (Sanskrit, "perfection of wisdom"). One of the ten paramitas, or perfections, i.e., virtues practiced by bodhisattvas; refers to the perfection of the virtue of wisdom (prajna).

* * * * * * * *

17

Climbing the Crystal Mountain
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

If the mind does not discriminate,
All dharmas are of one suchness.

The essence of one suchness is profound;
Unmoving, conditioned things are forgotten.

When you do not discriminate, you see everything as one. There is no difference between mind and body, inside and outside. Your mind is unified. You have left behind the sense of small self and have entered the state of great self. You are imbued with tremendous confidence. If you want to call this oneness "enlightenment," there is nothing wrong with that, but it is not Ch'an enlightenment. To experience Ch'an, you must probe the mysterious essence of suchness.

I have emphasized that when there is a sense of one, there are actually two. To go a step further, when you sense that even one does not exist, this is the experience of wu, or emptiness. But because you have a concept of emptiness, your mind is still subtly present. Ultimately, even wu does not exist. Emptiness is still within the three realms of existence, but this is already more advanced than just non-discrimination.

Ch'an is a lively practice which does not neglect the world. The Sixth Patriarch said, "Samadhi is not Ch'an." Practitioners of Ch'an lead normal lives. They do not speak of oneness or emptiness. The only difference is that there is no obstruction or attachment in their minds.

Contemplate all dharmas as equal,
And you return to things as they are.

In fact, these two lines refer to different things. "Contemplate all dharmas as equal" refers to non-discrimination, or one mind. "Things as they are" refers to returning to the ordinary life. In the state of one mind, the small self has died, but the great self is still present. There has to be a great death before we can experience a great rebirth. With this great rebirth will come a great love. When the great self dies, we enter no self, or Ch'an.

Once a student misunderstood this talk about small death and great death. He asked me to let him die here on retreat. In this way, he would accumulate merit in the company of his fellow practitioners. I told him, "If you die here you would only go to hell. It's a very hot time of year, and if we keep your corpse lying around, the smell will interfere with others' practice." The death I am talking about is not a physical death. It is the death of your self-centered mind. This cannot come about merely by wishing to die. If you killed yourself a thousand times it would not do you any good. You would still be in samsara.

> When the subject disappears,
> There can be no measuring or comparing.

If you let go of every thought object, there will be nothing to distinguish yourself from, and you will disappear. Today someone remarked, "I still have a self left. I have to get rid of this self." I said, "Self is not something you can get rid of. Self is not inside; it is not identical to your body or your mind. Rather, self is precisely the object of all of your thoughts and actions. Other than this, there is no self. Can your mind have no object? Usually we think of the method as something we can rely on, as a bridge to get us across the river. But Ch'an is really the method of no-method. There is no bridge provided, because there is no river. If you let go of your attaching mind, at that very moment you are enlightened.

Practice is a foolish endeavor, like climbing a crystal mountain covered with oil. As you try to climb, you constantly slip back down. Nevertheless, you have no choice. You must continue climbing. You climb until you are completely exhausted, and suddenly you find yourself on the top of the mountain. But you realize you are still at the original spot. If you have not covered any distance at all, why was it necessary to climb the mountain? The answer is that before you started climbing you did not realize that you were already on the top of the mountain. Only a fool would try to climb a slippery crystal mountain. If you are intelligent, you should go home right now. However, if you are willing to recognize being a fool, then take the time to climb the mountain.

* * * * * * * *

18

Rest and Activity

Stop activity and there is no activity;
When activity stops, there is no rest.
Since two cannot be established,
How can there be one?

In Ch'an practice it is not necessary to stop wandering thoughts. The reason is that activity and rest are not in opposition. But if there is no such duality, then there is no oneness to speak of either. We call this retreat a Ch'an retreat but actually it is just a suffering or training retreat. Ch'an is methodless, but everyone here is using certain methods. The purpose of the methods is to replace your wandering thoughts. But the methods themselves are wandering thoughts. Therefore, to use a method to stop the activity of your thoughts is in itself activity. There can be no such thing as rest.

Let us talk about rest. In samadhi, the mind moves so slowly it feels as if it were at rest. But this rest is only relative. Even if you get to the highest level of samadhi, the so-called "neither thinking nor not thinking samadhi," your mind is still moving in a subtle way. However, most people would understand this to be rest.

On the other hand, it is possible for the mind to seem to be at rest even when it is moving fast. To illustrate, one can copy a two-hour taped lecture onto another tape in the space of one minute. But if you listen to this lecture as it is being copied, you would not be able to distinguish the various words. You would hear only a single sound.

Likewise, a person with an agile mind can resolve many problems without effort. He would not be conscious of any strenuous mental activity. A person with slower mental faculties, however, may sense more vexations and feel that his mind has gone through a lot of thinking, when actually it has dealt with fewer problems.

In the very ultimate,
Rules and standards do not exist.

The ultimate is beyond all human rules and laws. It cannot be judged by worldly standards. Thoroughly enlightened people spontaneously help sentient beings in accordance with causes and conditions. Their actions are not bound by the moral codes of society. This is not the case for ordinary people. We must abide by certain principles and rules. But if the thoroughly enlightened are bound by these laws, it would not be genuine liberation. For them there is no boundary between activity and rest.

But the misinterpretation of this truth has caused great harm. Some people think that Ch'an advertises moral indifference, that Ch'an practitioners in general are free to ignore ethical principles. There are some who admit they are not enlightened, but nevertheless refuse to recognize accepted rules of behavior. They reason that if they imitate the ways of an enlightened person, they will gradually pick up the enlightened spirit.

Master Hsu-Yun, though a monk, never shaved his head. Thus, he appeared to be one of those who did not observe the rules. However, he insisted that his disciples have shaved heads. The reason why Hsu-Yun never shaved is that during his long period of practice, he did not have the time. Later, when he was an accomplished master he was already accustomed to not shaving. Though his hair was unruly, he conducted his life was very rigorously and in strict accord with the precepts. A Ch'an master may seem carefree, but behind superficial appearances there is a solid foundation. It is only upon a solid foundation that one can draw on a truly liberated spirit not limited by rules.

Develop a mind of equanimity,
And all deeds are put to rest.

A mind of equanimity is a mind without distinctions; in other words, there is no rest and no activity. When your mind is in this condition, whatever you do is the same as not doing anything at all. Your mind is at rest within activity. There is a saying that on becoming an arhat,[1] whatever has to be done has already been accomplished. Similarly, in the Platform Sutra, it is said that when there is no concern about good or evil, you can stretch out your legs and take a nap. When the mind is not making distinctions, there is no self, no other, no good, no bad. There is really nothing that needs to be done. This does not mean that you do nothing, but that your mind is in a state of rest. In fact, it is not even correct to speak of your mind. A person in this condition uses the mind of sentient beings.

Anxious doubts are completely cleared.
Right faith is made upright.

With a mind of equanimity, there is no longer any confusion or doubt about the Dharma. Even if you believe in the Dharma, but have not experienced realization, that is not called "right faith." You must have your own realization so that your faith will be affirmed and never change. Your mind will be straightforward without distortion. This means that whatever you endeavor, you will not make the wrong decision from the point of view of Dharma. The ordinary person may make erroneous judgments and actions, because he uses a mind of distinctions.

* * *

Note
~~~~

[1] arhat: (sanskrit, "worthy one"). Practitioner, especially in the
~~~~

Hinayana (Theravadin) tradition, who has extinguished all attachments and defilements, and stands on the threshold of nirvana. Contrasted to a bodhisattva of the Mahayana tradition, who foregoes the promise of nirvana until all sentient beings are delivered.

* * * * * * * *

19

Leaving No Trace

Nothing lingers behind,
Nothing can be remembered.
Bright and empty, functioning naturally,
The mind does not exert itself.

After a bird has flown from one tree to another, what trace did it leave in the air? Again, when you stand in front of a mirror,you see your image reflected in it. But after you have gone, what is left in the mirror? Your mind should be like this; any event that occurs should leave no trace in your mind.We cannot deny that the bird has actually flown a certain distance, or that the mirror has reflected you. But it is precisely because the bird did not leave a trace that other birds are free to fly over the same route, and it is precisely because the mirror does not retain your image that other people can also see their images. If traces were left in the sky, would it look as spacious as it does to us now? If the mirror retained images, would it still be able to reflect?

Likewise, the accumulation of knowledge and experiences only adds obstructions. For instance, whatever you have learned previously from other teachers is like the trace of a bird, or the image left behind on a mirror. If these things stay in your mind on retreat, you will not be able to absorb my teachings because there will be an overlap of images. On the first evening I told you to forget everything that happened in the past; do not attempt to compare what happens on this retreat with your former experiences.

Not remembering anything does not mean that you are like a stone or a piece of wood. Your mind is still clearly aware of knowing certain things but does not try to bring up these memories as criteria for comparing and judging. The bird did fly from tree to tree, and the mirror did reflect people, but they have nothing to do with you. Phenomena may change, but your mind is not moved by them.

Today someone found the Ch'an hall too hot, and so kept taking off layers of clothing; but when he looked around, it seemed that everyone else did not mind the heat. Finally he could bear it no longer and came to talk to me. I told him that he felt so hot because he was thinking that it was hot. If his mind was on practice he would not be aware of the heat. He took my advice and it worked. It is the mind that generates these vexations. The environment may contribute, but if your mind does not cooperate, it will not pose a problem for you.

> It is not a place of thinking,
> Difficult for reason and emotion to fathom.

It is impossible to explain the state when there is nothing left in the mind. For the past few evenings, I have been talking about no mind. A few people have asked me, "What is this no mind you are talking about?" I said, "No mind is just no mind. Even if I were to tell you, you still would not know. You cannot use your reasoning or knowledge to imagine it. You can only know by personal experience."

When I was in my teens someone told me he had a ringing in his ears. I asked him to describe it, and he explained it was like the humming of bees. I still did not understand what it felt like. Later when I was forty, I experienced it myself. If physiological experiences are difficult to imagine, all the more so with Ch'an, which is beyond all normal experience.

> In the Dharma Realm of true suchness,
> There is no other, no self.

True suchness refers to things as they really are, without eternal existence. Some think that true suchness is something eternal that can be held on to, but actually there is no such thing. Neither is there any Dharma Realm. True suchness is neither self nor other. Many practitioners seek to discover their self-nature, which they identify with Buddha nature, or true suchness. But this implies a certain existence. True suchness is neither yourself nor another.

Someone said to me, "I know that the self I am familiar with is an illusion. I want to find the true one." I replied, "The self you have now is illusory. But even the true self is illusory. Nevertheless, you must try to find it. If you don't find it, you won't know it is an illusion."

> To accord with it is vitally important;
> Only refer to "not-two."
> In not-two all things are in unity;
> Nothing is excluded.

To be in accord with true suchness, two things cannot be different; they are "not-two" in the sense of not being more than one. However, it would not be meaningful to speak of something according with itself. Thus, we cannot speak of one or two. We can only say "not-two." In true suchness, there is accordance with all sentient beings. The Buddha is in accord with sentient beings, and sentient beings can be in accord with each other. Accordance is a communication, or connection, between two things, such that they form a unity. For example, in marriage, two people come together without losing their own individuality.

In not-two everything is included. In fact, "not-two" refers to no mind, the mind of bodhi.[1] If you say something is there, you would be wrong. If you say nothing is there, you would also be wrong. Therefore, existence and non-existence are not-two. If this is the case, everything is included. The Platform Sutra states that vexation is the same as bodhi. Those who do not practice Ch'an are not aware of their deepest vexations. When you discover the extent of your vexations and think that you are not making any progress, then you are really practicing. Only when you realize your problems is it possible to resolve them.

* * *

Note
~~~~

[1] bodhi: (Sanskrit, "awakened"). State of enlightened mind, characterized by having experienced one's own Buddha nature.

* * * * * * * *

20

True Suchness
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The wise throughout the ten directions
All enter this principle.
This principle is neither hurried nor slow --
One thought for ten thousand years.

The word translated here as "wise" has multiple meanings. In Sanskrit, the word prajna can be used in the sense of worldly wisdom, or it can be used in the sense of wisdom transcending the world. Finally, it can be simultaneously worldly and transcendent. This is the highest prajna referred to in Mahayana Buddhism. To determine which sense of prajna is being used, you have to look at the context. Here, "wise" refers to the highest prajna. All beings with prajna will have to enter through the same door. Tsung, translated as "principle" here, can also be taken to mean the Dharma Realm of true suchness that I spoke of yesterday.

This principle is neither long nor short in a temporal sense. If you say that it is long, or lasting, you are falling into the "view of constancy." Buddha Dharma does not accept the view that there is something eternal and unchanging. On the other hand, if you say that it is short, then you are prone to the "view of termination." In Buddha Dharma both constancy and termination are considered extreme, or "outer path" views. But Ch'an often speaks of that which is "beginningless" and "endless." Does this contradict the Buddhist view of nothing being eternal? You should understand that even though everything is in a constant flux, the principle of change itself does go on indefinitely. Thus to say that this principle is not eternal would also be incorrect.

There are two possible interpretations of the line "One thought for ten thousand years." One is that the mind simply does not move. But is this possible? Even in deep levels of samadhi, as long as it is a worldly samadhi, the mind is still moving in a subtle way. In fact, as you get into ever deeper levels, you may be aware of the movement of your mind in the previous level, even if you are not aware of the movement at the present level. You realize that what you took to be a still mind, actually consisted of many minute fluctuations. Therefore, this interpretation does not hold here.

The second explanation is that there is no mind. "Ten thousand years" is a term used to indicate unlimited time. No mind is unlimited; one instant can encompass ten thousand years.

> Abiding nowhere yet everywhere,
> The ten directions are right before you.

This single incense board is true suchness in its entirety. But if you think that only the incense board is true suchness, you are wrong. True suchness is everywhere; nothing is separate from true suchness. The previous two lines referred to Ch'an as being unlimited by time. These two lines are speaking of the limitlessness of space. If you can grasp a small spot, you have access to totality. At the tip of a fine strand of hair all the Buddhas of the three times and the ten directions are turning the Dharma wheel. If a person who is thoroughly enlightened reads these lines, he would say, "Indeed it is just like that! It is not anything different." But for someone with only a theoretical understanding, it is like gazing at flowers through a mist, obscured by your own thoughts.

> The smallest is the same as the largest
> In the realm where delusion is cut off.
> The largest is the same as the smallest;
> No boundaries are visible.

In the state where the spot in front of your eyes is equivalent to totality, there is no room for illusory dharmas. Illusory dharmas are the dharmas of distinctions, of small and large, of positing one thing against another. Usually, we see something as small because it is in relation to something bigger than itself. To say that the largest is equivalent to the smallest erases all boundaries. This refers again to true suchness.

Someone asked, "After a person attains Buddhahood, where would he be?" There are three bodies of the Buddha, the trikaya [1] -- the transformation body, the reward body, and the Dharma body. The transformation body appears in a particular time and place in the human realm. The reward body also appears for the sake of sentient beings; for this reason, it is limited in location. But the Dharma body of the Buddha is not limited to any time or place. You cannot say it is here or it is there. It is simultaneously the largest and the smallest. It has the greatest power, but at the same time it has no power whatsoever. It is smaller than anything we can know of, because it has no self. But because the Dharma body of the Buddha has no self, all sentient beings are identical to this body. Wherever sentient beings need the Buddha, the Dharma body can function for their benefit.

> Existence is precisely emptiness;
> Emptiness is precisely existence.

The Dharma body of the Buddha, or true suchness, cannot be said to "exist" because there is no self. However, it can be experienced because if your practice reaches a certain depth. True suchness is not identical to nothingness. Everything that exists in the three times and ten directions is never separate from it. "Emptiness" refers to no self and "existence" refers to causes and conditions.

Some Ch'an masters speak only of existence and some speak only of emptiness. Others sometimes speak of existence and sometimes speak of emptiness, depending on the audience. But they are all speaking of the same thing. One time a monk complained to me, "In my opinion, most, if not all, Ch'an masters are lunatics. If you talk to them about existence, they uphold the idea of emptiness. If you talk to them about emptiness, they affirm existence." Ch'an cannot be spoken or conceived. Indeed, since it cannot be expressed in words, whatever you say about it, as existence or emptiness, can be criticized.

> If it is not like this,
> Then you must not preserve it.

You have to let go of your previous views: self-attachment, attachment to existence, emptiness, large and small, boundedness, unboundedness, truth and illusion.

> One is everything,
> Everything is one.

True suchness is identical to all phenomena and all phenomena are never separated from true suchness. It must be understood in this sense, and not in the sense that all phenomena reduce to one. There is no distinction between unification and non-unification in true suchness. Otherwise, taking these two lines literally would imply that if one person becomes a Buddha, everyone else has to become a Buddha. Or, all sentient beings must attain Buddhahood before there can be even one Buddha, since all sentient beings are one. This would not hold on a common sense level, yet it can be understood on the deeper level just explained.

If you can be like this,
Why worry about not finishing?

When you know that true suchness is identical to all phenomena, then there are no worries about getting enlightened or attaining Buddhahood.

Faith and mind are not two;
Non-duality is faith in mind.

If you have faith in the mind of equanimity and non-distinction, you have faith in no mind. However, the mind of the person who has faith is the mind of an ordinary sentient being. What the poem says is that the mind of faith is not separate from no mind, the mind that is the object of the faith. This is the same as saying that true suchness is identical to all phenomena. Although the two minds are identical, you must begin with faith to give you direction in your practice. Not only must you have faith in no mind, but you must have faith in every single word of this poem and act accordingly. In this way, you can attain the mind of no mind.

The path of words is cut off;
There is no past, no future, no present.

During the course of practice, we employ the use of words to guide us. But when faith and mind are not separate, all words and language are unnecessary, including the poem Faith in Mind. Again, during practice, there is a distinction between past, present and future. Progress is measured in terms of time, but when faith and mind are not separate, these distinctions are abolished.

Once a monk asked Hsu-Yun, "Is there time in samadhi?" Hsu-Yun answered, "If there is time in samadhi, it is not samadhi." The monk asked, "In that case, can you say there is no time in samadhi?" Hsu-Yun said, "If there is no time in samadhi, where is the person?" In samadhi the mind is holding to one thought, so there is no awareness of time. But the meditator is still in the present moment, not in the past or the future. However, if you go one step further into no mind, you cannot even be in the present. The present can only exist in the mind, in relation to the past and the future.

* * *

Note

[1] trikaya: (Sanskrit, "threebodies"). Mahayana doctrine of the tripartite bodies of the Buddha: (1) nirmanakaya, the transformation body, manifesting as a human being, as in Sakyamuni; (2) sambhogakaya, the bliss body of the venerated Buddhas, experienced only by enlightened bodhisattvas; (3) dharmakaya, the supreme body of all the transcendent Buddhas.

* * * * * * * *

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT

TITLE OF WORK: Faith in Mind: A Guide to Ch'an Practice FILENAME: FAITH_IN.ZIP

AUTHOR: Master Sheng-Yen
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: Institute of Chung-Hwa Buddhist Culture
90-56 Corona Avenue
Elmhurst, New York 11373

Tel: (718) 592-6593
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: Dharma Drum Publications
Institute of Chung-Hwa Buddhist Culture
90-56 Corona Avenue
Elmhurst, New York 11373
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: Dharma Drum Publications (1987)
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1987, 1993
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: You may print a single copy of this work for your personal use without requesting permission from the publisher. Otherwise, all rights reserved. See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: December 1994
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951
[end]

Fuck Me, You Bastards! (Wife gets an unexpected double fucking) byInLikeFlynn©

As with my other story I have changed important places, names, etc. to preserve anonymity.

*

My wife Shere and I had just recently moved from the city to a rural area, out in the country y
We had grown tired of the noise, smog, and fast pace that come with living in "the center of home was quite a long way from any neighbors, set back against reforested mountains with front. The days were hot, the evenings cool, and the sunsets gorgeous.

Shere was 37 years old and more attractive than any girl half her age. At 5 ft 5 inches she h that gracefully accentuate her ability to fill out a pair of blue jeans. Her hips were made for m attention, her waist is slim, and she has a heavy set of 36D breasts that jiggle like water ball moves and she has huge nipples that are perpetually stiff. Most women don't like her but I h yet that has not stared at those tits and her blue jean covered hips. Shere knows the effect t men; she's a man's girl.

She especially likes the response she gets from older men, and she can turn on the heat wit hips and a little accidental brush of her tits on their body. The poor men start getting red and says she can smell their musky scent and that gets her hot.

Awhile ago Shere wanted to get a tattoo, but not the typical stuff. She wanted one like the gu WWII, the old Sailor Jerry style, a beautiful red rose with green leaves right on her shoulder.
weeks before deciding on this little hole in the wall tattoo shop right on the wharf, quite a wa now that we lived in the country. The old man that ran the place was of the old school, he di and only had two tattoos himself, said he didn't get much business anymore, and was more Shere. And when he requested that she take her top and bra off just to get a shoulder tattoo knowing smile and gladly did so, like I said she likes to please older men. She gritted her tee pain of the needle and tears ran down her cheek and dripped onto her breasts but she didn't wanted a tattoo the old way and she got it. Surprisingly the old man did a wonderful job seei couldn't keep his eyes off Shere's tear soaked tits and huge stiff nipples.

Shere was tickled to death at how it had turned out; it truly was a beautiful old style tattoo. S happy that she had me take a picture of it showing just her naked upper body, arms togethe tits, accentuating their already large size. She took this 8x10 back to the old mans shop and closing time. His eyes opened wide when he saw it, and said that he would put it up on his c left and then, as she got to her car, she remembered that she did not thank him for the fanta went back in and as she opened the office door the old man was sitting in his chair, shirt off stroking his hard cock and looking at Shere's picture. Embarrassed he started to cover up a Shere said not to worry, she was flattered. She walked in and closed the door behind her an mischievous smile said "I wanted to thank you, for the tattoo, I just love it, um... keep on touc yourself, here....watch me."

She slowly started taking off her blouse, and then undid her bra. The old man just sat there began to stroke his cock. "Jesus," he said.

As Shere's heavy tits came free she approached the man and got down on her knees and w breasts around the man's cock, "Fuck them, fuck my tits, it's ok."

The old man couldn't believe it but started thrusting madly. Shere stuck out her tongue and a up she licked the sensitive underside and engulfed his bulging cockhead with her warm mou
the old mans cock were wet and shiny with Shere's spit, the old man was pumping like mad and covered in sweat, soon he started to moan "uhhh....jesus....fuck..." and Shere purred "U it, do it, fuck my tits, cum all over them... cover them, I want to see you cum."

With a final thrust the old man stiffened and his cockhead swelled and started pumping out h splattered Shere's face and open mouth then dripped down onto her tits. Shere swallowed a "Ohh....pump it, pump it all out."

The old mans hips thrust sporadically and then he collapsed back on the chair. His breathing gasps and he watched as Shere licked and swallowed the little cum drops from the tip of his are something else, god what a bitch, you are.... something else."

Shere got up, the cleavage of her breasts was flushed red and her chin and tits were splotch white cum. She smiled and used his shirt to clean herself up, dressed then leaned over and on the forehead, "Thanks for the tattoo," she said, then left closing the door behind her.

Shere told me about this encounter when she got home, we laughed and I was grateful that the attention, what a beautiful thing to do. Shere loves to suck men off. When we're on a trip pick a man out and invite him to our room. She will take off her top, and lick and suck his co swallows every drop of cum he can pump. The men are always so grateful and I'm proud of them. If she really likes them sometimes she'll strip off all of her clothes and let them fuck he

I am always there with her and we are very careful as to who we choose. Often I'll join in an same time but mostly I watch her beautiful body get ravished, and I stroke my cock.

She and I have what you might call a semi-open understanding; spur of the moment, heat o encounters with others are ok but premeditated flings are not, unless we both approve or ar always tell each other everything, no secrets. In our early marriage we would never have su arrangement but around a year ago we had an enlightening experience and our relationship
We began to understand each other in a deeper way and we are extremely confident in eac arrangement has been great for us, it is natural, and has made our sex lives incredibly hot.

Lately she has been complaining of having gained a few pounds. I tell her that she looks gre adds to her sexy curves, but it bothers her so she has started taking vigorous walks up the r dirt logging roads that cross the mountains behind our house. There are never any people o she also works on her tan and during the summer walks with nothing on but a bikini bottom.
walks with a passion and by the time she is done she's covered in sweat and is sexy beyon

A few weeks ago she came in from her walk later than usual, completely naked, covered in back were scratched, there were pieces of grass and leaves in her hair, her lips were all puf smell man scent all over her. We lay down on the bed and as she told me the story I watche face, her dirt smeared breasts, and I took out my cock and started stroking:

Apparently she was about a half mile into her walk, all uphill in the hot sun so she was weari her bikini bottom. She was rounding a blind corner when there in front of her were two men, the look of their shotguns and clothing, probably after grouse or pheasant. They all stopped each other, struck with surprise. The men looked at what was in front of them, this stunningl woman, completely naked except for a bikini bottom, breathing hard, sweat dripping from he heavy breasts heaving with exertion.

"My god! We're sorry Miss, ...jesus."

"We didn't know you were here..."

Shere was startled, her eyes darted around, she had nothing to cover up with and the two m tits. One of them was like a big bear and the other man was shorter and slim in build.

"I, I didn't know....uh....usually there is nobody on these roads." Shere stammered.

"Oh, we don't mind," said the bear like man, "its ok Miss.....god you're beautiful."

"Thank you" Shere said, awkwardly looking around for somewhere to go, but there was no p weren't budging an inch so she stood there for what seemed like hours letting them stare at calmed a little; it was exciting in a bad girl way, to be caught in the open naked with two mer to run.

"I'm uh ... the weather...trying to get a little exercise." Shere said feeling like she should have something else.

"Nice warm day out, good for walking...uh...your tits, jesus they're fantastic, I hope you don't look," said the slimmer man.

What was she going to say? God they were bold. She had nothing to clothe her breasts with to look like a prude by trying to cover with her hands.

"Well...um...you guys are so nice, I don't mind if you don't, I'm glad you like them, look all yo Shere was surprised, did she just say that?

The men moved in close, "You really are pretty, you are just incredible, uh I'm Jim and this is

"Hi" said Hank, "Jim's right you are just fantastic! You have such beautiful breasts, and I love tattoo."

"Thanks. Hank, Jim, I'm Shere" She said, pleased with the tattoo remark and wondering if sh get any closer.

Her breasts sweated in the hot sun and her nipples were protruding obscenely, it was incred Shere thought she could see bulges forming in their pants, oh fuck, did they see her look? D face grew even more red than it already was and the two men moved closer until they were caught a faint scent; she knew that smell, male musk mixed with sweat.

"You know," said Hank, "uh I know this is strange...uh...we don't mean you any harm but cou touch your tits... and...damn...then we'll just go on our way...you know, and don't feel bad if y it's all ok, really."

This all felt surreal, like it really couldn't be happening. I mean, they should turn their heads, her nakedness and she should not be so nice, right? My God they wanted to touch her brea should she? Of course not, this was getting out of control, she should just turn and walk awa let her go that is, but they weren't being rude or obnoxious, they were very respectful. This w fast, but her nipples were so stiff and aching, she knew they were begging to be touched, ar were staring at them. But there was more, between her legs, she could feel a tingling in her could begin to smell her own musky scent, could they smell it too? She was turned on being with these men, with nowhere to run. Her expression turned serious and she looked up at th shouldn't but she heard herself say it.

"Uh...ok, it's ok; touch them if you want to."

They didn't waste any time, putting their shotguns down and moving in so close that she cou of their breath. Shere raised her arms above her head and they reached out and cupped the breasts, feeling their weight. The hands were hard and rough the way a mans hands should gentle. It didn't take long for the touching to become centralized on her nipples and it sent pi pleasure straight to her swelling clit. She watched as four hands fondled her breasts, four ha concentrated on her stiff nipples, her eyes closed and memories of another time flooded her she had been taken by eight lust crazed men, she had been gangbanged, a time of relentles cumming.

"Miss...would you mind if...." Hank said in a throaty hoarse voice "would you mind if maybe.. on your nipples...really quickly?"

Shere opened her eyes halfway and looked up into their faces, "Yes, go ahead.....ahh...suck

She didn't need to finish, two warm mouths were already fastened onto her hard nipples. Th mouths, the lapping tongues, and the powerful suction was too much; they had all crossed t let them go to far, this was no longer about a chance meeting and admiration, now it was ab orgasm alone. She knew there was no way out of this now; she was going to get fucked, an She watched her breasts, jesus what a turn on seeing two men sucking on her nipples.

"Hank," Jim said, "look at her hips!" Hank looked down, Shere's hips were slowly moving, Ha with a hard pull yanked off Shere's bikini bottom.

"Ohh!" Shere exclaimed, but she didn't move away.

Jim ran a hand up the inside of her thigh stopping just below her cunt, when Shere thrust he brushed her slit, Shere let out a soft breathy moan, and his hand came away wet.

"Look at that!" Jim whispered.

Hanks hand joined Jims between Shere's legs and soon the fingers of both hands disappea slit. Shere's mouth opened wide, her face had a strained look and her breath came hard as and down, slick with the juice of her sopping cunt, stretching the lips of her cunt wide, filling caressing fingers. "Huuh... god...it feels good." she whispered heavily. Her knees began to b and she had trouble standing. The men withdrew their hands from between her legs. "Ohh... disappointedly.

"She's all worked up, look at her." Jim said.

"She's going to get more than just a tit sucking," Hank said pushing down on Shere's should

With Hanks hands on her bare shoulders Shere dropped down to her knees, still under the s the men's hands had given her, and caressed the bulges in their pants, "Let me see them...t whispered.

Within seconds zippers were down and hands pulled out what she wanted. They were beau thick and fat, a purplish red with huge mushroom heads swollen and tight, oh what they coul those, how good it would feel to have those in her, filling her, pulsing and throbbing between reached out both her hands and cupped their warm balls and then slowly began licking the u forth from the base up to the head, alternating from one cock to the next. She loved the way would jump as she began to give it attention. Soon she fully engulfed their cocks, opening h as she could to take the huge swollen cockheads, and then they started thrusting. Gently at in fury, hands grabbed the back of her head and she struggled to satisfy both men.

Her mouth was open wide, her head going from one man to the other, her face covered in th balls and dark man hair, the cocks were dripping with her saliva and her face was wet and s

They had lost the politeness, the gentle respect. Primitive lust was in control now and she kn meant, she was no longer the woman they met on the road, now she was an object, an obje bitch, and they were going to fuck her and use her, how many times she didn't know. The th her nipples hurt, and her clit felt tight, she wanted to cum. She needed to orgasm and then s cocks, she didn't care about where they were or who they were or what was going on, she w cum.

Shere looked up at Hank and Jim, there was spit dripping from her chin, she was breathing were heavy. "Please," she said "ahh...please.....I need to...to..."

"Get her over here, in the shade," Jim said.

Hank scooped her up as if she was weightless and carried her to the side of the road where dirt and there was shade. "Get our coats out, lay them down."

He gently laid Shere on the thick coats and she looked up and watched as the two men und muscled while Hank was like a great bear, thick and covered with hair, she kept her eyes on arched her back, then spread her legs, inviting them in.

Jim lay down beside her and started working her tits and nipples, while Hank got down betw slowly started licking the cunt juice and sweat from her inner thighs. He licked his way up to reveled in her musky scent. "Jim," he said, "god she's got a big clit, look how stiff it is, it look head of a little cock."

Jim raised his head from Shere's tits and looked. The whole length of her hooded clit was er of her clit was poking a quarter inch out.

"Make her beg" Jim snarled, "make the bitch beg like a slut, I'm gonna suck these tits raw. A were gonna fuck her."

Hank used both hands and gently pulled her cunt apart exposing Shere's swollen clit even m thrusting up trying to make contact with Hanks mouth. Hank flicked the tip of Shere's huge k tongue, "Uuhh...hahh" Shere moaned thrusting her hips higher, "Please...don't tease me..."

Hank continued to just barely lick around the hood of her poor clit, but never making solid co knob. Jim kept on Shere's tits, sucking first one then the other nipple, until he just roughly sq tits together and started sucking both of them at once. Shere was lost to the world around he good, only the sex mattered now. Jim was torturing her breasts, and her nipples made her s to her clit but she couldn't get it, no matter where she thrust her hips her clit only got a brush pleasure. This went on for minutes, until she was panting like a dog. She had to have Hanks clit full on, God he was a bastard, she had to cum, cum goddamit! "Please....jesus please" s "make me cum...."

"Are you begging for it?" asked Hank, "Beg for it like a whore, come on you bitch, beg to cum

"Ohh, yes, yes I'm a whore, a slut.....oh god....I'm begging you....uhhhh.....make me cum...oh you fuckers...bastards...make me cum!"

Shere was begging and moaning and her hips were thrusting in all directions trying to get Ha clit. Her body was covered in a slick sheen of sweat. She would have sold her soul to the de if it would make her cum. Finally Hank latched full onto Shere's clit with his mouth and starte licking and sucking with a fury.

Shere was in heaven, "shuuh...shit...shit... fuck...fuuhh...oh god it's so good...ah...ah...I'm.... cum....please don't stop...jesus...jesus fuck...oh...oh...I'm cumming!"

Her back arched up high and her body stiffened for a second, and then started shuddering i was being shocked with high voltage electricity. Jim watched Shere's face as it was wrought eyes glazed and turned up until just the whites shown and her body doubled up, Jim wrappe and supported her as she sat there mouth open, spit drooling out as if she was choking and breath "Huh...huh...uh..." was all the sound she made as she jerked and spasmed. Hank ha just held Shere's clit in his mouth and felt it throbbing and pulsing. Finally the spasms slowly and her body went limp. She collapsed onto her back and her breathing steadied, and her h gentle thrusting. "Ohh....fuck yes....that was good." she purred.

"Good." said Jim, "Now you're gonna get fucked and stuffed with cock!"

Shere had no time to recover from her orgasm as Jim moved between her legs. He had to h hot bitch, had to have that cunt with its big clit all wet and glistening with cunt juice and spit.
gonna tag team her Hank," he growled,"as soon as I fill her cunt you get on and then I'll be r then you! We'll keep her tits jumping!"

Jim shoved his cock in with one violent thrust "You.....bastard!...ohhh" Shere exclaimed as s being crammed with warm cock.

Jim wasn't being gentle, he was going to fuck this bitch, and with each rough shove his cock the hilt in Shere's cunt. She spread her legs wide and wrapped them around Jim and felt tha feeling, the feeling of having a hard cock filling her cunt after an intense orgasm. She watch kneeled beside her and wiped the sweat from her bobbing forehead and used it to lubricate watched as his hands stroked up and down the shiny length, it was big and thick with a large veins; half of it was covered in dark hair like a wild animal. The balls were huge and hairy an smell his scent and she loved it. Jims attack grew more violent and she closed her eyes and assaulted her cunt. Hank stared with lust as Shere's tits jumped and rolled each time Jim po

Jim saw Shere close her eyes and when she bit her lip he couldn't hold off, his cock felt so g slut, she was so sexy and such a whore, he felt it, that feeling, he stiffened and grunted and exploded. "Ohhh pump it..." Shere exclaimed as she felt his hot cum. She kept her legs tight Jim and with each jerk of his body more hot cum pumped into her.

Finally Jim's body relaxed and he moved from between her legs, but as soon as Jim pulled place and Shere's head was bobbing and her tits were jumping again.

Jim watched Shere's tits bounce every time Hank violently shoved his cock into her cunt, an chest until his semi-hard cock was right between those heaving breasts. Left over cum seep his cock and mixed with the slick sweat of her tits.

"You're a dirty little bitch aren't you," he said "such a fucking slut." and he scooped up a han from the ground and covered her sweat dripping tits, smearing it over her pleasure wrought

"You like that you dirty cumslut?"

"Oh" she moaned through the cock pounding Hank was giving her, "I'm a ... uhh.. a dirty slut me in it,, uhh, yes, oh god fuck me, fuck me you bastards!"

"Jim!" Hank yelled "Work her clit while I fuck her! I wanna see it!"

Jim reached around, "Yea, I'll work that little cock until she's cumming all over the place." an Shere's clit between his finger and thumb and rolled it back and forth each time Hanks cock cunt.

With Hanks thick cock pounding her cunt and Jims fingers stroking her clit it was almost to n being sexually dominated by these men, she couldn't make it stop even if she had wanted it that feeling was coming back, that feeling of cum, she felt it rising up in her, with the fingers clit and the cock in her cunt, it sent her over the top again, and she was cumming and her hi shuddering and nothing else mattered but orgasm. Jim grabbed her behind the head and ro sucking in the hot breath and the moans of her orgasm. When Hank felt her hips spasm he was cumming again and it set him off, he gave a final shove and started filling Shere's cunt, inside her with each spurt of cum.

Shere's orgasm slowed, Jim let her head drop, and Hank slowly pulled out of her cunt, and overflowed. He scooped it in his hand and coated the hair between her legs until it was matt cum, and he brought a handful up to her head and smeared her dirt covered face with it unti shiny. Shere opened her mouth and licked Hanks cum soaked hand.

But Jim didn't stop working her clit; he sat straddling her and kept stroking.

"Please" Shere said "that's enough....enough."

But Jim hadn't had enough, he had seen Hank pound her cunt, he had seen those hips spas orgasm from her full lips, he saw her face being coated in thick cum, and he saw that big clit throb between his fingers, and he was going to make her cum again and he didn't care how going to make this bitch cum until she passed out.

Shere tried to move Jim off her stomach but he was too heavy. She saw that Jims cock was
"Oh please....stop...." she cried.

"Hank, hold her legs, I'm gonna work this clit until she cums again!"

Hank put his weight on Shere's legs, spreading them apart, and held them still. Shere raised elbows but she was helpless. "You fuckers.....ohh what are you doing....!" she yelled.

"Jesus no!" she moaned shaking her head as Hanks hand shoved into her cum filled cunt ar and out.

God what was happening, she couldn't move, her clit, the hand in her cunt, it was too much, second orgasm, she laid back down and cursed the son of a bitches, and panted, arching he hips, and felt her poor clit being mauled.

Jim's fingers stroked and stroked and Hank spit on her clit to lubricate it, the hood was movi with the stroking and the knob was swollen and red, and Hanks fingers were buried in her st other hand was grabbing her nipples, and Shere's fingers ground into the dirt.

"You bastards.....you fucking bastards....ohh fuck, fuck, fuck" she moaned over and over aga

After minutes Shere started gulping huge breathes of air, Jim and Hank felt her hips try to lif violent shuddering wracked her body, she lifted her head and chest up and started grunting.
guuhh" she grunted over and over again each grunt coinciding with a spasm of her hips.

She was cumming again, and cumming hard. She was locked in that doubled up position, ha her tits were shaking, stomach muscles standing out from the strain, sweat dripping off her f open mouth; each breath blew sprays of spit and sweat. Then she collapsed, tipped her hea face contorted, and as the shuddering continued she just moaned weakly.

Finally her poor body stopped its shaking and she went limp, her eyes were half open and h was barely aware when Jim entered her roughly and started fucking her again and she didn' cock was growing in size, ready to take Jims place, and she didn't even notice that her head her tits were jumping as she was fucked for the third and fourth time.

As I lay on the bed and listened to this story and I saw Shere's dirt, sweat, and cum streaked hold out any longer, I pumped my hard cock and blew hot cum all over her. She closed her e

About a week after Shere's adventure there was a knock on our door and there was Hank. H said he wanted to apologize; he said he had noticed the wedding ring on Shere's finger that let it stop him and he really felt bad about it. And he figured that I would more than likely sho both Shere and I told him not to worry, Shere said that she had gotten just what she had wa except that her back and bottom were still bruised and sore. Hank laughed and said that his sore too!

Turns out Jim had been visiting from afar but Hank lives just five miles away. We invited him he wasn't a helluva nice guy. Shere really likes him, calls him her great big teddy bear, and over on four different occasions now, and he and I have double fucked Shere at least six tim

Life is good.

ÉÍÍÍ

Things Fall Apart
Impermanence
Rediscovery
Peace at Last
Noble Path

The Young Weaver
The Dull Young Monk
A Disciple of Sariputta Thera
Uposatha the Goddess
Truths

Appendix/Glossary

****

A Word from the Translator

"The Fundamentals of Vipassana Meditation" is a series of lectures delivered by the Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw during the New Year Holidays of the Burmese Era 1320 (1959). The lectures first appeared in book form in 1961, and have ever since enjoyed such popularity with the readers that they have run to several editions. This is their first English translation.

As the reader will see in the following pages, the lectures were addressed to lay listeners - people were totally new. As such the Sayadaw took great pains to make his language plain, easy and direct to the point, and led his listeners stage by simple stage from such basic facets as differentiation between calm and insight meditations to such intricate aspects of the Dhamma as reality and concept, process of consciousness and thought-moments, stages of progress in mind development and realization of Nibbana. The listener - or reader in our case - begins with the very first lesson: what insight is, how it is developed. He is then instructed how to begin his work, how to progress, how to be on his guard against pitfalls in the course of his training, and, most important of all, how to know when he "knows". He is thrilled, encouraged, and made to feel as if he were already on the path to bliss.

Buddhism is a practical religion, a creed to live by - not just another system of metaphysical philosophy as most outsiders are wont to imagine it to be. It examines the ills of this sentient life, discovers their cause, prescribes the removal of the cause, and points the Way to the release from all suffering. Anyone desirous of liberation can walk along the Way. But he must make the effort to step and walk. No-one will pick him up and offer him a free ride to Peace Eternal.

You yourself must make the effort.
Buddhas only point the way.
Those who have entered the Path and who meditate will be freed from the fetter of illusion.

(-Dhammapada 276)

What then is the Way to liberation? The Buddha himself tells us in the Satipatthana Sutta that there is but One Way - the Way of establishing mindfulness. It is this establishing of mindfulness that serves as the corner-stone of the whole system of insight meditation expounded and popularised by the Ven Mahasi Sayadaw for half a century now.

Here one must not forget the fact that preaching Vipassana is quite unlike the preaching of any other aspect of the Buddha's teaching, say, its moral or meta-physical portions. This most scholars versed in the scriptures can do. But Vipassana is something that only experience can convince. The Buddha himself (or, more correctly, the Bodhisatta) searched for the Way, found it, traversed it himself, and only then did he teach it to beings from his experience.

"Even so have I, monks, seen an ancient way, an ancient road followed by the wholly Awakened Ones of olden times....Along that have I gone, and the matters that I have come to know fully as I was going along it I have told to the monks, nuns, men and women layfollowers.....

Sam. ii 105

The Ven Mahasi Sayadaw, on his part, took up the Way pointed out to all of us by the Buddha, realized the Dhamma, and then spoke to his disciples from his experience. They, too, have realized the Dhamma. About this the Sayadaw says in his lectures:

"Here in the audience are lots of meditators who have come to this stage of knowledge. I am not speaking from my own experience alone. No, not even from the experience of forty or fifty disciples of mine. There are hundreds of them." (Today the number is by hundreds of thousands - Translator)

One attribute of the Buddha's Dhamma is that "it is a come-and-see thing (ehipassiko)" Millions came and saw it well over 2500 years ago. And today hundreds of thousands more will follow them, as we can see in the meditation centres the world over. It only remains to the aspirant after liberation to awake and join the multitude in their march. This book sets out the plan of the Way that lies ahead of him. It is, as the noted scholar in the foreword to the Myanmar edition remarks, not the kind of book one reads for reading's sake. It is to be his guide as he ventures from one stage of higher wisdom to another.

In translating this book, I have tried to reproduce in English all that the Sayadaw has to say in his Myanmar lectures. But I have not attempted a literal translation nor have I turned out an abridged, free version. I have avoided repetitions so characteristic of spoken language, and have left untranslated all the mnemonic verses that accompany the Sayadaw's lectures. Excepting these I have kept the word of the Sayadaw intact and every effort has been made to retain his simple, straight-forward and lucid style.

For translation of the Pali texts quoted by the Sayadaw in his work I have relied mostly on such noted scholars as Dr. Rhys Davids, F.L. Woodward, I.B. Horner, Nyanatiloka, Nyanamoli and Pe Maung Tin, with modifications here and there. I must record my indebtedness to them.

M T N

Yangon, 3 March 1981

****

FUNDAMENTALS OF VIPASSANA MEDITATION

Introductory

Today insight meditation needs no special introduction. Everybody is saying that it is good. The contrary was the case twenty years ago. People thought insight meditation was meant for monks and recluses and not for them. When we began preaching insight meditation we had had a hard time doing so. The situation has changed now. Today people keep asking us to lecture on insight. But when we begin telling them the simple facts of insight meditation, they seem unable to appreciate them. Some even rise and go away. One should not blame them. They have had no grounding in meditation to understand anything.

Some think calm is insight. Some talk of insight meditation as nothing different from calm meditation. The insight meditation as preached by some people, though high-sounding in language, proves just impossible in practice. Their listeners are left in confusion. For the benefit of such people we will talk about the elements of insight meditation.

Calm and Insight

What do we meditate on? How do we develop insight? This is a very important question.

There are two kinds of meditation: meditating to develop calm and meditating to develop insight. Meditating on the ten kasina devices only gives rise to calm, not insight. Meditating on the ten foul things (a swollen corpse, for example), too, only gives rise to calm, not insight. The ten recollections, like remembering the Buddha, the Dhamma and others, too, can develop calm and not insight. Meditating on the thirty-two parts of the body, like hair, nails, teeth, skin- these too are not insight. They develop only concentration.

Mindfulness as to respiration is also concentration-developing. But one can develop insight from it. Visuddhimagga, however, includes it in the concentration subjects and so we will call it as such here.

Then there are the four divine states, loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity, and the four formless states leading to formless jhanas. Then, there is the meditation on the loathsomeness of food. All these are subjects for concentration-meditation.

When you meditate on the four elements inside your body, it is called the analysis of the four elements. Although this is a concentration meditation, it helps develop insight as well.

All these forty subjects of meditation are subjects for developing concentration. Only respiration and analysis of elements have to do with insight. The others will not give rise to insight. If you want insight, you will have to work further.

To come back to our question, how do we develop insight? The answer is: we develop insight by meditating on the five aggregates of grasping. The mental and material qualities in beings are aggregates of grasping. They may be grasped with delight by craving in which case it is called "grasping of the sense objects" - or they may be grasped wrongly by wrong views - in which case it is called "grasping through wrong views". You have to meditate on them and see them as they really are. If you don't, you will grasp them with craving and wrong views. Once you see them as they are, you no longer grasp them. In this way you develop insight. We will discuss the five aggregates of grasping in detail.

Aggregates

The five aggregates of grasping are matter or form, feelings, perception, volitional activities and consciousness. What are they> They are the things you experience all the time. You do not have to go anywhere else to find them. They are in you. When you see, they are there in the seeing. When you hear, they are there in the hearing. When you smell, taste, touch, or think, they are there in the smelling, tasting, touching or thinking.

When you bend, stretch or move your limbs, the aggregates are there in the bending, stretching or moving. Only you do not know them to be aggregates. It is because you have not meditated on them and so do not know them as they really are. Not knowing them as they are, you grasp them with craving and wrong view.

What happens when you bend? It begins with the intention to bend. Then come the material properties of bending one by one. Now in the intention to bend there are the four mental aggregates. The mind that intends to bend is the consciousness. When you think of bending and then bend, you may feel happy, or unhappy, or neither happy nor unhappy, doing so. If you bend with happiness, there is pleasant feeling. If you bend with unhappiness or anger, there is unpleasant feeling. If you bend with neither happiness nor unhappiness, there is neutral feeling. So, when you think of bending, there is the 'feeling' aggregate. Then there is perception, the aggregate that recognizes the bending. Then there is the mental state that urges you to bend. It seems as though it were saying "Bend! Bend!" It is the volitional activities. Thus, in the intention to bend, you have feelings, perception, volitional activities and consciousness-all four mental aggregates. The movement of bending is matter or form. It is the material aggregate. So, the intention to bend and the bending together make up the five aggregates.

Thus in one bending of the arm there are five aggregates: You move once and the five aggregates come up. You move again and there are more of the five aggregates. If you have not meditated on them rightly and have not known them rightly, what happens we need not tell you. You know for yourselves.

Well, you think "I intend to bend" and "I bend" don't you? Everybody does. Ask the children, they will give the same answer. Ask adults who can read and write, the same answer still if he will say what he has in his mind. But because he is well-read he may invent answers to suit the scriptures and say "Mind and matter". It is not what he knows for himself. Only inventions to suit the scriptures. In his heart of hearts he is thinking: "It is I who intend to bend. It is I who bend. It is I who intend to move. It is I who move." He also thinks: "This I have been before; am now, and will be in the future. I exist for ever." This thinking is called the notion of permanence. Nobody thinks, "This intention to bend exists only now." Ordinary people always think, "This mind existed before. The same I that have existed before am now thinking of bending." They also think: "This thinking I exists now and will go on existing."

When you bend, or move the limbs, you think: "It is the same limbs that have existed that are moving now. It is the same I that have existed that am moving now. "After moving you again think, "These limbs, this I, always exist." It never occurs to you that they pass away. This too is the notion of permanence. It is clinging to what is impermanent as permanent, clinging to what is no personality, no ego, as personality, as ego.

Then, as you have bent or stretched to your desire, you think it is very nice. For example, as you feel the stiffness in the arm, you move or rearrange it and the stiffness is gone. You feel comfortable. You think it is very nice. You think it is happiness. Dancers and amateur dancers bend and stretch as they dance and think it is very nice to do so. They delight in it and are pleased with themselves. When you converse among yourselves you often shake you hands and heads and are pleased. You think it is happiness. When something you are doing meets with success, again you think it is good, it is happiness. This is how you delight through craving and clinging to things. What is impermanent you take to be permanent and delight in. What is not happiness, not personality, but just aggregates of mind and matter, you take to be happiness, or personality, and delight in. You delight in them and cling to them. You mistake them for self and ego and cling to them, too.

So, when you bend, stretch or move your limbs, the thinking "I will bend" is aggregate of grasping. The bending is the aggregate of grasping. The thinking "I will stretch" is the aggregate of grasping. The stretching is the aggregate of grasping. The thinking "I will move" is the aggregate of grasping. The moving is the aggregate of grasping. When we speak of aggregates of grasping to be meditated on, we mean just these things.

The same thing happens in seeing, hearing etc. When you see, the seat of seeing, the eye, is manifest. So is the object seen. Both are material things. They cannot cognize. But if one fails to meditate while seeing, one grasps them. One thinks the whole body with the eye is permanent, happy, self, and grasps it. One thinks the whole material world with the object seen is permanent, beautiful, good, happy, and self, and grasps it. So the form eye and the form visible object are aggregates of grasping.

And when you see, the "seeing" is manifest, too. It is the four mental aggregates. The mere awareness of seeing is the aggregate consciousness. Pleasure or displeasure at seeing is the aggregate feeling. What perceives the object seen is the aggregate perception. What brings the attention to see is the aggregate volitional activities. They constitute the four mental aggregates.

If one fails to meditate while seeing, one is inclined to think that seeing "has existed before, and exists now." Or, as one sees good things, one may think "seeing is good". So thinking, one goes after good and strange things to enjoy seeing. One goes to watch plays and films at the expense of money, sleep and health because one thinks it is good to do so. If one does not think it is good, one will not go to waste money or impair one's health. To think that what sees or enjoys is "I", "I am enjoying", is to grasp with craving and wrong view. Because they grasp, the mind and matter that manifest themselves in seeing are said to be aggregates of grasping.

You grasp in the same way in hearing, smelling, tasting, touching or thinking. You grasp all the more to the mind that thinks, imagines and reflects as being the I, the ego. So, the five aggregates of grasping are none other than the mental-material things that manifest themselves at the six doors whenever one sees, hears, feels, or perceives. You must try to see these aggregates as they are. To meditate on them and see them as they are - that is insight knowledge.

Knowledge and Freedom

"Insight meditation is meditating on the five aggregates of grasping." This is in accordance with the teaching of the Buddha. The teachings of the Buddha are called suttas, which means "thread". When a carpenter is about to plane down or saw off a piece of timber he draws a straight line using a thread. In the same way when we want to live the holy life we use the "thread" or sutta to draw straight lines in our actions. The Buddha has given us lines or instructions on how to train in morality, develop concentration and make become wisdom. You cannot go out of the line and speak or act as you please. Regarding the meditation of the five aggregates, here are a few excerpts from the suttas:

"Material shape, monks, is impermanent. What is impermanent, that is suffering. What is suffering, that is not the self. What is not self, that is not mine, that I am not, this is not my self. As it really comes to be, one should discern it thus by right wisdom." (S.ii,19.)

You must meditate so that you will realize this impermanent, suffering, not-self material form is really impermanent, dreadfully suffering and without a self or ego. You should meditate likewise on feelings, perception, activities, and consciousness. What is the use of looking upon these aggregates as impermanent, suffering and non-self? The Buddha tells us

"So seeing all these things, the instructed disciple of the Ariyans disregards material shape, disregards feeling and so on." (S.iii,68)

He who realizes the impermanent, suffering, not-self nature of the five aggregates is wearied of material form as he is of feelings, perception, activities and consciousness.

"By disregarding he is passionless"

That is to say, he has reached the Ariyan Path.

"Through passionlessness, he is freed"

Once he has reached the Ariyan path of passionlessness, he has arrived at the Four Fruitions of freedom from the defilements, too.

"In freedom the knowledge comes to be 'I am freed'"

When you are freed, you know for yourself that you are so. In other words, when you have become an Arahant in whom the defilements are extinguished, you know that defilements are extinguished.

All these excerpts are from Yad anicca Sutta and there are numerous suttas of this kind. The whole Khandhavagga Samyutta is a collection of them. Two of these suttas are especially noteworthy: Silavanta Sutta and Sutavanta Sutta. In both suttas the Venerable Maha Kotthika puts some questions to the Venerable Sariputta, who gives very brief but vivid answers. Maha Kotthika asks:

"What things friend Sariputta, should be attended to correctly by a monk of pure moral habit?"

Note the attribute "of moral habit" in this question. If you want to practise insight meditation with a view to attaining the Path, Fruition and Nibbana, the least qualification you need is to be of pure moral habit. If you don't even have pure moral habit, you can't hope for the higher conditions of concentration and wisdom. The Venerable Sariputta answers:

"The five aggregates of grasping friend Kotthika, are the things which should be correctly attended to by a monk of pure moral habit, as being impermanent, suffering, as a disease, as a boil, as a dart, as unwholesome as illness, as alien, as void of self, as decay."

What is the good of meditating like that? In answer the Venerable Sariputta goes on,

"Indeed, friend, it is a possibility that a monk of pure moral habit so correctly attending to these five aggregates of grasping "as impermanent and so on may realize the fruits of Stream-winning."

So, if you want to be a Stream-winner and never to be reborn in the four lower states, you have to meditate on the five aggregates of grasping to realize their impermanence, suffering and not-self nature.

But that is not all. You can become an Arahant, too. The Venerable Maha Kotthika goes on to ask,

"What things friend Sariputta, should be attended to correctly by a monk who is a Stream-winner?"

The Venerable Sariputta answers that it is the same five aggregates of grasping that should be correctly attended to by a Stream-winner, as impermanent, suffering, not-self. The result? He moves on to Once-returning. What does a Once-returner meditate on? Again the same five aggregates of grasping. He then becomes a Non-returner. What does a Non-returner meditate on? The five aggregates again. Now he becomes an Arahant. What does an Arahant meditate on? The five aggregates again. From this it is clear that the five aggregates are the things one has to meditate on even when one has become an Arahant.

What good is it to the Arahant by meditating so? Will he become a silent Buddha? Or, a Supreme Buddha? No, neither. He will end his round of rebirths as an Arahant and enter Nibbana. The Arahant has no defilements left unremoved or uncalmed. All the defilements have been removed and calmed. So, he has nothing to develop in order to remove the defilements left unremoved or to calm those left uncalmed. Neither has he any moral habit, concentration or wisdom yet to perfect. All the moral habits, concentration and wisdom that ought to be perfected have been perfected in him. So, he has no need to work for the perfection of what ought to be perfected, nor has he any need to increase those already perfected. The insight practice brings no such benefits to the Arahant.

One of the benefits the Arahant receives by meditating on the five aggregates is living with happiness in this world. Notwithstanding his being an Arahant, if he remains without meditation, disquiet and discomfort keep coming up at the six sense-doors, now here, now there. Here, disquiet does not mean mental distress. As the sense-objects keep coming up despite himself, he finds no peacefulness of mind. That is all. Not to speak of, even our meditators of today who are immersed in the practice feel ill at ease when meeting with the sense objects. As they return home from the meditation centre, they see this thing, hear that thing, get engaged in such and such business talks, and there is no peace at all. So they come back to the centre. To others however, the disquiet does not last very long. Just four, five or ten days. Very soon the homely spirit gets the better of them and they are happy with their home life and set to household cares again. The Arahant never returns to his old habits. If he meets with various sense-objects without meditation, only disquiet results. Only when he is absorbed in insight meditation does he find peacefulness of mind. Thus meditating on the five aggregates of grasping brings to the living with happiness in this world.

Again, as he lives in earnest meditation, mindfulness and comprehension of the impermanence, suffering and not-self keep rising in him. This is another benefit. The Arahant in whom mindfulness and comprehension keep rising through meditation is said to be called satata-vihari (one who dwells with meditation constantly). Such a one can enjoy the attainment to fruition at any time and for as long as he desires. For these two benefits- a happy living in the very life and mindfulness and comprehension the Arahant lives in meditation.

The above are the answers given by the Venerable Sariputta in the Silavanta Sutta. The same answers are found in Sutavanta Sutta too. The only difference is in the terms silavanta, "of moral habit" or "virtuous" and sutavanta, "instructed" or "well-informed". All the other words are the same. Based on these two suttas and other suttas on the aggregate the dictum has been formulated:

"Insight knowledge comes from meditating on the five aggregates of grasping."

Now to come back to the grasping that rises through the six sense-doors.

When people see, they think of themselves or others as being permanent, as having existed before, as existing now, as going to exist in future, as existing always. They think of them as being happy, good, or beautiful. They think of them as being living entities. They think likewise when they hear, smell, taste or touch. This "touch" is widespread all over the body- wherever there is flesh and blood. And wherever touch arises, there arises grasping. The bending, stretching, or moving of the limbs mentioned earlier are all instances of touch. So are the tense movements of rising and falling in the abdomen. We will come to this in detail later.

When one thinks or imagines, one thinks, "The I that has existed before is now thinking; thinking, I go on existing," and thus one thinks of oneself as being permanent, as an ego. One also thinks the thinking or imagining as being enjoyable, as being very nice. One thinks it is happiness. If told that the thinking will disappear, he cannot accept it. He is not pleased. This is because he is clinging to it.

In this way one clings to whatever comes through the six sense-doors as being permanent, as being happy, as ego, as self. One delights with craving and clings to it. One mistakes with wrong view and clings to it. You have to meditate on these five aggregates that can be clung to or grasped.

The Right Method

When you meditate, you have to meditate with method. Only the right method can bring about insight. If you look upon things as being permanent, how can there be insight? If you look upon them as being happy, beautiful, as soul, as ego, how can there be insight?

Mind and matter are impermanent things. These impermanent things you have to meditate on to see them as they really are, as being impermanent. They rise and pass away and keep on oppressing you, so they are dreadful, they are sufferings. You have to meditate to see them as they are, as sufferings. They are processes lacking in a personality, a soul, a self. You have to meditate to see that there is no personality, no soul, no self. You must try to see them as they really are.

So, every time you see, hear, touch or perceive, you must try to see the mental and material processes that rise through the six sense doors as they really are. This you must note 'seeing, seeing'. In the same way, when you hear, note 'hearing'. When you smell, note 'smelling'. When you touch, note 'touching'. Tiredness, hotness, aches and such unbearable and unpleasant sensations arise from contact too. Observe them: tiredness, hot, pain, and so on. Thoughts, ideas, may also turn up. Note them: 'thinking', 'imagining', 'desire', 'pleasure', 'delight', as they arise. But for the beginner it is hard to observe all that comes up through the six sense doors. He must begin with just a few.

You meditate on this. When you breathe in and out, the way the abdomen moves rising and falling is especially conspicuous. You begin observing this movement. The movement of rising you observe as 'rising'. The movement of falling you observe as 'falling'. This observation of rising and falling is void of the lingo of the scriptures. People who are not used to meditational practice speak of it in contempt: "This rising and falling business has nothing to do with the scriptures. It is nothing." Well may they think it is nothing because it is not done up in scriptural language.

In essence, however, it IS something. The rising is real, the falling is real, the moving air-element is real. We have used the colloquial words 'rising' and 'falling' for convenience's sake. In scriptural terminology, the rising-falling is the air-element. If you observe the abdomen attentively as it rises and falls, the distendedness is there, the motion is there, the conveying is there. Here, the "distendedness" is the characteristic of the air-element, the motion is its property, and the conveying is its manifestation. To know the air-element as it really is means to know its characteristic, property and manifestation. We meditate to know them. Insight begins with the defining of mind and matter. To achieve this the meditator begins with the matter. How?

"The (meditator) should..... comprehend by way of characteristic, function and so on" (Visuddhimagga ii 227.)

When you begin meditating on matter or mind, you should do so by way of either the characteristic or the property (function). "And so on" refers to the manifestation (mode of appearance). In this connection the Compendium of Philosophy is quite to the point.

"Purity of view is the understanding of mind and matter with respect to their characteristics, function (property), mode of appearance (manifestation) and proximate cause."

The meaning is this: insight begins with the analytical knowledge of mind and matter. In the seven stages of purity, first you perfect the purity of morals and the purity of mind, and then you begin the purity of views. To achieve the analytical knowledge of mind and matter and the purity of views, you have to meditate on mind and matter and know them by way of their characteristics, property (function), manifestation and proximate cause. Once you know them thus, you gain the analytical knowledge of mind and matter. Once this knowledge matures, you develop the purity of views.

Here, "to know them by way of their characteristics" means to know the intrinsic nature of mind and matter. To know "by way of property" is to know their function. Manifestation is their mode of appearance. It is not yet necessary to know the proximate cause at the initial stage of meditational practice. So we will just go on to explain the characteristics, function and manifestation.

In both the Path of Purity and the Compendium of Philosophy just quoted it is not indicated that mind and matter should be meditated on by name, by number, as substance of material particles or as incessantly coming up processes. It is only shown that they should be meditated on by way of their characteristics, function and manifestation. One should take careful note of this. If not, one can be led to concepts of names, numbers, particles or processes. The commentaries say that you should meditate on mind and matter by way of their characteristics, function and manifestation, and so when you meditate on the air-element, you do so by way of its characteristics, function and manifestation. What is the characteristic of the air-element? It is the characteristic of support. This is its intrinsic nature. The air-element is just this. What is the function of the air-element? It is moving. What is its manifestation? It is conveying. Manifestation is what appears to the meditator's intellect. As one meditates on the air-element, it appears to the meditator's intellect as something conveying, pushing and pulling. This is the manifestation of the air-element. As you meditate on the rising-falling of the abdomen, all the distended, moving, conveying, become clear to you. These are the characteristic, function and manifestation of the air-element. This air-element is important. In sections on postures and comprehension, contemplation of the body, Satipatthana-sutta, the commentator has laid emphasis on the air-element. Here is the Buddha's teaching:

"Gacchanto va gacchami ti pajanati."

(When he walks, he is aware 'I am walking.')

The Buddha is instructing us to be mindful of the form walking by noting 'Walking, Walking' every time we walk. How knowledge is developed from meditating thus is explained by the commentator:

"The thought I am walking arises. This produces air. The air produces the intimation. The bringing forward of the whole body as the air-element spreads is said to be walking."

The meaning is this: The meditator who is used to meditating 'walking, walking' every time he walks realizes like this. First the idea 'I will walk' arises. This intention gives rise to tense movement all over the body, which in turn cause the material body to move forward move by move. Thus we say "I walk," or "He walks." In reality there is no I or He that walks. Only the intention to walk and the form walking. This the meditator realizes. Here, in this explanation of the Commentary, the emphasis is on the realization of the moving of the air-element. So, if you understand the air-element by way of its characteristics, function and manifestation, you can decide for yourself whether your meditation is right or not.

The air-element has the characteristic of support. In a football it is air that fills and supports so that the ball expands and remains firm. In colloquial speech we say that the ball is full and firm. In philosophical terms the air-element is in support. When you stretch your arm you feel some stiffness there. It is the air-element in support. In the same way when you press an air-pillow or mattress with your body or head, your body or head will not come down but stay high above. It is because the air-element in the pillow or mattress is supporting you. Bricks pile up as the ones below support those above. If the bricks below are not supporting, the ones above will tumble down. In the same way the human body is full of the air-element which gives support to it so that it can stand stiff and firm. We say "firm" relatively. If there is something firmer, we will call it "lax." If there is something more lax, it becomes firm again.

The function of the air-element is moving. It moves from place to place when it is strong. It is the air-element that makes the body bend, stretch, sit, rise, go or come. Those unpractised in insight meditation often say, "if you note 'bending, stretching', only concepts like arms will appear to you. If you note 'left, right' only concepts like legs will appear to you. If you note 'rising, falling', only concepts like the abdomen will appear to you." This may be true to some of the beginners, but it is not true to think that the concepts will keep coming up. Both concepts and realities appear to the beginner. Some people instruct the beginners to meditate on realities only. This is impossible. To forget concepts is quite impracticable at the beginning. What is practicable is to observe concepts combine with realities. The Buddha himself used the language of concepts and told us to be aware 'I am walking' etc. when we walk, bend or stretch. He did not use the language of realities and tell us to be aware 'It is supporting, moving' etc. Although you meditate using the language of concepts like 'walking, bending, stretching', as your mindfulness and concentration grow stronger, all the concepts disappear and only the realities like support and moving appear to you. When you reach the stage of the knowledge of dissolution, although you meditate 'walking, walking', neither the legs nor the body appear to you. Only the successive movements are there. Although you meditate 'bending, bending', there will not be any arms or legs. Only the movement. Although you meditate 'rising, falling', there will be no image of the abdomen or the body. Only the movement out and in. These as well as swaying are the functions of the air-element.

What appears to be bringing out or drawing in to the meditator's mind is the manifestation of the air-element. When you bend or stretch your arm, it appears something is drawing it in or pushing it out. It is plainer when walking. To the meditator whose concentration is grown sharper by noting 'walking, right step, left step, lifting, putting forward, putting down' this moving forward as if being driven from behind becomes quite plain. The legs seem to be pushing forward of their own accord. How the move forward occurs without the meditator making any effort is very plain. It is so good walking noting like this that some spend a lot of time on it.

So when you meditate on the air-element, you should know it by way of its characteristic of support, its function of moving, and its manifestation of conveying. Only then is your knowledge right and as it should be.

You may ask, "Are we to meditate only after learning the characteristic, function and manifestation?" No. You need not learn them. If you meditate on the rising mind-and-matter, you know the characteristic, the function and the manifestation as well. There is no other way than knowing by way of the characteristic, function and manifestation when you meditate on the rising mind-and-matter. When you look up to the sky on a rainy day you see a flash of lightning. This bright light is the characteristic of lightning. As lightning flashes, darkness is dispelled. This dispelling of darkness is the function of lightning, its work. You also see what it is like- whether it is long, short, a curve, a circle, straight or vast. You see its characteristic, its function, its manifestation, all at once. Only you may not be able to say the brightness is its characteristic, dispelling of darkness is its function, or its shape or outline is its manifestation. But you see them all the same.

In the same way, when you meditate on the rising mind and matter, you know its characteristic, its function, its manifestation, everything. You need not learn them. Some learned persons think that you have to learn them before you meditate. Not so. What you learn are only concepts not realities. The meditator who is contemplating the rising mind and matter knows them as if he were touching them with his own hand. He need not learn about them. If there is an elephant before your very eyes, you do not need to look at the picture of an elephant.

The meditator who is meditating on the rising and falling of the abdomen knows the firmness or laxity thereof- its characteristic.

He knows the moving in or out- its function. He also knows its bringing in and pushing out- its manifestation. If he knows these things as they really are, does he need to learn about them? Not if he wants the realization for himself. But if he wants to preach to others, he will need to learn about them.

When you meditate 'right step, left step', you know the tenseness in every step- its characteristic. You know the moving about- its function. And you know its conveying- its manifestation. This is proper knowledge, the right knowledge.

Now, to know for yourselves how one can discern the characteristic and so on by just meditating on what rises, try doing some meditation. You certainly have some hotness, pain, tiredness, ache, somewhere in your body now. These are unpleasant feelings hard to bear. Concentrate on this unpleasantness with your intellect and note 'hot, hot, or pain, pain'. You will find that you are going through an unpleasant experience and suffering. This is the characteristic of suffering- going through an unpleasant experience.

When this unpleasant feeling comes about, you become low-spirited. If the unpleasantness is little, there is a little low-spiritedness. If it is great, then low-spiritedness is great too. Even those who are of a strong will have their spirits go low if the unpleasant feelings are intense. Once you are very tired. You can't even move. This making the spirit go low is the function of unpleasant feeling. We have said "spirit" the mind. When the mind is low, its concomitants get low too.

The manifestation of unpleasant feeling is physical oppression. It manifests itself as a physical affliction, something unbearable, to the meditator's intellect. As he meditates 'hot, hot, pain, pain', it comes up to him as something oppressing in the body, something very hard to bear. It shows up so much that you have to groan.

If you meditate on the unpleasant feeling in your body as it rises, you know the undergoing of undesirable tangible object- its characteristic, the withering of associated states- its function, and the physical affliction- its manifestation. This is the way the meditators gain knowledge.

The Mind

You can meditate on mind, too. Mind cognizes and thinks. So what thinks and imagines is mind. Meditate on this mind as 'thinking, imagining, pondering', whenever it arises. You will find that it has the intrinsic nature of going to the object, cognizing the object. This is the characteristic of mind, as it is said, "Mind has the characteristic of cognizing." Every kind of mind cognizes. The consciousness of seeing cognizes the object, as do the consciousness of hearing, smelling, tasting, touching and thinking.

When you work in collective, you have a leader. Consciousness is the leader that cognizes the object that appears at any sense door. When the visible object comes up to the eye, consciousness cognizes it first of all. It is then followed by feeling, perception, desire, delight, dislike, admiration and so on. In the same way, when the audible object comes up to the ear, it is consciousness that cognizes it first. It is more obvious when you think or imagine. If an idea comes up while you are meditating 'rising, falling', etc. you have to note the idea. If you can note it the moment it appears, it disappears immediately. If you can't, several of its followers like delight, desire, will come in succession. Then the meditator realizes how consciousness is the leader- its function.

"Mind precedes things." (Dhammapada,1.)

If you note consciousness whenever it arises, you see very clearly how it is acting as leader, now going to that object.

Again the following is said in the Commentary: "Consciousness has the manifestation of continuity." As you meditate 'rising, falling' etc., the mind sometimes wanders away. You note it and it disappears. Then another consciousness comes up. You note it and it disappears. Again another consciousness appears. Again you note it and again it disappears. Again another comes up. You have to note lots of such comings up and going away of consciousness. The meditator comes to realize: "Consciousness is a succession of events that come up and go away one after another. When one disappears, another appears." Thus you realize the continuous manifestation of consciousness. The meditator who realizes this also realizes death and birth. "Death is nothing strange after all. It is just like the passing away of each moment of consciousness I have been noting. To be born again is like the coming up of the consciousness I am now noting that has risen in continuation of the one before.

To show that one can understand the characteristic, function and manifestation of things even though one has not learnt about them, we have taken the air-element out of the material qualities and the unpleasant feeling and consciousness out of the mental qualities. You just have to meditate on them as they arise. The same applies to all the other mental and material qualities. If you meditate on them as they arise, you will understand their characteristics, functions and manifestations. The beginner in meditation can meditate on and understand the mental-material aggregates of grasping only by way of these characteristics, functions and manifestations. At the initial stage of analytical knowledge of mind and matter and the knowledge of discerning conditionality, which are elemental in insight meditation, understanding that much is enough. When you come to real insight knowledges like the knowledge of investigation, you know the nature of impermanence, suffering and not-self as well.

What For and What Time?

The question now arises: What do we meditate on the grasping aggregates for? And, as regards time, at what time do we meditate, when they are gone, or before they come up, or when they arise?

What do we meditate for? Do we meditate on the aggregates of grasping for worldly wealth? For relief from illness? For clairvoyance? For levitation and such supernatural powers? Insight meditation aims at none of these. There have been cases of people who get cured of serious illnesses as a result of meditational practice. In the days of the Buddha persons who got perfected through insight meditation had supernatural powers. People today may have such powers if they get perfected. But fulfilment of these powers is not the basic aim of insight meditation.

Shall we meditate on phenomena past and gone? Shall we meditate on phenomena not yet come? Shall we meditate on the present phenomena? Or, shall we meditate on phenomena which are neither past, future nor present, but which we can imagine as we have read about them in books? The answer to these questions is: we meditate not to grasp and we meditate on what is arising.

Yes, people not practised in meditation grasp at the rising mind and matter every time they see, hear, touch, or become aware of. They grasp at them with craving, being pleased with them. They grasp at them with wrong views, taking them as permanent, happy, as the I, or the ego. We meditate in order not to let these graspings arise, to be free from them. This is the basic aim of insight meditation.

And, we meditate on what is arising. We do not meditate on things past, future, or indefinite in time. Here we are speaking of practical insight meditation. In inferential meditation we do meditate on things past, future, and indefinite in time. Let me explain. Insight meditation is of two kinds, practical and inferential. The knowledge you gain by meditating on what actually arises by way of intrinsic characteristics and individual characteristics such as impermanence is practical insight. From this practical knowledge you infer the impermanence, suffering and not-self of things past and future, things you have not experienced. This is an inferential insight.

"The fixing of both (seen and unseen) as alike by following the object....." (-Patisambhida magga)

The Visuddhimagga explains this statement as follows:

".....by following, going after the object seen, visually determining both (the seen and the unseen) as one in intrinsic nature: 'as this (seen) one, so what goes as complex broke up in the past and will break up in the future also'" (The Path of Purity, p786.)

"The object seen" - this is practical insight. And "going after the object seen.....determining both.....in the past.....in the future" - this is inferential insight. But here note: the inferential insight is possible only after the practical. No inference can be made without first knowing the present. The same explanation is given in the Commentary on Kathavatthu:

"Seeing the impermanence of even one contemplated formation, by method one draws the conclusion as regards the others, as 'Impermanent are all formations'"

Why don't we meditate on things past or future? Because they will not make you understand the real nature and cleanse you of defilements. You do not remember your past existences. Even in this existence, you do not remember most of your childhood. So, meditating on things past, how can you know things as they really are with their characteristics and functions? Things of the more recent past may be recalled. But, as you recall them, you think, "I saw, I heard, I thought. It was I who saw at that time and it is I who am seeing now." There is the "I" notion for you. There can even be notions of permanence and happiness. So recalling things past to meditate on do not serve our purpose. You have already grasped them and this grasping cannot be removed. Although you look on them as mind and matter with all your learning and thinking, the "I" notion persists because you have already grasped it. You say "impermanent" on the one hand, you get the notion "permanent" on the other. You note suffering, but the notion "happiness" keeps turning up. You meditate on not-self, but the self notion remains strong and firm. You argue with yourself. In the end your meditation has to give way to your preconceived ideas.

The future has not yet come, and you can't be sure what exactly it will be like when it comes. You may have meditated on them in advance but may fail to do so when they turn up. Then will craving, wrong view, and defilements arise all anew. So, to meditate on the future with the help of learning and thinking is no way to know things as they really are. Nor is it the way to calm defilements.

Things of indefinite time have never existed, will not exist, and are not existing, in oneself or in others. They are just imagined by learning and thinking. They are high-sounding and look intellectual, but on reflection are found to be just concepts of names, signs and shapes. Suppose someone is meditating, "Matter is impermanent. Matter rises moment to moment and passes away moment to moment." Ask him: What matter is it? Is it matter of the past or present or the future? Matter in oneself or in others? If in oneself, is it matter in the head? The body? The limbs? The eye? The ear? You will find that it is none of these but a mere concept, an imagination such as name concept. So we do not meditate on things on indefinite time.

Origination

But the present phenomenon is what comes up at the six doors right now. It has not yet been defiled. It is like an unsoiled piece of cloth or paper. If you are quick enough to meditate on it just as it comes up, it will not be defiled. You fail to note it and it gets defiled. Once defiled, it cannot be undefiled. If you fail to note the mind-and-matter as it rises, grasping intervenes. There is grasping with craving - grasping of sense-desires. There is grasping with wrong view - grasping of wrong views, of mere rite and ritual, of a theory of a self. What if grasping takes place?

"Conditioned by grasping is becoming;

conditioned by becoming is birth;

conditioned by birth, old age and dying, grief, suffering, sorrow, despair and lamentation come into being.

Thus comes to be the origination of this entire mass of ill. (M i 333; S ii 1-2)

Grasping is no small matter. It is the root cause of good and bad deeds. One who has grasped works to accomplish what he believes are good things. Everyone of us is doing what he thinks is good. What makes him think it is good? It is grasping. Others may think it is bad, but to the doer it is good. If he thinks it is not good, of course he will not do it. There is a noteworthy passage in "Of one's work". One never thinks evil of one's work.

"A thief steals because it is good to him to steal. A robber robs people because he thinks it is good to rob. A killer kills because he thinks it is good to kill."

Ajatasattu killed his own father, King Bimbisara. He thought it was good. Deva-datta conspired against the life of the Buddha. Why, to him it was good. One who takes poison to kill himself does so because he thinks it is good. Moths rush to a flame thinking it is a very nice thing. All living things do what they do because they think it is good to do so. To think it is good is grasping. Once you are really grasped you do things. What is the outcome? Well, it is the good deeds and bad deeds.

It is a good deed to refrain from causing suffering to others. It is a good deed to render help to others. It is a good deed to give. It is a good deed to pay respect to those to whom respect is due. A good deed can bring about peace, a long life, and good health in this very life. It will bring good results in future lives, too. Such grasping is good, right grasping. Those who are thus grasped do good deeds like giving and keeping precepts and cause thereby to bring about good karma. What is the result then? "Conditioned by becoming is birth." After death they are born anew. Where are they born? In the Good Bourn, in the worlds of men and gods. As men they are endowed with such good things as a long life, beauty, health, as well as good birth, good following, and wealth. You can call them "happy people." As gods, too, they will be attended by multitudes of gods and goddesses and be living in magnificent palaces. They have grasped by notions of happiness and in a worldly sense, they can be said to be happy.

But from the point of view of the Buddha's teaching, these happy men and gods are not exempt from suffering. "Conditioned by birth are old age and dying." Although born a happy man, he will have to grow into an old "happy" man. Look at all those "happy" old people in the world. Once over seventy or eighty, not everything is all right with them. Grey hair, broken teeth, poor eyesight, poor hearing, backs bent double, wrinkles all over, energy all spent up, mere good-for-nothings! With all their wealth and big names, these old men and women, can they be happy? Then there is disease of old age. They cannot sleep well, they cannot eat well, they have difficulty sitting down or getting up. And finally, they must die. Rich man, king, or man of power, dies one day. He has nothing to rely on then. Friends and relatives there are around him, but just as he is lying there on his death-bed he closes his eyes and dies. Dying he goes away all alone to another existence. He must find it really hard to part with all his wealth. If he is not a man of good deeds, he will be worried about his future existence.

The great gods, likewise, have to die. Gods too are not spared. A week before they die, five signs appear to them. The flowers they wear which never faded now begin to fade. Their dresses which never got worn-out now appear worn-out. Sweat comes out in their armpits, an unusual thing. Their bodies which always looked young now look old. Having never felt bored in their divine lives, they now feel bored. (Itivuttaka, p.247)

When these five signs appear, they at once realize their imminent death, and are greatly alarmed. In the days of the Buddha, the Sakka (King of Gods) himself had these signs appear to him. Greatly alarmed that he was going to die and lose his glory, he came to the Buddha for help. The Buddha preached the Dhamma to him and he became a Stream-winner. The old Sakka died and was reborn as a new Sakka. It was lucky of him that the Buddha was there to save him. Had it not been for the Buddha, it would have been a disaster to the old great god.

Not only old age and dying. "...grief, suffering, sorrow, despair and lamentation come into being." All these are sufferings. "Thus comes to be the origination of this entire mass of ill." So, the good life resulting from grasping is dreadful suffering after all. Men or gods, all have to suffer.

If the good life resulting from good deeds is suffering, had we better not do them? No. If we do not do good deeds, bad deeds may come up. These can lead us to hell, to the realm of animals, to the realm of ghost, to the realm of Asuras. The sufferings of these lower planes are far worse. Human and divine life is suffering compared with the happiness of deathless Nibbana but compared with the sufferings of the lower states, human or divine life is happiness indeed.

Right grasping gives rise to good deeds. Likewise wrong grasping gives rise to bad deeds. Thinking that it is good to do so, some kill, steal, rob, do wrong to others. As a result they are reborn in bad bourn-in hell, in the realm of animals, in the realm of ghosts. To be reborn in hell is like jumping into a great fire. Even a great god can do nothing against hell fire. In the days of the Kakusandha Buddha there was a great Mara-god by the name of Dusi. He was contemptuous of the Buddha and the members of the Holy Order. One day he caused the death of the chief disciple. As a result of this cruel deed the great god died and was reborn in Avici hell. Once there he was at the mercy of the guardians of purgatory. Those people who are bullying others in this world will meet the same fate as that met by the great god Dusi one day. Then after suffering for a long time in hell, they will be reborn animals and ghosts.

How grasping arises

So grasping is dreadful. It is very important too. We meditate to let this grasping not be, to put an end to it. We meditate not to grasp with craving or wrong view - not to grasp as permanent or happy, not to grasp as self, ego, the I. Those who fail to meditate grasp whenever they see, hear, feel or perceive. Ask yourselves if you don't grasp. The answer will be too obvious.

Let's begin with seeing. Suppose you see something beautiful. What do you think of it? You are delighted with it, pleased with it, aren't you? You won't say, "I don't want to see, I don't want to look at it." In fact, you are thinking, "What a beautiful thing! How lovely!" Beaming with smiles you are pleased with it. At the same time you are thinking it is permanent. Whether the object seen is a human being or an inanimate thing, you think it has existed before, exists now, and will go on existing forever. Although it is not your own, you mentally take possession of it and delight in it. If it is a piece of clothing, you mentally put it on and are pleased. If it is a pair of sandals, you mentally put them on. If it is a human being, you mentally use him or her and are pleased, too.

The same thing happens when you hear, smell, taste or touch. You take pleasure on each occasion. With thoughts the range of your delights is far wider. You fancy and take delight in things not your own, long for them, and imagine them to be yours. If they are your own things, needless to say, you keep thinking of them and are pleased with them all the time. We meditate to check such taking delight in and grasping.

We grasp with wrong views, too. You grasp with the personality view. When you see, you think what you see is a person, an ego.

Your own consciousness of seeing, too, you take as a person, an ego. Without a thorough insight knowledge we grasp at things the moment we see them. Think of yourselves and you will see for yourselves how you have got such a grasping in you. You think of yourself as well as of others as an ego that has lived the whole life long. In reality there is no such thing. Nothing lives the whole life long. Only mind and matter rising one after another in continuation. This mind-and-matter you take as a person, ego, and grasp. We meditate to not let these graspings with wrong views be.

But we have to meditate on things as they come up. Only then will we be able to prevent the graspings. Graspings come from seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching and thinking. They come from six places - six doors. Can we cling to things we cannot see? No. Can we cling to those we cannot hear? No. The Buddha himself has asked these questions.

"Now what think you, Malunkya's son? As to those shapes cognizable by eye, which you have not seen, which you have never seen before, which you do not see now, which you have no expectation of seeing in future, have you any partiality, any passion, any affection for such shapes?"

"Not so, my lord" (-S. iv. 72)

What are those shapes you have not seen before? Towns and villages and countries you have never been to, men and women living there, and other scenes. How can anyone fall in love with men and women he or she hasn't ever seen? How can you cling to them? So, you do not cling to things you have never seen. No defilements arise in respect of them. You do not need to meditate on them. But things you see are another matter. Defilements can arise - that is to say, if you fail to meditate to prevent them.

The same is true of things heard, smelt, tasted, touched, thought on.

Meditate Right Now

If you fail to meditate on the rising phenomena and so do not know their real nature of impermanence, suffering and not-self, you may relive them and thus let defilements be. This is a case of latent defilements. Because they arise from objects, we call them "object-latent". What do people cling to and why do they cling to? They cling to things or persons they have seen because they have seen. If you fail to meditate on them as they arise, somehow or other graspings arise. Defilements are latent in whatever we see, hear, taste, etc.

If you meditate, you find that what you see passes away, what you hear passes away. They pass away in no time at all. Once you see them as they really are, there is nothing to love, nothing to hate, nothing to cling to. If there is nothing to cling to there can be no clinging or grasping.

And you meditate right now. The moment you see, you meditate. You can't put it off. You may buy things on credit, but you cannot meditate on credit. Meditate right now. Only then will the clingings not come up. Scripturally speaking, you meditate as soon as the eye-door thought-process ends and before the subsequent mind-door thought-process begins. When you see a visible object, the process takes place like this: First, you see the object that comes up. This is the seeing process. Then you review the object seen. This is the name process. With objects you have never seen before, and so you do not know the names of, this naming process will not occur. Of the four, when the first or seeing process takes place, you see the present form, the reality, as it rises. When the second or reviewing process takes place, you review the past form, the form seen - reality again. Both attend on reality - the object seen. No concept yet. The difference is between the present reality and the past reality. With the third process you come to the concept of shape. With the fourth you come to the concept of names. The processes that follow are all various concepts. All these are common to people not practised in insight meditation.

There are 14 thought-moments in the process of seeing. If neither seeing, hearing, nor thinking consciousness arises, life-continuum goes on. It is identical with rebirth consciousness. It is the consciousness that goes on when you are sleeping fast. When a visible object or any such appears, life-continuum is arrested, and seeing consciousness, etc. arises. As soon as life-continuum ceases, a thought-moment arises adverting the consciousness to the object that comes into the avenue of the eye. When this ceases, seeing consciousness arises. When this again ceases, the receiving consciousness arises. Then comes the investigating consciousness. Then, the consciousness that determines whether the object seen is good or not. Then, in accordance with the right or wrong attitude you have with regard to things, moral or immoral apperceptions arise forcefully for seven thought-moments. When these cease, there comes subsidence into life-continuum like falling asleep. From the adverting to retention there are 14 thought-moments. All these manifest as one seeing consciousness. This is how the seeing process takes place. When one is well-practised in insight meditation, after the arising of life-continuum following the seeing process, insight consciousness that reviews "seeing" takes place. You must try to be able to thus meditate immediately. If you are able to do so, it appears in your intellect as though you were meditating on things as they are seen, as they just arise. This kind of meditation is termed in the Suttas as "meditation on the present".

"He discerns things present as they arise here and now."

(-M. iii. 227)

"Understanding in reviewing the perversion of present states is knowledge in arising and passing away."

(-Patisambhidamagga)

These extracts from the Suttas clearly show that we must meditate on present states. If you fail to meditate on the present, apprehending process arises cutting off the flow of life-continuum. This process arises to review what has just been seen. The thought-moments included are: apprehending consciousness-1, apperceptions-7, and registering consciousness-2, a total of 10 thought-moments. Every time you think or ponder, these three types of consciousness and ten thought-moments take place. But to the meditator they will appear as one thought-moment only. This is in conformity with the explanations given in connection with the knowledge of dissolution in Patisambhidamagga and Visuddhimagga. If you can meditate (or note) after the apprehending process, you may not get to concepts and may stay with the reality - the object seen. But this is not very easy for the beginner.

If you fail to meditate even at the apprehending, you get to form process and name process. Then graspings come in. If you meditate after the emergence of graspings, they will not disappear. That is why we instruct you to meditate, immediately, before the concepts arise.

The processes for hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, are to be understood along similar lines.

With thinking at the mind-door, if you fail to meditate immediately, subsequent processes come up after the thought. So you meditate immediately so that they may not arise. Sometimes, as you are noting 'rising, falling, sitting, touching', a thought or an idea may come up in between. You note it the moment it arises. You note it and it ends right there. Sometimes a wandering of the mind is about to arise. You note it and it quiets down. In the words of some meditators, "it is like a naughty child who behaves himself when shouted at 'Quiet!'"

So, if you note the moment you see, hear, touch, or perceive, no subsequent consciousness will arise to bring about graspings.

"...you will simply have the sight of the thing seen, the sound of the things heard, the sense of the things sensed, and the idea of the thing cognized."

As this extract from Malunkyaputta Sutta shows, the mere sight, the mere sound, the mere sense, the mere idea is there. Recall them and only the real nature you have understood will appear. No graspings. The meditator who meditates on whatever arises as it arises sees how everything arises and passes away, and it becomes clear to him how everything is impermanent, suffering, not-self. He knows this for himself - not because a teacher has explained it to him. This only is the real knowledge.

Incessant Work

To arrive at this knowledge needs thorough work. There is no guaranteeing that you will gain such knowledge at one sitting. Perhaps one in a million will. In the days of the Buddha there are people who attained to the Path and Fruit after listening to a stanza. But you can't expect such things today. It was then the Buddha himself who was teaching. He knew the disposition of his listeners very well. The listeners on their part were people of perfections i.e. they had accumulated experience in their past lives. But today the preacher is just an ordinary person who preaches what little he has learnt. He does not know the disposition of his listeners. It will be difficult to say that the listeners are men and women of perfections. If they had been, they would have gained deliverance in the days of the Buddha. So we cannot guarantee you will gain special knowledge at one sitting. We can tell you that you can if you work hard enough.

How long do we have to work? Understanding impermanence, suffering and not-self begins with the investigating knowledge. But it does not come at once. It is preceded by purity of mind, purity of views, and purity of transcending doubts. To speak from the level of the present-day meditators, a specially gifted person can achieve this knowledge in two or three days. Most will take five, six or seven days. But they must work assiduously. Those who get lax at work may not gain it every after fifteen or twenty days have passed. So I will talk about working in earnest at the beginning.

Insight meditation is incessant work - meditate whenever you see, hear, smell, taste, touch or think, without missing anything. But to beginners, to note everything is quite impossible. Begin with several. It is easy to observe the moving form in the rising and falling of the abdomen. We have already spoken about it. Note without a let-up 'rising, falling, rising, falling'. As your mindfulness and concentration grow stronger, add the sitting and the touching and note 'rising, falling, sitting, touching'. As you note on, ideas may come up. Note them, too: 'thinking, planning, knowing'. They are hindrances. Unless you are rid of them, you have not got purity of mind and will not have a clear understanding of mind-matter phenomena. So don't let them in. Note them and get rid of them.

If unbearable feelings like tiredness, hotness, pain or itch appear in the body, concentrate on them and note: 'tired, tired' or 'hot, hot' as they arise. If the desire arises to stretch or bend the limbs, note it too, 'desire to bend, desire to stretch'. When you walk, note every step. When you sit down, note it. If you lie down, note it too.

Every bodily movement made, every thought that arises, every feeling that comes up, all must be noted. If there is nothing in particular to note, go on noting 'rising, falling, sitting, touching'. You must note while eating or having a bath. If there are things you see or hear particularly, note them too. Except for the four, five or six hours you sleep, you keep noting things. You must try to be able to note at least one thing in a second.

If you keep on noting thus in earnest, you will, in two or three days, find your mindfulness and concentration quite strong. If not in two or three days, in five or six. Then very rarely do wanton thoughts come up. If they do, you are able to note them the moment they come. And they pass away the moment you notice them. The object noted like the rising and falling and the mind noting it seem to be well-timed. You note with ease. These are signs that your mindfulness and concentration have become strong. In other words, you have developed purity of mind.

Things Fall Apart

From now on, every time you note, the object noted and the mind that notes it appear two separate things. You come to know that the material form like the rising and falling is one thing and the mental state that notes it is another. Ordinarily, the material form and the mind that cognizes it do not seem separate. They seem one and the same thing. Your book knowledge tells you they are separate but your personal feeling has them as one. Shake your index finger. Do you see the mind that intends to shake? Can you distinguish between that mind and the shaking? If you are sincere, the answer will be "No." But to the meditator whose mindfulness and concentration are well developed the object of attention and the awareness of it are as separate as the wall and the stone that is thrown to it.

The Buddha used the simile of the gem and the thread (D.i.72) Just as when you look at a string of lapis lazuli you know: the gem is threaded on a string; this is the gem, this is the string the gem is threaded on, so does the meditator know: this is the material form, this is the consciousness that is aware of it, which depends on it, and is related to it. The Commentary says that the consciousness here is the insight consciousness, insight knowledge, that observes the material form. The lapis lazuli is the material form and the string is the consciousness that observes. The thread is in the gem as the insight awareness penetrates the material form.

When you note 'rising', the rising is one thing, the awareness is one thing- only these two exist. When you note 'falling', the falling is one, the awareness is one- only these two. The knowledge comes clear in you of its own accord. When you lift one foot in walking, one is the lifting, the other is the awareness - only these two exist. When you push it forward, the pushing and the awareness. When you put it down, the putting down and the awareness. Matter and awareness. These two only. Nothing else.

As your concentration improves further, you understand how the material and mental things you have been noting keep passing away each in its own time. When you note falling, the form falling comes up gradually and then passes away. You also find that the rising as well as the awareness passes away, the falling as well as the awareness passes away. With every noting you find only arising and passing away. When noting 'bending, bending', one bending and the next do not get mixed up. Bends, and passes away, bends, passes away - and thus, the intention to bend, the form bending, and the awareness, come and go each in its time and place. And when you note the tiredness, hotness and pain, these pass away as you are noting them. It becomes clear to you: they appear and then disappear, so they are impermanent.

The meditator understands for himself what the commentaries say, "They are impermanent in the sense of being nothing after becoming." This knowledge comes to him not from books nor from teachers. He understands by himself. This is real knowledge. To believe what other people say is faith. To remember out of faith is learning. It is not knowledge. You must know from your own experience. This is the important thing. Insight meditation is contemplation in order to know for yourself. You meditate, see for yourself, and knowing this alone is insight.

Regarding Contemplation on impermanence the commentary says:

".....the impermanent should be understood."

".....impermanence should be understood."

".....the discernment of the impermanent should be understood."

(- Visuddhimagga, i. 281)

This brief statement is followed by the explanation: "Here, 'the impermanent' are the Five Aggregates." You must know that the Five Aggregates are impermanent. Although you may not understand it by your own knowledge, you should know this much. Not only that. You should know that they are all suffering, all without a self. If you know this much, you can take up insight meditation. This understanding made by learning is given in Culatanhasankhaya-sutta:

"If, O Lord of devas, a monk has heard, 'All states are not fit for adherence, he understands all the truth." (-M.i.318)

To "understand" means to meditate on the mind-and-matter and be aware of it. It is the basic insight knowledge of Analytical Knowledge of Conditionality. So, if you have learnt that mind and matter are all impermanent, suffering and not-self, you can begin meditating from the analysis of mind and matter. Then you can go on to higher knowledges like the Investigating Knowledge.

"Understanding all the states, he comprehends all of them."

So, the least qualification required of a beginner in insight meditation is that he must have heard or learnt of the impermanent, suffering, and not-self nature of mind and matter. To Buddhists in Myanmar this is something they have had since childhood.

We say mind and matter are impermanent because they come to be and then pass away. If a thing never comes to be, we cannot say it is impermanent. What is that thing which never comes to be? It is a concept.

Concepts never come to be, never really exist. Take a personal name. It comes into use from the day a child is named. It appears as though it has come to be. But actually people just say it in calling him. It has never come to be; it never really exists. If you think it exists, find it.

When a child is born, the parents give it a name. Suppose a boy has been named "Master Red." Before the naming ceremony the name Master Red is unknown to all. But from the day the boy is named people begin calling him Master Red. But we can't say the name has come into being since then. The name Master Red just does not exist. Let's find it out.

Is the name Master Red in his body? On his head? On his side? On his face? No, it is not anywhere. The people have agreed to call him Master Red and that is all. If he dies, does the name die with him too? No. As long as people do not forget it, the name will live on. So it is said, "a name or surname never gets destroyed". Only when the people forget it will the name Master Red disappear. But it is not destroyed. Should someone restore it, it will come up again.

Think of the Bodhisatta's names in the Jatakas: Vessantara, Mahosadha, Mahajanaka, Vidhura, Temiya, Nemi..... these names were known in the times of the stories but were lost for millions of years until the Buddha restored them. Four asankheyyas and a hundred thousand kappas ago (asankheyya is a number with the digit 1 followed by 140 zeroes) the name Dipankara the Buddha and the name Sumedha the recluse were well known. They were lost to posterity afterwards. But our Buddha restored them and the names are known to us again. They will be known as long as the Buddha's teaching lasts. Once Buddhism is gone from earth these names will be forgotten too. But if a future Buddha were to speak about them again, they would become known again. So, concepts, names, are just conventions. They never exist. They have never been and they will never be. They never arise, so we can't say they "pass away." Nor can we say they are impermanent. Every concept is like that; no existence, no becoming, no passing away, so no impermanence.

Nibbana, although it is a reality, cannot be said to be impermanent because it never comes to be or passes away. It is to be regarded as permanent because it stands as peace forever.

Impermanence

Realities other than Nibbana - mind and matter - never were in the beginning. They come into being whenever there arise causes. After coming into being they pass away. So we say these realities of mind and matter are impermanent. Take seeing for example. In the beginning there was no seeing. But if the eye is good, the object comes up, there is light, your attention is drawn to it - if these four causes concur, then there is seeing. Once it has risen, it passes away. No more of it. So we say seeing is impermanent. It is not very easy for an ordinary person to know that seeing is impermanent. Hearing is easier to understand. There was no hearing in the beginning. But if the ear is good, the sound comes up, there is no barrier, your attention is drawn to it - if, these four factors concur, then there is hearing. It arises and then passes away. No more of it. So we say hearing is impermanent.

Now you hear me talking. You hear one sound after another. Once you have heard them, they are gone. Listen, SOUND, SOUND, SOUND. When I say s-, you hear it, then it is no more. When I say -ound, you hear it, then it is gone. That is how they come and pass away. The same is true of other psycho-physical phenomena. They come and go. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, bending, stretching, moving - all come and go away. Because they keep passing away, we say they are impermanent.

Of these, the passing away of consciousness is very clear. If your mind wanders while you are noting 'rising, falling', you note 'wandering'. As you note it, the wandering mind is no more. It is gone. It has not existed before. It comes about just then. Then it is gone in no time at all when noted. So we say it is impermanent. The passing away of unpleasant feelings, too, is obvious. As you go on noting 'rising, falling, tiredness, hotness', or 'pain', appears somewhere in the body. If you concentrate on it and note 'tiredness, tiredness', etc. sometimes it disappears completely, and sometimes it disappears at least for the time you are noting. So it is impermanent. The meditator realizes its impermanent characteristic as he notes its arising and passing away.

This realization of the fleeting nature of things is Contemplation on impermanence. It comes from your experience. Mere reflection without personally experiencing it is no true knowledge. Without meditating you will not know what things come up and what things pass away. It is just book learning. It may be a meritorious deed but no real insight knowledge.

Real insight knowledge is what you know for yourself by meditating on things as they come up and pass away. Here in the audience are lots of meditators who have come to this stage of knowledge. I am not speaking from my own experience alone. No, not even from the experience of forty or fifty disciples of mine. There are hundreds of them. Beginners may not have such clear knowledge yet. It is not quite easy. But it is not too difficult to achieve, either. If you work hard enough as we instruct, you can have it. If you don't, you can't. Educational degrees, distinctions, honours all are results of hard work. No pain, no gain. The insight knowledge of the Buddha, too, must be worked for.

As your concentration grows sharper, you will be able to see a great number of thoughts in one single act of bending or stretching of the limbs. You will see large numbers of thoughts coming up one after another as you intend to bend or stretch. The same number when you step. There arise a great number of thoughts in the twinkling of an eye. You have to note all these fleeting thoughts as they arise. If you cannot name them, just note 'aware, aware.' You will see that there are four, five, or ten thoughts arising in succession every time you note 'aware'. Sometimes when the awareness is so swift, even the word 'aware' is no longer necessary. Just following them with your intellect will do.

Now a thought arises, now the mind is aware of it: now another thought arises, now the observant consciousness is aware of it. It is like the saying "a morsel of food, a stroke of the stick." For every thought that arises there is the observant consciousness to be aware of it. When you are thus aware, these arisings and passings away cannot but be very plain to you. The wandering mind that arises as you are noting the rising and falling of the abdomen is caught by the observing consciousness as an animal that falls direct into the snare or an object that is hit by a well-aimed stone. And once you are aware of it, it is gone. You find it as clearly as if you were holding it in your hand. You find thus whenever consciousness arises.

When tiredness arises, you note 'tired', and it is gone. It comes up again, you note it again, and it is gone again. This kind of passing away will be made all the more clearer in higher stages of insight. Tired, noted, gone: tired, noted, gone - they pass away one by one. There is no connection between one tiredness and the next. The same with pain. Pained, noted, gone: pained, noted, gone - each pain is gone at each noting. One pain does not mix with the other. Each pain is distinct from the other.

To ordinary people there is no interruption in tiredness or pain. It seems to tire or pain you continuously for a long time. In fact, there is no tiredness or pain for a long while. One tiredness and the next, one pain and the next, just very short pieces, very separate ones. The meditator sees this as he notes.

When you note 'rising', the rising comes up gradually and passes away by degrees. When you note 'falling', the falling comes up and passes away by degrees. Common people who are ignorant of this fact think of the rising and falling in terms of the absurd abdominal shape. So from their own experience they think the meditators, too, will only be seeing the absurd abdominal shape. Some make accusations to this effect. Don't speak by guess, please. Try and see for yourselves, let us warn. If you work hard enough, you will find out.

When you note 'bending', you see clearly how it moves and passes, moves and passes, one move after another. You understand now the scriptural statement that realities like mind and matter do not move from place to place. Ordinary people think it is the same hand that moves, that has been before the bending. They think the same hand moves inwards and outwards. To them it is ever-unchanging hand. It is because they have failed to see through the continuity of matter, the way matter rises in succession. It is because they lack in the knowledge to see through. Impermanence is hidden by continuity, it is said. It is hidden because one does not meditate on what arises and passes away. Says Visuddhimagga

"Because the rise and fall are not attended to, the characteristic of impermanence does not appear, as long as it is hidden by continuity."

(-Vis. xxi, Path of Purity, p781)

Since the meditator is watching every arising, all things mental and material appear to him as separate, broken pieces - not as things whole and unbroken. From a distance ants look like a line, but when you get nearer you see the ants one by one. The meditator sees things in broken pieces so continuity cannot hide the fact from him. The characteristic of impermanence unfolds itself to him. He is no longer illusioned.

"But when the rise and fall are grasped and continuity is broken, the characteristic of impermanence appears in its true peculiar property." (Ibid.)

This is how you meditate and gain the knowledge of Contemplation on Impermanence. Mere reflection without meditation will not give rise to this knowledge. Once this knowledge is made become, those on suffering and not-self follow.

"To one, Meghiya, who has perceived impermanence the perception of not-self is established." (A.iii,169.)

How will you take what you very know to be capable of rising and passing away to be self, ego, a being? People cling to the self because they think they have been the same person the whole life. Once it is clear to you from your own experience that life is but made up of things that rise and pass away incessantly, you will not cling as self.

Some obstinate persons say that this sutta is meant for Meghiya alone. This is something that should not be said. We fear others will come up who will say what the Buddha said were meant for the people of his days, not for us who live today. But the statement is found not in that sutta alone. In Sambodhi Sutta the Buddha says:

"To one, monks, who has perceived impermanence the perception of not-self is established." (A.iii.165.)

And, if one realizes impermanence, one realizes suffering, too. The meditator who realizes how things are rising and passing away, can see how the two events, rising and passing away, have been oppressing him. The Commentary to Sambodhi Sutta says:

"When the characteristic of impermanence is seen, the characteristic of not-self is seen, too, since when one of the three characteristics is seen the other two are seen too."

So, it is very important to understand the one characteristic of impermanence.

Rediscovery

In this connection let me tell you a story from my own experience as a meditation teacher. It is about a meditator from my native village, Hseikkhun, in Shwebo district. He was none other than a cousin of mine. He was one of the first three persons from the village to take up insight meditation. The three of them agreed among themselves to work very hard. They had brought to the hermitage cigars and betel quids to be taken one each day. But when they returned from the hermitage they took home all the seven cigars and quids - untouched.

So hard did they work that in three days they attained the knowledge of rising and falling and were overjoyed to experience tranquillity and see the brilliance around. "Only at this old age have we discovered the truth," they spoke with great joy. Because they were the first to take up meditation I thought of letting them go with their joys and just told them to go on noting. I did not tell them to note the joys. So although they worked for four more days, they did not get any higher.

After a few day's rest they came again for another week of meditation. That cousin of mine then reached the stage of the Knowledge of Dissolution. Although he was noting 'rising, falling, sitting', he did not see the abdominal shape, and his body seemed to have disappeared, so he had to touch it with his hand to see if it was still there, he told me. And, whenever he looked or saw, everything seemed to be dissolving and breaking up. The ground he looked at was dissolving, and so were the trees. It was all against what he had thought things to be. He began to wonder.

He had never thought such external, season-produced gross material things like earth, trees, logs, etc. could be incessantly breaking up. He had thought they perished only after a considerable length of time. They lasted for quite a long time, he had thought. Now, as insight knowledge gained momentum with meditation, the rising and passing of phenomena appeared to him of their own accord without his specially meditating on them. They were passing away, breaking up, there before him. It was all the reverse of his former beliefs. Perhaps his new vision was wrong. Perhaps his eyesight was failing.

So he asked me. And I told him. The passing away and breaking up he saw in everything were true. As your insight grew sharper and quicker, things appear rising and passing away to you without your meditation on them. These are all true, I explained to him. Later on he again told me about his own findings as he progressed in insight. Today he is no more. He has long been dead.

When insight knowledge has grown really sharp, it will prevail over wrong beliefs and thoughts. You see things in their true light, as impermanent, suffering, not-self. An uncultured mind or reflection without meditation cannot give you real insight into the nature of things. Only insight meditation can do that.

Once you realize impermanence, you see how they oppress you with their rising and passing away, how you can derive no pleasure from them, how they can never be a refuge, how they can perish any moment, so how they are frightening, how they are suffering, etc.

"...ill (suffering) in the sense of fearful."

You thought, "This body will not perish so soon. It will last for quite a long time." So you took it for a great refuge. But now as you meditate you find only incessant risings and passing away. If no new ones rise up for the mental and material things that have passed away, one dies. And this can happen any moment. To make a self out of these mental and material things that can die any moment and to take a refuge in it is as dreadful a thing as sheltering in an old house which is tumbling down.

And you find that nothing happens as you desire. Things just follow their natural course. You thought you could go if you wished to, sit if you wished to, rise, see, hear, do anything if you wished to. Now as you meditate you find that it is not so. Mind and matter are found to be working in a pair. Only when there is intention to bend is there the form bending. Only when there is intention to stretch is there stretching. There is effect only when there is cause. Only when there is something to see do you see. If there is something to see, you can't help seeing it. You hear when there is something to hear. You feel happy only when there is a reason to be happy. You worry when there is cause to worry. If there is cause, there is effect. You cannot help it. There is nothing that lives and does what it desires. There is no self, no ego, no I. Only process of arising and passing away.

To understand clearly is the most important thing in insight meditation. Of course, you will come across joys, tranquilities, bright lights in the course of your training. They are not important things. What is important is to understand impermanence, suffering and not-self. These characteristics are made clear to you as you just keep on meditating as explained.

Peace at Last

You make things clear to yourself not believing what others tell you. If any of you beginners have not had such self-made knowledge yet, know that you have not reached that stage. Work on. If others can, you can. It will not take very long. The knowledge comes to you as you are meditating. Only when you know for sure that all are impermanent, suffering and not-self will you not cling to sense objects as permanent, happy, beautiful, good. Nor will you cling to them as self, soul, the I. All the graspings are done away with. What then? Well, all the defilements are calmed and Ariyan Path and Nibbana are realized.

"One who has no grasping does not long after things. One who does not long after things is calmed in himself." (M.ii,318)

Whenever you meditate, you have no obsession with the object noted. So no grasping arises. There is no grasping to what you see, hear, smell, eat, touch or are aware of. They appear to rise each in its time and then pass away. They manifest themselves as impermanent. There is nothing to cling to. They oppress us with their rise and fall. They are all sufferings. There is nothing to cling to as happy, good or beautiful. They rise and fall as is their nature, so there is nothing to cling to as self, soul, or I, that lives and lasts. All these are made very plain to you. At that the graspings are done away with. Then you realize Nibbana through Ariyan Path. We will explain this in the light of Dependent Origination and Aggregates.

"The stopping of grasping is from the stopping of craving; the stopping of becoming is from the stopping of grasping; the stopping of birth is from the stopping of becoming; With the stopping of birth then grief, suffering, sorrow, despair and lamentation are stopped. Thus comes to be the stopping of this entire mass of ill." (M.i,337;S.ii,1-3)

One who meditates on the mental and material objects that appear at the six doors and knows their intrinsic nature of impermanence, suffering and not-self does not delight in them. As he does not grasp them, he makes no effort to enjoy them. As he refuses to make and effort, there arises no kamma called "becoming". As no kamma arises, there is no new birth. Where there is no new birth there is no occasion for old age, dying, grief etc. This is how one realizes momentary Nibbana through insight path whenever one meditates. We will explain the realization by Ariyan Path later.

In Silavanta sutta earlier quoted, the Venerable Sariputta explained how, if a monk of moral habit meditates on the five aggregates of grasping as impermanent, suffering, and not-self, he can become a Stream-winner; if a Stream-winner meditates, he can become a Once-returner; if a Once-returner, a Never-returner; if a Never-returner, an Arahant. Here, to realize the four Ariyan fruitions of Stream-winning, Once-returning, Never-returning, and Arahantship means to realize Nibbana through the four Ariyan Paths.

Progress

To get to the Ariyan Path one starts with insight path. And insight path begins with the analytical knowledge of mind and matter. Then one arrives at the knowledge of discerning conditionality. Then, working on, one gains the knowledge of investigation. Here one comes to enjoy reflecting on things, investigating them, and persons of considerable learning often spend a long time doing so. If you do not want to reflect or investigate, you must keep on meditating. Your awareness now becomes light and swift. You see very clearly how the things noted arise and pass away. You have come to the knowledge of rising and passing away.

At this stage noting tends to be easy. Illuminations, joys, tranquilities appear. Going through experiences unthought of before, one is thrilled with joy and happiness. At the initial stage of his work, the meditator has had to take great pains not to let the mind wander this way and that. But it has wandered and for most of the time he has not been able to meditate. Noting has seemed all right. Some have had to fight back very hard indeed. But with strong faith in one's teachers, good intentions and determination, one has passed all the difficult stages. One has now come to the knowledge of rising and passing away. Everything is fine at this stage. Noting is easy and effortless. It is good to note, and brilliant lights appear. Rapture seizes him and causes a sort of goose-flesh in him. Both body and mind are at ease and he feels very comfortable. The objects to be noted seem to drop on one's mindfulness of their own accord. Mindfulness on its part seems to drop on the object of its own accord. Everything is there already noted. One never fails or forgets to note. On every noting the awareness is very clear. If you attend to something and reflect on it, it proves to be a plain and simple matter. If you take up impermanence, suffering and not-self, about which you have heard before, they turn out to be plainly discernable things. So you feel like preaching. You think you would make a very good preacher. But if you have had no education, you will make a very poor preacher. But you feel like preaching and you can even become quite talkative. This is what is called "the ideal Nibbana" the meditators experience. It is not the real Nibbana of the Ariyans. We may call it "imitation Nibbana"

"It is the immortality of those who know."

Training in meditation is like climbing a mountain. You begin climbing from the base. Soon you get tired. You ask people who are coming down and they answer you with encouraging words like "It's nearer now." Tired you climb on and very soon come to a resting place in the shade of a tree with a cool breeze blowing in. All your tiredness is gone. The beautiful scenery around fascinates

you. You get refreshed for a further climb. The knowledge of the rising and passing away is the resting place for you on your climb to higher insight knowledge.

Those meditators who have not yet reached this stage of knowledge may be losing hope. Days have passed and no taste of insight yet. They often get disheartened. Some leave the meditation centre with thoughts that meditation is nothing after all. They have not discovered the "meditator's Nibbana". So we instructors have to encourage newcomers to the centre with the hope that they will attain to this knowledge at least. And we ask them to work to attain it soon. Most succeed as we advise. They don't need further encouragement. They are now full of faith and determination to work on till the ultimate goal.

The "meditator's Nibbana" is often spoken of as amanusi rati - non-human delight or superhuman enjoyment (i.e. joy or delight transcending that of ordinary human beings). You derive all kinds of delights from various things - from education, wealth, family life. The "meditator's Nibbana" surpasses all these delights. A meditator once told me that he had indulged in all kinds of worldly pleasures. But none could match the pleasure derived from meditation. He just could not express how delightful it was.

But is that all? No, you must work on. You go on with your noting. Then, as you progress, forms and features no longer manifest themselves and you find them always disappearing. Whatever appears disappears the moment you notice it. You note seeing, it disappears swiftly. You note hearing, it disappears. Bending, stretching, again it disappears swiftly. Not only the object that comes up, the awareness of it too disappears with it in a pairwise sequence. This is the Knowledge of Dissolution.

Every time you note, they dissolve swiftly. Having witnessed it for a long time, you become frightened of them. It is the knowledge of the Fearful. Then you find fault with these things that keep passing away. It is the Knowledge of Tribulation. Then as you meditate on, you get weary of them. It is the Knowledge of Repulsion.

"So seeing all these things, the instructed disciple of the Ariyans disregards the material shapes, disregards feeling."
(M.i,137;S.iii,68.)

Your material body has been a delightful thing before. Sitting or rising, going or coming, bending or stretching, speaking or working, everything has seemed very nice. You have thought this material body of yours to be a dependable and delightful thing. Now that you have meditated on it and seen that everything dissolves, you no longer see your body as dependable. It is no longer delightful. It is just a dull, tiresome business.

You have enjoyed both pleasurable feelings of the body and mental pleasure. You have thought, "I am enjoying," "I feel happy." Now these feelings are no longer pleasurable. They, too, pass away as you notice them. You become wearied of them.

You have thought well of your perception. But now it, too, passes away as you notice it. You feel disgusted with it as well.

Volitional activities are responsible for all your bodily, mental and vocal behaviours. To think, "I sit, I rise, I go, I act," is to cling to volitional activities. You have thought well of them too. Now that you see them passing away, you feel repulsion for them.

You have enjoyed thinking. When newcomers to the meditation centre are told that they must not engage in thinking about things, but must keep noting, they are not at all pleased. Now you see how thoughts, ideas, come up and pass away, and you are tired of them too.

The same thing happens to your sense-organs. Whatever comes up at the six doors is now a thing to disgust, to be wearied of. Some feel extreme disgust, some a considerable amount.

Then arise desires to be rid of them all. Once you are tired of them, of course you want to get rid of them. "They come and pass incessantly. They are no good. It were well if they all ceased." This is the Knowledge for Deliverance. Where "they all ceased" is Nibbana. To desire for deliverance from them is to long for Nibbana. What must one do if one wants Nibbana? He works harder and goes on meditating. This is the Knowledge of Re-reflection. Working with special effort, the characteristics of impermanence, suffering and not-self become all the more clearer to you. Especially clearer is suffering.

After re-reflection you come to the Knowledge of Indifference to Formations. Now the meditator is quite at ease. Without much effort on his part the noting runs smoothly and is very good. He sits down to meditate and makes the initial effort. Then everything runs its course like a clock once wound up goes on ticking of its own accord. For an hour or so he makes no change in his posture and goes on with his work without interruption.

Before this knowledge there may have been disturbances. Your mind may be directed to a sound heard and thus disturbed. Your thought may wander off and meditation is disturbed. Painful feelings like tiredness, hotness, aches, itches, coughs appear and disturb you. Then you have to start all over again. But now all goes well. There are no more disturbances. Sounds you may hear, but you ignore them and go on noting. Whatever comes up you note without being disturbed. There are no more wanderings of the mind. Pleasant objects may turn up but no delight or pleasure arises in you. You meet with unpleasant objects. Again you feel no displeasure or fear. Painful feelings like tiredness, hotness or aches rarely appear. If they do, they are not unbearable. Your noting gets the better of them. Itching, pains and coughs disappear once you attain this knowledge. Some even get cured of serious illnesses. Even if the illnesses are not completely cured, you get some relief while noting in earnest. So for an hour or so there will be no interruption to your notings. Some can go on meditating for two or three hours without interruption. And yet they feel no weariness in the body. Time passes unheeded. "It's not long yet," you think.

On such a hot summer day as this it would be very fine to have attained this knowledge. While other people are groaning under the intense heat, the meditator who is working in earnest with this knowledge will not be aware of the heat at all. The whole day seems to have fled in no time. It is a very good insight knowledge indeed, yet there can be dangers like excess of worry, ambition or attachment. If these cannot be removed, no progress will be made. Once they are removed, the Ariyan Path knowledge is there to be realized. How?

Noble Path

Every time you note 'rising, falling, sitting, touching, seeing, hearing, bending, stretching,' and so on, there is an effort being made. This is the Right Effort of the Noble Eightfold Path. Then there is your mindfulness. It is Right Mindfulness. Then there is concentration which penetrates the object noted as well as remains fixed on it. This is Right Concentration. The three are called Concentration Constituents of the Path. Then there is initial application which, together with concentration, ascends on the object noted. It is the application of the concomitants on the object. Its characteristic is putting the concomitants onto the object (abhiniropana-lakkhana), according to the Commentary. This is Right Thought. Then there is the realization that the object thus attended is just movement, just non-cognizing, just seeing, just cognizing, just rising and disappearing, just impermanent and so on. This is the Right View. Right Thought and Right View together form the Wisdom Constituents of the Path. The three Morality Constituents, Right Speech, Right Action and Right Livelihood, have been perfected before you take up insight meditation - when you take the precepts. Besides, there can be wrong speech, wrong action, or wrong livelihood in respect of the object noted. So whenever you note, you perfect the Morality Constituents of the Path as well.

Thus the eight constituents of the Noble Path are there in every act of awareness. They constitute the insight path that comes up once clinging is done away with. You have to prepare this path gradually until you reach the Knowledge of Indifference to Formations. When this knowledge grows mature and strong, you arrive at Ariyan Path in due course. It is like this:- When the Knowledge of indifference to Formations has matured and grown stronger, your notings get sharper and swifter. While thus noting and becoming aware, swiftly all of a sudden, you fall into the peace that is Nibbana. It is rather strange. You have no prior knowledge that you will reach it. You cannot reflect on it reaching, either. Only after the reaching can you reflect on it. You reflect because you find unusual things. This is the knowledge of Reflection. Then you know what has happened. This is how you realize Nibbana through the Ariyan Path.

So if you want to realize Nibbana, what is important is to work for freedom from clinging. With ordinary people clingings arise everywhere: in seeing, in hearing, in touching, in being aware. They cling to things as being permanent, as being happy, good, as soul, ego, persons. We must work for a complete freedom from these clingings. To work is to meditate on whatever rises, whatever is seen, heard, touched, thought of. If you keep meditating thus, clingings cease to be, the Ariyan Path arises leading to Nibbana. This is the process.

TO SUM UP:

How is insight developed?

Insight is developed by meditating on the five aggregates of grasping.

Why and when do we meditate on the aggregates?

We meditate on the aggregates whenever they arise in order that we may not cling to them.

If we fail to meditate on mind and matter as they arise clingings arise.

We cling to them as permanent, good and as ego.

If we meditate on mind and matter as they arise, clingings do not arise.

It is plainly seen that all are impermanent, suffering, mere processes.

Once clingings cease, the Path arises, leading to Nibbana.

These, then, are the elements of Insight Meditation.

****

WORDS OF ENCOURAGEMENT

The Young Weaver

Now a few words of encouragement.

When the Buddha preached, his listeners meditated as they listened to him and gained enlightenment. The number of people who thus gained enlightenment at the end of each preaching was very great indeed. Sometimes as many as eighty-four thousand beings gained enlightenment at the end of a sermon, according to the Commentary. But reading this, you may want to remark, "It appears quite easy to gain enlightenment. But here we are, working very hard and yet unable to gain anything. Why such a difference?"

Here you must remember that the commentary is just giving an account of the occasion and as such does not go into details as to the qualifications of the listeners. The preacher himself was the Buddha and none other. His listeners were people of perfections. As an example let us consider a story.

Once the Buddha was teaching at Alavi, the present-day Allahabad. His theme was mindfulness of death. He told his listeners to remember, "My life is not lasting. My death is sure to come. My life will end in death. Inevitable is my death. My life is uncertain. Death is certain." Then he went back to Savatthi.

Among the listeners at Alavi was a sixteen-year-old girl, a weaver. She developed mindfulness of death since then. Three years later, the Buddha came to Alavi again. As the Buddha sat among his listeners, he saw the girl coming towards him. He asked, "Young lady, where have you come from?" The girl replied, "I don't know, my lord." "Where are you going?" he continued. "I don't know, my lord" was the answer. "Don't you know?" "I do, my lord." "Do you know?" "I don't, my lord."

The people were full of contempt for the girl. She was showing disrespect to the Buddha, they thought. The Buddha therefore, asked the girl to explain her answers. Said she: "Sir, you the Buddha will not engage in small talk. So when you asked me where I had come from, I knew at once you were asking something significant. You were asking me what past existence I had come from. This I do not know and I answered so. When you asked me where I was going to, you meant the next existence I am going to. This again I don't know and so I answered. Then you asked if I don't know I am to die one day. I know I have to die one day, so I answered I do. You then asked if I know when I will die. This I don't know and I answered no." The Buddha said, "Well done" (Sadhu) to her answers.

So, by the third question it is certain that we will die. It is not certain when we will die. Let us ask ourselves the second question "Where are you going?" It is rather difficult to answer, isn't it? But there are ways to make the answer not difficult. Think about your bodily, verbal and mental deeds. Which are greater in number, good deeds or bad deeds? If good deeds, you will go to Good Bourn. If bad deeds, you will be bound for the Bad Bourn. So we must make an effort to do good deeds. The best way is to be engaged in insight meditation, so that you will be freed from the lower states forever. You should try to reach at least the stage of Stream-winning. Is this enough? If you can reach that stage, I will be happy. But according to the Buddha you must work till you attain to the fruition of Arahantship.

Now to go back to the young weaver. She became a Stream-winner at the end of the Buddha's sermon. Clearly, she gained enlightenment as a result of her having developed mindfulness of death for three years. From this we can infer that many people had been like her.

While the Buddha was staying at Jeta Grove at Savatthi there were dhamma talks everyday. There the citizens of Savatthi came in the evening dressed in clean clothes and bringing offerings of flowers and incense to the dhamma. The same thing may have happened while the Buddha was staying at Bamboo Grove, Rajagaha. So, listening to the dhamma, they must have taken up meditation just as they had taken up the precepts. Even today people listen to a teacher of meditation and begin practising it. It was then the Buddha himself who was preaching. How could they help not practising it? It was these people who had listened to his previous sermons that listened to a sermon and gained enlightenment.

Then there were monks, nuns, lay men and women disciples, all types of people. These people who had the opportunity to listen to the Buddha must have been men and women of great perfections. And when the Buddha preached, he did so to suit the disposition of the listener. Now this is important.

The Dull Young Monk

Once there was one Younger Panthaka who could not learn (memorize) a stanza of 44 syllables in four months. His brother the Older Panthaka got impatient with him and sent him away. The Buddha took him to himself, gave him a piece of cloth, and instructed him to handle it while repeating, "Removal of impurity, removal of impurity." The monk did as instructed, realized the nature of mind and matter in him and became an Arahant. It must have taken him two or three hours at most. He gained enlightenment so easily because he was given a subject of meditation that suited his disposition.

A Disciple of Sariputta Thera

Once a disciple of the Venerable Sariputta meditated on the foulness of the body in vain for four months. So the Venerable Sariputta took him to the Buddha, who brought forth a golden lotus by his supernormal power and gave it to the monk. It turned out that the monk had been a goldsmith for five hundred existences in succession. He liked beautiful things and had no interest in foul things. Now when he saw the golden lotus, he was fascinated and developed jhana while looking at it. When the Buddha made the lotus fade away, he realized the impermanent, suffering and not-self nature of things. The Buddha then taught him a stanza, on hearing which he became an Arahant.

The Elder Channa was not successful in his efforts to gain enlightenment. So he asked the Venerable Ananda for advice. Ananda said to Channa, "You are a person capable of gaining enlightenment." The elder was filled with joy and delight. He followed Ananda's advice and soon gained enlightenment.

Some teachers of meditation of today do not know how to teach to suit the disposition of the would-be meditators. They use words not suitable to them. As a result, the prospective meditators go home discouraged. But some do know how to speak. Their disciples who thought of spending only a few days at the meditation centre were heartened enough to stay on till they finished the course satisfactorily. It is very important to teach to suit the disposition of the listener. No wonder thousands of people gained enlightenment at the end of a sermon by the Buddha.

Here among our listeners can be one or two who have attained perfections as those people in the days of the Buddha. Then there will be those who have matured after days and months of training. These few may gain enlightenment while listening to the dhamma now. If you can't get it now, you will get it very soon as you go on meditating. Those of you who have never meditated before have learnt the right method now, and if you start meditating at some convenient time, you will also gain it. Whether you have gained enlightenment, or just done good deeds, you will all be born in the six deva worlds when you die. There you will meet those Ariyan devas who have been there since the days of the Buddha. You will meet Anathapindika, Visakha and others. Then you can ask them about what they have learnt from the Buddha and practised. It would be a delightful thing discussing the dhamma with good folk in deva worlds.

But if you do not want to be born in the deva world but just want to be born in the world of men, well, you will be born here. Once, that is, about 25 or 30 years ago, a Chinese devotee invited some monks to a feast at his home in Moulmein. After the meal, the presiding monk made a gladdening speech for the occasion. He said how, as a result of his good deed of feeding the monks, the Chinese devotee would be born in the deva worlds, where life is full of delights with magnificent palaces and beautiful gardens. The monk then asked the Chinaman, "Well, devotee, don't you want to be born in the deva world?" "No." the Chinaman replied, "I don't want to be born in the deva world." Surprised, the monk asked, "Why?" "I don't want to be anywhere else. I just want to be in my own house, in my own place." "Well," said the monk, "then you will be born in your own house, in your own place." The monk was right. His kamma will lead him to where he wants to be.

"The aspiration, monks, of a man of morality is realized because of purity." (A.iii,71.)

Now you listeners here are of pure morality. At a time when most people in Yangon are enjoying themselves at this New Year time, you are here to do meritorious deeds, away from the merry-making, some of you donning the yellow robes and training in meditation. Some keep eight precepts and do meditation. So your moral habits are pure. If you want to be born in deva worlds, you will be born there. If you want to be born in this human world, you will.

In this connection there is something that has been a cause of concern to us. Today countries in Europe and America are prospering. We fear those Myanmar who do good deeds get inclined towards those countries and will be born there. I think it is the case already. Some ask, "Although Buddhists do good deeds, why isn't a Buddhist country prospering?" They seem to think, "When a Myanmar dies, he is born in Myanmar only." It is not so. A man of merit can be born anywhere. A Myanmar if he so desires can be born elsewhere.

Those wealthy people in other countries may have been good Buddhists from Myanmar. There are so many people who do meritorious deeds here. But there are not enough wealthy parents to receive them in their next life here. So they will have to be born elsewhere. If you are born there, and if you are just a worldling, you will have to take up the religion of your parents there. This is very important.

So, to be steadfast in your religious faith, you must work now. You must try to reach a stage in which your faith in the Buddha, the Teaching and the Order will never waver. Such a stage is that of Stream-winning. Once a Stream-winner, your faith in the Three Gems will never waver whatever country you may be born.

These days it is not very good to be born in the world of men. Life is short, disease are plentiful, ideologies are confusing, and dangers abound. So, if you do not want to be born in the world of men, you will be born in the world of devas. Even if you have not gained the Path and Fruit, your good deeds of giving and keeping precepts will take you wherever you want to be. If you attained the Path and Fruit, all the better.

And the world of devas is not very hard to come by. One Indaka of Rajagaha made a gift of a spoonful a rice (to the Order) and was born in the Tavatimsa heaven. Our lay devotees in Myanmar have been making far greater gifts than a spoonful of rice. As regards precepts, observing them for a while has sent people to deva heavens. Some kept eight precepts for half a day and were born in heavens. Now you have observed eight precepts very well and practised meditation very well. If you want, you will easily get to the deva worlds. Why not? Once there, ask the Ariyan devas about the teaching of the Buddha and discuss the dhamma with them. Please do, may I ask you.

Uposatha the Goddess

In the time of the Buddha there was a girl called Uposatha at Saketa, which lies in Kosala region in Central India. She lived by the teachings of the Buddha and became a Stream-winner. When she died she was born in Tavatimsa heaven. There she lived in a magnificent palace. One day the Venerable Moggallana while on a tour of deva worlds met her. The monks in those days were perfect in higher knowledge and had acquired supernormal powers. They could travel to deva worlds or look towards them with their deva-sight or listen to them with their deva-hearing. But today there are no monks known to possess such powers. We cannot go to the deva worlds. Even if we managed somehow to get there, we would not be able to see them. Let alone those devas in the higher planes, we cannot even see devas in this world of men, such as guardians of trees and guardians of treasures.

Well, the Venerable Moggallana often toured the deva worlds by his supernormal powers. It was his intention to get first-hand reports from the devas interviewed as to how they had got there, what good deeds they had performed to deserve the good life there. Of course, he could learn of their stories without going to them. But he wanted their stories as told by themselves. As the Elder went there, he came near to the palace of the goddess Uposatha, who saluted him from her palace. Moggallana asked her, "Young goddess, your splendour is like the brightness of the planet Venus. What good deeds have you done to deserve this splendour and good life?" The goddess answered:

"I was a woman by the name of Uposatha, at Saketa. I listened to the Buddha's teaching, was full of faith in his teaching, and became a lay disciple who went to the Three Gems for refuge."

Putting your faith in the Three Gems, the Buddha, the Teachings, and the Order, is "going for refuge." You do this by repeating the formula: "I go to the Buddha for refuge, I go to the Dhamma for refuge, I go to the Order for refuge."

The Buddha knows all the dhamma. Having himself realized Nibbana, the end of all sufferings like old age, disease and death, he taught the Dhamma so that beings may enjoy the bliss of Nibbana like him. If one follows the teachings of the Buddha, one can avoid the four lower states and be freed from all suffering. Believing this, you go to the Buddha for refuge. When you are ill, you have to put your faith in the physician. You must trust him. "This doctor is an expert. He can cure me of my illness." In the same way, you put your trust in the Buddha knowing that you will be saved from all suffering by following his teachings. But these days some do not seem to know the significance of the formula. They respect them because their parents or teachers make them repeat. This is not the right thing. You must know the meaning, think of it in your mind, and repeat the formula slowly. If you cannot do it often, try to do it at least once in a while.

When you say "I go to the Dhamma for refuge," you are putting your faith in the teachings of the Buddha - teachings of the Paths, the Fruits and Nibbana. You are acknowledging your belief that the practice of these teachings will save you from the four lower states and from all suffering of the round of rebirths.

When you say "I go to the Order for refuge," you are putting your faith in the brotherhood of the holy ones who, by practising the dhamma as taught by the Buddha, have attained or are about to attain the Paths and Fruitions. You are acknowledging the belief that reliance on the Order will lent you freedom from the lower states and the round of rebirths.

A man who has gone to the Three Refuges is called in Pali an upasaka, and a woman an upasika. Being an upasaka or upasika amounts to doing a good deed that will send you to the deva worlds.

"Those who have gone to the Buddha for refuge will not go the lower worlds. Leaving human bodies, They will fill deva bodies." (D.ii,204; S.i,25)

The goddess Uposatha had done other good deeds, too, she continued. I was full of morality. I gave alms. I kept the eight precepts.

Those who do not know Buddhism make fun of keeping the eight precepts and often say, "You fast and get starved. That's all." They know nothing about good and bad deeds. They do not know how by overcoming the desire to eat, which is greed, good consciousness is being developed. But they will know how fasting can be good to sick people. They praise it then. They understand current material welfare only. They are totally ignorant of mind and afterlife. To observe the eight precepts is to prevent bad things from coming up and develop good things like restraint and long suffering day and night. "The holy ones, the Arahants, live avoiding forever bad things like killing, stealing, sex, falsehood, strong drinks, eating at improper times. I will follow their example for one day and honour them by so doing." The Ariyan good folk think like this when they keep the eight precepts. When you feel hungry, you control yourself and try to free yourself of the defilement of hunger. It is a noble act. As noble acts arise in your mind, it gets purified. It is like fasting and cleansing your intestines when you are sick. Since your mind is pure, when you die, a pure continuity of consciousness goes on. This we say "being born a man or a deva".

Truths

The goddess Uposatha continued, "I come to live in this palace as a result of restraint and generosity." Here "restraint" is very important. Even in this world, if there is no restraint in your spending you will become poor. If there is no restraint in your actions, you will contract diseases or get involved in crimes. As for the next life, restraint is important as it can purify the heart. That generosity can lead one to deva worlds is common knowledge among Buddhists.

She said, "I knew the Noble Truths." The Noble Truths are truths to be known by, made known to, the Noble Ones of the Ariyans. Once you understand these truths by yourself, you become an Ariyan. They are the Truth of Suffering, the Truth of the Cause of Suffering, the Truth of the Cessation of Suffering, and the Truth of the Path leading to the Cessation of Suffering. This is the most important part.

"To know the Noble Truths" does not mean to learn of them from hearsay. It means realization by yourself. You should understand them well, give up what ought to be given up, realize (the end) and make become (the Path) in yourself. So goes the Commentary.

The five aggregates of grasping we have discussed constitute the truth of suffering. So noting the aggregates and understanding them is understanding the Truth of Suffering. As you note, you see how they arise and pass away, how they constitute suffering. Thus you understand while meditating. When you reach the Ariyan Path, you see Nibbana, the end of suffering, and on reflection understand that whatever arises and passes away and has not come to cessation is suffering. Thus you understand at the Path moment. It is not understanding by way of attention to the object, but rather by way of function.

As you meditate, there can be craving for the object meditated on. This is understanding by way of giving up. On reflection, no craving will arise on objects you have seen to be impermanent, suffering and not-self. It has been extinguished. This is how you understand while meditating. When you realize the Ariyan Path and Nibbana, no craving will ever arise with respect to the Path. With the Path of Stream-winning any gross craving that can lead one to the lower states is done away with. With Never-returning, all cravings for sense-pleasures are put away and with Arahantship, all remaining types of craving.

Whenever you note, no defilements, no kamma, so no sufferings will arise in respect of the objects noted. All are extinguished. Such cessation of suffering is experienced with every act of noting. This is how you realize the Truth of Cessation. At the Ariyan Path moment you realize Nibbana. This is obvious now.

Every time you meditate, Right View regarding the true nature of mind and matter arises. Once there is Right View its concomitants such as Right Thought arise too. We have dealt with them above. To make become the eight constituents of the Path is to develop the Path. It is how you understand while meditating. At the Ariyan Path moment the eight constituents arise and Nibbana is realized. The one who has arrived at the Path and Fruition can see on reflection how the Ariyan Path has come to be. He sees. This, too, is understanding.

Thus, if you understand how mind and matter are sufferings, if you have given up craving which is the cause of suffering, if you realize the end of suffering, and if you make become the eight constituents of the Path in you, we can say you know the four truths. So, when the goddess Uposatha said she knew the four noble truths, she meant she had seen the insight path and the Ariyan path by her own experience. In other words, she was a Stream-winner.

Once you know the four truths you know the Ariyan dhammas as well. We will give an excerpt from the suttas.

"..the well instructed Ariyan disciple, one who sees the Ariyans, who is skilled in the Ariyan dhamma"

If you are not an Ariyan, you will not know by right wisdom what kind of a person an Ariyan is. Those who have never been initiated into the Order will not know from personal experience how a monk behaves and lives. Those who have never taken up meditation will not know how a meditator behaves and lives. Only when you yourself are an Ariyan will you discern who an Ariyan is.

According to the Commentary, the Ariyan dhamma consists of the four establishments of mindfulness, four supreme efforts, four means of accomplishment, five faculties, five powers, seven factors of enlightenment, and eight constituents of the Path - seven categories in all. If you know any one of the seven categories, you know the other six. So we have said that if you know the four truths you know the Ariyan dhamma, for the Eightfold Path which is one item of Ariyan dhamma is included in the four truths.

When you try to make become any of the seven categories like the establishment of mindfulness in you, you understand it from your own experience. This is true understanding. Learning from hearsay will not do.

"A monk when he walks is aware 'I am walking'" So the meditator who is going to be an Ariyan, when he walks, walks noting either 'walking, walking' or 'lifting, moving, forward, putting down'. As he so walks, mindfulness arises whenever he notes, as does knowledge that cognizes the object noted. You know how the intention to walk, the material form of walking, and the awareness arise and pass away. The mindfulness and knowledge that arise whenever you note constitute establishing mindfulness by way of contemplation of the body.

"He is aware 'I am feeling a painful feeling' when he feels a painful feeling." The meditator notes 'hot, hot' or 'pain, pain' whenever there arises hotness or pain. Thus he is mindful and he knows how feelings arise and then pass away. This is establishing mindfulness by way of contemplation of feelings.

"He is aware of a passionate mind that it is passionate." Every time such a thought or idea arises, the meditator notes 'clinging, delighting'. He is thus mindful and knows how they arise and pass away. This is establishing mindfulness by way of contemplation of mind.

"One who has existing in himself a sensual desire is aware 'There is in me a sensual desire.'" The meditator notes 'desire, delight' and so on, and is mindful and knows how dispositions like sensual desire arise and pass away. This is establishing mindfulness by way of contemplation of dhamma objects (=hindrances and so on).

Those of you who have been training here have been meditating and understanding from self-experience. You get skilled in the Ariyan dhamma, the four establishments of mindfulness. At the same time you are making the four supreme efforts, too. As you note, you are making an effort to discard evils that have arisen, or to prevent the arising of those evils not yet arisen, or to develop those good deeds of insight and Path that have not yet arisen, or to augment the insight knowledge that has already arisen. The four means of accomplishment are involved too. When you work, you have to rely on either will, effort, thought or reason. The five faculties of confidence, effort, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom are there too. The five powers are the same as the five faculties. The seven factors of enlightenment, too, are there. When you note, you have mindfulness, investigation (of the dhamma), effort, rapture, quietude, concentration and equanimity. That the Eightfold Path is involved too need not be repeated here.

To go back to the story of the goddess Uposatha. She said, "I kept the five precepts. I was a lay woman-disciple of Gotama the Buddha. I often heard of Nandana and wanted to be there. As a result I came to be born here in Nandana."

Nandana is the name of a garden in the deva world. In those days people talked so much of Nandana as they do of America or Europe these days. Uposatha heard people talk about the deva garden and wished to be born there. So was she born. But now she was not happy there. She got dissatisfied with her lot. She told Moggallana, 'I failed to do the Buddha's word. Having turned my mind to this lowly plane, now I am full of repentance."

The Buddha taught us that life - whatever form it takes is no good. It is mere suffering. He told us to work for the end of suffering. But Uposatha had disregarded the Buddha's teaching and longed for life in a deva world. Now she realized she had been mistaken.

You may ask, "Well, why not work for the end of suffering in the deva world?" It is not easy to meditate there. The devas are always singing, dancing and making merry. There is not a single quiet spot there as in the world of men. Well, even in this world of men, when you meditators return home, you can't meditate well, can you? So, work hard now.

The Venerable Moggallana cheered her up with these words, "Don't worry, Uposatha. The Fully Enlightened One has declared that you are a Stream-winner with special attainment. You are freed from the Bad Bourn."

The young goddess is still in Tavatimsa. She has not been there long in the reckoning of the deva world. A century here equals a day there. From the Buddha's time till now it is 2500 years, which is only 25 days according to the Tavatimsa calendar. She is not yet a month old. If you attain enlightenment now, in forty, fifty or sixty years you will be born in the deva world, meet this goddess, and discuss the dhamma with her on an equal level. If you have not got any stage of enlightenment, do not be discouraged. At least you will be born in the deva world. Then ask the Ariyan devas, listen to their teachings, and pay attention to what they teach. Then you will attain to the Path and Fruition. The corporeality of the devas is very pure. The consciousness that arises depending on this pure matter is keen and swift. So, if you remember what you have meditated on in your human existence, you will understand the arising and passing away of mind and matter and reach the Ariyan Path and Fruition in no time at all.

"The pieces of the dhamma which he has experienced before flow to him in his happiness there. The arising of recollection, monks, is slow. But then quickly does that being reach the attainment of Path, fruition and Nibbana." (A.i,505)

A Sakyan woman, Gopika by name, who was a Stream-winner, died and was born a son of Sakka, the King of devas in Tavatimsa. There he saw three gandhabba gods who had come to dance at his father's palace. On reflection Gopaka (for it was his name now) saw that the three gods had been monks he had worshipped in his former existence. He told them. Two of the gods remembered the dhamma they had practised, meditated on it, and there and then gained jhana, and became Non-returners, and rose to Brahmapurohita world.

There are lots of gods and goddesses like Uposatha now living in the world of devas, who have practised the dhamma in the Buddha's time. There are gods like Gopaka who have been born gods from women. All of them have practised the dhamma just like you. It is very heartening. This is the ancient road. It is the road taken by the Ariyans. You must know that we are following this road. Every time you note you are walking along this road. As a traveller nears his destination with each step, you come closer to Nibbana with each noting.

If the Path-Fruition were to be reached in ten thousand notings, and if you now have made a thousand notings, then you need nine thousand more notings to reach it. If you have made nine thousand notings already, then you need only a thousand more. If you have 9999 already, then the very next noting could be the Path process. The more you note, the nearer you come to the Path.

May you be able to note

The five aggregates of grasping whenever they arise at the six doors.

May you realize their impermanence, suffering and not-self nature.

May you make swift progress in your insight and realize NIBBANA, the end of all suffering.

3087 words, p114

****

APPENDIX

Glossary

Action = kammanta

right action = samma-kammanta, it consists of refraining from killing, stealing and sexual misconduct.

wrong action = miccha-kammanta, it consists in killing, stealing and sexual misconduct.

activities, volitional = sankharas. This word is also translated as mental formations. They consist of volition or will and other mental concomitants (cetasikas).

adverting = avajjana. In a thought process it is the moment when mind, or rather, consciousness turns towards the object presented through one of the sense-doors, viz. eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, or when consciousness becomes conscious of the object.

aggregate = khandha. Khandhas are so called because they have the division into past, present, future, internal, external, etc. Perception for example, though only one is called khandha or aggregate because there can be past perception, present perception and so on.

-of grasping, or of clinging = upadanakkhanda, aggregates that are objects of grasping or clinging (upadanas)

air-element, see element

analysis = vavatthana. Discerning things well defined, seeing which is which. See next.

-of four elements = catudhatu-vavatthana Seeing the four elements clearly and well defined, seeing 'This is earth-element', 'This is water-element' and so on. See element also.

analytical knowledge of mind and matter = namarupaparicchedanana. An insight knowledge which sees mind and matter clearly and well defined as, for example, 'This is mind', 'This is matter.'

apperception = javana. The meaning of this Pali word is 'running, or force, or speed'. In Abhidhamma it is the name given to certain types of consciousness which experience the object forcefully or thoroughly. It is also translated as 'impulsion'.

attainment = samapatti. This means entering into and remaining in a certain state of higher consciousness. There are three kinds of samapatti.

1. Jhapatti-samapatti, entering into and remaining in the state of jhana.

2. Phala-samapatti, entering into and remaining in the state of Fruition consciousness.

3. Nirodha-samapatti, entering into and remaining in the state of cessation of mental activities.

awareness = vinnana. Pure awareness of the object is the characteristic of consciousness (citta or vinnana)

Becoming = bhava. It is also translated as existence.

birth = jati. Arising of mind and/or matter, so it does not necessarily mean to be born as a child only.

body = kaya.

contemplation of the body = kayanupassana. See contemplation bourn = gati. Existence or realms beings go to.

bad bourn = duggati, realms of woe, such as hell and animal kingdom good bourn = sugati, realms of happiness, such as human and deva worlds brahma = higher celestial beings.

Calm = samatha, also translated as 'tranquillity'. Samatha is synonymous with samadhi (concentration).

clear comprehension = sampajanna

compassion = karuna

Compendium of Philosophy, name of the English translation of an ancient Abhidhamma treatise called 'Abhidhammatthasangaha'. It itself is often referred to as Compendium of Philosophy in the present book.

concentration = samadhi. Samadhi is defined as that mental state (cetasika) which places consciousness and its concomitants undistracted and unscattered on a single object. Samadhi is one of the five mental faculties functioning during meditation.

concept = pannatti. Pannatti is explained as having no individual essence, so it is a non-reality.

concomitants of mind = cetasikas. Cetasikas are those mental states or mental factors which arise and perish together with consciousness (citta)

condition = paccaya confidence, faith = saddha. See also faculty.

consciousness = vinnana or citta, which is defined as the pure awareness of the object. Consciousness (citta) and concomitants of mind (cetasikas) constitute what we call mind.

constituent (of Path) = (magg-) anga. There are eight of them, and they are as a group what is popularly known as the Noble Eightfold Path.

contemplation = anupassana
-of body = kayanupassana
-of dhamma objects = dhammanupassana
-of feelings = vedananupassana

-of mind = cittanupassana continuity = santati

craving = tanha

Death, dying = marana. Disappearing of mind and matter.

deed = kamma. See kamma.

bad deed = akusala kamma.
good deed = kusala kamma.

defilements = kilesas. Mental impurities such as attachment, ill will and delusion.

Dependent Origination = Paticca-samuppada. The teaching (or law) of conditionality. This word is also translated as 'Conditioned Genesis'.

desire (will) = chanda. Chanda is mere will to do. It can be associated with kusala or akusala.

determining consciousness = votthabbana citta. It is the type of consciousness which determines whether the object presented to the mind and investigated by the previous moment of investigations is desirable or undesirable.

devas = celestial beings. It can mean both lower celestial beings and higher celestial beings called 'brahmas'.

deva-sight = dibba-cakkhu. It is one of the supernormal knowledges; by it one can see things very minute, subtle, far away, hidden and so on. The ability to see beings dying from one existence and being reborn in another is a variety of this knowledge.

deva-hearing or deva-ear = dibba-sota. One of the supernormal knowledges by which one can hear sounds very minute, subtle, hidden, far away and so on.

deva-world = devaloka. The realm of celestial beings.

divine states = brahma-viharas, way of living of brahmas. They are loving-kindness (metta), compassion (karuna), sympathetic joy (mudita) and equanimity (upekkha).

door (sense-door) = dvara. There are six sense doors according to Buddhism, viz., eye-door, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind-door. These are the doors through which objects come into contact with mind.

Effort = vayama. See also faculty.

right effort = samma-vayama.

ego(self) = atta.

element = dhatu. Mental as well as physical properties are called dhatus. There are four great elements of matter, viz.,

1. Earth-element = pathavi-dhatu, solidity of things.

2. Water-element = apo-dhatu, fluidity or cohesiveness.

3. Fire-element = tejo-dhatu, heat or cold, temperature.

4. Air-element = vayo-dhatu, distendedness.

equanimity = upekkha. Upekkha also means indifference or neutral feeling.

establishment of mindfulness = satipatthana. It is also translated as 'foundations of mindfulness'.

Factors of Enlightenment = sambojjhanga or bojjhanga. There are seven of them, viz.

1. Mindfulness = sati
2. Investigation of dhammas = dhamma-vicaya. It is in reality understanding or wisdom.
3. Effort = viriya
4. Joy or rapture = piti
5. Tranquillity = passaddhi
6. Concentration = samadhi
7. Equanimity = upekkha

faculty = indriya. There are 22 of them taught in Abhidhamma. The five mental faculties important in the practice of meditation are confidence, effort, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom.

faith (confidence) = saddha

feeling = vedana

form (matter) = rupa

formless = arupa. The word means 'non-matter', which according to Buddhism comprises consciousness (citta), mental factors (cetsikas), and Nibbana. In most cases, however, it means consciousness and mental factors only. Arupa is synonymous with 'nama' foul thing = asubha, such as bloated corpse.

fruit(ion) = phala. It is the resultant of magga or Path consciousness, and at the time of enlightenment it immediately follows the Path consciousness and arises for two or three times. In phala-sampatti it arises countless times.

function, property as = kicca. Action done by things of reality. The function of air-element, for instance, is moving.

Going for Refuge = sarana-gamana, taking someone or something as a refuge, as a guide. Only those who take refuge in the Triple Gem are called upasakas or upasikas, followers of the Buddha, or Buddhists.

grasping = upadana. It is the name of attachment and wrong view.

Happiness = sukha.

happy living in this very life = ditthadhamma-sukhavihara.

higher knowledge (superknowledge) = abhinna.

hindrances = nivarana. There are five of them, viz.

1. Sense-desire = kamacchanda.

2. Ill will = byapada

3. Sloth and torpor = thina-middha

4. Restlessness and remorse = uddhacca-kukkucca

5. Doubt = vicikiccha

In Abhidhamma ignorance (delusion) also is describes as hindrance.

Impermanence = anicca

inferential insight = anumana-vipassana

initial application = vitakka insight = vipassana. The real meaning of the word 'vipassana' is 'seeing in various ways', i.e., seeing mental and physical phenomena as impermanent, suffering (or unsatisfactory) and not-self (or insubstantial).

intimation = vinnana. There are two kinds of intimation, viz.,

1. Bodily intimation = kaya-vinnatti, gestures, etc.
2. Verbal intimation = vaci-vannatti, mode of speech.

investigating consciousness = satirana citta. It is the type of consciousness which investigates the object presented to mind and accepted by the previous moment whether it is desirable or undesirable.

investigating knowledge = sammasana-nana, one of the stages of vipassana knowledge.

investigation of dhammas = dhamma-vicaya. See Factors of Enlightenment.

Kamma = volition. Technically, kamma is volition, a mental factor. Since it is always with this volition that beings do good or bad deeds, deeds themselves are often referred to as kamma.

knowledge = nana

- analytical, of mind and matter = namarupa-pariccheda-nana
- of desire for deliverance = muncitukamyata-nana.
- of (by) discerning conditionality = paccaya-pariggaha-nana.
- of dissolution = bhanga-nana
- of indifference to formations = sankharupekkha-nana
- of investigation = sammasana-nana
- of re-reflection (re-observation) = patisankha-nana
- of repulsion (disgust) = nibbida-nana
- of rise and fall (rising and passing away) = udayabbaya-nana
- of the fearful = bhava-nana
- of tribulation = adinava-nana

Law = dhamma

life-continuum = bhavanga. It is the inactive moments of consciousness.

livelihood = ajiva

right livelihood = samma-ajiva wrong livelihood = miccha-ajiva

loving-kindness = metta

lower states = apaya, literally, states of woe or suffering

Manifestation (mode of appearance) = paccupatthana matter (material, physical, form) = rupa means of accomplishment = iddhipada meditator = yogi

member of enlightenment = bodhipakkiya-dhamma

mental quality (mind, psychological) = nama mind = mana, citta or nama. 'Mind' is often used to mean citta and cetasikas together.

mind and matter = nama-rupa

mindfulness = sati

-of death = maranussati

mode of appearance = see manifestation moral habit = sila

Nama = literally that which inclines towards the object or that which makes others incline towards it. It consists of consciousness (citta), mental factors (cetasikas), and Nibbana. But in most cases nama is used to mean citta and cetasikas only as, for example, in the word 'nama-rupa'.

neutral feeling = adukkha-m-asukha vedana never-returner (non-returner) = anagami

noble one = ariya

Noble Eightfold Path = Ariyo Atthangiko Maggo

non-returner = anagami

notion = sanna

notion of permanence = nicca-sanna

notion of loathsomeness of food = ahare patkula-sanna

Developing the notion that food is loathsome by reflecting in various ways so that one does not get attached to food.

not-self = anatta

object-latent = arammananusaya

old age = jara

once-returner = sakadagami

Order (of noble monks) = samgha origin (origination, cause) = samudaya

Path = magga. The name given to the group of eight factors of Path such as Right View etc. Consciousness which they accompany is called Path consciousness.

Path of Purity (Purification) = Visuddhimagga perception = sanna

permanence (-ent) = nicca

pleasant (pleasurable, happy) = sukha

power = bala

practical (personal) insight = paccakkha-vipassana

process (thought-process) = vithi property = rasa. It has two varieties, viz., as function and as achievement.

proximate cause (immediate occasion) = padatthana

purity = visuddhi

Quietude (tranquillity) = passaddhi, one of the factors of enlightenment

Rapture = piti. Piti is translated differently by different authors, as joy, happiness, rapture, zest, and pleasurable interest.

reality = paramattha reason = vimamsaa

rebirth = patisandhi. It is also translated as relinking -consciousness = patisandhi-citta receiving (recipient) consciousness = sapaticchana citta. It is the type of consciousness which receives the object presented to the mind.

recollection = anussati

refuge = sarana

retentive (registering) consciousness = tadarammana citta. This consciousness always arises twice or none at all. It follows the moments of apperception (javana)

round of rebirths = samsara

Self (ego) = atta

sense-objects = kama

Silent Buddha = Pacceka Buddha. 'Pacceka' literally means separate. They are not Supreme Buddhas, nor are they ordinary arahants. They are lower than the Supreme Buddhas, but higher than the arahants. They appear in the world when there is no Supreme Buddha or no teachings of Supreme Buddhas are available.

specification (analysis) = vavatthana speech = vaca

right speech = samma-vaca wrong speech = miccha-vaca stream-winner = sotapanna

stream-winning = sotapatti

subject of meditation = kammatthana. It also means the practice of meditation.

subsequent (thought-) process = anuvattaka vithi suffering (ill, misery, pain) = dukkha

Supreme Buddha = Sammasambuddha

supreme effort = sammappadhana sympathy (sympathetic joy) = mudita

Theory of the self = attavada thought = citta, sankappa

right thought = samma-sankappa wrong thought = miccha-sankappa thought moment = cittakkhana

Three Gems = Tiratana

tranquillity = passaddhi

transcending doubts = kankhavitarana

Unpleasant = dukkha unwholesome = akusala. 'Akusala' is also translated as immoral, unprofitable and unskilful.

View (wrong view) = ditthi

volitional activities = sankharas

Wholesome = kusala. It is also translated as moral, profitable and skilful.

will (desire) = chanda

wisdom = panna

wrong = miccha

Yogi = meditator

****

"Notes on Gassho and Bowing"Taizan Maezumi Roshi with John Daishin Buksbazen----------Visitors to the Zen Center often ask about th gassho and about bowing. What, they inquire, is the meaning of these gestures? Why are th it necessary to do them so precisely and uniformly? These questions deserve careful consid we are Zen Buddhists, it should be noted that the gassho and the bow are common to all se both Mahayana and Theravada. These two gestures date from the earliest days of Buddhisn than that, and they have moved from India throughout the Orient, finally arriving recently in t world.When Shakyamuni Buddha's enlightenment occurred, he went to see five of his forme he had practiced various austerities and spiritual disciplines prior to his enlightenment. Thes who were very devout monks, felt that their companion had gone astray when he abandone practices. "Come," they said to each other, "Let's not pay any attention to poor Gautama, he one of us." They were dismayed to find that he had seemingly stopped his spiritual practices as to even drink milk and take a bath (two forbidden acts according to their tradition). They c understand why he seemed only to sit quietly, doing nothing of any value.But when the Bud them, it is reported that these five monks were so struck by the transformation of their forme his serenity and the radiance of his personality, that they spontaneously placed their palms t greeted him with deep bows. Perhaps it is a little misleading to say that they greeted HIM. M it should be said that they were bowing not to their old friend Gautama, but rather to the Buc Enlightened One.What the Buddha had experienced was the Supreme Great Enlightenment samyak sambodhi): the direct and conscious realization of the oneness of the whole univers unity with all things. This is what enlightenment means. This very realization is actually in its of being the Buddha. And it was to this enlightened state that the five monks bowed.When th enlightened, the first thing he said was: "Wonder of wonders! All sentient beings have the sa (enlightened) nature!" What this implies is that in bowing to the Buddha, the monks were act themselves, and to all beings. These monks were recognizing the great unity which their for directly and profoundly experienced.Let us examine the gassho and the bow more closely.G GASSHO literally means "To place the two palms together". Of all the mudras (symbolic har positions) we use, it is perhaps the most fundamental, for it arises directly from the depths o enlightenment. Its uses are many, but most commonly it is employed to express respect, to of the mind, to unify all polarities (such as left and right, passive and dominant, etc.) and to e One Mind -- the total unity of Being.Although there are many types of gassho, in the Soto se primarily concerned with these four: 1. THE FIRM GASSHO. The most formal of the gass one most commonly used in our daily practice. It is the gassho we use upon entering the zen taking our seats. We also use it at least sixteen times in the course of a formal meal, and du services. It is made by placing the hands together, palm to palm in front of the face. The fing together, and are straight rather than bent, while the palms are slightly pressed together so t meet. The elbows are held somewhat out from the body, although the forearms are not quite floor. There is about one fist's distance between the tip of the nose and the hands. Fingertip

the same height from the floor as the top of the nose. This gassho has the effect of helping t alert and reverential state of mind. 2. THE GASSHO OF NO-MIND. This is the next most gassho. It is basically used in greeting one another or our teachers. In this position, the hand little more loosely together, with a slight space between the palms, although the fingers still t elevation of the elbows from the floor is not so great as in the Firm Gassho; forearms should approximately a 45-degree angle to the floor. This gassho has the effect of deepening one's samadhi. 3. THE LOTUS GASSHO. This gassho is used primarily by officiating priests on occasions. It is made like the GASSHO OF NO-MIND, except that the tips of the middle fing inch apart. Its name derives from the resemblance of this hand position to the shape of a jus bud. 4. THE DIAMOND GASSHO. This gassho is also known as the GASSHO OF BEING LOTUS GASSHO, it is used by officiants in services. Although the hands and arms are in ba position as in the GASSHO OF NO-MIND, the DIAMOND GASSHO is made with the fingers interlocking, and with the right thumb on top of the left.In each of these gasshos, we keep th focused upon the tips of our middle fingers. But regardless of the style or variety of the gass whatever setting it is being used, the fundamental point of the gassho is to be one with the T Treasures: Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha.Of course, we can look at the Three Treasures fro perspectives, and with varying degrees of depth and clarity. At perhaps the most superficial Three Treasures are seen as external objects of supreme reverence for all Buddhists. Unfor view, the Three Treasures tend to be perceived as something other than oneself. But as our we experience that each of us is, in fact, the Buddha. We see clearly that everything we enc world is none other than the Dharma -- the functioning of underlying enlightenment. And, rea oneness of all beings, we come to realize that the Sangha -- the all-embracing brotherhood simply all composite things, including each of us. Having this awareness we become -- or ra one with the Three Treasures.So, joining our hands palm to palm, we simultaneously create absolute, the oneness which goes beyond all dichotomies. It is from this perspective that we and that we bow.It is no ordinary person who bows; it is the Three Treasures recognizing its things. If anyone thinks of himself as "just ordinary", he is, in effect, defaming the Three Trea as we place our palms together we unite wisdom and samadhi, knowledge and truth, enlight delusion.BOWING:Dogen Zenji once said: "As long as there is true bowing, the Buddha Way deteriorate." In bowing, we totally pay respect to the all-pervading virtue of wisdom, which is Buddha.In making the bow, we should move neither hastily nor sluggishly but simply mainta mind and humble attitude. When we bow too fast, the bow is then too casual a thing; perhap hurrying to get it over and done with. This is frequently the result of a lack of reverence.On th hand, if our bow is too slow, then it becomes a rather pompous display; we may have gotten the feeling of bowing, or our own (real or imagined) gracefulness of movement. This is to ha humble attitude which a true bow requires.When we bow, it is always accompanied by gassh gassho itself may not always be accompanied by bowing. As with the gassho, there are num styles of bowing, but here we will deal only with the two main kinds of bow which we use in o practice. 1. THE STANDING BOW. This bow is used upon entering the zendo, and in gre and our teachers. The body is erect, with the weight distributed evenly and the feet parallel t

The appropriate gassho is made (see above). As the bow is made, he body bends at the wa forms an angle with the legs of approximately 45 degrees. The hands (in gassho) do not mo face, but remain in position and move only with the whole body. 2. THE DEEP BOW (FUL bow is most often used at the beginning and end of services, and upon entering and leaving somewhat more formal than the standing bow, and requires a continuous concentration duri that it is not sloppily done. The bow itself begins in the same way as the STANDING BOW body is bent slightly from the waist, the knees ben and one assumes a kneeling position. Fro position, the movement of the torso continues, with the hands separating and moving, palms position parallel with the forehead. As the bowing movement progresses, the backs of the ha just above the floor and the forehead is lowered until it rests upon the floor between the han point, the body is touching the floor at knees, elbows, hands, and forehead. The hands are t raised, palms upward, to a point just above the ears. Then the hands slowly return to the floo is a symbolic placing of the Buddha's feet above one's head as an act of reverence and hum should be no sharp, abrupt movements of the hands or arms, no bending of the wrists or cu fingers when executing this gesture. When the hands have been raised and lowered, the bo as the person bowing gets to his feet once again and ends in gassho, just as he began. In k the knees do not touch the ground simultaneously, but in sequence; first, the right and then touches the ground. The same is true for the right and left hands and right and left elbows, i sequence. In practice, however, the interval between right and left sides touching the ground minute as to be unnoticeable. In bowing, movement should not be jerky or disjointed, but sh smoothly and continuously without either disruption or arrested motion.Master Obaku, the te Rinzai, was famous for his frequent admonition to his students. "Don't expect anything from Treasures." Time after time he was heard to say this. One day, however, Master Obaku was of bowing, and was challenged about his practice."You always tell your students not to expe the Three Treasures," said the questioner, "and yet you have beenmaking deep bows." In fa bowing so frequently and for so long that a large callus had formed on his forehead at the po touched the hard floor. When asked how he explained this, Master Obaku replied, "I don't ex bow."This is the state of being one with the Three Treasures. Let us just make gassho. Let u bow.[from ON ZEN PRACTICE, Hakuyu Taizan Maezumi and Bernard Tetsugen Glassman, 0-916820-04-1.]Reproduced in GASSO vol 1 no 1 (ISSN: 1072-2971) with permission of the Angeles, 927 South Normandie Avenue, Los Angeles, CA 90006. All rights reserved.==========

[This document can be acquired from a sub-directory coombspapers viaanonymous FTP or the node COOMBS.ANU.EDU.AU orANU Soc.Sci.WWW Server at http://coombs.anu.edu.a document's ftp filename and the full directory path are given inthe coombspapers top level I files][This version: 23 March 1994]----------TITLE: In Praise of the ACIP CD-ROM: Woodblock to LaserAUTHOR: GELEK Rinpoche (Nyagri Khentrul)SOURCE: "AC e-mail Erik Davis<erikd@panix.com> to buddha-l@ULKYVM.LOUISVILLE.EDU 23 Mar 199 lay Tibetan master named Gelek Rinpoche(Nyagri Khentrul) wrote Nov. 8, 1993 in praise of LobsangTharchin and the computerised Asian Classics Input Project at the SeraMey monas
PRAISE OF THE ACIP CD-ROM: WOODBLOCK TO LASER(trans. Michael Roach)Great fr [Lo] is deep and vastBorn of the hundred thousandGood and wonderful [sang] deedsYou've down and salute you,King of scholars,For your surpassing [Tharchin]And courageous efforts precious knowledgeOf our snowy landThroughout the countries of the world.The light of the endlessLike the light of the disksOf the sky,Sun and moon;The generosity of your giftIs endl attracted to itAnd caught,Like fish in a net;The lands of the globeAre endlessWhere the goo contributionWill spread;The people you reachAre endless,And what your doIs of ultimate va likeA far spreading cloudIn the sky,And the showers of your kind workPour down on us.You seemAlmost effortless,Like a rain that fallsDown to sustainThe rest of us.Who else could do have done,Master of master scholars,King of rivers,Flowing downTo feed the oceanOf the i those with the fortuneTo be fed.Like a motherYou sent the sunlightOf care and compassion instructThat very luckyMan of the raceOf the yellow hairAnd feed him the sweetNectar of ho knowledge of the classicsOf Asia,And your rays of lightOpened in himA thousand petalsOf k againIs proofOf your kindness,And your masteryOf knowledge.Your deeds are pure,And wh skyThat lightsOur great books;The rays come downFrom youAnd open the night flowers,Ful wish,For you areA real Lamp of Alladin.You light up the pathThat leads to the doorOf the ho ultimate ends of knowledge;And there you marchCarrying highThe golden flagOf wisdom, in ethics.A hundred thousandMirrors of the diskHold the great classicsOf authorsBeyond coun longerDo we needTo wander amilesslyIn the pages of catalogsBeyond counting.This magic shineThe works of KangyurAnd the Tengyur, almostBeyond counting.It is a thing of wonder; switchWe bring up whatever wordsWe seek to find,Beyond counting.They sayTheat the mos jewelsCome from the depthsOf the ocean;And so from deepBelow the vast seaOf our ancie single pushOf our fingerOn a buttonWe pull up the shining gemsOf citations,Of text and commentary,Whatever we seek;This is somethingFantastic,Beyond dreams.It could only ha yourself,Master of our ancient schools,Who took this new inventionAnd turned it to a precio vase, jammed to the brimWith the treasure of the knowledgOf our Himalayan lands.It was a assembleIn one placeThe woodblock printsOf our ancient authorsUntil all these keysTo the knowledgeWere complete in a singlePrecious treasure chest;But you went further,And sprea throughoutThe entire world;A featMore amazing still!I throw to youA thousand petalled bloo congratulations,And I rejoiceIn the kind deed you have don,Which I knowWill satisfy the wisl throughout the world.May you good activitiesSpread to whereverThe earth spreads,And ther praisesOf your deeds be sung.--Gelek Rinpoche, Nov. 8, 1993----------end of file

É͍͍»
º º
º T I G E R T E A M º
º º
º Oakland, CA º
º º
º Gary Ray & Jeffrey Macko º
º 510-658-0607 º
È͍͍¼

The meaning of Genjo- Ko-an can be interpreted a number of #ways, but the best translation, by T.P. Kasulis, is "...`the individuality of things manifesting themselves equally.'" (5:83) Of all the essays of the Sho-bo-genzo-, Genjo- Ko-an best describes Do-gen's understanding of Zen, especially his view of ultimate reality. It is sometimes said that the Genjo- Ko-an is the key to the Sho-bo-genzo-, and that the other essays stand merely as "...so many facets of `Genjo- Ko-an,' exploring and developing its themes." (2:46/6:56) Although it is said that Do-gen's primary contribution in the Sho-bo-genzo- is his reminder to "live daily life in the moment," his concept #of what "ultimate reality" really is is #also an important concept #in understanding Do-gen's and his full range of teachings.

Almost like the story of creation in the Bible, Do-gen places his description of reality at the beginning of the first chapter, Genjo- Ko-an. This first section reads:

> (1) When all things are just what they are [apart from discrimination], illusion and enlightenment exist, religious practice exists, birth exists, death exists, Buddhas exist, and ordinary beings exist. (2) When the myriad things are without self, there is no delusion, no enlightenment, no Buddhas, no ordinary beings, no birth, no extinction. (3) Since the Buddha Way from the beginning transcends fullness and deficiency, there is no birth and extinction, delusion and enlightenment, beings and Buddhas. (4) However, though this is the way it is, it is only this: flowers scatter in our longing, and weeds spring up in our loathing. (2:46)

This passage has created a controversy between many commentators who argue over whether Do-gen's view of reality in this section is made up of progressive or equal statements. Those who believe the first four lines are progressive argue that the first line is a deluded view of reality, followed by the view of the recognition of emptiness, and lastly, "...the correct position of transcendence of both existence and nonexistence, affirmation and denial, difference and sameness." (2:47) Each of these lines are considered to be a hierarchical scale starting from the most deluded view to an enlightened view.

The biggest critic of this view, Francis Cook, argues that understanding this section as progressive is incorrect. Cook gives two reasons for his view. First, he interprets the first line "When all things are just what they are..." as meaning when all things are Buddha Dharma. (2:47) In fact,# most translators of the Genjo- ko-an, such as Thomas Cleary, Hee-Jin Kim, Kazuaki Tanahashi and Kosen Nishiyama, translate this phrase directly as "Buddha dharma" or "buddha teachings." (2:32 / 6:51 / 9:69 / 7:1) If all things then are Buddha dharma (buppo), they must exist "...in reality as the `Eternal Law.'" (2:47) If this first way of viewing reality is incorrect, then it cannot be the way reality is viewed "When all things are just what they are..." Cook's second argument revolves around the repeated statement in line three about the "Buddha Way" also being in a way different from the "Buddha-dharma" of line one. According to Cook, "...the view of things expressed in the first line cannot be a deluded view, let alone the inferior of the three positions." (2:47) Therefore, the other option, that of each line being equal, must be examined.

The view that each line is equal asserts that there is one reality or truth of the Genjo- Ko-an, and that each viewpoint is an equally valid view of the individuals #reality on the transformative path. According to Kim, "These three paragraphs can be viewed as describing the three `aspects' of the single reality of the realization-ko-an; at the same time,# each aspect is itself the fullest possible expression of the realization-ko-an,..." (6:56) With this viewpoint, the "Buddha-dharmas" do not contradict.

One may now ask: Why only three ways of viewing reality? Dogen's education in Buddhist doctrine first took place at the Tendai temple, Onjo-ji. (3:52) This training is evident in this section of the Genjo- Ko-an, since the Tendai sect divide reality up into four parts, unlike other "sects" of Buddhism, including Zen. As for the significance of viewing reality in four ways, rather than three or five, it seems to be an arbitrary number chosen to help students understand the path to realization of the highest reality. According to Zen Master Stephen Echard, the number of ways to view reality is infinite and arbitrary if one goes beyond one. (4) Each level on the "reality scales" is like a ladder with infinite rungs, each rung of the ladder represents a way of viewing reality. To state that there are four ways, or three ways, is to ignore the other rungs. In truth, there is only one reality, just as there is only one "top" at which the ladder leads the climber. To describe different points of ascent on the ladder can be useful in judging an individuals #progress, but the evaluation should not be viewed as ultimate truth.

The last section reads: (4) However, though this is the way it is, it is only this: flowers scatter in our longing, and weeds spring up in our loathing. (2:46) This section attempts to explain the self-sufficiency of each previous viewpoint. The "springing up" represents form (or samsara). The "scattering" alludes #to emptiness (or nirvana). Therefore, "The Buddha-way is thus neither plenitude (samsara) nor dearth (nirvana), and yet, it is paradoxically both plenitude and death." (6:56) Each view is totally independent and dependent at the same time.# "...any dharma becomes the single total dharma which transcends all other dharmas and simultaneously embraces them all." (6:57)

This viewing of reality as discussed, leads many scholars to describe the Genjo- Ko-an as the "presencing ko-an," due to #its emphasis on viewing reality in the present moment, as it is (for each individual). (8:145) As for being a ko-an, by expressing reality as it is, the student "...will give the accurate descriptive response to the Master and thus `resolve' all ko-ans." (8:145) The formula for reflecting reality in the moment in a spontaneous manner, is taught by Do-gen:

> To master the Buddha way is to master oneself,
> To master oneself is to forget oneself,
> To forget oneself is to realize the myriads of dharmas,
> To realize the myriads of dharmas is to cast off one's body and mind and mind of others. (FROM 8:146, Genjo-Ko-an)

By climbing the ladder without being conscious of the rungs, the individual stands a fighting chance of reaching the top. A Zen ko-an even goes as far as asking: What do you do after climbing to the top of a pole? The appropriate answer...? Take one step.

WORKS CITED

1. Cleary, Thomas, trans. Sho-bo-genzo-: Zen Essays by Do-gen. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1986.
2. Cook, Francis H. Sounds of Valley Streams. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1989.
3. Dumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: A History. Volume II, Japan. New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 1990.
4. Echard, Stephen, Roshi. Personal Conversation. San Diego, December 9, 1990.
5. Kasulis, T.P. Zen Action, Zen Person. Honolulu: The University of Hawaii Press, 1981.
6. Kim, Hee-Jin. Flowers of Emptiness. Lewiston, NY: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1985.
7. Nishiyama, Kosen and John Stevens, trans. Sho-bo-genzo-. Volume I. Sendai, Japan: Daihokkaikaku Publishing Company, 1975.
8. Shaner, David Edward. The Bodymind Experience in Japanese Buddhism. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1985.
9. Tanahashi, Kazuaki, ed. Moon in a Dewdrop. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1985.

WORKS CONSULTED

Cleary, Thomas, trans. Sho-bo-genzo-: Zen Essays by Do-gen. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1986.

Cook, Francis H. Sounds of Valley Streams. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1989.
Dumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: A History. Volume II, Japan. New York: Macmillan Publishing Company, 1990.
Echard, Stephen, Roshi. Personal Conversation. San Diego, December 9, 1990.
Eliot, Sir Charles. Japanese Buddhism. London: Edward Arnold & Co., 1935.
Jikai, Reverend and Reverend Jiho. Tendai Buddhism For Americans. A Pamphlet. Cape Girardeau, MO: The Tendai Buddhist Information Center, N.d.
Kasulis, T.P. Zen Action, Zen Person. Honolulu: The University of Hawaii Press, 1981.
Kim, Hee-Jin. Flowers of Emptiness. Lewiston, NY: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1985.
Nishiyama, Kosen and John Stevens, trans. Sho-bo-genzo-. Volume I. Sendai, Japan: Daihokkaikaku Publishing Company, 1975.
Shaner, David Edward. The Bodymind Experience in Japanese Buddhism. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1985.
Steinilber-Oberlin, E. The Buddhist Sects of Japan. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, Publishers. 1970.
Tanahashi, Kazuaki, ed. Moon in a Dewdrop. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1985.

Sho-bo-genzo- Genjo- Ko-an Manifesting Absolute Reality

By

Gary L. Ray

Asian Studies 499
Independent Study
San Diego State University
December 13, 1990

TURNING THE WHEEL OF THE DHARMA

Gen Rinpoche teaches Bodhicitta, the Mind of Enlightenment

Teaching given by the Most Venerable Geshe

Ngawang Dhargyey at the Dhargyey Buddhist Centre, Dunedin, Sunday 18th December 1994. It has been edited by Ven. Ani Sönam Chökyi from the oral translation by Losang Dawa. copywrite Dhargyey Buddhist Centre.

Today is the last teaching of 1994 so it is time to review what you have done during the year. If you discover that your year has been positive, that you have done lots of practices, learned a lot and meditated a lot, now is the time to appreciate yourself and congratulate yourself on being so successful in spiritual terms, and it is also the time to rededicate yourself to practice, study and meditation in the coming year. On the other hand, if you find that you have been irregular in doing practices and coming to classes, and that you have not actually done anything much that you have more-or-less wasted a year of this precious human life now is the time to feel regret and sadness about it. But being sad about it is not enough this sadness must also become a force impelling you to do better. So now is the time to determine that you will change for the better in the coming year.

Bodhicitta is like the supreme gold-making elixir,
For it transforms the unclean body we have taken Into the priceless jewel of a Buddha-Form.
Therefore firmly seize this Awakening Mind.

We need to practise, and practise all the time. The practice we most need to undertake is the most wholesome practice of all the practice in which we work wholeheartedly to develop bodhicitta, the state of mind that sincerely and fervently wants to achieve full enlightenment for the sake of all beings. Nothing is as wholesome as concentrating on this mind. It is said that if all the Buddhas of the three times were to put their heads together and discuss what would be most beneficial for suffering beings, giving them happiness in the short-term and in the long-term, they would not find anything more magical than the mind of enlightenment, bodhichitta, for it is the panacea of all ills.

This mind of bodhicitta is of crucial importance, for it is this mind which determines whether or not our practice carries us to the state of enlightenment. For instance if a person were to go away to the mountains, find a suitable cave for meditation and completely seal themselves inside the cave with the strong determination not to come out or see anyone, but to dedicate their entire life to concerted practice, if this person did not have bodhicitta, no matter what practice he or she might do inside the sealed cave, nothing much would come of it in terms of achieving enlightenment.

Thus we must realize the importance of this precious mind of enlightenment. Our efforts to achieve the state of enlightenment must be constant and steady, therefore we need the precious mind of enlightenment continuously. Although you are going to have a month-and-a-half's break for the summer holidays, never have a break from generating bodhicitta.

As Jamgön Lama Tsongkapa says, if one has the alchemists' elixir one can transmute base metal into gold; in the same way, if you have this precious mind of enlightenment, this bodhicitta, this jewel of all minds, it will transmute all your small and seemingly insignificant good deeds into a means by which you will reach the state of enlightenment.

The great Indian Buddhist master Shantideva says something very similar: If we have this mind of enlightenment, although at the moment we have a human body that originally came into being from the sperm and egg of our parents and is thus basically undesirable, impure and unattractive in itself, the elixir of the mind of enlightenment will transform this human body of gross, impure human material into the glorious, magnificent, enlightened body of a Buddha.

If even the thought to relieve Living creatures of merely a headache
Is a beneficial intention Endowed with infinite goodness,

What need is there to mention
The wish to dispel their inconceivable misery,
Wishing every single one of them
To realize boundless good qualities?

The Tibetan master Dzogchen Patrul Rinpoche says, I have been to many lamas of all four traditions of Tibetan Buddhism, I have studied the many tenets and views of Buddhist philosophy and practice. None of the lamas or the texts say that there is a mind that is superior to the precious mind of enlightenment. They all have the same view with regard to the supreme significance of this mind.

Normally we understand the esoteric Buddhist practice of tantra as a very powerful and speedy way of achieving enlightenment so powerful and so speedy that through its means certain people are able to achieve the state of enlightenment in one lifetime even though normally it takes millions of eons to travel the path. However without bodhicitta, even the practice of tantra, so powerful and speedy, will not help a person reach the state of enlightenment in one lifetime.

If you really want to know how to engage in extensive merit-gathering practice in a simple way, the secret is bodhicitta. If you manage to develop bodhicitta, then even if you do no more than offer one butter-lamp, one candle, that simple practice of offering one light will gather an enormous amount of merit a universe full of merit so that however much merit is used up the store of merit will never run out. However if you were to engage in extensive offerings without bodhicitta offering ten thousand butter lamps for instance the merits would not be as great as in the first case the merit would only be as great as the number of lamps offered.

During Buddha's own time there was an Indian king called Prasenajit. On many occasions he invited the Buddha and his followers, offering them meals for weeks together. On one of these occasions the Buddha asked the king, To whom should we dedicate the merits? The king requested the Buddha to say the prayers of dedication to whoever had the greatest merits. Assuming that he himself would have the greatest merits because he was offering so much food, the King thought that the Buddha would dedicate the merits to him. However the king didn't have the most merit. Also present was a beggarly monk called Surata who felt so good about the king's generosity in offering food to the Buddha and his followers for weeks and weeks, that he rejoiced sincerely in the king's generosity and thus, through his pure heart, gathered more merits than the king who had incurred a great deal of expense.

For the one who has perfectly seized this mind
With the thought never to turn away
From totally liberating
The infinite forms of life,

From that time hence,
Even while asleep or unconcerned,
A force of merit equal to the sky
Will perpetually ensue.

For two or three weeks the king didn't get any dedications at the end of the meals he was offering to the Buddha and his many followers. Because it was the custom to say prayers at the end of the meal, and the Buddha and the Sangha didn't dedicate the merits to him, the king felt unhappy and had a very long face. One of his ministers asked him, Lord, is something bothering you? The king answered, Buddha has been here for weeks now. I have been offering food all this time and all this time the beggar Surata has received the dedication. So the minister resorted to a dirty trick. Because the beggar continued to rejoice with a pure heart in the king's generosity, thus unwittingly gathering more merits, the minister decided to have someone chase the beggar so that he would have no chance to feel good about the king's generosity. Because poor Surata had to run for his life, he didn't have time to rejoice, and that day it was found that the king had more merits. Thus that day he got the dedication he wanted!

There is another small anecdote about this poor beggar, Surata. Though he was a beggar in material terms, in spiritual terms he was already quite developed. He is said to have offered one butter lamp with bodhicitta motivation, praying, With this butter lamp may I achieve the state of enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, and it is said that the butter lamp was so brilliant that when someone tried to put it out they were unable to do so.

So with the precious mind of enlightenment, even if you burn only one incense stick and offer the fragrance to the holy objects and so on, the merit you will gather will be enormous. If, before you light the incense stick and offer the fragrance, you say to yourself, Today I offer this incense stick to the gurus and the Buddhas may I achieve the state of enlightenment for the sake of all sentient beings, saying it not in a jaded, mechanical way but with full sincerity, you will gather as many merits by burning this one incense stick as there are sentient beings throughout the universe.

This intention to benefit all beings,
Which does not arise in others even for their own sake,
Is an extraordinary jewel of the mind,
And its birth is an unprecedented wonder.

Now that I have told you about the need for and importance of bodhicitta, about the magical power of bodhicitta, please dwell in bodhicitta. Remember this: Bodhicitta is the supreme object of meditation, bodhicitta is the supreme object of any practice ... Bodhicitta is supreme for it includes the interests of all sentient beings, which is the greatest of all practices. Bodhicitta is called rinchen sem chog, meaning the precious jewel of all minds. It is the core practice the central practice of all bodhisattvas. Ask any bodhisattva, What do you mainly practise? and you will hear nothing other than, I have tried to practise bodhicitta. They will be unanimous in their answer.

I could keep on reciting the many teachings about bodhicitta given by the Buddha himself in the Sutras, as well as by Indian masters and scholar practitioners. In his great work Bodhicharyavatara (A Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life) Shantideva says that if someone simply has the good heart to want to relieve another person of a headache, the merit from that good intention cannot be estimated. There is a true story about this. It is the story of Dza.khän Pumo (literally Potter's Daughter, though the person was a man). Dza.khauml;n Pumo had been forbidden by his mother from going to distant islands in the high seas to fetch jewels for his father's trade. Because her husband had lost his life at sea, Dza.khän Pumo's mother didn't want her son to follow in his father's footsteps since she didn't want to lose the only male remaining in the family. In order to stop him, his mother could do nothing more than lie down on the threshold of their house, hoping that out of respect for her he would not jump over her. However he lost his temper and not only walked over his mother's body but also kicked her head.

Dza.khän Pumo sailed for a long time in the company of others. Eventually, as his mother had feared, the boat capsized. They were washed up on the beach of an island and as he walked along the beach trying to find his way, he came upon an iron house and went in. Inside the house he saw a terrible sight: a person whose head was being drilled by a wheel so that brains and blood were oozing out. He was suffering tremendously. Dza.khän Pumo asked him, What is the reason that you have this terrible suffering? He answered, I think it must be because of the dreadful way I behaved towards my mother, walking over her and treating her cruelly. Dza.khän Pumo thought to himself, I am in the same situation, driven by karma to suffer the same consequences of the same actions. The moment he realized that he was there due to the force of karma, a voice from above said, May one who is bound be liberated and one who is free be bound, and he found that the wheel had left the other man's head and was busily drilling into his own. However even while he was suffering the agony of being drilled by the wheel, he was able to feel sympathy for others who might be undergoing the same suffering, thinking to himself, May all other people who are suffering the same consequence through disobedience and walking over their mothers' heads, be free of their suffering: may the sufferings I undergo be sufficient for them too. As soon as he had generated this good-hearted empathy for others, the wheel jumped off his head.

I bow down to the body of the one
In whom the sacred precious mind is born.
I seek refuge in that source of joy
Who brings to happiness even those who harm him.

Dza.khän Pumo, this Potter's Daughter, was in fact the historical Buddha Shakyamuni in one of his earlier lives, as a bodhisattva on the way to enlightenment. The reason he was called Potter's Daughter was that before his birth, his mother had had many boys but they had all died. Then the parents thought, If we have a boy next time, let's try giving him a girl's name. They did so, and it worked!

One of the ways of generating universal altruism, bodhicitta, is equalizing and exchanging self for others. In equalizing, one recognizes that oneself and others are the same; in exchanging self for others one mentally exchanges one's own position for that of others. This very powerful practice of equalizing and exchanging can be traced back to the experience of the Buddha as the bodhisattva Dza.khän Pumo.

If, like Dza.khän Pumo, you have bodhicitta, although you might be temporarily reborn in a bad state of existence due to some unfortunate past action, you won't be there for as long as is usually the case you will pay for your bad karma briefly.

As Shantideva says, if somebody has the kindness and good heart to want to help relieve someone else's headache, and if that kindness and goodness of heart gathers great merit, is there any need to say that if someone generates the good heart wanting to liberate and to work for the ultimate enlightenment of all sentient beings, that that person will gather much greater merits?

Today, please meditate on bodhicitta by way of understanding that you yourself and others are the same, and then trying to exchange your cherishing of self for cherishing of others. In other words, your sense of self-cherishing must be displaced by a strong, selfless sense of cherishing others. Let such an attitude develop in your mind. This is one of the ways of generating bodhicitta, universal altruism.

Notes:
The verses quoted above are from Chapter One of Shantideva's Bodhicharyavatara as translated by Stephen Batchelor in A Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life. Gen Rinpoche quoted phrases and lines from Bodhicharyavatara many times during the teaching.

The Sanskrit word bodhicitta, (in Tibetan jang.chub.kyi sem), means literally awakening mind and mind of enlighten-ment. It is sometimes presented in English as altruistic attitude or universal altruism. It has been described as a mind infused with the aspiration to attain the state of Buddhahood for the sake of all sentient beings. This is the entrance to and the motivation behind the Bodhisattva's way of life. (Stephen Batchelor, A Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, page 178.)

Send comments to: Sonam
Tenzin at sonamt@earthlight.co.nz sonamt@earthlight.co.nz

[This document can be acquired from a sub-directory coombspapers via anonymous FTP ar on the node COOMBS.ANU.EDU.AU]The document's ftp filename and the full directory path
thecoombspapers top level INDEX file][This version: 28 July 1993]----------TITLE: Ascending the MountainAUTHOR: Bernard Tetsugen GLASSMANSOURCE: The Ten Directions, Summer/
16NOTES: Poems composed by B.T. Glassman, Sensei, on the occasion of the ceremonyo (Shisanshiki), on the 6 June 1982, during which hewas installed as abbot of Mount Doji, Zen Zen Community of NewYork.Standing alone on a solitary peak,The gateless gate crumbles.
the windyroad,Heaven and earth are walking as one.Buddhas intimate with buddhas-What r oldmedicine bottles?Then thousand blossoms perfumethe vast sky.Like this, like this !Protec Dharma,purifying beings,Dragon-heads search for water.Nothing to protect, no one topurify-Way.Eyebrow-to-eyebrow,Karmic relations everywhere.Three bows, ten thousand bows-Wh the air.The diamond sword flashes;The shadow beckons.The only path is descending the m gnarled roots are ruthlesslyexposed.Before the heavens were created,this seal is.After the h destroyed,this seal is.A formless field of benefaction,Enveloping the worlds ofliberation.Who transmitted it?Who is not embraced by it?At play in the field of the Buddha,A solitary eagle c bigmountain,Sheer cliffs afford no resting place;It is time to ascend-Cloud stepped upon cloud.----------end of file

[from: Tibetan Bulletin (March-April 1994) Universal Responsibility and Our Global E

His Holiness the Dalai Lama As the twentieth century draws to a close, we fin the world has grown smaller. The world's people have become almost one community. P military alliances have created large multinational groups; industry and international trade h a global economy. Worldwide communications are eliminating ancient barriers of distance race. We are also being drawn together by the grave problems we face: overpopulation, dw resources, and an environmental crisis that threatens our air, water, and trees, along with number of beautiful life forms that are the very foundation of existence on this small planet I believe that to meet the challenge of our times, human beings will have to develop a gre universal responsibility. Each of us must learn to work not just for his or her own self, family nation, but for the benefit of all mankind. Universal responsibility is the real key to human s is the best foundation for world peace, the equitable use of natural resources and, through future generations, the proper care of the environment. That is why it is so heartening to se non-governmental organisations as yours. Your role in forging a better future is absolutely have come across many such orgaisations built by dedicated volunteers out of genuine co fellow human beings. Such commitment represents the forefront of both social and enviro progress. Whether we like it or not, we have all been born on this earth as part of one grea Rich or poor, educated or uneducated, belonging to one nation, religion, ideology or anothe each of us is just a human being like everyone else. We all desire happiness and do not w Furthermore, each of us has the same right to pursue happiness and avoid suffering. Wher all beings are equal in this respect, you automatically feel empathy and closeness for ther this, in turn, comes a genuine sense of universal responsibility -- the wish to actively help o overcome their problems. The need for a sense of universal responsibility is present in eve aspect of modern life. Nowadays, significant events in one part of the world eventually affe planet. Therefore, we have to treat each major local problem as a global concern from the begins. We can no longer invoke the national, racial or ideological barriers that separate us destructive repercussions. In the context of our new interdependence, considering the inter is clearly the best form of self-interest. We need to appreciate interdependence in nature fa have in the past. Our ignorance of it is directly reponsible for many of the problems we fa instance, tapping the limited resources of our world -- particularly those of the developing n simply to fuel consumerism, is disastrous. If it continues unchecked, eventually we will all must respect the delicate balance of life and allow it to replenish itself. Ignorance of interde has not only harmed the natural environment, but human society as well. Instead of caring another, we place most of our efforts for happiness in pursuing individual material consump become so engrossed in this pursuit that, without knowing it, we have neglected to foster th human needs of love, kindness and cooperation. This is very sad. We have to consider wh really are. We are not machine-made objects. However, since we are not solely material a mistake to seek fulfillment in external development alone. To pursue growth properly, we our commitment to human values in many fields. Political life, of course, requires an ethica foundation, but science and religion, as well, should be pursued from a moral basis. Withou cannot distinguish between beneficial technologies and those which are merely expedient.

environmental damage surrounding us is the most obvious result of this confusion. In the c it is particularly necessary. The purpose of religion is not to construct beautiful buildings, bu cultivate positive human qualities such as tolerance, generosity and love. Every world relig what its philosophical view, is founded first and foremost on the precept that we must reduc selfishness and serve others. Unfortunately, sometimes in the name of religion, people cau than they solve. Practitioners of different faiths should realise that each religious tradition h immense intrinsic value as a means for providing mental and spiritual health. I have been heartened to follow the recent developments in the search for peace between Israelis and Laying down guns on both sides, and talking face-to-face is, in my opinion, the only way t disputes. We must learn to live together in a nonviolent way that nurtures the freedom of al
There is a wonderful verse in the Bible about turning swords into ploughshares. It is a lovel weapon transformed into a tool to serve basic human needs, symbolic of an attitude of inne disarmament. In the spirit of this ancient message, I think it is important that we stress toda urgency of a policy that is long overdue -- the demilitarisation of the entire planet. Demilit would free great human resources for protection of the environment, relief of poverty, and s human development. I have always envisioned the future of my own country, Tibet, as fou basis. Tibet will be a neutral, demilitarised sanctuary where weapons are forbidden and the harmony with nature. I have called this a Zone of Ahimsa or non-violence. This is not me it is precisely the way Tibetans tried to live for over a thousand years before our country wa invaded. In Tibet, wildlife was protected in accordance with Buddhist principles. We enact protect the environment, but it was mainly protected by the beliefs which were installed in u children. I would like to conclude by stating that I feel optimistic about the future. There are number of recent trends which show our potential for achieving a better world. The rapid ch attitude towards the earth are a source of hope. As recently as a decade ago, we thought the resources of the world as if there was no end to them. We failed to realise that unchecke was disastrous for both the environment and social welfare. Now, both individuals and go seeking a new ecological and economic order. It is true to say that as late as the 1980s pe that war was an inevitable condition of mankind. The notion prevailed that people with con interests could only confront each other. This view has deminished. Today people all over more committed to peaceful co-existence, as is evident here in the Middle East. This is an positive development. After believing for centuries that human society could only be gove rigid authoritarian discipline, people in all corners of the world have woken up to the virtues democracy. Speaking from their hearts, they have shown that the desire for freedom and tr democracy stems from the core of human nature. Recent events have proved that the simp truth is an immense force in the human mind, and as a result, in the shaping of history. Or greatest lessons for all of us has been the peaceful change in Eastern Europe. In the past people have always resorted to violence in their struggle to be free. Now, these peaceful following in the footsteps of Gandhi and Martin Luther King, have given future generations example of successful, nonviolent change. When, in the future, the need arises to change descendents can look back to 1989 as a paradigm for peaceful struggle: a real success st unprecedented scale, involving more than half a dozen nations and hundreds of millions of Meanwhile, there has been a growth of awareness of human rights. Crude power can neve basic desire for freedom, truth and democracy, which are our fundamental right. People sir a person or a system that bullies, cheats and lies. These activities are essentially opposed spirit. All these encouraging signs reflect a renewed appreciation of the benefits of basic h values. Because of the lessons we have begun to learn, the next century will be friendlier, harmonious, and less harmful. Compassion, the seeds of peace, will be able to flourish. A time, I believe that every individual has a responsibility to help guide our global family in the direction. Good wishes alone are not enough, we each have to assume responsibility. I h that in the days ahead, each of us will do all we can to see that the goal of creating a happ harmonious and healthier world is achieved. [This is the text of the address delivered to th for the Protection of Nature, Israel, on March 22, 1994]

GLOSSARY

Abyakata, Avyakata Neutral Kamma. Kamma that is not good (Kusala) or bad (Akusala)

Acariya, Acharn Acharn is the Thai derivation of Acariya which means "Teacher."

Akusala Bad, unhealthy, wrong or evil in regard to actions (Kamma).

Anagami See Ariya.

Anapanasati The meditation in which one focuses one's attention and mindfulness on the feeling of the breath going in and out at one point such as the tip of the nose.

Anatta, Anicca See Ti-Lakkhana.

Arammana The object which is presented to the Citta at any moment. This object is derived from the 5 senses or direct from the mind (memory, thoughts, feeling). It is not the external object (in the world) but that object after having been processed by one's preconceptions and predispositions.

Ariya One who has gained the Path (Magga) leading to Nibbana. This includes the Sotapanna, the Sakadagami, the Anagami, and Arahant. Each stage involves the elimination of some major defilements (Samyojana) until the Arahant eliminates them all.

Ayatana Spheres of sensation. They include the internal Ayatana -- eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and heart -- and the external Ayatana -- the spheres of sight, hearing, smell, taste, touch, and mind.

Bhavana — The practice of training one's Citta by developing the various aspects of meditation.

Bhavanga — That underlying stream of continuity which the Citta drops to when it goes completely calm and still. It may be called the underlying basis of the "Self" concept and it is that which leads to future births.

Bhumi — The ground or basic foundation of the Citta. Thus Arahatta Bhumi is the basic state of the Arahant's Citta.

Cankama — Walking back and forth, usually as a mode of meditation practice.

Citta — Mind, heart, consciousness (in some senses). It is that basis in a person which is "central" whereas everything else including all five Khandhas are peripheral.

Dhamma — The ultimate meaning of Dhamma is not definable in words but it lies in the direction of "Truth" or "Reality." The more usual meaning is that of the Buddha Dhamma or Sasana Dhamma which is that teaching which leads to the ultimate Dhamma.

Dhatu — The four elements of earth, water, fire, and air.

Dukkha — Discontent, suffering, pain, anxiety, anguish, etc.

Jhana — Various levels of Samadhi which some people can attain. They include the 4 Rupa (Form) Jhanas and the 4 Arupa (Formless) Jhanas.

Kammatthana (Kamma - action, thana - a basis). That object or subject of meditation which leads one to gain skill in Samadhi and Panna. Many meditation Bhikkhus in Thailand talk of their way of practice and behaviour as being the way of Kammatthana.

Khandha Heaps or groups. Technically this always refers to the five Khandhas: body (Rupa Khandha), feeling (Vedana Khandha), memory (Sanna Khandha), thought (Sankhara Khandha), consciousness (Vinnana Khandha). These are the five groups that form what we call a person.

Kilesas Defilements based on greed, hatred, and delusion. Also including conceit, opinionatedness, uncertainty, torpidity, restlessness, lack of conscience, lack of fear of the consequences of doing wrong and whatever else tends to the production of bad, unwholesome states.

Kusala Whatever is healthy (mentally) or good.

Metta Friendliness or love (in the more platonic sense).

Nama Those four groups that make up the mind. Nama is usually paired with Rupa, the two together being the same thing as the five Khandhas.

Nibbana That which is attained when the Kilesas have all been entirely dispersed.

Niyyanika "Leading out of." Often descriptive of the Buddha Dhamma as leading out of Samsara.

Panna Wisdom.

Parikamma A preparatory meditation, such as repetition of "Buddho" or setting up one's mindfulness on breathing.

Patisandhi Re-uniting. Patisandhi Vinnana is that form of consciousness which is similar to Bhavanga Citta, but which occurs at death, thereby leading the Citta to re-unite with the Khandhas in a new birth.

Rupa Form. The literal meaning is "shape" or visual form. But it is often used to refer to the physical body -- as in Rupa Khandha.

Sacca Dhamma Dhamma Truth. Usually refers to the Four Noble Truths: Dukkha, Samudaya (the origin of Dukkha), Nirodha (the ceasing of Dukkha), and Magga (the path leading to the ceasing of Dukkha).

Sakadagami See Ariya.

Samadhi A state of calm attained by meditation practice. It has many levels depending on the degree of absorption of the Citta with the object of the meditation.

Samapatti The attainment of Jhana.

Samatha Calm.

Sammuti Convention. The mundane world in the sense that it is made up of relative conventions.

Samsara The universe of birth and death including all possible realms of life.

Samudaya See Sacca Dhamma.

Sankhara As Sankhara Khandha it means thoughts or imaginations by putting together sense perceptions, memories, and feelings. The more general sense of the meaning of Sankhara is those parts of factors which make up any object or state.

Sannavedayitanirodha - The cessation of Sanna (memory) and Vedana (feeling). This is the ultimate level of subtlety which can be attained by Samadhi, and is one stage beyond the highest Arupa Jhana.

Sarana A refuge. The well-known Ti-Sarana (3 refuges) are the Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha.

Sati Mindfulness.

Savaka Literally "hearer." One who heard the Dhamma from the Buddha.

Savaka Arahant Those Savakas who attained Arahantship at the time of the Lord Buddha.

Sila Moral behaviour.

Sotapanna Stream attainer. See Ariya.

Sukha Pleasure or happiness, contrasted with Dukkha.

Svakkhata Svakkhata Dhamma, the well-taught Dhamma.

Tan This is a Thai word meaning Venerable. Thus: Tan Acharn; Ven. Acariya.

Tathagata The "Thus-gone," meaning the Buddha.

Ti-Lakkhana The three marks of all phenomena: anicca (non-permanence), Dukkha (unsatisfactoriness), and Anatta (not-self).

Upadana Grasping, attachment.

Vimutti Freedom (antonym of Sammuti).

Vinnana Consciousness.

Vipaka The result or fruition of Kamma.

Vipassana Insight wisdom. Synonymous with Panna.

* * * * * * * *

GLOSSARY ======== I. Terms

========= The definitions given here are based on the meanings these words have in Aj and sermons. Terms marked with a single asterisk () are taken from the standard chant o the Buddha; those with a double asterisk (), from the chant of the qualities of the Dhamr akaliko: Timeless; unconditioned by time or season. apaya: State of deprivation; the fou of existence--rebirth in hell, as a hungry ghost, as an angry demon, or as a common anim these states are permanent. arahant: A 'Worthy One,' a person whose heart is freed fror fermentation (asava) of sensuality, states of being, views and ignorance, and who is thus n further rebirth. An epithet for the Buddha and the highest level of his Noble Disciples. a Unawareness; ignorance; counterfeit awareness. bhavanamaya-panna: Discernment ach mind through meditation. brahma: Inhabitant of the higher, non-sensual levels of heaven buddho: Awake. chabbanna-ransi: Six-colored radiance or aura. Mentioned usually as the Buddha. chalang'upekkha: Six-factored equanimity, i.e., maintaining equanimity towa known through any of the six senses--sight, hearing, smell, taste, touch and ideation. dha phenomenon; the way things are in and of themselves; their inherent qualities; the basic pr underlie their behavior. Also, principles of behavior that human beings ought to follow so with the right natural order of things; qualities of mind they should develop so as to realize quality of the mind in and of itself. By extension, 'dhamma' is used also to refer to any do teaches such things. Thus the Dhamma of the Buddha refers both to his teachings and to experience of the quality--'buddho'--at which those teachings are aimed. In contexts where used in a neutral sense in these sermons, it has been left uncapitalized. Where used in a p sense, it has been capitalized. dhamma-vicaya-sambojjhanga: Discrimination of phenome principles, etc. One of the factors of Awakening, the others being mindfulness, persistence serenity, concentration and equanimity. dhatu: Element; property; the elementary proper up the inner sense of the body and mind: earth (solidity), water (liquidity), fire (heat), winc or motion), space and cognizance. The breath is regarded as an aspect of the wind proper feelings of energy in the body are classed as breath sensations. According to Thai physiol come from the aggravation or imbalance of any of the first four of these properties. Well-defined as a state in which none of these properties is dominant: All are quiet, unaroused, still. ekayana-magga: A unified path; a direct path. An epithet for the practice of being m the four frames of reference: body, feelings, mind and mental qualities. gotarabhu-nana:
lineage knowledge': The glimpse of nibbana that changes one from an ordinary run-of-the-Noble One. jhana: Absorption in a physical sensation (rupa jhana) or in a mental notion jhana). Vitakka (directed thought), vicara (evaluation) and piti (rapture) are three of the five forming the first level of rupa jhana, the other two being sukha (pleasure) and ekaggatara (singleness of preoccupation). kamma: Acts of intention that result in states of being and khandha: Component parts of sensory perception: rupa (sensations, sense data); vedana pleasure, pain or indifference); sanna (labels, concepts, allusions); sankhara (mental fashio anything created by the mind); and vinnana (cognizance). lokavidu*: Expert with regard to magga: The path to the cessation of suffering and stress. The four transcendent paths-- path with four levels of refinement--are the path to stream entry (entering the stream to ni ensures that one will be reborn at most only seven more times), the path to once-returning non-returning and the path to arahantship. Phala--fruition--refers to the mental state imm following the attainment of any of these paths. mahabhuta-rupa: The four great physical properties--earth, water, fire and wind (see 'dhatu'). nibbana (nirvana): Liberation; the un of the mind from greed, anger and delusion, from physical sensations and mental acts. As used to refer also to the extinguishing of fire, it carries connotations of stilling, cooling and (According to the physics taught at the time of the Buddha, the property of fire in a latent exists to a greater or lesser extent in all objects. When activated, it seizes and sticks to its long as it remains latent or is extinguished, it is 'unbound.') nivarana: Hindrances to concentration--sensual desires, ill will, torpor & lethargy, restlessness & anxiety, and uncer opanayiko: Referring inwardly; to be brought inwards. paccattam: Personal; individua Inner worth; merit; the inner sense of well-being that comes from having acted rightly or we enables one to continue acting well. sambhavesin: (A being) searching for a place to tak sanditthiko: Self-evident; visible here and now. sangha: The community of the Buddha's the conventional level, this refers to the Buddhist monkhood. On the ideal level, it refers t the Buddha's followers, whether lay or ordained, who have practiced to the point of gaining 'stream-entry,' the first of the transcendent qualities culminating in nibbana. sankhara:

Fashioning--the forces and factors that fashion things, the process of fashioning, and the fa which result; all processes or things conditioned, compounded or concocted by nature, wh physical or the mental level. sugato*: Well-faring; going (or gone) to a good destination.
uposatha: Observance day, corresponding to the phases of the moon, on which Buddhist listen to the Dhamma and to observe special precepts. The eight uposatha precepts are to taking life; from stealing; from sexual intercourse; from telling lies; from taking intoxicants; f eating food after noon until the following dawn; from watching dancing, singing, instrumenta other shows, and from using garlands, perfumes, cosmetics and jewelry; and from using hi beds and seats. vicara: Evaluation (see 'jhana'). vijja: Awareness, science, cognitive s vijja-carana-sampanno*: Consummate in knowledge and conduct; accomplished in the co awareness or cognitive skill. vipassana: Clear, intuitive insight into physical and mental p as they arise and disappear, seeing them for what they actually are--in and of themselves-- stress, its origin, its disbanding, and the way to its disbanding. vitakka: Directed though 'jhana'). II. Quotations ========== anicca vata sankhara, uppada-vaya-dha uppajjitva nirujjhanti: Fashionings are inconstant, subject to arising and passing away. A disband. (From stanzas uttered on the occasion of the Buddha's passing into total nibbana ca balanam, panditananca sevana: Non-association with fools, and association with the w discourse listing factors that augur well for one's well-being.) atta hi attano natho: One's one's own mainstay. atitam nanvagameyya, nappatikankhe anagatam, paccuppannanca y tatha vipassati: He would not pursue the past, nor yearn for the future...and whatever phen present, he clearly sees it as it occurs. (From stanzas describing a person who spends h auspiciously in terms of the practice.) ayudo balado dhiro'ti: The wise person who gives lif strength.... (From stanzas extolling the benefits (to the donor) of a donation of food.) ekay maggo sattanam visuddhiya: This is a direct path for the purification of beings. (See 'ekay kammassako'mhi: I am heir to my kamma. mano-pubbangama dhamma, mano-settha m the mind in their forefront, are excelled by the mind, are made from the mind. namo tass arahato samma-sambuddhassa: Homage to the Blessed One, Worthy and Rightly Self-awa

If anything in this translation is inaccurate or misleading, I ask forgiveness of the author a for having unwittingly stood in their way. As for whatever may be accurate, I hope the reac the best use of it, translating it a few steps further, into the heart, so as to attain the truth at it points. The translator Enquiries concerning this book may be addressed to:
The Abbot, Metta Forest Monastery, PO Box 1409, Valley Center, CA 92082 U.S.A.

sabbe satta sada hontu avera sukha-jivino katam punna-phalam mayham sabbe bhagi bhavantu te

May all beings always live happily, free from animosity. May all share in the blessings springing from the goo
I have done.

GLOSSARY

This Glossary is designed to help the reader in two sorts of situations: (1) when encoun term in this book in a passage where it is not explained; and (2) when encountering Vinaya in other books or conversations and wanting to know how it is defined and/or where it is di For terms that have entire chapters devoted to them -- such as //nissaya// and //pacittiya the relevant chapter. //Acariya//: teacher. See Chapter Two and Appendix VIII. //Acitt a class of offenses carrying a penalty even when committed unintentionally or with inco perception. //Adhitthana//: determining for use. See NP 1, 3, 21, & 24 and Appendix I //Akkosa-vatthu//: a topic for abuse. See Pacittiyas 2 & 3. //Anupasampanna//: anyone wh received full ordination. With some rules, this includes bhikkhunis; with others, it doesn't. //Apalokana//: declaration; the simplest form for a formal act of the Communit a decision is proposed to the Community in the announcer's own words. //Bhattuddes Community official in charge of meal distribution. See Pacittiya 32 and Appendix III. // a male mendicant ordained in the Bhikkhu Sangha, subject to the training rules of the B Patimokkha and the Khandhakas (the Mahavagga and Cullavagga). //Bhikkhuni//: a fe ordained by both the Bhikkhuni and the Bhikkhu Sanghas, subject to the training ru Bhikkhuni Patimokkha and the eight vows of respect (//garu-dhamma//). See Pacittiya 2 //Bhojaniya//: staple food. See the introduction to the Food Chapter in Chapter Eight. //Bhutagama//: a living plant in its place. See Pacittiya 11. //Bijagama//: a plant or part of removed from its place but capable of growing again if replanted. See Pacittiya 11. //Chanda//: consent by proxy. See Pacittiya 79. //Deva (devata)//: literally, a "shining one" celestial being. //Dubbhasita//: wrong speech. See Pacittiya 2. //Dukkata//: wrong d lightest penalty. //Garu-bhanda//: a heavy article. Garu-bhanda belonging to the Sang monasteries and monastery land; dwellings, land on which dwellings are built; furnishing as couches, chairs, and mattresses; metal vessels and tools; building materials, except things as rushes, reeds, grass, and clay; and articles made of pottery or wood. See 2, Sanghadisesa 6, and Pacittiya 81. //Garu-dhamma//: a vow of respect mandatory for all bhikkhunis. See Pacittiya 21. //Hatthapasa//: a distance of 2 1/2 cubits, or 1.25 meters. // mental absorption. See Parajika 4. //Kappiya-vohara//: a proper expression, i.e., a way of expressing a hint or desire allowable in the context of a rule where an outright comman breach of the rule. //Kathina//: a ceremony, held in the fourth month of the rainy s in which a Community of bhikkhus receives a gift of cloth from lay people, bestows it on members, and then makes it into a robe before dawn of the following day. See NP Pacittiya 81. //Khadaniya//: non-staple food. See the introduction to the Food Chapter Eight. //Lahu-bhanda//: a light article. Lahu-bhanda of the Sangha includes such thing food, and medicine; small personal accessories such as scissors, sandals, and water and light building materials, such as rushes, reeds, grass, and clay. See Parajika 2, Sa and Pacittiya 81. //Leddupata//: the distance a man of average height can toss a dirt underarm -- approximately 6 meters. //Loka-vajja//: acts criticized by people in general Chapter One. //Lokuttara-dhamma//: a transcendent state. See Parajika 4. //Mahapades Standard for deciding what is and is not in line with the Dhamma and Vinaya. See Cha //Manatta//: penance. See the conclusion to Chapter Five. //Naga//: a special kind of serp as a common animal but having magical powers, including the ability to assume hu appearance. Nagas have long been regarded as protectors of the Buddha's teachings //Natti-kamma//: a form for a formal act of the Community in which a decision is propos Community in a motion following a set wording. //Natti-dutiya-kamma//: a form for a fo the Community in which a decision is proposed to the Community in a motion and announcement. //Natti-catuttha-kamma//: a form for a formal act of the Community in decision is proposed to the Community in a motion and three announcements. //Niyas stripping of status (also called //nissaya-kamma//, an act of dependence) -- a formal act whereby a bhikkhu released from dependence is required to return to dependence unde mends his ways. See Chapter Two. //Pabbajaniya-kamma//: an act of banishment wh is denied membership in a particular Community until he mends his ways. See Sang //Pabbajja//: going forth -- ordination as a samanera. //Paccuddharana//: rescinding from Appendix IV. //Palibodha//: commitment. See NP 1. //Pana//: juice drink. See the introd the Food Chapter in Chapter Eight, and Pacittiya 38. //Pandaka//: a man sexually devi deformed. See Sanghadisesa 2. //Pannatti-vajja//: acts criticized by the training rules.

See Chapter One. //Parivasa//: probation. See the conclusion to Chapter Five. //Pavaran invitation whereby a donor gives permission to a bhikkhu or a Community of bhikkhus to requisites. See Pacittiya 47. (2) a ceremony, held at the end of the Rains Retreat (see in which each bhikkhu invites the rest of the Community to inform him of any transg they may have seen, heard, or suspected that he has committed. //Peta//: a hungry s a class of beings in the lower realms, sometimes capable of appearing to human be //Pubbayoga//: a preliminary effort leading up to the commission of an offense. //Sacit class of offenses that carry a penalty only when committed intentionally and with correc //Samana//: contemplative. This word is derived from the adjective //sama//, which me or "in harmony." The samanas in ancient India were wanderers who tried through contemplation to find the true nature of reality -- as opposed to the conventions taught i
-- and to live in tune or in harmony with that reality. Buddhism is one of several sa movements. Others included Jainism, Ajivakan fatalism, and Lokayata, or hedonis //Samanera//: literally, a small samana -- a novice monk observing ten precepts. See P //Sangha//: Community. This may refer to the entire Community of bhikkhus or bhikkh Community living in a particular location. In this book I have tried to distinguish bet the two by calling the first //Sangha//, and the second //Community//, but there are some where it is difficult to draw a clear line between the two. //Sangha-bheda//: a schism in t

See Sanghadisesas 10 & 11. //Sangha-raji//: a crack in the Sangha. See Sanghadise //Sima//: boundary or territory related to the performance of formal acts of the Commun Pacittiya 79. //Sugata//: Well-gone, an epithet for the Buddha. Sugata measures are c Appendix II. //Sutta (suttanta)//: discourse. //Tajjaniya-kamma//: an act of censure, where Community may strip a bhikkhu of some of his communal rights if he is a maker of s refuses to see or confess an offense he admits to having committed, or if he criticizes Buddha, Dhamma, or Sangha. If he mends his ways, the act can be repealed. See Sa Aniyata 1, and Chapter Eleven. //Thullaccaya//: grave offense, the most serious derive offense. //Tiracchana-katha//: "animal talk," topics of conversation inappropriate for bh See Pacittiyas 46 & 85 //Tiracchana-vijja//: "bestial/animal knowledge," occult abilities inappropriate for bhikkhus to practice. See Parajika 4 and the Samannaphala Suttanta.
//Ukkhepaniya-kamma//: an act of suspension, whereby a Community may deprive a bh to associate with the Sangha as a whole until he mends his ways. See Pacittiyas 6 //Upajjhaya//: preceptor. See Chapter Two and Appendix VIII. //Upasampada//: acceptan ordination as a bhikkhu or bhikkhuni. //Uposatha//: Observance day, the day of the ne full moon; traditionally, in India, a time of special spiritual practices. The Buddha ac this as the day for reciting the Patimokkha. //Vassa//: Rains Retreat -- a three-month p generally beginning the day after the full moon in July (or the second, if there are tw during which certain restrictions are placed on the bhikkhus' wanderings; usually consid time to accelerate one's efforts in study or practice. //Vikappana//: an arrangement whereb in use is placed under shared ownership. See NP 1, Pacittiya 59, and Appendix V.
//Vissasa//: trust between friends. See Parajika 2 and Pacittiya 59. //Yakkha//: one of special class of powerful "non-human" beings -- sometimes kindly, sometimes murderou corresponding roughly to the fairies and ogres of Western fairy tales. The female (//y is generally considered more treacherous than the male. //Yojana//: a league -- a dista miles or sixteen kilometers. * * * * * * * *

GLOSSARY

The following Thai words are used in this booklet:

//Thudong//, (pronounce `toodong', from the Pali, //dhutanga//, -- Austere Practices) -- the wandering, ascetical, solitary and meditative life of some bhikkhus.

//Crot//, an umbrella with an attachable mosquito net.

//Nain//, (from Pali, //samanera//), a novice of under 20 years old undertaking to observe 10 Precepts.

A few Pali words are used occasionally:

//Bhikkhu//, a fully ordained member of the Sangha over the age of 20, training himself in the observance of the Patimokkha, that is, the monastic Code of Discipline. Nearest English translation of `bhikkhu' is `monk' -- never `priest'!

//Sangha//, the community or order of bhikkhus open to people of all races who desire to lead the holy life in the Dispensation of the Buddha.

//Vihara//, The Buddhist equivalent of a `monastery' (i.e., where bhikkhus live), but this English word conjures up so many misleading ideas that the Buddhist term `vihara' has been preferred throughout.

//Puja//, veneration, worship. In Buddhist practice this is done with the idea of increasing the skilful qualities (such as wisdom and devotion) in one's own mind. Propitiation of forces outside oneself (Gods, etc.), is quite foreign to Buddhadhamma.

//Kamma//, intentional action, or willed, volitional action.

(In Buddhism, //never// the result of action.)

ÉÍÍÍ

his/her purity of mind and wisdom.

Diligent practice of the Ten-Recitation Method, together with unwavering belief and vows, can ensure fulfillment of our wish to reach the Western Pure Land of Infinite Life and Infinite Light. We hope everyone will practice accordingly.

Namo Amitabha!

Glossary

Aeon. 1,334,000,000 years. Often expressed as the time it would take for a mountain of solid rock of ten cubic leagues to wear down if the tip of a heavenly maiden's delicate tunic brushed against it every hundred years. A fantastically long period of time.

Affliction. Condition or cause of pain, distress and suffering which disturbs the body and mind.

Amitabha (Sanskrit or Skrt). The name of the Buddha of the Western Pure Land, primarily meaning Infinite Life and Light. Called Amituofo in Chinese.

Anuttara-Samyak-Sambodhi (Skrt). Highest, proper and complete enlightenment.

Arhat (Skrt). One who has reached self-realization, a state in which one possesses no erroneous perceptions, views, speech or behavior.

Attachments. Fixed to certain ideas or objects.

Bodhi mind (Skrt). The great compassionate and sincere mind, with every thought to attain complete self-realization for self and other.

Bodhisattva (Skrt). One who helps others to reach realization after achieving their own.

Buddha (Skrt). One who has reached perfection in both self-realization and helping others to reach realization.

Delusion. False beliefs, wrong views.

Dharma (Skrt). 1) The teachings of the Buddha (generally capitalized in English); 2) Things, events, phenomena, everything; 3) Duty, law, doctrine.

Dharma-ending Age. The Dharma Perfect Age began with Buddha Shakyamuni's demise and lasted five hundred years, during which Enlightenment was often attained. The Dharma Semblance Age began after that and lasted one thousand years, during which Enlightenment was seldom attained. The Dharma Ending Age that we are now in began after that and will last for ten thousand years during which Enlightenment will rarely be attained.

Dusts. Metaphor for all the mundane things that can cloud our self-nature.

Eight Afflictions. Absence of embarrassment and shamefulness, and the presence of jealously, stinginess, misdeeds, drowsiness, sleep and agitation.

Eighth Ground Bodhisattva. There are ten levels or grounds of a Bodhisattva's enlightenment, which summarize the most important steps in a Bodhisattva's path right before attaining Buddhahood. Some say it is at this level that Bodhisattvas reach the stage of Non-regression, the level at which they will never retreat from the Bodhisattva-path.

Five Deadly Offenses. Murdering one's own father, murdering one's own mother, causing a Buddha to bleed, killing a Bodhisattva or an Arhat and disrupting the unity of the Sangha.

Five Desires. Wealth, lust, fame, food-drink, and sleep.

Five Guidelines. Following: 1) The Three Conditions; 2) The Six Principles of Harmony; 3) The Three Learnings; 4) The Six Paramitas or Principles and 5) Samantabhadra Bodhisattva's Ten Great Vows.

Five Pure Land Sutras and One Sastra. (1) The Buddha Speaks of the Infinite Life Sutra of Adornment, Purity, Equality and Enlightenment of the Mahayana School, (2) The Amitabha Sutra, (3) The Visualization Sutra, (4) The Chapter of Universal Worthy Bodhisattva's Conduct and Vows, (5) The Chapter on the Perfect Complete Realization of Great Strength Bodhisattva through Buddha Name Recitation from the Surangama Sutra and (6) Vasubandhu Bodhisattva's Report on the Way to Reaching the Pure Land.

Four Universal Vows of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas. (1) Sentient beings are innumerable, I vow to help them all; (2) Afflictions are inexhaustible, I vow to end them all: (3) Ways to practice are boundless, I vow to master them all: (4) Enlightenment is unsurpassable, I vow to attain it.

Good Fortune. Happiness, intelligence, wellbeing, prosperity etc.

Good roots. Good qualities or seeds sowed by a good life to be reaped later.

Hungry Ghost. One of the three lower realms. Hungry ghosts wander in a limbo-like state in which they can find no satisfaction for their desires, especially but not exclusively, for their hunger or thirst.
One is reborn here if he or she has extreme greed.

Karma (Skrt). Law of Cause and Effect, results from thought, speech and behavior.

Karmic Result. The natural reward or retribution brought about by the Law of Cause and Effect (Karma).

Mahayana (Skrt). One of the two major branches of Buddhism. Bodhisattva path of helping all sentient beings to attain universal liberation.
Merits. The great benefits (wealth, intelligence, etc) of the human and celestial realms; therefore, they are temporary and subject to birth and death. Virtues, on the other hand, are attained from one's pure mind and enable one to transcend birth and death and lead to Buddhahood. An identical action, e.g. charity, can lead either to merit or virtue, depending on the mind of the practitioner, whether he or she is seeking ordinary rewards (merit) or transcendence (virtue).

Mindfulness of Buddha. Initially the mind remembers the Buddha and does not forget. After further cultivation, one constantly contemplates the Buddha.

Nine Realms. All ten realms minus the Buddha realm.

Non-regression. One who will never retreat from the Bodhisattva-path, some say it is not reached until the eighth of the ten grounds of a Bodhisattva.

Phenomena. Things, events, happenings, everything.

Prajna-Wisdom (Skrt). Intuitive wisdom.

Pratyekabuddha (Skrt). One who attains his enlightenment alone, independent of a teacher, with the objective of attaining Nirvana for him/herself.

Precepts. Rules set up by Buddha Shakyamuni to guide his students from erroneous thoughts, speech and behavior.

Pure Land. See Western Pure Land.

Pure Mind or Purity of Mind. The mind without discrimination or attachments.

Retribution. Karmic punishment from erroneous thought, speech or action.

Saha world (Skrt). Refers to our solar system, filled with suffering and afflictions, yet gladly endured by its inhabitants.

Samadhi (Skrt). Meditative absorption. Usually denotes the particular final stage of pure concentration and contemplation. There are many degrees and types of Samadhi.

Sangha (Skrt). Group of four or more peoples who properly practice the Buddha's teaching together, especially The Six Principles of Harmony.

Sanskrit (Skrt). Language of ancient India.

Sastra (Skrt). Commentary on sutras primarily by Bodhisattvas.

Self-Nature. Our original, true self that we still have, but is currently covered by deluded thoughts.

Sentient being. A living being that is self-aware and that can experience feeling or sensation.

Sharira (Skrt). Relics that remain after cremation indicating the person had attained some degree of purity of body and mind.

Six Paramitas or Principles. Giving, precept observation, patience, diligence, deep concentration and wisdom.

Six Principles of Harmony. 1) Share the same viewpoints or goals. 2) Observe the same precepts. 3) Live and practice together harmoniously. 4) Not quarrel. 5) Experience the inner peace and happiness from practicing together harmoniously. 6) Share benefits harmoniously.
Six Realms. Three upper realms are heavens, asuras and humans. Three lower realms are animals, hungry ghosts and hells.

Six Senses. Sight, sound, smell, taste, touch and mind object.

Six Sense Objects. Form, sound, scent, taste, texture and mind object.

Six Sense Organs. Eyes, ears, nose, mouth, body and mind.

Sutra (Skrt). Teaching by the Buddha, initially given verbally, later compiled and written down by the Buddha's students.

Ten Directions. North, Northeast, East, Southeast, South, Southwest, West, Northwest, above and below.

Ten Good Conducts. No killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, abusive language, backbiting, seductive words, greed, anger or ignorance.

Ten Great Vows of Samantabhadra Bodhisattva. 1) Pay respect to all Buddhas. 2) Praise "Thus Come One." 3) Make offerings extensively. 4) Repent of Karmic obstacles. 5) Be joyful over others meritorious deeds. 6) Appeal to the Buddha to turn the Dharma wheel. 7) Request the Buddha to reside in this world. 8) Constantly be a diligent follower of the Buddha's teaching. 9) Accord with all sentient beings. 10) Dedicate all merits.

Ten Realms. Six realms plus those of Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, Pratyekabuddhas and Sound-hearers.

Three Conditions. The First Condition includes: Being filial to one's parents, Being respectful to one's teachers, Being compassionate and not killing any living beings and Following the Ten Good Conducts. The Second Condition includes: Following the Three Refuges, Observing the precepts, laws and customs, and Conducting oneself in a proper and dignified manner. The Third Condition includes: Generating the Bodhi mind, Deeply believing in the Law of Cause and Effect, Reciting and upholding Mahayana sutras and Encouraging others to advance on the path to Enlightenment.

Three Learnings. Self-discipline, deep concentration and wisdom.

Three Poisons. Greed, anger and ignorance.

Three Refuges. We take refuge in the Buddha, Dharma and Sangha. When we take refuge in the Buddha, we are returning from our deluded state of mind and relying upon an awakened, understanding mind. When we take refuge in the Dharma, we are returning from deviant views and relying upon proper views and understanding. When we take refuge in the Sangha, we are returning from pollution and disharmony and relying upon purity of mind and the Six Principles of Harmony.

Transliteration. To represent (letters or words) in the corresponding characters of another alphabet, so the original sound is retained.
Virtues. See Merits.

Way Place. Usually called a temple, a place where Buddhist practitioners come to practice.

Western Pure Land. World created by Buddha Amitabha. An ideal place of cultivation, those who are born there are no longer subject to reincarnation.

Dharma-body Bodhisattva
Asuras
Bhramin
Deva. Heavenly Beings or gods
Field of merit
Aleya Consciousness

<end of file>

This document was originally distributed on Internet as a part of the Electronic Buddhist Archives, available via anonymous FTP and/or COOMBSQUEST gopher on the node COOMBS.ANU.EDU.AU

The document's ftp filename and the full directory path are given in the coombspapers top level INDEX file.

This version of the document has been reformatted by Barry Kapke and is being distributed, with permission, via the DharmaNet Buddhist File Distribution Network.

[Last updated: 26 October 1993]

"GOLDEN WIND" - a provisional title of an originally untitled teisho.

This text addresses some of the most fundamental and delicate religious issues. Therefore, it should be read, quoted and analysed in a mindful way.

All copyrights to this document belong to John Tarrant, California Diamond Sangha, Santa Rosa, Cal., USA
Enquiries: The Editor, "Mind Moon Circle", Sydney Zen Centre, 251 Young St., Annandale, Sydney, NSW 2038, Australia. Tel: + 61 2 660 2993

ZAZENKAI TEISHO

John Tarrant Roshi

January 10, 1993
Oakland, California

I'm going to begin today with one of the jewels of our tradition, an old koan from China spoken by a teacher called Yun-men (Jap. Unmon).

A student of the way asked Yun-men: How is it when the tree withers and the leaves fall?

Yun-men said: The golden wind is manifesting itself.

Please sit comfortably.

The golden wind is the poetic expression, locution for autumn in the old Chinese culture. Cleary, actually, has a very interesting, tough translation of this he says, "Body exposed in the golden wind." It's very much that sense of vulnerability and ruin about his translation.

The student is coming out with, I think, one of the classic questions touching on the way everything changes in life. As soon as we think we've got something settled, something else changes. As a child I noticed this, when I noticed as soon as I did the dishes, they got dirty again. But there are other losses as well that are even worse than having to do the dishes again. We notice that our whole lives we're actually immersed in these losses and these changes. As we get wiser and cleverer, this immersion still remains constant so that it is the thing that doesn't change. Shakyamuni noticed this and, in fact, the discovery of this was a wonderful release for him when he realized. He let go and realized that life is suffering and that was the First Noble Truth.

The student in this case when he says, "The leaves wither." There is also that sense of somebody who has already come onto the way. He knows that when you orient yourself, there is a kind of stripping away that happens often in a spiritual path. There are things that we cared about we know are no longer so important, really. Or, maybe we wish they were so important somehow. We lose some of the things that gave us meaning when we start pointing ourselves in a spiritual direction. Then we are in a darkness because when you get rid of the things you are hanging onto, something true doesn't always automatically appear. There's an intervening period of confusion and bewilderment, familiar and beloved. Familiar to and beloved by all of us. I think this student is talking about that kind of state. I think we all know that place.

Before I go on to say more about that I want to tell a couple of stories about the Yun-men. Yun-men was a very notable figure. (R. H. Blyth, Aitken Roshi always refers to him as Mr. Blyth, who actually we owe our doing zazen in some ways to him because he taught Aitken Roshi about zen and poetry in prison camp in Japan during the war. All the trouble came from that. He thought of Yun-men as being one of those great figures like Shakespeare or Goethe in the West, an Eastern version of that only with an enlightened eye.) He was a very notable person and he always seemed gifted. As many of you know, the moment he was enlightened was rather odd because he broke his leg and screamed in pain when somebody slammed a heavy iron gate on his leg. At that moment he became enlightened. His teacher threw him out, actually, of an interview and he didn't get his leg out in time and the door slammed. So he always walked with a bit of a limp. He was one of those people who was in some way marked, I think, always.

He eventually found his teacher, but he didn't inherit his teacher's temple. He inherited somebody else's temple, which was quite a common thing. He inherited the temple of a teacher called Ling-shu (sp???). For twenty years Ling-shu didn't have a head of his own temple. He would say things like, "The head of the temple was born today." Then he'd say, "The head of the temple is looking after the oxen in the fields today." Things like that. "The head of the temple is playing Nintendo in the Round Table Pizza Parlor today." He would go on like that for twenty years and his students got to figure this was some sort of elaborate joke or something or another. But then he would say things like, "The head of the temple is sitting zazen today." And he would go on like that. Then one day he said, "You must strike the big temple bell and announce that the head of the temple will be arriving today." Everybody after twenty years was rather dubious, of course. But along came Yun-men limping along.

He wasn't asked any questions. He was immediately shown into the quarters of the head of the temple. So he had that sort of graced quality about him. The person whose temple he inherited had just been waiting for him to come and died soon after, voluntarily, actually, just gave up the ghost.

One thing I get from this is that you don't know what might be coming down the road toward you always. Ling-shu did know that Yun-men was coming toward him, but you don't always. When we want something, it's typical for us to doubt our capacity. People always want something to do with wisdom or love or work or something like that. When we don't have something we want, there's a voice in almost everybody's head, I think, that goes, "Well, it's not right," and you're not meant to do it, and you're screwed up anyway. Another voice we know and love. But I think this story says, don't listen to that voice. You may unawares be walking toward your temple. Or something may be coming toward you that you don't understand properly. What you have to do is work on your wisdom. Prepare your heart, your inner life for what may arrive. That is always our task. If you're ever in doubt about what your task is, that is your task. Life is simple.

After he broke his leg, his teacher was getting a bit old, he was getting to be about one hundred years old, he got too old to be braking people's legs any more, so he sent Yun-men off to Hsueh-feng, who was very different in style. He used humor a lot and didn't break anybody's leg. Hsueh-feng's story was completely different. He was the person who was not marked out as anything special. He was the person who was marked out as being rather dumber than everybody else. So he makes a wonderful contrast. I think all of us can identify, perhaps, with both these people because there are ways in which we've been enormously graced because we have been loved, we are alive, and we've found the dharma. And to find the dharma in itself is just an enormous gift, the incomparable gift dwarfing all others. Yet there are ways in which we surely feel stupid if we have any integrity and sincerity at all, we surely felt very foolish a lot of the time, rather like made of dense material that's difficult for light to penetrate.

Hsueh-feng was exactly that sort of person. He had a buddy called Yen-t'ou. They were famous friends. Yen-t'ou was actually younger. Hsueh-feng was sort of getting along. Yen-t'ou was younger, but Yen-t'ou was really smart and quick and was running rings around Hsueh-feng and everybody else in the temple. But Yen-t'ou's great contribution was actually to help Hsueh-feng along. Hsueh-feng became the great master.

They were good friends and when they were released from the temple at various times to go out into the world and do whatever they wanted, they were on pilgrimage together. They came to a village called Tortoise Mountain, a familiar story to some of you. It was just nowhere, really, some little place in the Sierras, and they got snowed in this little hut. Day after day Hsueh-feng would sit and do zazen very earnestly and Yen-t'ou, his friend, would sleep. So they had this perfect relationship really. Yen-t'ou slept and every now and again he would wake up and see his friend sitting very hard, meditating. He'd open an eye and then he'd go back to sleep again and snooze the time through.

Then he sat up and said, "Won't you get some sleep? Every day you're sitting on the meditation cushion. You just look like a clay buddha. What's wrong with you?" He was getting his attention that way.

Hsueh-feng said, "Well, I don't dare deceive myself. I am not yet at peace." So you can see that although he feels stupid and let's face it he is stupid in his own estimation, he has an integrity and a sincerity about him that makes you already like him. He says, "I can't fool myself. I'm not at peace and because I'm not at peace, I must do something about it. The only thing I know to do is meditate. Maybe it doesn't even work, but I can't think of anything else to do. What choice do I have?" He was in that place. So already all of the leaves have fallen for him. You have this tree with bare twigs and nothing green has shot out, although we don't know. Maybe the sap is moving below.

His friend says, "Well, that's hard to believe. You've been around the scene a long time."

And he says, "Well, it's true."

His friend says, "Well, if you like . . ." So he asks permission. This is always very important if we're going to help a friend, to ask permission, I think. Friends don't always want to be helped. So he says, "If you like, you can bring your views forth one by one and where they're correct I'll approve them for you, and where their not I'll prove them away." Yen-t'ou was always very confident.

Hsueh-feng said things like, "First of all, I saw my first teacher, Yen-kuan (sp???), up in the hall and he brought up the meaning of form and void, emptiness and somethingness and suddenly I gained an understanding.

Yen-t'ou said, "Don't mention this for thirty more years."

Then again he said, "When I saw Tung-shan's (sp???) verse about crossing the river, (The teacher, Tung-shan, saw his reflection in the river and was enlightened.) I had an insight then."

Yen-t'ou said, "If you go on like this, you won't be able to save yourself at all."

Feng went on. "Later when I got to Te-shan, I asked, `Do I have part in the affair of the vehicle of the most ancient school, or not?'" Do I have a part in the great matter, or not? The affair of the most ancient school, the eternal school, or not? "And Te-shan hit me with his staff and said, `What are you saying?' At that time it was like the bottom of a bucket dropping out for me."

Yen-t'ou thereupon shouted. Yen-t'ou was famous for his shout. He said, "When I die, I will go with a great shout." When he died, in fact, his shout was heard for miles and miles around. People knew he had gone. So he shouted, but they were in this tiny little hut. They don't say anything about how deaf Hsueh-feng was afterwards, but he said, "Haven't you heard it said that what comes in through the gate is not the family treasure."

Hsueh-feng said, "What should I do?

Yen-t'ou said, "In future, if you want to propagate the great teaching let each point flow out from your own breast to come out and cover heaven and earth."

At these words Hsueh-feng was greatly enlightened and he bowed down crying out again and again, "Today Tortoise Mountain has finally achieved the way. Today Tortoise Mountain has finally achieved the way." So even the mountain and the village and the hut got enlightened. It has nothing to do with the man there.

Later he wrote a poem. He went and lived as a hermit for awhile before he became a famous teacher, he taught Yun-men, and said:

> Human life is so hectic and hurried.
> It is just a brief instant.
> How can you live for a long time in that fleeting world?
> At first I emerged from the mountains and now I return home.
> It's no use bringing up the faults of others.
> Our own mistakes must be cleared away continually.
> I humbly report to the nobles who fill the court;
> The king of death has no awe of the golden emblems of rank that you wear.

He later became known for his humor and, I think, there's a sort of generosity and largeness of spirit about Hsueh-feng that anything you read about him will indicate. This came from his sincerity and his patience in the way. He was known as the person who was sincere and patient. He wasn't naturally brilliant. And yet his student, of course, was one of the great naturally brilliant people, Yun-men.

Please bear this in mind. If you're not like Yun-men, be like Hsueh-feng. I think Yamada Roshi felt rather like this. He was roommates, as a very young man, with Soen Nakagawa Roshi. Soen Roshi went off to sit on Daibasatsu (sp???) Mountain and get enlightened as a very young man, and Yamada Roshi went off to make money in the world. Later on they came back, sort of full circle, and both became zen masters. He had trained with a number of very good teachers and had had various enlightenment experiences, but it wasn't enough. He was like Hsueh-feng. For many years he would go to dokusan time after time, hours out of his way, really to get rid of all of his doubts because getting rid of a few doubts isn't enough. He was old by the time he got enlightened and he didn't teach for very long, by the time he became fully enlightened he didn't teach for very long. But all that gathering of effort and all those years meant that then there was this strong burst when he did teach.

One of the things I'm saying here is if you do the work sincerely from the inside, that is really all you need to worry about. The world will take care of itself. It will give you its gifts in whatever ways it chooses in terms of your career path and love and all those things. But all that is really the material of wisdom and the material of your own transformation into somebody who herself or himself can offer the way. Can have compassion on others. The vow we all take every time we chant the great vows is to enlighten other beings. It's very important and very precious.

The I Ching talks about obstacles. In fact, there's a hexagram of obstruction, (instruction I said. That's a great slip.) the hexagram obstruction which is Number 39.

> It pictures a dangerous abyss lying before and a steep inaccessible mountain behind. (An abyss before and a cliff behind. A perfect zen situation.)
>
> The image is water on the mountain. (The image of obstruction.) Thus the superior person turns her attention to herself and molds her own character.
>
> The comment
>
> (This comment was cooked up by the translator in combination with a very early twentieth century Chinese master of this book.)
>
> Difficulties and obstructions throw a person back on herself. While the inferior person seeks to put blame on others bewailing fate, the superior person seeks the error within and through this introspection the external obstacle becomes an occasion for inner enrichment and education.

But you see it is the same thing that is being said here. "You must come out from your own breast and cover heaven and earth," is what Yen-t'ou said to Hsueh-feng.

Whenever we're sitting and whenever in life we feel like we really are unhappy, if we begin to attend, we'll notice that that action itself begins to bring us home. The strangest thing about the way is that turning toward the way brings us home, brings us, really, to the end of the way. It really doesn't matter where you are when you turn home. It is that turning itself has this marvelous value. So if you are unhappy and you begin to attend, suddenly you will find that your unhappiness has started to transform and open, become more spacious and cloudy, and you can find your way around in it. This is true for the most acute and persistent kinds of unhappiness. It is just your obstruction that in some way you must bless with your attention for it to transform.

It is said in zen that you must keep your attention even if you are alone in a dark room when nobody can see you, because you can see you. That is the most important one. It really doesn't matter what your teacher thinks of you or your friends think of you. It's nice if they think well of you, but is not the crucial thing. The crucial thing is to go into your own heart and make the practice truly and deeply and utterly your own. Then, you see, sitting zazen is not an effort. It is just a sort of natural flow of things. It's not something separate from your ordinary life. Whether you are eating or drinking, that is all zazen. Even if you're nodding off, that is all zazen.

I think one of the things that increases for us as we go on in time and gathers is our integrity. So we really do become less interested in impressing other people and we do become more interested in what is the true path for ourselves. Our integrity even makes us uncomfortable sometimes. The more delusion you have the more unhappy you and that is your integrity that is making you unhappy. So you follow that and trust that, and you immerse yourself even in that unhappiness, that discontent. That is called raising the doubt, the massive doubt in traditional zen. You immerse yourself in the discontent you have because you know you are not yet fully present. You know that you have gifts that you can give to the world, but you are not yet quite able to give, and that is a sorrow. I think, perhaps, one of the greatest sorrows is not to be able to give back to the world as well as we would love to. And I think that is true for all of us. So we immerse ourselves even in that sorrow and then we find it begins to open. When we turn home, we find home is here. Over and over again we must turn home, turn home, turn home. Just like that.

When we do that, we'll find that we can take joy in what is already here. Just coming to dokusan and saying, "I really don't have a clue," is in itself turning home and is a great gift. To be able to do that, I discovered, was a wonderful thing. I would come into my teacher and say, "I just don't know," and that was perfectly all right with him. He would just ring his bell and I would bow and leave. To accept that was the beginning of the opening for me. I think it is for all of us. To accept where we are and to love where we are and to take joy in it and pleasure in it. What a wonderful thing that is.

Here we have set aside this time to sit together. We have companionship like Hsueh-feng with Yen-t'ou up there sitting in the hut snowed in. So we're snowed in for the afternoon and we have our companionship and we have all the space in the world to do zazen. So let us enjoy it.

---

end of record

A GOOD DOSE OF DHAMMA
FOR MEDITATORS WHEN THEY ARE ILL

A talk by Upasika Kee Nanayon (K. Khao Suan-Luang)

Translated from the Thai
by Thanissaro Bhikkhu

Copyright 1995 Khao Suan Luang Dhamma Community

From the book
"An Unentangled Knowing: The Teachings of a Thai Buddhist Lay Woman" Published in 1995 by Dhamma Dana Publications
c/o Barre Center for Buddhist Studies
149 Lockwood Road
Barre, MA 01005 USA

This work may be freely copied, printed, and redistributed provided it is offered free of any charge.
Otherwise, all rights reserved.

* * *

DharmaNet Edition 1995

This electronic edition is offered for free distribution
via DharmaNet by arrangement with the publisher.

DharmaNet International
P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley CA 94704-4951

* * * * * * * *

Part I
~~~~~~

Normally, illness is something we all have, but the type of illness where you can still do your work isn't recognized as illness. It's called the normal human state all over the world. Yet really, when the body is in its normal state, it's still ill in and of itself -- simply that people in general are unaware of the fact that it's the deterioration of physical and mental phenomena, continually, from moment to moment.

The way people get carried away with their thoughts and preoccupations while they're still strong enough to do this and do that: That's really complacency. They're are no match at all for people lying in bed ill. People lying in bed ill are lucky because they have the opportunity to do nothing but contemplate stress and pain. Their minds don't take up anything else, don't go anywhere else. They can contemplate pain at all times -- and let go of pain at all times as well.

Don't you see the difference? The "emptiness" of the mind when you're involved in activities is "play" emptiness. Imitation emptiness. It's not the real thing. But to contemplate inconstancy, stress, and not-selfness as it appears right inside you while you're lying right here, is very beneficial for you. Just don't think that //you're// what's hurting. Simply see the natural phenomena of physical and mental events as they pass away, pass away. They're not you. They're not really yours. You don't have any real control over them.

Look at them! Exactly where do you have any control over them? This is true for everyone in the world. You're not the only one to whom it's happening. So whatever the disease there is in your body, it isn't important. What's important is the disease in the mind. Normally we don't pay too much attention to the fact that we have diseases in our minds, i.e., the diseases of defilement, craving, and attachment. We pay attention only to our physical diseases, afraid of all the horrible things that can happen to the body. But no matter how much we try to stave things off with our fears, when the time comes for things to happen, no matter what medicines you have to treat the body, they can give you only temporary respite. Even the people in the past who //didn't// suffer from heavy diseases are no longer with us. They've all had to part from their bodies in the end.
~~~~~~

So when you continually contemplate in this way, it makes you see the truth of inconstancy, stress, and not-selfness correctly within you. And you'll have to grow more and more disenchanted with things, step by step.

When you give it a try and let go, who's there? Are //you// the one hurting, or is it simply an affair of the Dhamma? You have to examine this very carefully to see that it's not really you that's hurting. //The disease isn't your disease. It's a disease of the body//, a disease of physical form. In the end, physical form and mental events have to change, to be stressful in the change, to be not-self in the change and the stress. But you must focus on them, watch them, and contemplate them so that they're clear. Make this knowledge really clear, and right there is where you'll gain release from all suffering and stress. Right there is where you'll put an end to all suffering and stress. As for the aggregates, they'll continue to arise, age, grow ill, and pass away in line with their own affairs. When their causes and conditions run out, they die and go into their coffin.

Some people, when they're healthy and complacent, die suddenly and unexpectedly without knowing what's happening to them. Their minds are completely oblivious to what's going on. This is much worse than the person lying ill in bed who has pain to contemplate as a means of developing disenchantment. So you don't have to be afraid of pain.

If it's going to be there, let it be there -- but don't let the mind be in pain with it. And then look -- right now -- is the mind empty of "me" and "mine"?

Keep looking on in. Keep looking on in so that things are really clear, and that's enough. You don't have to go knowing anything anywhere else. When you can cure the disease, or the pain lightens, that's something normal. When it doesn't lighten, that's normal, too. But if the heart is simply empty of "me" and "mine," there will be no pain within it. As for the pain in the aggregates, don't give it a second thought.

So see yourself as lucky. Lying here, dealing with the disease, you have the opportunity to practice insight meditation with every moment. It doesn't matter whether you're here in the hospital or at home. Don't let there be any real sense in the mind that you're in the hospital or at home. //Let the mind be in the emptiness//, empty of all labels and meanings. You don't have to label yourself as being anywhere at all.

This is because the aggregates are not where you are. They're empty of any indwelling person. They're empty of any "me" or "mine." When the mind is like this, it doesn't need anything at all. It doesn't have to be here or go there or anywhere at all. This is the absolute end of suffering and stress....

The mind, when it doesn't get engrossed with the taste of pleasure or pain, is free in and of itself, in line with its own nature. But I ask that you watch it carefully, the behavior of this mind as it's empty in line with its own nature, not concocting any desires for anything, not wanting pleasure or trying to push away pain.

When the mind is empty in line with its nature, there's no sense of ownership in it; there are no labels for itself. No matter what thoughts occur to it, it sees them as insubstantial, as empty of self. There's simply a sensation that then passes away. A sensation that then passes away, and that's all.

So you have to watch the phenomena that arise and pass away. In other words, you have to watch the phenomenon of the present continuously -- and the mind will be empty, in that it gives no meanings or labels to the arising and passing away. As for the arising and passing away, that's a characteristic of the aggregates that has to appear as part of their normal nature -- simply that the mind isn't involved, doesn't latch on. This is the point you can make use of.

You can't go preventing pleasure and pain, you can't keep the mind from labeling things and forming thoughts, //but you can put these things to a new use//. If the mind labels a pain, saying, "I hurt," you have to read the label carefully, contemplate it until you see that it's wrong. If the label were right, it would have to say that the pain isn't me, it's empty. Or if there's a thought that "I'm in pain," this type of thinking is also wrong. You have to take a new approach to your thinking, to see that thinking is inconstant, stressful, and not yours.

So whatever arises, investigate and let go of what's right in front of you. Just make sure that you don't cling, and the mind will keep on being empty in line with its nature. If no thoughts are bothering you, there may be strong pain, or the mind may be developing an abnormal mood, but whatever is happening, you have to look right in, look all the way in to the sensation of the mind. Once you have a sense of the empty mind, then if there's any disturbance, any sense of irritation, you'll know that the knowledge giving rise to it is wrong knowledge, in and of itself. Right knowledge will immediately take over, making the wrong knowledge disband.

In order to hold continuously to this foundation of knowing, you first have to start out by exercising restraint over the mind, at the same time that you focus your attention and contemplate the phenomenon of stress and pain. Keep this up until the mind can maintain its stance in the clear emptiness of the heart. If you can do this all the way to the end, the final disbanding of suffering will occur right there, right where the mind is empty.

But you have to keep practicing at this continuously. Whenever pain arises, regardless of whether it's strong or not, don't label it or give it any meaning. Even if pleasure arises, don't label it as //your// pleasure. Just keep letting it go, and the mind will gain release -- empty of all clinging or attachment to "selfness" with each and every moment. You have to apply all your mindfulness and energy to this at all times.

You should see yourself as fortunate, that you're lying here ill, contemplating pain, for you have the opportunity to develop the Path in full measure, gaining insight and letting things go. Nobody has a better opportunity than what you have right now. People running around, engaged in their affairs: Even if they say their minds are disengaged, they're really no match for you. A person lying ill in bed has the opportunity to develop insight with every in-and-out breath. It's a sign that you haven't wasted your birth as a human being, you know, because you're practicing the teachings of the Lord Buddha to the point where you gain clear knowledge into the true nature of things in and of themselves.

The true nature of things, on the outside level, refers to the phenomenon of the present, the changing of the five aggregates. You can decipher their code, decipher their code until you get disenchanted with them, lose your taste for them, and let them go. When the mind is in this state, the next step is to contemplate it skillfully to see how it's empty, all the way to the ultimate emptiness -- the kind of emptiness that goes clearly into the true nature lying most deeply inside where there is no concocting of thoughts, no arising, no passing away, no changing at all.

When you correctly see the nature of things on the outer level until it is all clear to you, the mind will let go, let go. That's when you automatically see clearly the nature of what lies on the inner level -- empty of all cycling through birth and death, with nothing concocted at all....The emptiest extreme of emptiness, with no labels, no meanings, no clingings or attachments. All I ask is that you see this clearly within your own mind.

The ordinary emptiness of the mind is useful on one level, but that's not all there is. True emptiness is empty until it reaches the true nature of things on the inner level -- something really worth ferreting out, really worth coming to know....

This is something you have to know for yourself....There are really no words to describe it...but we can talk about it by way of guidance, because it may happen that ultimately you let go of everything, in what's called disbanding without trace.

The mind's point of disbanding without trace, if you keep developing insight every day, every moment like this, will happen on its own. The mind will know on its own. So don't let the mind bother itself by getting preoccupied with pleasure or pain. Focus on penetrating into the mind in and of itself relentlessly.

Do you see how different this is from when you're running around strong and healthy, thinking about this, that, and the other thing?...This is why there's no harm in having lots of pain. //The harm is in our stupidity// in giving labels and meanings to things. People in general tend to reflect on the fleeting nature of life with reference to other people, when someone else grows sick or dies, but they rarely reflect on the fleeting nature of their own lives. Or else they reflect for just a moment and then forget all about it, getting completely involved in their other preoccupations. They don't bring these truths inward, to reflect on the inconstancy occurring within themselves with every moment.

The fact that they can still do this and that, think this and that, say this and that, makes them lose all perspective. When you practice insight meditation, it's not something that you take a month or two off to do on a special retreat. That's not the real thing. It's no match for what you're doing right now, for here you can do it all day every day and all night, except when you sleep. Especially when the pain is strong, it's really good for your meditation, because it gives you the chance to know once and for all what inconstancy is like, what stress and suffering are like, what your inability to control things is like.

You have to find out right here, right in front of you, so don't try to avoid the pain. Practice insight so as to see the true nature of pain, its true nature as Dhamma, and then keep letting it go. If you do this, there's no way you can go wrong. This is the way to release from suffering.

And it's something you have to do before you die, you know, not something you wait to do when you die or are just about to die. It's something you simply keep on doing, keep on "insighting." When the disease lessens, you "insight" it. When it grows heavy, you "insight" it. If you keep on developing insight like this, the mind will get over its stupidity and delusion. In other words, things like craving and defilement won't dare hassle the mind the way they used to....

So you have to give it your all -- all your mindfulness, all your energy -- now that you have the opportunity to practice the Dhamma. Let this be your last lifetime. Don't let there be anything born again. If you're born again, things will come back again just as they are now. The same old stuff, over and over and over again. Once there's birth, there has to be ageing, illness, and death, in line with your defilements, experiencing the good and bad results they keep churning out. It's a cycle of suffering. So the best thing is to gain release from birth. Don't let yourself want anything any more. Don't let yourself want anything any more, for all your wants fall in with what's inconstant, stressful, and not-self.

Wanting is simply a form of defilement and craving. You have to disband these things right at the instigator: the wanting that's nothing but craving for sensuality, craving for becoming, or craving for no becoming -- the germs of birth in the heart. So focus in and contemplate at the right spot, seeing that even though craving may be giving rise to birth at sensory contact, you can set your knowing right at the mind, right at consciousness itself, and let there just be //the knowing that lets go of knowing//. This is something to work at until you have it mastered.

Setting your knowing at the mind, letting go of knowing like this, is something very beneficial. There's no getting stuck, no grabbing hold of your knowledge or views. If the knowledge is right, you let it go. If the knowledge is wrong, you let it go. This is called knowing letting go of knowing without going and getting entangled. This kind of knowing keeps the mind from latching onto whatever arises. As soon as you know something, you let it go. As soon as you know something, you've let it go. The mind just keeps on staying empty -- empty of mental formations and thoughts, empty of every sort of illusion that could affect the mind. It quickly sees through them and lets them go, knows and lets go, without holding onto anything. All it has left is the emptiness....

You've already seen results from your practice, step by step, from contemplating things and letting them go, letting go even of the thought that //you// are the one in pain, that //you// are the one who's dying. The pain and the dying are an affair of the aggregates, pure and simple. When this knowledge is clear and sure -- that it's not "my" affair, there's no "me" in there -- there's just an empty mind: an empty mind, empty of any label for itself. This is the nature of the mind free of the germs that used to make it assume this and that. They're dead now. Those germs are now dead because we've contemplated them. We've let go. We've set our knowing right at the mind and let go of whatever knowing has arisen, all along to the point where the mind is empty. Clear. In and of itself....

Consciousness, when you're aware of it inwardly, arises and passes away by its very own nature. There's no real essence to it -- this is what you see when you look at the elemental property of consciousness (//vinnana-dhatu//), pure and simple. When it's not involved with physical or mental phenomena, it's simply aware of itself -- aware, pure and simple. That's called the mind pure and simple, or the property of consciousness pure and simple, in and of itself, and it lets go of itself. When you're told to know and to let go of the knowing, it means to know the consciousness that senses things and then lets go of itself.

As for the aggregate of consciousness (//vinana-khandha//), that's a trouble-making consciousness. The germs that keep piling things on lie in this kind of consciousness, which wants to hang onto a sense of self. Even though it can let go of physical pain, or of physical and mental events in general, it still hangs onto a sense of self. So when you're told to know the letting go of knowing, it means to let go of this kind of consciousness, to the point where consciousness has no label for itself. That's when it's empty. If you understand this, or can straighten out the heart and mind from this angle, there won't be anything left. Pain, suffering, stress -- all your preoccupations -- will become entirely meaningless. There will be no sense of good or bad or anything at all. Dualities will no longer be able to have an effect. If you know in this way -- the knowing that lets go of knowing, consciousness pure and simple -- it prevents any possible fashioning of the mind.

The dualities that fashion good and bad: There's really nothing to them. They arise, and that's all there is to them; they disband, and that's all there is to them. So now we come to know the affairs of the dualities that fashion the mind into spirals, that fashion the mind or consciousness into endless cycles. When you know the knowing that lets go of knowing, right at consciousness in and of itself, dualities have no more meaning. There's no more latching onto the labels of good and bad, pleasure and pain, true and false, or whatever. You just keep on letting go....

Even this knowing that lets go of knowing has no label for itself, saying, "I know," or "I see." But this is something that lies a little deep, that you have to make an effort to see clearly and rightly. You have to keep looking in a shrewd way. The shrewdness of your looking: That's something very important, for only that can lead to Awakening. Your knowledge has to be shrewd. Skillful. //Make sure that it's shrewd and skillful//. Otherwise your knowledge of the true nature of things -- on the inner or outer levels -- won't really be clear. It'll get stuck on only the elementary levels of emptiness, labeling and latching onto them in a way that just keeps piling things on. That kind of emptiness simply can't compare with this kind -- the knowing that lets go of knowing right at consciousness pure and simple. Make sure that this kind of knowing keeps going continuously. If you slip for a moment, just get right back to it. You'll see that when you don't latch onto labels and meanings, thoughts of good and bad will just come to a stop. They'll disband. So when the Buddha tells us to see the world as empty, this is the way we see.

The emptiness lies in the fact that the mind doesn't give meaning to things, doesn't fashion things, doesn't cling. It's empty right at this kind of mind. Once you're correctly aware of this kind of empty mind, you'll no longer get carried away by anything at all. But if you don't really focus down like this, there will only be a little smattering of emptiness, and then you'll find yourself getting distracted by this and that, spoiling the emptiness. That kind of emptiness is emptiness in confusion. You're still caught up in confusion because you haven't contemplated down to the deeper levels. You simply play around with emptiness, that's all. The deeper levels of emptiness require that you focus in and keep on looking until you're thoroughly clear about the true nature of things in the phenomenon of the present arising and disbanding right in front of you. This kind of mind doesn't get involved, doesn't latch on to meanings or labels.

If you see this kind of emptiness correctly, there are no more issues, no more labels for anything in this heap of physical and mental phenomena. When the time comes for it all to fall apart, there's nothing to get excited about, nothing to get upset about, for that's the way it has to go by its nature. //Only if we latch onto it will we suffer//....

The Dhamma is right here in our body and mind, simply that we don't see it -- or that we see it wrongly, latching on and making ourselves suffer. If we look at things with the eyesight of mindfulness and discernment, what is there to make us suffer? Why is there any need to fear pain and death? Even if we do fear them, what do we accomplish? Physical and mental phenomena have to go their own way -- inconstant in their own way, stressful in their own way, beyond our control in their own way. So what business do we have in reaching out and latching on and saying that their stress and pain is //our// stress and pain? If we understand that the latching on is what makes us suffer over and over again, with each and every breath, then all we have to do is let go and we'll see how there is release from suffering right before our very eyes....

So keep on looking in to know, in the way I've described, right at the mind. But don't go labeling it as a "mind" or anything at all. Just let there be things as they are, in and of themselves, pure and simple. That's enough. You don't need to have any meanings or labels for anything at all. That will be the end of all suffering....When things disband in the ultimate way, they disband right at the point of the elemental property of consciousness free of the germs that will give rise to anything further. That's where everything comes to an end, with no more rebirth or redeath of any kind at all....

The practice is something you have to do for yourself. If you know things clearly and correctly with your own mindfulness and discernment, that's your tool, well-sharpened, in hand. If the mind is trained to be sharp, with mindfulness and discernment as its tool for contemplating itself, then defilement, craving, and attachment will keep getting weeded out and cleared away. You can look and see, from the amount you've already practiced: Aren't they already cleared away to some extent? The mind doesn't have to worry about anything, doesn't have to get involved with anything else. Let go of everything outside and then //keep// letting go until the mind lets go of itself. When you do this, how can you //not// see the great worth of the Dhamma?...

So I ask that this mind empty of attachment, empty of any sense of self whatsoever, be clear to you until you see that it's nothing but Dhamma. Get so that it's nothing but Dhamma, perfectly plain to your awareness. May this appear to you, as it is on its own, with each and every moment.

* * *

Part II
~~~~~~~

Listening to the Dhamma when the mind has already reached a basic level of emptiness is very useful. It's like an energizing tonic, for when we're sick there's bound to be pain disturbing us; but if we don't pay it any attention, it simply becomes an affair of the body, without involving the mind at all. Notice this as you're listening: The mind has let go of the pain to listen to the words, leaving the pain to its own affairs. The mind is then empty....

Once the mind honestly sees the truth that all compounded things are inconstant, it will have to let go of its attachments. The problem here is that we haven't yet really seen this, or haven't yet reflected on it in a skillful way. Once we do, though, the mind is always ready to grow radiant. Clear knowing makes the mind immediately radiant. So keep careful watch on things. Even if you don't know very much, just be aware of the mind as it maintains a balance in its basic level of neutrality and emptiness. Then it won't be able to fashion the pains in the body into any great issues, and you won't have to be attached to them.

So keep your awareness of the pain right at the level where it's no more than a mere sensation in the body. It can be the body's pain, but don't let the mind be in pain with it. If you //do// let the mind be in pain with it, that will pile things on, layer after layer. So the first step is to protect the mind, to let things go, then turn inward to look for the deepest, most innermost part of your awareness and stay right there. //You don't have to get involved with the pains outside//. If you simply try to endure them, they may be too much for you to endure. So look for the aspect of the mind that lies deep within, and you'll be able to put everything else aside.

Now, if the pains are the sort that you can watch, then make an effort to watch them. The mind will stay at its normal neutrality, calm with its own inner emptiness, watching the pain as it changes and passes away. But if the pain is too extreme, then turn around and go back inside; for if you can't handle it, then craving is going to work its way into the picture, wanting to push the pain away and to gain pleasure. This will keep piling on, piling on, putting the mind in a horrible turmoil.
~~~~~~~

So start out by solving the problem right at hand. If the pain is sudden and sharp, immediately turn around and focus all your attention on the mind. You don't want to have anything to do with the body, anything to do with the pains in the body. You don't look at them, you don't pay them any attention. Focus on staying with the innermost part of your awareness. Get to point where you can see the pure state of mind that isn't in pain with the body, and keep it constantly clear.

Once this is constantly clear, then no matter how much pain there is in the body, it's simply an affair of mental and physical events. The mind, though, isn't involved. It puts all these things aside. It lets go.

When you're adept at this, it's a very useful skill to have, for the important things in life don't lie outside. They lie entirely within the mind. If we understand this properly, we won't have to go out to grab this or that. We won't have to latch onto anything at all -- because if we do latch on, we simply cause ourselves needless suffering. The well-being of the mind lies at the point where it doesn't latch onto anything, where it doesn't want anything. That's where our well-being lies -- the point where all suffering and stress disband right at the mind....

If we don't really understand things, though, the mind won't be willing to let things go. It will keep on holding tight, for it finds so much flavor in things outside. Whatever involves pain and stress: That's what it likes.

We have to focus on contemplating and looking, looking at the illusions in the mind, the wrong knowledge and opinions that cover it up and keep us from seeing the aspect of the mind that's empty and still by its own internal nature. Focus on contemplating the opinions that give rise to the complicated attachments that bury the mind until it's in awful straits. See how mental events -- feelings, perceptions, and thought-formations -- condition the mind, condition the property of consciousness until it's in terrible shape.

//This is why it's so important to ferret out the type of knowing that lets go of knowing//, i.e., that knows the property of consciousness pure and simple when mental events haven't yet come in to condition it, or when it hasn't gone out to condition mental events. Right here is where things get really interesting -- in particular, the thought-formations that condition consciousness. They come from ignorance, right? It's because of our not knowing, or our wrong knowing, that they're able to condition things.

So I ask that you focus on this ignorance, this not-knowing. If you can know the characteristics of not-knowing, this same knowledge will know both the characteristics of thought-formations as they go about their conditioning and how to disband them. This requires adroit contemplation because it's something subtle and deep.

But no matter how subtle it may be, the fact that we've developed our mindfulness and discernment to this point means that we have to take an interest in it. If we don't, there's no way we can put an end to stress or gain release from it.

Or, if you want, you can approach it like this: Focus exclusively on the aspect of the mind that's constantly empty. If any preoccupations appear to it, be aware of the characteristics of bare sensation when forms make contact with the eye, or sounds with the ear, and so forth. There's a bare sensation, and then it disbands before it can have any such meaning as "good" or "bad." //If there's just the bare sensation that then disbands, there's no suffering//.

Be observant of the moment when forms make contact with the eye. With some things, if you're not interested in them, no feelings of liking or disliking arise. But if you get interested or feel that there's a meaning to the form, sound, smell, taste, or tactile sensation, you'll notice that as soon as you give a meaning to these things, attachment is already there.

If you stop to look in this way, you'll see that attachment is something subtle, because it's there even in the simple act of giving meaning. If you look in a superficial way, you won't see that it's attachment -- even though that's what it is, but in a subtle way. //As soon as there's a meaning, there's already attachment//. This requires that you have to be good and observant -- because in the contact at the eyes and ears that we take so much for granted, many sleights-of-hand happen all at once, which means that we aren't aware of the characteristics of the consciousness that knows each individual sensation. We have to be very observant if we want to be able to know these things. If we aren't aware on this level, everything will be tied up in attachment. These things will keep sending their reports into the mind, conditioning and concocting all kinds of issues to leave the mind, or consciousness, in an utter turmoil.

So if we want to look purely inside, we have to be very, very observant, because things inside are subtle, elusive, and sensitive. When the mind seems empty and neutral: That's when you really have to keep careful watch and control over it, so as to see clearly the sensation of receiving contact. There's contact, pure and simple, then it disbands, and the mind is empty. Neutral and empty. Once you know this, you'll know what the mind is like when it isn't conditioned by the power of defilement, craving, and attachment. We can use this emptiness of the mind as our standard of comparison, and it will do us a world of good....

Ultimately, you'll see the emptiness of all sensory contacts, as in the Buddha's teaching that we should see the world as empty. What he meant is that we observe bare sensations simply arising and passing away, knowing what consciousness is like when it does nothing more than receive contact. If you can see this, the next step in the practice won't be difficult at all -- because you've established neutrality right from the start. The act of receiving contact is no longer complicated: The mind no longer grabs hold of things, no longer feels any likes or dislikes. It's simply quiet and aware all around within itself at all times. Even if you can do this much, you find that you benefit from not letting things get complex, from not letting them concoct things through the power of defilement, craving, and attachment. Even just this much gets rid of lots of problems.

Then when you focus further in to see the nature of all phenomena that are known through sensory contact, you'll see that there's simply bare sensation with nothing at all worth getting attached to. If you look with the eyes of true mindfulness and discernment, you'll have to see emptiness -- even though the world is full of things. The eye sees lots of forms, the ear hears lots of sounds, you know, but the mind no longer gives them meanings. At the same time, things have no meanings in and of themselves.

The only important thing is the mind. //All issues come from the mind that goes out and gives things meanings// and gives rise to attachment, creating stress and suffering for itself. So you have to look until you see all the way through. Look outward until you see all the way out, and inward until you see all the way in, all the way until you penetrate inconstancy, stress, and not-selfness. See things as they are, in and of themselves, in line with their own nature, without any meanings or attachments. Then there won't be any issues. The mind will be empty -- clean and bright -- without your having to do anything to it.

Now, the fact that the mind has the viruses of ignorance, or of the craving that gives rise to things easily, means that we can't be careless. In the beginning, you have to supervise things carefully so that you can see the craving that arises at the moment of contact -- say, when there's a feeling of pain. If you don't label it as meaning //your// pain, craving won't get too much into the act. But if you do give it that meaning, then there will be the desire to push the pain away or to have pleasure come in its place.

All this, even though we've never gotten anything true and dependable from desiring. The pleasure we get from our desires doesn't last. It fools us and then changes into something else. Pain fools us and then changes into something else. But these changes keep piling up and getting very complicated in the mind, and this is what keeps the mind ignorant: It's been conditioned in so many ways that it gets confused, deluded, dark, and smoldering.

All kinds of things are smoldering in here....This is why the principle of the knowing that lets go of knowing is such an important tool. Whatever comes at you, the knowing that lets go of knowing is enough to get you through. It takes care of everything. If you let it slip, simply get back to the same sort of knowing. See for yourself how far it will take you, how much it can keep the mind neutral and empty.

You can come to see this bit by bit. In the moments when the mind isn't involved with very much, when it's at a basic level of normalcy -- empty, quiet, whatever -- keep careful watch over it and analyze it as well. Don't let it just be in an oblivious state of indifference, or else it will lose its balance. If you're in an oblivious state, then as soon as there's contact at any of the sense doors, there's sure to be attachment or craving giving rise to things the instant in which feeling appears. You have to focus on keeping watch of the changes, the behavior of the mind at every moment. As soon as your mindfulness lapses, get back immediately to your original knowing. We're all bound to have lapses -- all of us -- because the effluent of ignorance, the most important of the effluents, is still there in the mind.

This is why we have to keep working at our watchfulness, our investigation, our focused awareness, so that they keep getting clearer and clearer. Make your mind ripe in mindfulness and discernment, continuously....

Once they're ripe enough for you to know things in a skillful way, you'll be able to disband the defilements the very minute they appear. As soon as you begin feeling likes and dislikes, you can deal with them before they amount to anything. This makes things a lot easier. If you let them loose so that they condition the mind, making it irritated, murky, and stirred up to the point where it shows in your words and actions, then you're in terrible straits, falling into hell in this very lifetime.

The practice of the Dhamma requires that we be ingenious and circumspect right at the mind. The defilements are always ready to flatter us, to work their way into our favor. If we aren't skillful in our awareness, if we don't know how to keep the mind under careful supervision, we'll be no match for them -- for there are so many of them. But if we keep the mind well supervised, the defilements will be afraid of us -- afraid of our mindfulness and discernment, afraid of our awareness. Notice when the mind is empty, aware all around, with no attachments to anything at all: The defilements will hide out quiet, as if they weren't there at all.

But as soon as mindfulness slips, even just a little, they spring right up. They spring right up. If you recognize them for what they are the moment they spring up, they'll disband right there. This is a very useful skill to have. But if we let them get to the point where they turn into issues, they'll be hard to disband. That's when you have to bear with the fight and not give up.

Whatever happens, start out by bearing with it -- //not simply to endure it, but so as to examine it//, to see what it's like, how it changes, how it passes away. We bear with things so that we can see through their deceits: the way they arise, persist, and disband on their own. If they disband while we're examining them and clearly seeing their deceitfulness, we can have done with them for good. This will leave the mind in a state of freedom and independence, empty entirely within itself.

If you can learn to see through things right away the moment they arise -- what you might call your own little instantaneous awakenings -- your aware- ness will keep getting brighter and brighter, stronger and more expansive all the time.

So work at them -- these little instantaneous understandings -- and eventually, when things come together in an appropriate way, there will be the moment where there's the instantaneous cutting through of defilements and effluents once and for all. When that happens, then -- //nibbana//. No more taking birth. But if you haven't yet reached that point, just keep sharpening your knives: your mindfulness and discernment. If they're dull, they won't be able to cut anything through, but whatever shape they're in, keep cutting through bit by bit whatever you can....

I ask that you keep at this: examining and understanding all around within the mind until you reach the point where everything is totally clear and you can let go of everything with the realization that nothing in the five aggregates or in physical and mental phenomena is //me// or //mine//. Keep trying to let go, and that will be enough. Each moment as they're taking care of you here in the hospital, do what has to be done for your illness, but make sure that there's this separate, special awareness exclusive to the mind -- this knowing that simply lets go of itself. That will end all your problems right there....

* * * * * * * *

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TITLE OF WORK: A Good Dose of Dhamma for Meditators When They Are Ill
FILENAME: GOODDOSE.ZIP
AUTHOR: Upasika Kee Nanayon (K. Khao-suan-luang)
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: N/A (deceased 1978)
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: Dhamma Dana Publications
c/o Barre Center for Buddhist Studies
149 Lockwood Road
Barre, MA 01005
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: Khao Suan Luang Dhamma Community
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1995
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: February 1995
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

[end]

==========
First printed in //The Maha Bodhi//, Vol. 93, nos. 4-6 (1985), pp. 49-56.

Also printed in the Publication "Buddhism as a Way of Life and other Essays" by Sayagyi U Chit Tin, printed by the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, United Kingdom, 1993.
==========

THE GOOD FRIEND

Sayagyi U Chit Tin

//Kalyanamittata munina lokam adissa vannita.
Kalyanamitte bhajamano api balo pandito assa.

Bhajitabba sappurisa panna tatha pavaddhati bhajantanam
Bhajamano sappurise sabbehi dukkhehi mucceyya.//

The state of having good friends has been praised by the sage (the Buddha) with reference to the world; if he resorted to good friends, even a fool would be wise.

Good men are to be resorted to; in this way the wisdom of those who resort to them increases. Resorting to good men, one would be released from all pains.

Therigatha vv. 213-214 [1]

The Buddha made very clear the importance of having a good friend

(kalyana-mittata).[2] When Venerable Ananda said to the Buddha that half of the life of purity (brahma-cariya) was the state of having a good friend (kalyana), having good companions, and being inclined to good friends, the Buddha corrected him. "Do not say that, Ananda," he said. "Having a good friend, having good companions, and being inclined to good friends is the whole of the life of purity, not the half." And he went on to explain that this was so because it means that one will develop the Noble Eightfold Path, which is based on detachment, on dispassion, on cessation, involving maturity of relinquishing. "It is because I am a good friend to them that living beings subject to birth are freed from birth," he said.[3]

The highest order of friendship, of course, is with the best of friends, the Buddha. But let us consider first some of the general qualities of a good friend and the advantages of associating with them before going into the more important aspect of the good friend as the meditation teacher.

Once, when the Buddha was living among the Koiyans at Kakkarapatta, a man name Dighajanu Byagghapajja requested that the Buddha give a discourse on the Dhamma and teach things that would be helpful in this life and in lives to come for laymen such as him.[4] We can assume from this request that Byagghapajja was not concerned with aiming higher: with developing his concentration and insight. The Buddha complied by giving a discourse, and in it, he lists four conditions that lead to a man's advantage and happiness in this life. These are: (1) being alert, (2) being wary, (3) keeping good company, and (4) leading a balanced life.

Good company, the Buddha explained, means that wherever a layman goes, wherever he talks with other laymen, he chooses men who possess the four qualities that lead to happiness in future lives: faith, virtue, charity, and wisdom. He will emulate those who are full of faith, virtue, charity, and wisdom.

The Buddha also mentions friendship in speaking of the four ways in which the layman can lose his wealth. These four are: looseness with women, debauchery in drinking, dishonesty in gambling and in friendship, and companionship and intimacy with those who do evil. Abstinence from these four will lead to greater wealth. So we can see that even on the mundane level, a good friend is very important.

Friendship is given as one of seven things that prevent decline for a bhikkhu: (1) reverence for the Buddha, (2) the Dhamma, and (3) the Sangha; (4) the (moral) training, (5) concentration, (6) right speech, and (7) good friendship.

The Buddha also told the bhikkhus to cultivate the friend who possessed the following seven qualities: a friend (1) gives what is hard to give, (2) does what is hard to do, (3) bears what is hard to bear, (4) confesses his own secret, (5) keeps others' secrets, (6) does not forsake a person in time of want, and (7) does not despise a person who is ruined.

A third set of seven qualities of a friend are: being (1) genial, (2) pleasant, (3) serious, (4) self-composed, (5) a speaker (of good), (6) mild, (7) profound in speech, and (7) being one who does not urge (one on) at the wrong time.[5]

In //The Path of Purification//[6] Ashin Buddhaghosa included in his discussion of virtue the bad effects of wrong friendship and the good effects of good friendship. The virtue will diminish in a man who does not visit the virtuous but rather cultivates the unvirtuous, a person who, in his ignorance, sees no fault in a transgression here. As a result of such association and action, his mind will often be full of wrong thoughts and he will not guard his faculties.

Later in the same chapter,[7] we find long lists of both the wrong and the right kinds of people to associate with: bhikkhus should not frequent prostitutes, widows, old maids, eunuchs, bhikkhunis, or taverns. They should not live associated with kings, kings' ministers, sectarians, sectarians' disciples, or in unbecoming association with laymen. They should not cultivate, frequent or honour families that are faithless, untrusting, abusive, and rude, who wish harm, ill, woe, who wish no surcease of bondage for bhikkhus and bhikkhunis or for men and women who are disciples.

In the //Dialogues of the Buddha//,[8] details are given concerning the qualities of good and bad friends. Four types of people are to be considered as foes disguised as friends, and four reasons for this are given for each:

(1) A grasping person is rapacious, gives little and asks much, does his duty out of fear, and pursues his own interests.

(2) A man of words, not deeds, makes friendly remarks about the past and about the future, tries to win favour by empty sayings, and when the opportunity for service comes, he says he cannot help.

(3) The flatterer agrees to do wrong and does not agree to do right, praises you to your face and speaks ill of you to others.

(4) The companion down the wrong path is a companion when you indulge in strong drink, when you frequent the streets at untimely hours, when you go to shows and fairs, and when you gamble.

Having recognized such false friends, the wise man should avoid them from afar, for they lead to peril and dread.

Four types of people are to be considered as good-hearted friends, and four reasons for this are given for each:

(1) The helper guards you when you are off your guard, guards your property when you are off your guard; he is a refuge when you are afraid, and he gives you double what you require when you need something for your work.

(2) The friend who is the same in happiness and adversity tells you his secrets, keeps your secrets, does not forsake you when you are in trouble, and lays down even his life for your sake.

(3) The friend who declares what you need to do restrains you from doing wrong, tells you to do what is right, informs you of what you had not heard before, and reveals to you the way to future happy abodes.

(4) The friend who sympathizes does not rejoice over your misfortunes, rejoices over your prosperity, restrains anyone who is speaking ill of you, and commends anyone who is praising you.

Wise people should know that these four types are their friends and should devote themselves to them as a mother devotes herself to her child.

In this same discourse,[9] the Buddha explains how the layman should act towards his friends and companions. He should minister to them with generosity, courtesy, and benevolence, by treating them as he treats himself and by being as good as his word. As a result, his friends and companions will love him, protect him when he is off his guard, and guard his property when he is off his guard. They become his refuge in danger, they will not forsake him in his troubles, and they will show consideration for his family.

On another occasion,[10] the Buddha explained to King Pasenadi the advantages to be expected if one has a good friend, has good companions, and is inclined to good friends. In order to do so, he said, one must be diligent in good actions. If the king did this, the Buddha told him, then others would follow his example. The nobles and ladies of his court and his subjects in both the town and country would also be diligent. Living in this manner, the king would be guarded and preserved as would be the house of his women and his treasury and storehouses.

More important than friendship that leads to mundane happiness is friendship leading to perfect happiness, Nibbana. The qualities of a good friend who will lead others to the highest happiness are enumerated.[11] The good friend has ten subjects of conversation: talk that is (1) concerned with effacement, (2) favours the mind's release, (3) leads to complete dispassion, (4) to fading, (5) to cessation, (6) to peace, (7) to direct knowledge, (8) to Awakening, (9) to Nibbana; that is to say, (10) talk on wanting little, contentment, seclusion, aloofness from contact, strenuousness, virtue, concentration, understanding, deliverance, and knowledge and vision of deliverance. In the good friend's presence, one hears what has not been heard, corrects what has been heard, gets rid of doubt, rectifies one's view, and gains confidence. By training under a good friend, one grows in faith, virtue, learning, generosity, and understanding.

In one discourse, the Buddha emphasizes how essential friendship is in winning liberation. "For the bhikkhu who is a learner and who has not attained mental perfection," he said, "but who dwells with the desire for peace from bondage in his mind, as far as what is called `an external factor,' I see no other single factor as helpful as possessing good friends.[12] Bhikkhus, he who has good friends abandons the unprofitable (akusala) and develops the profitable (kusala)." And the Buddha gave the following verse:

> //Kalyanamitto yo bhikkhu sappatisso sagaravo
> Karam mittanam vacanam sampajano patissato
> Papune anupubbena sabbasamyojanakkhayam.//

The bhikkhu who has a good friend, who is deferential (to him), who is respectful (to him), who does what friends advise, if he is attentive and mindful, he will eventually destroy all the fetters.

Itivuttaka, p. 10 [13]

In //The Gradual Sayings//,[14] we find several indications of the importance of having good friends. This is given first in a list of things that have the power to cause good states that have not yet arisen to come up and the power to cause evil states already arisen to wane. It is included in lists of the things that lead to great profit (in a general list, and, in lists separating subjective factors and external factors, among the latter).

In //The Kindred Sayings//,[15] the Buddha tells the bhikkhus, "Those for whom you have fellow-feeling, those who may deem you worth listening to, your friends and colleagues, your kinsmen and blood-relations, ought to be roused, admonished and established in the comprehension of the Four Noble Truths." Similarly,[16] he says the same people "should be advised about, grounded in, established in the four constituents of attaining the first stage of Awakening, Sotapanna." These four constituents are: loyalty to the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Sangha, and being blessed with the virtue dear to Noble Persons -- unbroken virtue leading to concentration of the mind. Having good friends is also given as the first of several qualities that are forerunners and harbingers of the arising of the Noble Eightfold Path, which is based on seclusion, dispassion, cessation, and which ends in relinquishing.[17] The other qualities are: virtue, desire (to do good), self-possession, the attainment of right view, earnestness, and wise attention.

In //The Gradual Sayings// [18] the Buddha gives five conditions as belonging to Awakening. The first of these is having a good friend, a good companion, a good comrade. "This may be expected of a bhikkhu who has a good friend, companion, comrade," the Buddha said, "he will be virtuous, restrained, perfect in behaviour, and will undertake the training. He will employ right speech. He will dwell strenuous in purpose and will not shirk the burden of righteousness. He will have wisdom and noble penetration concerning the way to the utter destruction of pain (dukkha)." In other words, if he has the first condition -- a good friend -- he will acquire the other four conditions.

The same list of five conditions leading to an emancipated mind is given elsewhere in the same collection.[19] These conditions were explained by the Buddha to Meghiya, who at that time was his attendant. Meghiya had seen a mango grove that was pleasing and beautiful, so he thought to himself that it would be a good place to meditate. He went to ask the Buddha to permit him to meditate in the grove. The Buddha knew that this was not a good place for Meghiya to meditate, but instead of refusing to let him go, he answered a little indirectly, giving Meghiya a hint. "I am alone, Meghiya," the Buddha said. "Stay a while till some other bhikkhu comes." But Meghiya did not catch the hint and asked permission three times. In his final answer, the Buddha makes it clear that he is giving permission because Meghiya insists and because to answer otherwise would give the impression the Buddha was discouraging someone from meditating. "What can we say to you, Meghiya, when you repeat: `I would strive'?" he said. "Do as you think fit, Meghiya."

When Meghiya tried to meditate, three sorts of evil thoughts kept coming: sensual thoughts, thoughts of ill-will, and cruel thoughts. This was because in a past life he had been a king in that same place. As he had had wives in that past life, sensuous thoughts arose when he tried to meditate, and because he had passed judgement on criminals there, the thoughts of ill-will and cruelty arose. Meghiya thought to himself, "It is amazing and astonishing. By faith alone I have gone forth from home to this homeless state; yet I am still dogged by these evil thoughts." Then he went to the Buddha and explained everything to him.

The Buddha did not criticize Meghiya, or tell him "I told you so," or explain away what had happened. Instead, he explained the five conditions leading to an emancipated mind given above: a good friend, being virtuous, right speech, being strenuous in purpose, and being possessed of wisdom. Both these groups of five are completed by four more conditions: (1) reflections on the foul (which is particularly appropriate for bhikkhus) to put away passion, (2) being established in loving kindness to put away ill will, (3) mindfulness of breathing to cut off distractions, and (4) the thought of impermanence (anicca) to uproot the conceit "I am." The first two of these are directly related to the problems Meghiya was having trying to meditate in the mango grove.

This story gives a very good example of why the best good friend of all is the Buddha. He is best able to foresee potential problems for a person. And he understands best what instructions are the most appropriate to give. But, as we can see from Meghiya's story, even the best of friends cannot force someone to work properly.

In this connection, we might mention the importance of right association as explained in //The Path of Purification//.[20] Avoiding people without understanding and cultivating people with understanding are included among the seven things that lead to the arising of investigation-of-states, one of the factors of Awakening. Avoiding rough people and cultivating refined people are among the eleven things leading to the factor of Awakening of happiness.

The most complete discussion of the good friend as the meditation teacher is found in //The Path of Purification//. This is the aspect of friendship that is most important to anyone who wishes to make an end of suffering. Ashin Buddhaghosa explains in detail what one must do to make progress on the Path of Awakening. First, one must be established in virtue. Next, one should overcome any of the ten impediments one may have.

By this is meant impediments to meditation.[21] Briefly stated, they are: being preoccupied about one's dwelling, about one's family, about gain, about one's own students, about building work that is in progress, about travel, about fellow workers, being distracted by illness, by responsibility for the texts, and the supernormal powers of the ordinary person that are hard to maintain. The last is only an impediment for insight as the powers are gained through concentration, but the other nine are all impediments for concentration.

The story given to illustrate the importance of not letting the texts become an impediment is of interest as it shows some important aspects concerning the relationship between teacher and student. At one time, there was an elder who was a Stream-Winner named Tipitaka-Cula-Abhaya. Elder Abhaya assembled the bhikkhus and said that he would explain the three Pitakas, but this was before he had learned the commentaries. The bhikkhus told him, "Which teachers' teaching is it? Unless you give only the teaching of our own teachers, we shall not let you speak." His preceptor listened to part of his explanation and then advised him to go learn from their own teachers and sent him to Elder Maha-Dhammarakkhita.

Elder Dhammarakkhita consented to let Elder Abhaya recite the texts by night so that he could give the explanation by day, and they went through the canon. After it was over, Elder Dhammarakkhita, who had been teaching Elder Abhaya, sat down on a mat on the ground in front of Elder Abhaya and said, "Friend, explain a meditation subject to me."

"What are you saying, venerable sir," Elder Abhaya answered, "have I not heard it all from you? What can I explain to you that you do not already know?"

Then the senior elder said, "The Path is different for one who has actually travelled by it." So Elder Abhaya consented and taught Elder Dhammarakkhita a meditation subject.

Later, he heard that Elder Dhammarakkhita had attained Nibbana, and he said, "The Arahat path befits our teacher, friends. Our teacher was a true thoroughbred. He sat down on a mat before his own Dhamma pupil and said, `Explain a meditation subject to me.' The Arahat path befits our teacher, friends."

This story is a good illustration of the type of humility that is required for the next step on the Path to Nibbana. After establishing himself in virtue and overcoming the impediments, the student "should then approach the good friend, the giver of a meditation subject, and he should learn from among the forty meditation subjects one that suits his own temperament. After that he should avoid a (place) unfavourable to the development of concentration and go to live in one that is favourable. Then he should sever the lesser impediments and not overlook any of the directions for development."[22]

"Meditation subjects are of two kinds," Ashin Buddhaghosa explains, "that is, generally useful meditation subjects and special meditation subjects. Loving kindness towards the Community of Bhikkhus, etc., and also mindfulness of death are what are called generally useful meditation subjects. ... A special meditation subject is that one from among the forty meditation subjects that is suitable to a man's own temperament.... So it is the one who gives this twofold meditation subject that is called the giver of a meditation subject."[23]

"It is only the Fully Awakened One who possesses all the aspects of the good friend," Ashin Buddhaghosa continues. "Since that is so, while he is available, only a meditation subject taken in the Blessed One's presence is well taken. But after his final attainment of Nibbana, it is proper to take it from any one of the eighty great disciples still living. When they are no longer available, one who wants to take a particular meditation subject should take if from someone with taints (asava) destroyed, (an Arahat) who has, by means of that particular meditation subject, produced the fourfold and fivefold //jhana//, and has reached the destruction of the taints by augmenting insight that had that //jhana// as its proximate cause."

Then Ashin Buddhaghosa says that an Arahat will say that he is one whose taints are destroyed -- that is to say, he will declare himself to be an Arahat -- when he knows that his instructions will be carried out.

"So if someone with cankers destroyed is available," Ashin

Buddhaghosa continues, "that is good. If not, then one should take (the meditation subject) from a Non-Returner, a Once-Returner, a Stream-Enterer, an ordinary man who has obtained //jhana//, one who knows the three Pitakas, one who knows two Pitakas, one who knows one Pitaka, in descending order (as available). If not even one who knows one Pitaka is available, then it should be taken from one who is familiar with one Collection together with its commentary and one who is himself conscientious. For a teacher such as this who knows the texts, guards the heritage, and protects the tradition will follow the teachers' opinion rather than his own." [24]

From what is said here, it is obvious that the more highly developed, the further along the path a person is, the better he will be as a good friend. It is noteworthy that knowledge of the texts is so important for the teacher who is an ordinary man, who has not reached at least the first stage of Awakening. This may seem to be in contradiction to the fact that being distracted by responsibility for the texts is included in the impediments to meditation. But Ashin Buddhaghosa makes it clear in his discussion of this impediment that what is meant is neglecting one's meditation through reciting the canon, and this applies to the student, not the teacher. "Guarding the heritage," of course, means keeping the pure Buddha-Dhamma without trying to add to it or to take away from it, and not distorting it in any way. This is particularly difficult for an ordinary person who has not personally experienced for himself the most profound aspects of the Four Noble Truths. So we see that the teacher who is an ordinary person and who knows the texts will guard the heritage and protect the tradition. He will do so through following his own teachers' guidance rather than by relying on his own opinion. Ashin Buddhaghosa concludes the remarks given above by saying, "Therefore the Ancient Elders said three times, `One who is conscientious will guard (the heritage).'"

Ashin Buddhaghosa next gives some information about the different approaches used by teachers:[25] "Now those beginning with one whose taints are destroyed mentioned above will describe only the Path they have themselves reached. But with a learned man, his instructions and his answers to questions are purified by his having approached various teachers, and so he will explain a meditation subject showing a broad track, like a big elephant going through a stretch of jungle, and he will select discourses in the canon and reasons from here and there, adding (explanations of) what is suitable and unsuitable. So a meditation subject should be taken by approaching the good friend such as this, the giver of a meditation subject, and by doing all the duties to him."

This does not mean that a teacher who uses a broad track is the superior teacher. As we have seen in the story of Elder Abhaya and Elder Dhammarakkhita, the man who knew all the canon and the commentaries on it was the one who approached the man who had attained the first stage of Awakening.

Ashin Buddhaghosa's discussion of the duties of the meditator towards his teacher applies mainly to bhikkhus. But the basic principle to be applied should be followed by laymen also. This means that one should show every respect to the teacher, being courteous to him. Ashin Buddhaghosa does mention one case when the student may request that the time set for explaining the meditation subject be changed. If he is ill, he should let it be known and propose a time appropriate for him. "For if a meditation subject is expounded at an inconvenient time, one cannot give attention," Ashin Buddhaghosa says. [26]

Venerable Ledi Sayadaw, in his book //The Requisites of Enlightenment//,[27] discusses wrong teachings and makes many important points concerning the Buddha-Dhamma today that will serve to compliment our discussion of the good friend. Ven. Ledi Sayadaw says that it is essential for laypeople to keep the five precepts (permanent morality, nicca-sila) and this leads to good conduct (carana). Combined with right knowledge (vijja), this enables them to attain the Paths and the Fruition States. Many people today keep these precepts, but people who have developed perfect concentration are very rare, as are people who have attained insight. "Such people are very rare," Ledi Sayadaw points out, "because these are times when wrong teachings (miccha-dhamma) are ripe -- wrong teachings that are likely to cause danger and obstruction to the Dhamma (dhammantaraya)."[28]

Ven. Ledi Sayadaw then gives an explanation of wrong teachings that we would like to quote at length: [29]

Wrong Teachings

By wrong teachings likely to cause obstruction to the Dhamma are meant such views, practices, and limitations as the inability to see the dangers of repeated rebirths (samsara), the belief that these are times when the Paths and Fruition States can no longer be attained, the tendency to defer effort until one's perfections (parami) ripen, the belief that people today are endowed with only two root-conditions (dvi-hetuka),[30] and the belief that the great teachers of the past never existed, etc.

Even though it does not reach the ultimate (Nibbana), no wholesome volitional action (kusala-kamma) is ever rendered futile. If effort is made, a wholesome volitional action is instrumental in producing perfection in those who do not possess perfection. If no effort is made, the opportunity to acquire perfection is lost. If those whose perfections are immature put forth effort, their perfections become ripe and mature. Such people can attain the Paths and Fruition States in their next existence within the present Dispensation (Sasana). If no effort is made, the opportunity for the perfection (that is immature) to ripen is lost. If those whose perfection is ripe and mature put forth effort, the Paths and the Fruition States can be attained within this life. If no effort is made, the opportunity to attain the Paths and Fruition States is lost.

If people with only two root-conditions put forth effort, they can become endowed with all three root-conditions (ti-hetuka) in their next existence. If they do not put forth effort, they cannot ascend from the stage of having two root-conditions and will slide down to the stage of being without any root-conditions (ahetuka).

Suppose there is a person who plans to become a bhikkhu. If another person says to him, "Only entertain the intention if you can remain a monk all your life. Otherwise, don't entertain the idea." This would amount to obstructing the Dhamma.

The Buddha said, "I declare that the mere arising of an intention of performing good deeds is productive of great benefit."[31]

To disparage either the act of generosity (dana) or to discourage the person who is generous may invoke the obstruction of the Dhamma for a person; that is to say, he causes obstruction to the performance of meritorious actions. If acts of virtue, concentration, and insight, or if those who perform these acts are disparaged, it may be an obstruction of the Dhamma. If obstruction to meritorious actions is caused, one is liable to be bereft of power and influence, of property and riches, and one may be abjectly poor in future lives. If obstruction to the Dhamma is caused, one is liable to be defective in conduct and behaviour and defective of sense and thus utterly low and debased in the existences that follow. Hence, all beware!

In the discourse to Venerable Cunda that Ledi Sayadaw quotes above, the Buddha pointed out the importance of working on one's own development in order to help others.[32] "This situation does not occur, Cunda," he said, "when one sunk in the mud will by himself pull out another who is sunk in the mud. But this situation occurs, Cunda, when one not sunk in the mud will by himself pull out another who is sunk in the mud.

"This situation does not occur, Cunda, when one who is not tamed, not trained, not utterly quenched, will by himself tame, train, make another utterly quenched. But this situation occurs, Cunda, when one who is tamed, trained, utterly quenched, will by himself tame, train, make another utterly quenched."

[1] Based on the translation by K.R. Norman, //Poems of Early Buddhist Nuns// (Pali Text Society, 1989). For the Pali, we follow the edition by L. Alsdorf in Appendix II of the Pali Text Society's 1966 edition of Therigatha.

[2] For a detailed discussion of the Pali terms and the concept of the good friend in the canon and commentaries, see Steven Collins, "//Kalyanamitta and Kalyanamittata//," //Pali Text Society Journal// XI (1987) pp. 51-72. See this article for references to other passages on the good friend.

[3] KS I 113f.; V 2f. The last statement is quoted in //Path//, Chapter III para 62. Collins (op. cit., p. 70, n. 23) quotes the commentary (Spk I 156f.) where it is said that Ananda thought that half of the life of purity was the state of having a good friend and that half was individual effort (paccatta-purisa-kara). The commentary explains that these two cannot be separated.

[4] GS IV 187-191.

[5] GS IV 17-19.

[6] Chapter I para 14.

[7] //Path//, Chapter I para 45.

[8] DB III 177-182 (THIH 464ff.) [D III 185ff.].

[9] DB III 182 (THIH 467) [D III 190].

[10] KS I 112-115 [S I 87-89].

[11] //Path//, Chapter I para 49.

[12] As Steven Collins points out (op. cit., p. 71, n. 42), the preceding discourse (It 10, MA II 121) and similar parallel discourses at S V 101f. (KS V 84f.) give the best internal (or subjective) factor as "careful attention."

[13] MA II 122.

[14] GS I 10-12.

[15] KS V 368.

[16] KS V 317f.

[17] KS V 27-30.

[18] GS IV 232.

[19] GS V 234-237.

[20] Chapter IV paras 54ff.

[21] For details on these, see //Path//, Chapter III paras 29-56.

[22] //Path//, Chapter III para 28.

[23] //Path//, Chapter III paras 57, 60.

[24] //Path//, Chapter III paras 62-64.

[25] //Path//, Chapter III para 65.

[26] //Path//, Chapter III para 73.

[27] //Wheel// nos. 171-174.

[28] //Op. cit.//, p. 24.

[29] //Op. cit.//, 25f.

[30] That is to say, people today are only capable of non-greed and non-hatred and cannot attain non-delusion.

[31] MLS I 55.

[32] MLS I 56.

Worldwide Contact Addresses
in the Tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin
~~~
~~~

AUSTRIA: International Meditation Centre, A-9064 St. Michael/Gurk 6, Austria;Tel: +43 4224 2820, Fax: +43 4224 28204

EASTERN AUSTRALIA: International Meditation Centre, Lot 2 Cessnock Road, Sunshine NSW 2264, Australia;
Tel: +61 49 705 433, Fax: +61 49 705 749

UNITED KINGDOM: International Meditation Centre, Splatts House, Heddington, Calne, Wiltshire SN11 OPE, England;
Tel: +44 380 850 238, Fax: +44 380 850 833,
Email: CIS, IMC-UK,100330,3304

USA (East Coast): International Meditation Centre, 438 Bankard Road, Westminster MD 21158, USA;
Tel: +1 410 346 7889, Fax: +1 410 346 7133;
Email: CIS, IMC-USA, 74163,2452

WESTERN AUSTRALIA: International Meditation Centre, Lot 78 Jacoby Street, Mahogany Creek WA 6072, Australia;
Tel: +61 9 295 2644, Fax: +61 9 295 3435

CANADA: IMC-Canada, 336 Sandowne Drive, Waterloo, Ontario, N2K 1V8, Canada; Tel: +1 519 747 4762, Fax: +1 519 725 2781

GERMANY: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Gesellschaft, Christaweg 16, 79114 Freiburg, Germany, Tel: +49 761 465 42, Fax: +49 761 465 92

JAPAN: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, Komatsuri-Cho 923, Kishiwada-Shi, Osaka-Fu, 596 Japan, Tel: +81 724 45 0057

THE NETHERLANDS: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Stichting, Oudegracht 124, 3511 AW Utrecht, The Netherlands,
Tel: +31 30 311 445, Fax: +31 30 340 612

SINGAPORE: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Association, 9 Penang Road #07-12, Park Mall, Singapore 0923
Tel: +65 338 6911, Fax: +65 336 7211

SWITZERLAND: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Gesellschaft, Greyerzstrasse 35, 3013
Bern, Switzerland;Tel: +41 31 415 233, Fax: +41 61 691 8049;
Email: CIS, 100256,3576

USA (West Coast): IMC-USA, 77 Kensington Rd., San Anselmo, CA 94960.
Tel: +1 415 459 3117, Fax: +1 415 346 7133

BELGIUM: Address as for the Netherlands, Tel: +32 2414 1756

DENMARK: Contact Address: Mr. Peter Drost-Nissen, Strandboulevarden
117, 3th, 2100 Kopenhagen, Denmark. Tel: 031 425 636

ITALY: Contact address: Mr. Renzo Fedele, Via Euganea 94, 35033
Bresseo PD, Italy. Tel: +39 49 9900 752

Published by the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, United Kingdom
Address as above, registered charity no. 280134

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT

TITLE OF WORK: The Good Friend
FILENAME: GOODFRND.ZIP
AUTHOR: Sayagyi U Chit Tin
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: n/a
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: International Meditation Centre, Splatts House,
Heddington, Calne, Wiltshire SN11 OPE, England
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: The Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, U.K.
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1985
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: 1994
ORIGIN SITE: BODY DHARMA * Richmond CA 510/234-9431 DharmaNet (96:101/33)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights or restrictions that may apply.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

THE GREAT DISCOURSE ON THE LION'S ROAR

Introduction

The Mahasihanada Sutta, the Great Discourse on the Lion's Roar, is a text of awesome scope and power, one of those rare suttas in which the Buddha discloses the greatness and loftiness of his own spiritual endowments. Towards the end of the sutta, the Buddha says that he has reached his eightieth year, which allows us to place the discourse in the final year of his life. Thus the sutta serves as a convenient summation of the exalted qualities that enabled the Buddha to function so effectively as teacher and spiritual guide through the forty-five years of his mission.

It is not typical of the Buddha to extol himself, for he did not intend his Dispensation to evolve into a personality cult centred around himself as a charismatic and powerful leader. Throughout his ministry he constantly emphasized the primacy of his role as guide, as the discoverer and proclaimer of the path. His task is not to command reverence, but to steer his disciples onto and along the path, for it is only the practice of the path, the cultivation of the training, that can effect the deep interior purification by which one can reach the extinction of the defilements and liberation from suffering.

However, while the Buddha functions primarily as the revealer of the path, confidence in him as the Supreme Teacher remains an essential element of the training. It is this confidence, freshly arisen, that induces the curious inquirer to cross the great divide that separates the admirer of the Dhamma from the practitioner, and it is this same confidence that drives the aspirant forward until the task of self-cultivation has been completed. Frequent reflection on the greatness of the Master inspires joy and courage, sustaining one's commitment during those dark periods when prospects for progress appear bleak, and desire and doubt -- those twin conspirators -- combine forces to attempt to persuade one of the futility of one's efforts. Hence, in order to provide a spur to awaken and nurture the confidence necessary to tread the path through its downward turns as well as its ascents, the Buddha on occasion offers us revelations of his "Buddha-//gunas//," the excellent qualities of a Fully Enlightened One that entitle him to serve as the first of the Three Gems and Three Refuges.

One of the most impressive of these rare disclosures is the Great Discourse on the Lion's Roar. Spoken as a rebuttal to the charges of a renegade disciple who, in the midst of the populous city of Vesali, had been denouncing the Buddha and attempting to dissuade others from following his teaching, the sutta recapitulates the various distinguished qualities of the Blessed One, with special emphasis upon his "ten Tathagata powers" (//tathagatabala//) and "four intrepidities" (//vesarajja//); the sutta also affords us a glimpse of the demanding ordeal he underwent over many past aeons seeking the path to deliverance. When it was first spoken, the sutta had such a powerful impact on one monk in the assembly that his bodily hairs stood on end, and thus, during an early period, the sutta was known by the alternative title "The Hair-raising Discourse." Even today, centuries later, the Great Discourse on the Lion's Roar can continue to serve as a fecund source of inspiration.

* * * * * * * *

MAJJHIMA NIKAYA NO. 12

The Great Discourse on the Lion's Roar

(//Mahasihanada Sutta//)

1. Thus have I heard. On one occasion the Blessed One was living at Vesali in the grove outside the city to the west.

2. Now on that occasion Sunakkhatta, son of the Licchavis, had recently left this Dhamma and Discipline. [1] He was making this statement before the Vesali assembly: "The recluse Gotama does not have any superhuman states, any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones. [2] The recluse Gotama teaches a Dhamma (merely) hammered out by reasoning, following his own line of inquiry as it occurs to him, and when he teaches the Dhamma to anyone, it leads him when he practises it to the complete destruction of suffering." [3]

3. Then, when it was morning, the Venerable Sariputta dressed, and taking his bowl and outer robe, went into Vesali for alms. Then he heard Sunakkhatta, son of the Licchavis, making this statement before the Vesali assembly. When he had wandered for alms in Vesali and had returned from his almsround, after his meal he went to the Blessed One, and after paying homage to him, he sat down at one side and told the Blessed One what Sunakkhatta was saying.

4. (The Blessed One said:) "Sariputta, the misguided man Sunakkhatta is angry, and his words are spoken out of anger. Thinking to discredit the Tathagata, he actually praises him; [*p.69] for it is a praise of the Tathagata to say of him: 'When he teaches the Dhamma to anyone, it leads him when he practises it to the complete destruction of suffering.'

5. "Sariputta, this misguided man Sunakkhatta will never infer of me according to Dhamma: 'That Blessed One is accomplished, fully enlightened, perfect in true knowledge and conduct, sublime, knower of worlds, incomparable leader of persons to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, enlightened, blessed.' [4]

6. "And he will never infer of me according to Dhamma: 'That Blessed One enjoys the various kinds of supernormal power: having been one, he becomes many; having been many, he becomes one; he appears and vanishes; he goes unhindered through a wall, through an enclosure, through a mountain, as though through space; he dives in and out of the earth as though it were water; he walks on water without sinking as though it were earth; seated cross-legged, he travels in space like a bird; with his hand he touches and strokes the moon and sun so powerful and mighty; he wields bodily mastery even as far as the Brahma-world.'

7. "And he will never infer of me according to Dhamma: 'With the divine ear element, which is purified and surpasses the human, that Blessed One hears both kinds of sounds, the heavenly and the human, those that are far as well as near.'

8. "And he will never infer of me according to Dhamma: 'That Blessed One encompasses with his own mind the minds of other beings, other persons. He understands a mind affected by lust as affected by lust and a mind unaffected by lust as unaffected by lust; he understands a mind affected by hate as affected by hate and a mind unaffected by hate as unaffected by hate; he understands a mind affected by delusion as affected by delusion and a mind unaffected by delusion as unaffected by delusion; he understands a contracted mind as contracted and a distracted mind as distracted; he understands an exalted mind as exalted and an unexalted mind as unexalted; he understands a surpassed mind as surpassed and an unsurpassed mind as unsurpassed; he understands a concentrated mind as concentrated and an unconcentrated mind as unconcentrated; he understands a liberated mind as liberated and an unliberated mind as unliberated.'

(Ten Powers of a Tathagata)

9. "Sariputta, the Tathagata has these ten Tathagata's powers, possessing which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma.[5] What are the ten?

10. (1) "Here, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the possible as possible and the impossible as impossible.[6] And that [*p.70] is a Tathagata's power that the Tathagata has, by virtue of which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma.

11. (2) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the results of actions undertaken, past, future and present, with possibilities and with causes. That too is a Tathagata's power....[7]

12. (3) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the ways leading to all destinations. That too is a Tathagata's power.... [8]

13. (4) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the world with its many and different elements. That too is a Tathagata's power....[9]

14. (5) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is how beings have different inclinations. That too is a Tathagata's power....[10]

15. (6) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the disposition of the faculties of other beings, other persons. That too is a Tathagata's power....[11]

16. (7) "Again, the Tathagata understands as it actually is the defilement, the cleansing and the emergence in regard to the jhanas, liberations, concentrations and attainments. That too is a Tathagata's power....[12]

17. (8) "Again, the Tathagata recollects his manifold past lives, that is, one birth, two births, three births, four births, five births, ten births, twenty births, thirty births, forty births, fifty births, a hundred births, a thousand births, a hundred thousand births, many aeons of world-contraction, many aeons of world-expansion, many aeons of world-contraction and expansion: 'There I was so named, of such a clan, with such an appearance, such was my nutriment, such my experience of pleasure and pain, such my life-term; and passing away from there, I reappeared elsewhere; and there too I was so named, of such a clan, with such an appearance, such was my nutriment, such my experience of pleasure and pain, such my life-term; and passing away from there, I reappeared here.' Thus with their aspects and particulars he recollects his manifold past lives. That too is a Tathagata's power....

18. (9) "Again, with the divine eye, which is purified and surpasses the human, the Tathagata sees beings passing away and reappearing, inferior and superior, fair and ugly, fortunate and unfortunate, and he understands how beings pass on according to their actions thus: 'These worthy beings who were ill-conducted in body, speech and mind, revilers of noble ones, wrong in their views, giving effect to wrong view in their actions, on the dissolution of the body, [*p.71] after death, have reappeared in a state of deprivation, in a bad destination, in perdition, even in hell; but these worthy beings who were well-conducted in body, speech and mind, not revilers of noble ones, right in their views, giving effect to right view in their actions, on the dissolution of the body, after death, have reappeared in a good destination, even in the heavenly world.' Thus with the divine eye, which is purified and surpasses the human, he sees beings passing away and reappearing, inferior and superior, fair and ugly, fortunate and unfortunate, and he understands how beings pass on according to their actions. That too is a Tathagata's power....

19. (10) "Again, by realizing it for himself with direct knowledge, the Tathagata here and now enters upon and abides in the deliverance of mind and deliverance by wisdom that are taintless with the destruction of the taints. That too is a Tathagata's power that a Tathagata has, by virtue of which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma.

20. "The Tathagata has these ten Tathagata's powers, possessing which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma.

21. "Sariputta, when I know and see thus, should anyone say of me: 'The recluse Gotama does not have any superhuman states, any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones. The recluse Gotama teaches a Dhamma (merely) hammered out by reasoning, following his own line of inquiry as it occurs to him' -- unless he abandons that assertion and that state of mind and relinquishes that view, then as (surely as if he had been) carried off and put there he will wind up in hell.[13] Just as a bhikkhu possessed of virtue, concentration and wisdom would here and now enjoy final knowledge, so it will happen in this case, I say, that unless he abandons that assertion and that state of mind and relinquishes that view, then as (surely as if he had been) carried off and put there he will wind up in hell.

(Four Kinds of Intrepidity)

22. "Sariputta, the Tathagata has these four kinds of intrepidity, possessing which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma. What are the four?

23. "Here, I see no ground on which any recluse or brahmin or god or Mara or Brahma or anyone at all in the world could, in accordance with the Dhamma, accuse me thus: 'While you claim full enlightenment, you are not fully enlightened in regard to certain things.' [*p.72] And seeing no ground for that, I abide in safety, fearlessness and intrepidity.

24. "I see no ground on which any recluse ... or anyone at all could accuse me thus: 'While you claim to have destroyed the taints, these taints are undestroyed by you.' And seeing no ground for that, I abide in safety, fearlessness and intrepidity.

25. "I see no ground on which any recluse ... or anyone at all could accuse me thus: 'Those things called obstructions by you are not able to obstruct one who engages in them.' And seeing no ground for that, I abide in safety, fearlessness and intrepidity.

26. "I see no ground on which any recluse ... or anyone at all could accuse me thus: 'When you teach the Dhamma to someone, it does not lead him when he practises it to the complete destruction of suffering.' And seeing no ground for that, I abide in safety, fearlessness and intrepidity.

27. "A Tathagata has these four kinds of intrepidity, possessing which he claims the herd-leader's place, roars his lion's roar in the assemblies, and sets rolling the Wheel of Brahma.[14]

28. "Sariputta, when I know and see thus, should anyone say of me ... he will wind up in hell.

(The Eight Assemblies)

29. "Sariputta, there are these eight assemblies. What are the eight? An assembly of nobles, an assembly of brahmins, an assembly of householders, an assembly of recluses, an assembly of gods of the heaven of the Four Great Kings, an assembly of gods of the heaven of the Thirty-three, an assembly of Mara's retinue, an assembly of Brahmas. Possessing these four kinds of intrepidity, the Tathagata approaches and enters these eight assemblies.

30. "I recall having approached many hundred assemblies of nobles ... many hundred assemblies of brahmins ... many hundred assemblies of householders ... many hundred assemblies of recluses ... many hundred assemblies of gods of the heaven of the Four Great Kings ... many hundred assemblies of gods of the heaven of the Thirty-three ... many hundred assemblies of Mara's retinue ... many hundred assemblies of Brahmas. And formerly I had sat with them there and talked with them and held conversations with them, yet I see no ground for thinking that fear or timidity might come upon me there. And seeing no ground for that, I abide in safety, fearlessness and intrepidity. [*p.73]

31. "Sariputta, when I know and see thus, should anyone say of me ... he will wind up in hell.

(Four Kinds of Generation)

32. "Sariputta, there are these four kinds of generation. What are the four? Egg-born generation, womb-born generation, moisture-born generation and spontaneous generation.

33. "What is egg-born generation? There are these beings born by breaking out of the shell of an egg; this is called egg-born generation. What is womb-born generation? There are these beings born by breaking out from the caul; this is called womb-born generation. What is moisture-born generation? There are these beings born in a rotten fish, in a rotten corpse, in rotten dough, in a cesspit, or in a sewer; this is called moisture-born generation. What is spontaneous generation? There are gods and denizens of hell and certain human beings and some beings in the lower worlds; this is called spontaneous generation. These are the four kinds of generation.

34. "Sariputta, when I know and see thus, should anyone say of me ... he will wind up in hell.

(The Five Destinations and Nibbana -- In Brief)

35. "Sariputta, there are these five destinations. What are the five? Hell, the animal realm, the realm of ghosts, human beings and gods.[15]

36. (1) "I understand hell, and the path and way leading to hell. And I also understand how one who has entered this path will, on the dissolution of the body, after death, reappear in a state of deprivation, in an unhappy destination, in perdition, in hell.

(2) "I understand the animal realm, and the path and way leading to the animal realm. And I also understand how one who has entered this path will, on the dissolution of the body, after death, reappear in the animal realm.

(3) "I understand the realm of ghosts, and the path and way leading to the realm of ghosts. And I also understand how one who has entered this path will, on the dissolution of the body, after death, reappear in the realm of ghosts.

(4) "I understand human beings, and the path and way leading to the human world. And I also understand how one who has entered this path will, on the dissolution of the body, after death, reappear among human beings.

(5) "I understand the gods, and the path and way leading to the world of the gods. And I also understand how one who has entered this path will, on the dissolution of the body, after death, reappear in a happy destination, in the heavenly world.

(6) "I understand Nibbana, and the path and way leading to Nibbana. [*p.74] And I also understand how one who has entered this path will, by realizing it for himself with direct knowledge, here and now enter upon and abide in the deliverance of mind and deliverance by wisdom that are taintless with the destruction of the taints.

(The Five Destinations and Nibbana -- In Detail)

37. (1) "By encompassing mind with mind I understand a certain person thus: 'This person so behaves, so conducts himself, has taken such a path that on the dissolution of the body, after death, he will reappear in a state of deprivation, in an unhappy destination, in perdition, in hell.' And then later on, with the divine eye, which is purified and surpasses the human, I see that on the dissolution of the body, after death, he has reappeared in a state of deprivation, in an unhappy destination, in perdition, in hell, and is experiencing extremely painful, racking, piercing feelings. Suppose there were a charcoal pit deeper than a man's height full of glowing coals without flame or smoke; and then a man scorched and exhausted by hot weather, weary, parched and thirsty, came by a path going in one way only and directed to that same charcoal pit. Then a man with good sight on seeing him would say: 'This person so behaves, so conducts himself, has taken such a path, that he will come to this same charcoal pit'; and then later on he sees that he has fallen into that charcoal pit and is experiencing extremely painful, racking, piercing feelings. So too, by encompassing mind with mind ... piercing feelings.

38. (2) "By encompassing mind with mind I understand a certain person thus: 'This person so behaves, so conducts himself, has taken such a path that on the dissolution of the body, after death, he will reappear in the animal realm.' And then later on, with the divine eye, which is purified and surpasses the human, I see that on the dissolution of the body, after death, he has reappeared in the animal realm and is experiencing painful, racking, piercing feelings. Suppose there were a cesspit deeper than a man's height full of filth; and then a man [*p.75] scorched and exhausted by hot weather, weary, parched and thirsty, came by a path going in one way only and directed to that same cesspit. Then a man with good sight on seeing him would say: 'This person so behaves ... that he will come to this same cesspit'; and then later on he sees that he has fallen into that cesspit and is experiencing painful, racking, piercing feelings. So too, by encompassing mind with mind ... piercing feelings.

39. (3) "By encompassing mind with mind I understand a certain person thus: 'This person so behaves, so conducts himself, has taken such a path that on the dissolution of the body, after death, he will reappear in the realm of ghosts.' And then later on ... I see that ... he has reappeared in the realm of ghosts and is experiencing much painful feeling. Suppose there were a tree growing on uneven ground with scanty foliage casting a dappled shade; and then a man scorched and exhausted by hot weather, weary, parched and thirsty, came by a path going in one way only and directed to that same tree. Then a man with good sight on seeing him would say: 'This person so behaves ... that he will come to this same tree'; and then later on he sees that he is sitting or lying in the shade of that tree experiencing much painful feeling. So too, by encompassing mind with mind ... much painful feeling.

40. (4) "By encompassing mind with mind I understand a certain person thus: 'This person so behaves, so conducts himself, has taken such a path that on the dissolution of the body, after death, he will reappear among human beings.' And then later on ... I see that ... he has reappeared among human beings and is experiencing much pleasant feeling. Suppose there were a tree growing on even ground with thick foliage casting a deep shade; and then a man scorched and exhausted by hot weather, weary, parched and thirsty, came by a path going in one way only and directed to that same tree. Then a man with good sight on seeing him would say: 'This person so behaves ... that he will come to this same tree'; and then later on he sees that he is sitting or lying in the shade of that tree experiencing much pleasant feeling. So too, by encompassing mind with mind ... much pleasant feeling [*p.76]

41. (5) "By encompassing mind with mind I understand a certain person thus: 'This person so behaves, so conducts himself, has taken such a path that on the dissolution of the body, after death, he will reappear in a happy destination, in the heavenly world.' And then later on ... I see that ... he has reappeared in a happy destination, in the heavenly world and is experiencing extremely pleasant feelings. Suppose there were a mansion, and it had an upper chamber plastered within and without, shut off, secured by bars, with shuttered windows, and in it there was a couch spread with rugs, blankets and sheets, with a deerskin coverlet, with a canopy as well as crimson pillows for both (head and feet); and then a man scorched and exhausted by hot weather, weary, parched and thirsty, came by a path going in one way only and directed to that same mansion. Then a man with good sight on seeing him would say: 'This person so behaves ... that he will come to this same mansion'; and later on he sees that he is sitting or lying in that upper chamber in that mansion experiencing extremely pleasant feelings. So too, by encompassing mind with mind ... extremely pleasant feelings.

42. (6) "By encompassing mind with mind I understand a certain person thus: 'This person so behaves, so conducts himself, has taken such a path that by realizing it for himself with direct knowledge, he here and now will enter upon and abide in the deliverance of mind and deliverance by wisdom that are taintless with the destruction of the taints.' And then later on I see that by realizing it for himself with direct knowledge, he here and now enters upon and abides in the deliverance of mind and deliverance by wisdom that are taintless with the destruction of the taints, and is experiencing extremely pleasant feelings.[16] Suppose there were a pond with clean, agreeable, cool water, transparent, with smooth banks, delightful, and nearby a dense wood; and then a man scorched and exhausted by hot weather, weary, parched and thirsty, came by a path going in one way only and directed towards that same pond. Then a man with good sight on seeing him would say: 'This person so behaves ... that he will come to this same pond'; and then later on he sees that he has plunged into the pond, bathed, drunk and relieved all his distress, fatigue and fever and has come out again and is sitting or lying in the wood [*p.77] experiencing extremely pleasant feelings. So too, by encompassing mind with mind ... extremely pleasant feelings. These are the five destinations.

43. "Sariputta, when I know and see thus, should anyone say of me: 'The recluse Gotama does not have any superhuman states, any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones. The recluse Gotama teaches a Dhamma (merely) hammered out by reasoning, following his own line of inquiry as it occurs to him' -- unless he abandons that assertion and that state of mind and relinquishes that view, then as (surely as if he had been) carried off and put there he will wind up in hell. Just as a bhikkhu possessed of virtue, concentration and wisdom would here and now enjoy final knowledge, so it will happen in this case, I say, that unless he abandons that assertion and that state of mind and relinquishes that view, then as (surely as if he had been) carried off and put there he will wind up in hell.

(The Bodhisatta's Austerities)

44. "Sariputta, I recall having lived a holy life possessing four factors. I have practised asceticism -- the extreme of asceticism; I have practised coarseness -- the extreme of coarseness; I have practised scrupulousness -- the extreme of scrupulousness; I have practised seclusion -- the extreme of seclusion.[17]

45. "Such was my asceticism, Sariputta, that I went naked, rejecting conventions, licking my hands, not coming when asked, not stopping when asked; I did not accept food brought or food specially made or an invitation to a meal; I received nothing from a pot, from a bowl, across a threshold, across a stick, across a pestle, from two eating together, from a pregnant woman, from a woman giving suck, from a woman lying with a man, from where food was advertised to be distributed, from where a dog was waiting, from where flies were buzzing; I accepted no fish or meat, I drank no liquor, wine or fermented brew. I kept to one house, to one morsel; I kept to two [*p.78] houses, to two morsels; ... I kept to seven houses, to seven morsels. I lived on one saucerful a day, on two saucerfuls a day ... on seven saucerfuls a day; I took food once a day, once every two days ... once every seven days, and so on up to once every fortnight; I dwelt pursuing the practice of taking food at stated intervals. I was an eater of greens or millet or wild rice or hide-parings or moss or ricebran or rice-scum or sesamum flour or grass or cowdung. I lived on forest roots and fruits, I fed on fallen fruits. I clothed myself in hemp, in hemp-mixed cloth, in shrouds, in refuse rags, in tree bark, in antelope hide, in strips of antelope hide, in kusa-grass fabric, in bark fabric, in wood-shavings fabric, in head-hair wool, in animal wool, in owls' wings. I was one who pulled out hair and beard, pursuing the practice of pulling out hair and beard. I was one who stood continuously, rejecting seats. I was one who squatted continuously, devoted to maintaining the squatting position. I was one who used a mattress of spikes; I made a mattress of spikes my bed. I dwelt pursuing the practice of bathing in water three times daily including the evening. Thus in such a variety of ways I dwelt pursuing the practice of tormenting and mortifying the body. Such was my asceticism.

46. "Such was my coarseness, Sariputta, that just as the bole of a tinduka tree, accumulating over the years, cakes and flakes off, so too, dust and dirt, accumulating over the years, caked off my body and flaked off. It never occurred to me: 'Oh, let me rub this dust and dirt off with my hand, or let another rub this dust and dirt off with his hand' -- it never occurred to me thus. Such was my coarseness.

47. "Such was my scrupulousness, Sariputta, that I was always mindful in stepping forwards and stepping backwards. I was full of pity even for (the beings in) a drop of water thus: 'Let me not hurt the tiny creatures in the crevices of the ground.' Such was my scrupulousness.

48. "Such was my seclusion, Sariputta, that [*p.79] I would plunge into some forest and dwell there. And when I saw a cowherd or a shepherd or someone gathering grass or sticks, or a woodsman, I would flee from grove to grove, from thicket to thicket, from hollow to hollow, from hillock to hillock. Why was that? So that they should not see me or I see them. Just as a forest-bred deer, on seeing human beings, flees from grove to grove, from thicket to thicket, from hollow to hollow, from hillock to hillock, so too, when I saw a cowherd or a shepherd ... Such was my seclusion.

49. "I would go on all fours to the cow-pens when the cattle had gone out and the cowherd had left them, and I would feed on the dung of the young suckling calves. As long as my own excrement and urine lasted, I fed on my own excrement and urine. Such was my great distortion in feeding.

50. "I would plunge into some awe-inspiring grove and dwell there -- a grove so awe-inspiring that normally it would make a man's hair stand up if he were not free from lust. When those cold wintry nights came during the 'eight-days interval of frost,' I would dwell by night in the open and by day in the grove.[18] In the last month of the hot season I would dwell by day in the open and by night in the grove. And there came to me spontaneously this stanza never heard before:

> Chilled by night and scorched by day,
> Alone in awe-inspiring groves,
> Naked, no fire to sit beside,
> The sage yet pursues his quest.

51. "I would make my bed in a charnel ground with the bones of the dead for a pillow. And cowherd boys came up and spat on me, urinated on me, threw dirt at me, and poked sticks into my ears. Yet I do not recall that I ever aroused an evil mind (of hate) against them. Such was my abiding in equanimity. [*p.80]

52. "Sariputta, there are certain recluses and brahmins whose doctrine and view is this: 'Purification comes about through food.'[19] They say: 'Let us live on kola-fruits,' and they eat kola-fruits, they eat kola-fruit powder, they drink kola-fruit water, and they make many kinds of kola-fruit concoctions. Now I recall having eaten a single kola-fruit a day. Sariputta, you may think that the kola-fruit was bigger at that time, yet you should not regard it so: the kola-fruit was then at most the same size as now. Through feeding on a single kola-fruit a day, my body reached a state of extreme emaciation. Because of eating so little my limbs became like the jointed segments of vine stems or bamboo stems. Because of eating so little my backside became like a camel's hoof. Because of eating so little the projections on my spine stood forth like corded beads. Because of eating so little my ribs jutted out as gaunt as the crazy rafters of an old roofless barn. Because of eating so little the gleam of my eyes sank far down in their sockets, looking like a gleam of water which has sunk far down in a deep well. Because of eating so little my scalp shrivelled and withered as a green bitter gourd shrivels and withers in the wind and sun. Because of eating so little my belly skin adhered to my backbone; thus if I touched my belly skin I encountered my backbone, and if I touched my backbone I encountered my belly skin. Because of eating so little, if I tried to ease my body by rubbing my limbs with my hands, the hair, rotted at its roots, fell from my body as I rubbed.

53-55. "Sariputta, there are certain recluses and brahmins whose doctrine and view is this: 'Purification comes about through food.' They say: 'Let us live on beans' ... 'Let us live on sesamum' ... 'Let us live on rice,' and they eat rice, they eat rice powder, [*p.81] they drink rice water, and they make various kinds of rice concoctions. Now I recall having eaten a single rice grain a day.

Sariputta, you may think that the rice grain was bigger at that time, yet you should not regard it so: the rice grain was then at most the same size as now. Through feeding on a single rice grain a day, my body reached a state of extreme emaciation. Because of eating so little ... the hair, rotted at its roots, fell from my body as I rubbed.

56. "Yet, Sariputta, by such conduct, by such practice, by such performance of austerities, I did not attain any superhuman states, any distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones. Why was that? Because I did not attain that noble wisdom which when attained is noble and emancipating and leads the one who practises in accordance with it to the complete destruction of suffering.

57. "Sariputta, there are certain recluses and brahmins whose doctrine and view is this: 'Purification comes about through the round of rebirths.' But it is impossible to find a realm in the round that I have not already [*p.82] passed through in this long journey, except for the gods of the Pure Abodes; and had I passed through the round as a god in the Pure Abodes, I would never have returned to this world.[20]

58. "There are certain recluses and brahmins whose doctrine and view is this: 'Purification comes about through (some particular kind of) rebirth.' But it is impossible to find a kind of rebirth that I have not been reborn in already in this long journey, except for the gods of the Pure Abodes....

59. "There are certain recluses and brahmins whose doctrine and view is this: 'Purification comes about through (some particular) abode.' But it is impossible to find a kind of abode that I have not already dwelt in ... except for the gods of the Pure Abodes....

60. "There are certain recluses and brahmins whose doctrine and view is this: 'Purification comes about through sacrifice.' But it is impossible to find a kind of sacrifice that has not already been offered up by me in this long journey, when I was either a head-anointed noble king or a well-to-do-brahmin.

61. "There are certain recluses and brahmins whose doctrine and view is this: 'Purification comes about through fire-worship.' But it is impossible to find a kind of fire that has not already been worshipped by me in this long journey, when I was either a head-anointed noble king or a well-to-do brahmin.

62. "Sariputta, there are certain recluses and brahmins whose doctrine and view is this: 'As long as this good man is still young, a black-haired young man endowed with the blessing of youth, in the prime of life, so long is he perfect in his lucid wisdom. But when this good man is old, aged, burdened with years, advanced in life, and come to the last stage, being eighty, ninety or a hundred years old, then the lucidity of his wisdom is lost.' But it should not be regarded so. I am now old, aged, burdened with years, advanced in life, and come to the last stage: my years have turned eighty. Now suppose that I had four disciples with a hundred years' lifespan, perfect in mindfulness, retentiveness, memory and lucidity of wisdom.[21] Just as a skilled archer, trained, practised and tested, could easily shoot a light arrow across the shadow of a palm tree, suppose that they were even to that extent perfect in mindfulness, retentiveness, [*p.83] memory and lucidity of wisdom. Suppose that they continuously asked me about the four foundations of mindfulness and that I answered them when asked and that they remembered each answer of mine and never asked a subsidiary question or paused except to eat, drink, consume food, taste, urinate, defecate and rest in order to remove sleepiness and tiredness. Still the Tathagata's exposition of the Dhamma, his explanations of factors of the Dhamma, and his replies to questions would not yet come to an end, but meanwhile those four disciples of mine with their hundred years' lifespan would have died at the end of those hundred years. Sariputta, even if you have to carry me about on a bed, still there will be no change in the lucidity of the Tathagata's wisdom.

63. "Rightly speaking, were it to be said of anyone: 'A being not subject to delusion has appeared in the world for the welfare and happiness of many, out of compassion for the world, for the good, welfare and happiness of gods and humans,' it is of me indeed that rightly speaking this should be said."

64. Now on that occasion the Venerable Nagasamala was standing behind the Blessed One fanning him.[22] Then he said to the Blessed One: "It is wonderful, venerable sir, it is marvellous! As I listened to this discourse on the Dhamma, the hairs of my body stood up. Venerable sir, what is the name of this discourse on the Dhamma?"

"As to that, Nagasamala, you may remember this discourse on the Dhamma as 'The Hair-raising Discourse.' "[23]

That is what the Blessed One said. The Venerable Nagasamala was satisfied and delighted in the Blessed One's words.

* * * * * * *

Notes

1. The story of Sunakkhatta's defection is found in the Patika Sutta (DN 24). He became dissatisfied with the Buddha and left the Order because the Buddha would not perform miracles for him or explain to him the beginning of things. He also showed great admiration for those who engaged in self-mortification, and probably resented the Buddha for emphasizing a "middle way" that condemned such extreme austerities as unprofitable.

2. Superhuman states (//uttari manussadhamma//) are states, virtues or attainments higher than the ordinary human virtues comprised in the ten wholesome courses of action; they include the jhanas, direct knowledges (//abhinna//), the paths and the fruits. "Distinction in knowledge and vision worthy of the noble ones" (//alamariyanana-dassanavisesa)//, an expression frequently occurring in the suttas, signifies all higher degrees of meditative knowledge characteristic of the noble individual. In the present context, according to Comy., it means specifically the supramundane path, which Sunakkhatta is thus denying of the Buddha.

3. The thrust of his criticism is that the Buddha teaches a doctrine that he has merely worked out in thought rather than one he has realized through transcendental wisdom. Apparently, Sunakkhatta believes that being led to the complete destruction of suffering is, as a goal, inferior to the acquisition of miraculous powers.

4. All the sections to follow are intended as a rebuttal of Sunakkhatta's charge against the Buddha. Sections 6-8 cover the first three of the six direct knowledges, the last three appearing as the last of the ten powers of the Tathagata. The latter, according to Comy., are to be understood as powers of knowledge (//nanabala//) that are acquired by all Buddhas as the outcome of their accumulations of merit. The Vibhanga of the Abhidhamma Pitaka provides an elaborate analysis of them, the gist of which will be discussed in subsequent notes.

5. Comy.: The Wheel of Brahma (//brahmacakka//) is the supreme, best, most excellent wheel, the Wheel of the Dhamma (//dhammacakka//). This has two aspects: the knowledge of penetration (//pativedhanana//) and the knowledge of teaching (//desananana//). The knowledge of penetration, by which the Buddha penetrates the truth of the Dhamma, is produced from wisdom and leads to the attainment of the noble fruit for himself; the knowledge of teaching, by which the Buddha is qualified to expound the Dhamma perfectly to others, is produced from compassion and leads others to the attainment of the noble fruit.

6. Comy. glosses //thana// as cause or ground (//karana//) and explains: "Such and such dhammas are causes (//hetu//), conditions (//paccaya//), for the arising of such and such dhammas: that is //thana.// Such and such dhammas are not causes, not conditions, for the arising of such and such dhammas: that is //atthana//. Knowing that, he understands //thana// as //thana// and //atthana// as //atthana// (i.e. causal occasion as causal occasion, and non-causal occasion as non-causal occasion//)." Comy. also refers to the different explanation in the Vibhanga, apparently regarding both explanations as acceptable.

Vbh. Section 809 explains this knowledge with reference to MN 115 as the Buddha's knowledge of what is possible and what is impossible, e.g. it is impossible that a person possessed of right view should regard any formations as permanent or as pleasurable, or anything whatever as self, while it is possible that a worldling will regard things in such an erroneous way. It is impossible for a person possessed of right view to commit the five heinous crimes (matricide, parricide, the murder of an Arahant, the wounding of a Buddha, causing a schism in the Sangha), while it is possible for a worldling to commit such crimes, etc. etc.

7. Vbh. Section 810: "Herein, the Tathagata comprehends that there are some evil actions performed which do not mature because they are prevented from maturing by a fortunate rebirth, a fortunate body, a fortunate time, a fortunate effort, while there are some evil actions performed which mature because of an unfortunate rebirth, etc. There are some good actions which do not mature because of an unfortunate rebirth, etc., while there are some good actions which mature because of a fortunate rebirth, etc." (condensed).

8. Vbh. Section 811: "Herein, the Tathagata comprehends thus: 'This is the path, this is the practice leading to hell, to the animal realm, to the plane of ghosts, to the human realm, to the realm of the gods, to deliverance.' " This knowledge will be elaborated upon below in Sections 35-42.

9. Vbh. Section 812: "The Tathagata comprehends the different aggregates, the different sense bases, the different elements; he comprehends the different worlds that have many elements, different elements."

10. Vbh. Section 813: "The Tathagata understands that beings are of inferior inclinations and superior inclinations, and that they gravitate towards those who share their own inclinations" (condensed).

11. Vbh. Sections 814-27 gives a detailed analysis. Comy. states the meaning more concisely as the Tathagata's knowledge of the superiority and inferiority of beings' faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom.

12. Vbh. Section 828: "The defilement (//sankilesa//) is a state partaking of deterioration; cleansing (//vodana//) is a state partaking of distinction; emergence (//vutthana//) is both cleansing and the rising out of an attainment. The eight liberations (//vimokkha//) are enumerated, e.g. at DN 15/ii,70-71, and comprise three liberations pertaining to the realm of material form, the four immaterial attainments, and the cessation of perception and feeling. The nine attainments (//samapatti//) are the four jhanas, the four immaterial attainments, and cessation.

13. The idiom //yathabhatam nikkhitto evam niraye// is knotty; the rendering here follows the gloss of Comy.: "He will be put in hell as if carried off and put there by the wardens of hell." Although such a fate may sound excessively severe merely for verbal denigration, it should be remembered that he is maligning a Fully Enlightened Buddha with a mind of hatred, and his intention in so doing is to discourage others from entering upon the path that could lead them to complete liberation from suffering.

14. The four kinds of intrepidity (//vesarajja//: also rendered "grounds of self-confidence") may be divided into two pairs. The first pair relates mainly to the internal qualities of the Buddha, his achievement of personal perfection, while the second pair has an outward orientation, being concerned primarily with his qualifications as a teacher. The first intrepidity confirms his attainment of supreme enlightenment and the removal of all obscuration regarding the range of what may be known; it points to the Buddha's acquisition of omniscience (//sabbannutanana//). The second underlines his complete purity through the destruction of all defilements; it points to his achievement of the fruit of Arahantship. The third means that the Buddha's understanding of obstructions to the goal is unimpeachable, while the fourth confirms the efficacy of the Dhamma in accomplishing its intended purpose, namely, leading the practitioner to complete release from suffering.

15. In later Buddhist tradition the //asuras//, titans or "anti-gods," are added as a separate realm to make the "six destinations" familiar from the Tibetan Wheel of Life.

16. Comy.: Even though the description is the same as that of the bliss of the heavenly world, the meaning is different. For the bliss of the heavenly world is not really extremely pleasant because the fevers of lust, etc. are still present there. But the bliss of Nibbana is extremely pleasant in every way through the subsiding of all fevers.

17. Comy. explains that at this juncture the Buddha related this account of his past ascetic practices because Sunakkhatta was a great admirer of extreme asceticism (as is clear from the Patika Sutta) and the Buddha wanted to make it known that there was no one who could equal him in the practice of austerities. Sections 44-56 apparently deal with the Bodhisatta's striving during the six years' period of austerities in his last existence, while Sections 57-61 refer back to his previous existences as a seeker of enlightenment.

18. The "eight-days' interval of frost" is a regular cold spell which occurs in South Asia in late December or early January.

19. That is, they hold the view that beings are purified by reducing their intake of food.

20. Rebirth into the Pure Abodes (//suddhavasa//) is possible only for non-returners.

21. The Pali for the four terms is: //sati//, //gati//, //dhiti//, //pannaveyyattiya//. Comy. explains //sati// as the ability to grasp in mind a hundred or a thousand phrases as they are being spoken; //gati//, the ability to bind them and retain them in the mind; //dhiti,// the ability to recite back what has been grasped and retained; and //pannaveyyattiya,// the ability to discern the meaning and logic of those phrases.

22. The Venerable Nagasamala had been a personal attendant of the Buddha during the first twenty years of his ministry.

23. //Lomahamsanapariyaya//. The sutta is referred to by that name at //Milindapanha//, p. 398, and in the commentary to the Digha Nikaya.

* * * * * * *

ÉÍÍÍ

mind-tools to encourage mindfulness may be used in collaboration with a counsellor/therapist as well as in solitary practice. With mindfulness a bereaved person can more effectively acknowledge the reality of loss and allow the pain of grief to manifest without further complication. If the pain is experienced without undue reaction, the undermining effect and manifestation of grief can be resolved and the bereaved person can function relatively free from impediment.

Grief is a common emotion that human beings experience when they are parted from that to which they are attached. Its effect can be painful and debilitating. Probably the most debilitating type of grief occurs when a loved one dies. If the grief is not dealt with effectively the grief can become pathological and create a situation where the bereaved person is unable to function in the world adequately. Bowlby (according to Worden, 1982) argues that attachment is developed in animals (humans included) because it has a survival value. If attachment is natural, then it is also 'natural' to grieve. "The pain of grief is just as much a part of life as the joy of love; it is, perhaps, the price we pay for love, the cost of commitment" (Parkes according to Kalish, 1985, p182). The resolution of grief can be accomplished by developing mindfulness. The practice of mindfulness (also called satipatthana) emphasises being aware and surrendering to the natural and present moment conditions of mind and body. This is primarily a Theravadin Buddhist approach. However, elements of its practice can be found within common task oriented and supportive grief counselling techniques as well as some modern psychotherapies.

If grief is dealt with effectively it can become a tool for the development of great insight. If on the other hand it is dealt with unskilfully it could initiate a whole chain of chronic dysfunction, confusion, depression, avoidance behaviours and general unhappiness. The complications of the grief reaction are many. However in the manifestation of a normal grief there are many common types of reaction (Worden, 1982). There can be feelings such as sadness, anger, guilt, anxiety, loneliness, shock, yearning, numbness, helplessness etc; physical sensations which include fatigue, tightness in the chest, a dry mouth, a hollow feeling in the stomach, tightness in the throat and more; various thoughts that can lead to depression, obsessions, confusion or even hallucinations; and behaviours such as disturbed sleep, social withdrawal, crying, neurotic responses to old possessions and memories, absent-mindedness, searching and calling out, restless overactivity and so on.

Parkes (according to Kalish, 1985) suggests four stages of grief: numbness, pining, depression and recovery, while Averill (according to Kalish, 1985) three: shock, despair and recovery. Worden (1982) on the other hand, encourages a more active approach by specifying various tasks that must be accomplished before grief can be resolved. The four tasks that Worden (1982) claims are necessary are:

Task 1: Accept the reality of the loss;
Task 2: Experience the pain of the grief;
Task 3: Adjust to an environment in which the deceased is missing;
Task 4: Withdraw emotional energy from the deceased and reinvest it in other social activity without uncertainty or guilt.

The goal of the counsellor/therapist is to encourage the completion of these tasks. Neither the phase nor the task models should be considered as invariable patterns. They are, however, useful guidelines that may be used when appropriate.

Counselling can be used for the 'natural' grieving process. However when the resolution of the grieving process becomes complicated, Worden (1982) recommends grief therapy. Grief therapy is used when the grief is excessively prolonged, exaggerated, creating somatic reactions or in some other way influencing a subconscious or even conscious impediment in an individual's normal functioning. Though the initial effects of a death or other shock may in many cases pass in a few days, the 'pangs' of grief may continue for many months or even indefinitely. "Even if your loved ones are still alive, there is a place within of disappointment and loss because we live in a world where everything changes....Whatever you want, the more you want it, the more there is a kind of grief, a sickness, a hollowness in the pit of the stomach.....Grief comes from trying to protect anything from being what it is. From trying to stop the change." (Levine, 1982 p97.) It seems then that most people are candidates for both grief counselling and grief therapy.

If one considers Worden's (1982) tasks various themes become evident. Within these themes there are elements of the necessity to acknowledge the loss, be honest, aware, "let go" and function adequately on all levels of personal care and social interaction. Whether one is assisted by a therapist, clergy, family or other, eventually the onus must come back to the individual, as another person can only act as a catalyst to awaken a subjective awareness and resolution to whatever dilemma may exist.

2500 years ago the Buddha (according to De Silva, 1984), used a performance-based technique to help a bereaved woman accept the reality of her child's death. The woman's child died not long after it could walk, and in a distressed state the woman wandered the streets for days with the child in her arms asking everyone for a medicine to save her child. The Buddha seeing her behaviour told her that he knew of a medicine to help her but first she had to collect a handful of mustard seeds, each one from a house that had not seen death. As she went from house to house unable to collect the seeds she realized that death, in general and the death of her child in particular, was a reality. Through insight she discarded her irrational behaviour. De Silva (1984) compared this technique to Ellis's rational-emotive therapy. A common performance based technique used to help the bereaved accept the reality of a loved one's death is that of encouraging the survivor to see the body. Barbara Walsh (1987) claimed that research has shown that when a body is viewed it assists the bereaved to deal with the reality. Barbara Walsh pointed out though that one should be sensitive to the way that this is done. One should not for example say, "Would you like to see the body?" but instead say something like "I think it would help if you said goodbye to ...".

Other techniques can be less performance based and more introspective, as it is the eventual 'internal' resolutions that will heal external manifestations and behaviours. One such technique or therapy could be that of mindfulness or 'satipatthana' which has been used in the Theravadin Buddhist tradition. 'Sati' means awareness and 'patthana' means keeping present. The Buddha claimed (according to Nyanaponika Thera, 1962) that there was only one way to overcome grief, and that was with mindfulness. To one who knows nothing of 'satipatthana' this could seem like a sweeping statement. However if one investigates the dynamics of this therapy-practice, one may begin to see how most aspects of modern psychotherapy and counselling incorporate aspects of mindfulness, and how Worden's four tasks can be accomplished using mindfulness. There are four foundations of mindfulness. These are body, feelings, mind states and mind objects (according to Nyanaponika, 1962).

The goal is to clearly perceive and pay attention to, in an objective manner, the arising and passing away of all conditions of mind and body. Eventually insight into their transient and insubstantial nature arises and one is no longer at conflict with their changing nature. Mindfulness of body includes amongst other aspects, being aware of postures, somatic sensations and the breath. Mindfulness of feelings is not regarded as mindfulness of the emotions as such but more being attentive to the qualities of pleasantness, unpleasantness or neutrality that arises in the mind in relationship to physical sensations or mental processes. Mindfulness of mind states refers to being aware of the states of mind that may colour the mind, such as a distracted mind, a happy mind, an angry mind, a guilty mind and so on. Mindfulness of mental objects refers to being aware of the content of mind such as thoughts, and being aware of how they condition both physical and mental processes. The theme behind mindfulness is to honestly relate with whatever arises as it arises. The aim to perceive and acknowledge the reality of any situation in a present moment context. The benefits of 'satipatthana' are based on the development of insight.

Traditionally a practitioner of 'satipatthana' decides upon an object of meditation or mindfulness and when the mind becomes distracted from that object the distraction is acknowledged and the person returns to the original object. If the distraction becomes overwhelming the distraction then becomes the object of meditation and non-intellectual investigation. During life one's mind and body undergoes continual change. Mindfulness can be facilitated with the manifestation of both the acute reactions of what Worden (1982) called normal grieving as well as dealing with complicated grieving reactions that may seem pathological. There are many mind tools that can be used to develop mindfulness.

One tool is that of labelling the object of mindfulness with a name. This serves to concentrate the mind as well as clarify and objectify the condition. The rising and falling of the abdomen is usually labelled "rising, falling", thoughts of the past "remembering", the future "planning". Other simple tendencies are labelled accordingly such as "anger", "worrying", "sadness", "brushing" for brushing one's teeth and so on.

Another such tool is developing what Deatherage (1982) called "the watcher self". "The watcher self can see the remembering of some painful event and label it objectively without becoming involved in its melodrama. The watcher can therefore put psychological distance between the "me" who experiences the painful event and the "me" who is presently remembering it." (Deatherage, 1982, p22). The aim of the watcher self is not to strengthen the ego but "The watcher self is used only as a tool for grounding some of the patient's mental energies in the present, providing a temporary, psychological stable centre for them to operate from and providing a perspective from which their own psychological functioning can be objectively observed." (Deatherage, 1982, p25)

As aspects of the physical, cognitive and behavioural manifestations of depression, anxiety and obsessive behaviour are similar to the normal and abnormal grieving processes, successful techniques applied to the former could also be applied to the latter. Deatherage (1982) has cited how the 'satipatthana' method has been successfully applied in a clinical setting. In one case a divorced woman would have bouts of depression and anxiety when she remembered her ex-husbands bizarre sexual demands. She was trained to label her thoughts as "remembering, remembering", and within a few days she could see the causal relationship between the thoughts and the anxiety and depression. Another woman who was hospitalised for manic-depression and schizophrenia, was instructed to watch the second hand of a clock and when her mind went off the clock to name the distraction. Soon she realized that most of her distractions were related to the past. She was then instructed to label them as "remembering, remembering". With this technique "she learned to identify herself with the objective watcher of her disturbing thoughts instead of the depressed thinker." (Deatherage, 1982, p24). Soon she began to gain insight into the nature of her illness and was released from hospital. Another woman who was hospitalised for anxiety, depression and inability to function adequately, rebelled against any suggestion of introspection, and as she was a Mormon the word 'Buddhist' or 'meditation' was not mentioned. As the therapist interacted with her it became evident that much of her day was spent fantasizing and imagining to avoid the anxiety of her life. The habit of fantasizing was discussed with her, and then she was asked to undertake a "psychological procedure". To her surprise she was asked to bake a cake. However, she had to do it extremely mindfully with minute attention to detail. When the persistent fantasies would arise she was instructed to just observe them. After a while she found that she could intentionally return to the present moment and so function more adequately. She also began to gain insight into the nature of her anxiety and depression.

Mindfulness training therefore develops a space between life's events and the ego's reaction to those events. Eventually tools such as the labelling or the "watcher self" can be discarded and it is possible to totally immerse oneself in whatever one is doing, whether it is observing the breath, washing the dishes or solving an occupational problem.

Everyone is different and so have different physical and psychological manifestations while grieving or suffering the effect of an unresolved grieving process. If one is aware, grief can become a tool for an awakening to greater understanding and insight into the truth of life. Levine (1982) claims that when someone we love dies it is almost like an initiation into insight. As one experiences the intensity of physical and emotional anguish, it becomes so intense that there is no way to avoid the raw experience of human pain. Levine (1982) related a story of a woman who lost her 3 year old child in a surfing accident. Three days after the child went missing the woman was contacted to identify the half-eaten washed-up body. The identification, said the mother, was the most profound and enlightening experience of her life, as intense pain and love were felt simultaneously.

It seems that the more one can remain 'open' and mindfully experience the pain of grief (Worden's 2nd task), the greater possibility of effectively processing and overcoming its effects. If one has previously practised satipatthana, it can be extremely useful at the time of bereavement. If one is mindful there is less tendency to delay the inevitable task of accepting the reality of a death (Worden's 1st task), and experiencing its pain (Worden's 2nd task). The more one avoids these tasks, the greater is the tendency to experience disturbing emotions, thoughts, physical sensations and develop avoidance behaviour. If one has accomplished Worden's (1982) first two tasks, the last two are a natural progression as the manifestation of grief do not overly influence and undermine an appropriate and normal relationship with life, and the person is (relatively) free.

The 'satipatthana' technique is a client-centred approach and so gives the bereaved the freedom and dignity to work by themselves without being overly influenced by a counsellor/therapist's expectations or preordained pattern of what 'should' happen. 'Satipatthana', however, is not always suitable for everyone, nor is its solitary introspection techniques appropriate at all times. The grieving process can be extremely overwhelming or complicated. There are times of course when a bereaved person needs close contact and support of a counsellor/therapist. The support person could act as a source of strength, compassion, insight or merely help reflect the bereaved's situation, and so even when the awareness seems to be externalised the process of 'satipatthana' can be utilised.

Rogerian techniques incorporate 'empathetic listening' and non-judgemental reflection, and so the acceptance, recognition and clarification of mind-body conditions have a healing effect. Worden (1982) claims that repeated verbalisation about the event helps bring home the reality of the situation. Whilst Kollar (according to Kalish, 1984) says that 3 out of 16 important points to follow in helping the bereaved are to "14 listen, 15 listen" and "16 listen" (Kalish, 1984 p271).

In accordance with the 'satipatthana' approach and the completion of Worden's tasks, Gestalt therapy (Davison and Neale, 1974) encourages: being concerned with the present rather than the past or the future, dealing with what appears rather than what is absent, experiencing things rather than imagining them, feeling rather than thinking, expressing feelings rather than justifying or explaining them, being aware of pain as well as pleasure and surrendering to the kind of person one is.

With bereavement counselling Worden (1982) praises the use of the 'open chair' technique of Gestalt therapy, and the role playing technique of psychodrama to resolve unfinished business that may cause various undermining effects such as guilt or anger. Even body therapies can be useful. A simple massage can trigger off many unresolved feelings or unacknowledged emotions. Levine (1982) has written a guided grief meditation-massage used to become aware and surrender to the physical and emotional pain that may be felt in the area of the heart. (refer to Appendix 1).

Traditionally, when using a 'satipatthana' technique a teacher often encourages a student to centre their awareness on bodily sensations as this is a more tangible and less confusing object of awareness. When one is experiencing the overwhelming effect of bereavement, in addition to the multitude of thoughts and mental states, strong physical sensations also appear (according to Lindemann in Kalish, 1985) and seem to be a reflection of and synonymous with mental counterparts. Worden's (1982) second task is to feel the pain of loss. When a bereaved person is undergoing a difficult time he/she could be encouraged to pay more attention to what it feels like as opposed to just being aware of cognitions or theoretical solutions to the situation. A person may for example have memories of his/her loved one, which creates sadness and tight feelings in their chest. Firstly they could label "remembering", then "sadness", then "tightness" and pay full attention to the physical sensations while allowing the corresponding mental melodrama to run its course. If one opens up to the physical sensations the non-intellectual awareness/investigation often serves as a means to process the present mental and physical dilemma, as well as a means to pry open suppressed pain and conflict from the past. Often what may start as a minor sensation can be like the tip of an iceberg which eventually becomes exposed. Often a therapist can assist the bereaved by actively asking her/him to describe the sensations, its dimensions, where it is, its shape or quality, whether it changes and so on. With the passive support of the therapist a bereaved person is often able to go right to the centre of the pain. If one is encouraged to experience the pain she/he begins to gain a different perspective about it. The pain is accepted and eventually passes, and likewise the conflict with it and its mental and behavioural counterparts.

Grief is a natural reaction to loss. Its effect can be painful and debilitating. If one is to overcome the effects of grief one must accept the reality of the situation and experience whatever pain may arise. If one delays the inevitable necessities of the 'natural' grieving process, one merely prolongs the suffering and one's open relationship with life is undermined. If one is aware (mindful) the natural process of grief can be facilitated and if complications arise they can be dealt with in an efficient manner. Awareness can be facilitated by performing various learning tasks, introspection or expression. As this is done it eventually becomes evident that the subjective experience of grief cannot be resolved by anyone other than the experiencer. The resolution comes from both an active attention-investigation and a passive surrender.

ÄÄÄ

Deatherage, O.G., Buddhism in Psychotherapy, The Wheel Publications 290/291, Buddhist Publication Society, 1982.

< End of File ***>

==========
Published in //The Middle Way//, Vol. 65, no 65, no 3 (Nov. 1990), pp. 155-159.
Also Published in the Vipassana Newsletter Vol.7 no 3, October 1990.
Also Published in //Buddhism as a way of life and other essays//, Dhamma Texts Series 4, by the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust U.K., 1993.
==========

THE TWO GUARDIANS OF THE WORLD:
A Sense of Shame, a Fear of Blame (//hiri-ottappa//)

Hirinisedho puriso koci lokasmi vijjati
Yo niddam apabodheti asso bhadro kasam iva.

Aso yatha bhadro kasanivittho atapino samvegino bhavatha.
Saddhaya silena ca viriyena ca samamina dhammavinicchayena ca Sampannavijjacarana patissata jatissatha dukkham idam anappakam.

Whoever is restrained in this world by a sense of shame, that person wakes up from sleep like a thoroughbred horse (woken) by a whip.

Be zealous, with a sense of urgency, like a thoroughbred horse touched by a whip. Mindful (//patissata//), endowed with (right) knowledge and conduct, give up this mass of suffering (//dukkha//) through faith (//saddha//), virtue (//sila//), energy (//viriya//), concentration (//samadhi//), and discerning the Doctrine.

Dhammapada, vv. 143, 144

In the discourse entitled "The Lion's Roar on the Turning of the Wheel,"[1] the Buddha told an assembly of bhikkhus about how the world declines due to immorality. He explained that seven Universal Monarchs, Dahanemi and his successors, lived according to the true doctrine of the Dhamma. But eventually there was a king who did not ask his predecessor to give him advice on how to govern. He ruled according to his own opinion, and the people were not as prosperous as before.

This king was advised not to use his own ideas but to govern according to the noble tradition of kings of the past. He accepted the advice he was given, but he was not generous. As a result, poverty became widespread. This led to theft. When the king had a thief's head cut off, thieves began to use arms and kill their victims. As immorality grew, the people did not live as long as before and they were uglier.

A succession of generations gradually became more and more immoral and lived for shorter and shorter lengths of time. People began to use slander and to tell lies. Ugly people began to covet those who were still beautiful and adultery became common. Abusive speech and idle talk were widespread. Next, wrong beliefs increased. Then incest, greed, and deviant practices grew. People no longer had respect for their parents, their civic leaders, or their religious leaders. At this point, the human life span had decreased from eighty thousand years to one hundred years. This was the life span during the Buddha's time according to the Pali texts. Eventually, the Buddha told the bhikkhus, the human life span will decrease to ten years. Even the word "morality" will disappear.

At that time, people will live in promiscuity, like goats and sheep, fowls and swine, dogs and jackals. Members of the same family will look on each other just as a hunter who is ready to kill his prey. There will finally be a period of seven days when there will be wanton slaughter. Those who survive will eventually realize that it is wrong to act in this way, and they will make an effort to stop killing each other. Gradually, morality will be established again. People will live longer and longer, and they will begin to be handsome again.

We can see that this description refers to the decline in the Dhamma taught by Buddha Gotama, for he goes on to describe how the time will come in the future when the conditions will be right for the coming of the next Buddha, Ariya Metteyya.

If we look at the world today, we can say that there are many indications of just such a decline in morality. It is, of course, possible to point to bad conditions in the past, but there are signs that the very basis of moral civilization is threatened today. We have only to pick up a newspaper or magazine, or to see the latest movie or television show, to discover that the moral values we used to find taught are missing. It is considered old-fashioned to have a clear, moral message in a story. What were once seen as moral restraints are now put down as being censorship. Freedom of expression has become more sacred than a sane society. As a result, we see images that are designed to arouse strong sensual desires. We have stories with immoral characters who go unpunished. The violence we see in films has become more and more realistic, more and more prevalent, but people who claim to be experts say that all this is not harmful to children. If we look at the latest news, we see reports of child abuse, drug abuse, and crimes in cities where people act more and more like wild animals. Problems such as racism seem to get worse. Government figures are more concerned with winning votes than with governing. Support for abortion and euthanasia has grown. Some religious leaders seem ready to do almost anything to accommodate their followers while others resort to fanaticism.

Those of us who practise the Teachings of the Buddha do not need experts to tell us what effect all this has on humanity. We have only to observe in ourselves to see that what is presented to us as entertainment and as news is harmful. We know that if greed or lust or hatred are stirred up in our minds then we will be more likely to act according to these roots of bad actions. It is obvious to us that we must make a major effort to lead moral lives if there is to be any hope for us and for humanity.

The Buddha taught that there are two Guardians of the World: a sense of shame and the fear of blame (//hiri-ottappa//). It is important that we understand correctly what these two guardians are. They are mental qualities that make it possible to act in a moral, responsible way. They do not mean that we indulge in feelings of guilt and worry about what we have done in the past. It is important to recognize past mistakes for what they are and to make amends whenever possible for any harm we have done to others or pain we may have caused them. But we do not dwell on past mistakes, whether they be our own or other people's.[2]

The Buddha said that a sense of shame and the fear of blame are two bright states that protect the world.[3] When they no longer exist, the very lowest stage of human existence is reached, the stage when people are as promiscuous as goats and sheep, fowls and swine, dogs and jackals.

It is important, then, that we understand these two guardians correctly. Having a sense of shame means that we refrain from doing evil because we do not want to harm ourselves. It is because we wish to preserve our self-respect that we develop a sense of shame. Fearing blame is more a question of avoiding doing evil deeds because of others. We wish to be respected by others, so we develop the fear of blame.

Ashin Buddhaghosa explains the guardians of the world in considerable detail,[4] and we will base our discussion on what he says. The proximate cause for both guardians is virtue: being pure in bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions. Only when all three are present does virtue arise and persist.

Having a sense of shame means that a person abhors evil and shrinks from doing wrong actions. It is subjective in origin and its characteristic is respectful obedience. Ashin Buddhaghosa gives the illustration of two sets of four causes for the arising of a sense of shame. The first four are considering our (1) birth, (2) age, (3) heroism, and (4) wide experience. We should say to ourselves whenever we are tempted to do an evil action: (1) "This is not worthy of a person of (good) birth; it is the type of action done by inferior people." (2) "This is the way children act; it is not worthy of a mature person like me." (3) "An evil action of this sort is only for those who are weak; a person who is strong and courageous like me should not do this." (4) "An evil action like this is only done by blind fools, not by wise people like me. I have gained wisdom, I have wide experience, I should not do this." The second group of four includes: refraining from doing evil out of consideration of (1) our high birth (as above), (2) the dignity of our Teacher, (3) the greatness of our inheritance, and (4) the honour of our companions.

If we are following the Teachings of the Buddha, we should not do anything that could reflect badly on him, his Doctrine, or on those who are striving to progress on the right path and who are helping to keep the Buddha-Dhamma alive. In our day-to-day lives, many people among our families, friends, and fellow workers know that we practise Buddhist meditation. If we do not live up to the principles laid down by the Buddha, we may be responsible not only for our own downfall, but we may put obstacles in the way of others.

Ashin Buddhaghosa makes it clear that what is included here is also a sense of modesty. A sense of shame is similar to the sort of modesty involved in covering our private parts, or it is like the shame we would feel if a person worthy of our respect should come along as we are answering the call of nature.

The fear of blame has an external cause. Its characteristic is viewing a fault with timidity and fear. It is by nature a sense of dread, meaning that we dread the possibility of being reborn in the lowest planes of suffering. We are afraid of being blamed by any of the four assemblies: the Bhikkhu-Sangha, the Bhikkhuni-Sangha, an assembly of laymen, or an assembly of laywomen. We also realize how big the world is and that there are bhikkhus and laypeople who have developed the supernormal powers. These people can read other people's minds. There are also devas who can read people's thoughts, and because we do not want these highly developed people or these Devas to see us indulging in evil, unprofitable thoughts, we strive to develop pure thoughts and actions. [5]

The fear of blame has four causes: (1) accusing oneself, (2) being accused by others, (3) (fear of) punishment, (4) (fear of) an evil destiny. In other words, we will be afraid of doing something that we know we will reproach ourselves for later, or something that others will criticize. We will avoid actions that we might be punished for in this life, or actions that will lead to future lives of suffering.

Ashin Buddhaghosa gives the illustration of two iron balls. One is cold and covered with excrement. The other is burning hot. A wise man will not catch the iron ball that is cold because he does not want to be covered in dung. He will not catch the one that is hot because he is afraid of being burnt. Avoiding the cold iron ball is like not doing wrong out of an internal sense of shame. Not grasping the hot iron ball is like not doing evil because we are afraid of suffering in the lowest planes.

Keeping these two guardians of the world present in our lives can be very difficult. When we are surrounded by a world that encourages us to act as we wish without worrying about the results, we may find our faith wavering. The guardians are two of the Seven Noble Treasures (//ariya-dhanani//):

(1) faith, (2) virtue, (3) a sense of shame, (4) the fear of blame,
(5) learning (//suta//), (6) renunciation (//caga//), and (7)wisdom;

and two of the seven powers (//balani//):

(1) faith, (2) energy, (3) a sense of shame, (4) the fear of blame,
(5) mindfulness, (6) concentration, (7) wisdom. [6]

So we will need to work on all these qualities if we are to stay on the right path. We will need to keep up our meditation practice and deepen our knowledge and understanding of the Buddha's Teachings.

It will also be very difficult not to waver if we are surrounded by people who encourage us to do evil. That is why it is so important to spend as much time as possible with friends who, like ourselves, are working for the goal of Nibbana. It will not be easy. This is stated quite clearly in two verses of the Dhammapada (vv. 244, 245):

Life is easy for a person who is shameless, as bold as a crow, obtrusive, pushy, reckless, and whose life is impure.
But life is difficult for a person who has a sense of shame, who constantly seeks purity, who does not cling, who is not reckless, who understands the life of purity.

We must guard against allowing the dark states of shamelessness (//ahirika//) or recklessness (//anottappa//) taking hold of our minds and determining our actions. To do this, we will need to work to overcome the four mental factors that are present in all immoral types of consciousness:

(1) delusion (//moha//), (2) shamelessness, (3) recklessness, and (4) restlessness (//uddhacca//).[7]

And we will work to eliminate qualities that are the opposite of the Noble Treasures, the seven wrong practices (//asaddhamma//):

(1) lack of faith, (2) lack of a sense of shame, (3) lack of fear of blame, (4) little learning, (5) being slack (//kusito//), (6) being unmindful (//mutthassati//), and (7) lack of wisdom. [8]

If we avoid the seven wrong practices and develop the seven Noble Treasures, we will go beyond having just a sense of shame and fear of blame. We will develop the Middle Path that eliminates the root of greed by avoiding the extreme of indulging in sense pleasures, that eliminates the root of aversion by avoiding the extreme of exhausting oneself, and that eliminates ignorance by leading to wisdom. If we stay on this Path, one day we will no longer have to struggle, for we will attain the goal and become perfectly liberated from all this suffering.

Sayagyi U Chit Tin

The Two Guardians of the World

FOOTNOTES:

[1] If we have done especially bad deeds, however, we may not be able to shake off feelings of guilt. See GS I 44, where the Buddha talks of immoral acts that "sear" and "burn" whenever they are remembered.

[2] Op. cit., p. 46; MA II 141f.

[3] See especially Path Ch. 1 SS22, 88; Ch. 14 S142; Expos pp. 164-167, 198.

[4] See GS I 130-133.

[5] THIH, pp. 501, 502. It is as part of the seven powers that Ashin Buddhaghosa discusses these in Illus.

[6] See //A Manual of Abhidhamma//, p. 97.

[7] THIH, p. 502.

Worldwide Contact Addresses
in the Tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin
~~~~~~

AUSTRIA: International Meditation Centre, A-9064 St. Michael/Gurk 6, Austria;Tel: +43 4224 2820, Fax: +43 4224 28204

EASTERN AUSTRALIA: International Meditation Centre, Lot 2 Cessnock Road, Sunshine NSW 2264, Australia;
Tel: +61 49 705 433, Fax: +61 49 705 749

UNITED KINGDOM: International Meditation Centre, Splatts House, Heddington, Calne, Wiltshire SN11 OPE, England;
Tel: +44 380 850 238, Fax: +44 380 850 833,
Email: CIS, IMC-UK,100330,3304

USA (East Coast): International Meditation Centre, 438 Bankard Road, Westminster MD 21158, USA;
Tel: +1 410 346 7889, Fax: +1 410 346 7133;
Email: CIS, IMC-USA, 74163,2452

WESTERN AUSTRALIA: International Meditation Centre, Lot 78 Jacoby Street, Mahogany Creek WA 6072, Australia;
Tel: +61 9 295 2644, Fax: +61 9 295 3435

CANADA: IMC-Canada, 336 Sandowne Drive, Waterloo, Ontario, N2K 1V8,
~~~~~~

Canada; Tel: +1 519 747 4762, Fax: +1 519 725 2781

GERMANY: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Gesellschaft, Christaweg 16, 79114 Freiburg, Germany, Tel: +49 761 465 42, Fax: +49 761 465 92

JAPAN: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, Komatsuri-Cho 923, Kishiwada-Shi, Osaka-Fu, 596 Japan, Tel: +81 724 45 0057

THE NETHERLANDS: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Stichting, Oudegracht 124, 3511 AW Utrecht, The Netherlands,
Tel: +31 30 311 445, Fax: +31 30 340 612

SINGAPORE: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Association, 9 Penang Road #07-12, Park Mall, Singapore 0923
Tel: +65 338 6911, Fax: +65 336 7211

SWITZERLAND: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Gesellschaft, Greyerzstrasse 35, 3013 Bern, Switzerland;Tel: +41 31 415 233, Fax: +41 61 691 8049;
Email: CIS, 100256,3576

USA (West Coast): IMC-USA, 77 Kensington Rd., San Anselmo, CA 94960.
Tel: +1 415 459 3117, Fax: +1 415 346 7133

BELGIUM: Address as for the Netherlands, Tel: +32 2414 1756

DENMARK: Contact Address: Mr. Peter Drost-Nissen, Strandboulevarden 117, 3th, 2100 Kopenhagen, Denmark. Tel: 031 425 636

ITALY: Contact address: Mr. Renzo Fedele, Via Euganea 94, 35033 Bresseo PD, Italy. Tel: +39 49 9900 752

Published by the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, United Kingdom
Address as above, registered charity no. 280134

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT

TITLE OF WORK: The Two Guardians of the World
FILENAME: GUARDIAN.ZIP
AUTHOR: Sayagyi U Chit Tin
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: n/a
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: International Meditation Centre, Splatts House,
Heddington, Calne, Wiltshire SN11 OPE, England
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: The Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, U.K.
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1990
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: 1994
ORIGIN SITE: BODY DHARMA * Berkeley CA 510/234-9431 DharmaNet (96:101/33.0)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights or restrictions that may apply.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

A SIMPLE GUIDE TO LIFE

by Robert Bogoda

ISBN 955-24-0125-9

Wheel Publication No. 397/398

Copyright 1994 Buddhist Publication Society

BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
KANDY Sri Lanka

* * *

DharmaNet Edition 1995

Transcribed directly from BPS Pagemaker files
Formatting: John Bullitt

This electronic edition is offered for free distribution
via DharmaNet by arrangement with the publisher.

DharmaNet International
P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley CA 94704-4951

* * * * * * * *

CONTENTS

Introduction

A Simple Guide to Life

1. The Right View of Life
2. Benefits of Right Understanding
3. A Life Plan
4. Obstacles
5. Relaxation
6. Observing the Five Precepts
7. Controlling the Emotions
8. Beware of Bias and Propaganda
9. A Happy Family Life
10. The Practice of Benevolence
11. Freeing the Mind
12. Mindfulness of Breathing
13. Facing Death with Equanimity
14. The Good Buddhist

About the Author

* * * * * * * *

INTRODUCTION

Innumerable books have been written about Buddhism, but most of these are far too exhaustive, too specialized, or too scholarly to be of much practical help to the busy lay Buddhist in search of concise guidance. A short, clear, and simple handbook on how to live a proper Buddhist lay life was therefore a much felt need. The present essay attempts to fill that gap by providing exactly what its title offers: A Simple Guide to Life.

For easy reference the essay has been divided into short, convenient sections. The first section is theoretical in emphasis. It attempts to fix in the reader's mind the essential principles of the Buddha's teaching, without complicated and sophisticated explanations. The principles discussed here should serve as a clear-cut philosophy of life, a framework which illuminates the meaning and purpose of the Buddhist life. These principles will enable the lay Buddhist to understand his or her place in the larger scheme of things, to order priorities, and to devise a proper way to achieve them. The lack of a clear philosophy of life, so widespread today, is largely responsible for the steady decline in ethical standards, both individually and socially, in Sri Lanka and in the world as a whole.

The second section is concerned with the practical implications of adopting the understanding of existence sketched in the first section. We here examine the visible benefits of accepting the Buddha-Dhamma as a way of thinking and living; in this section we will also throw a sidelong glance at what happens to a society when spiritual values are abandoned in favour of an exclusive stress on material development.

The next two sections discuss respectively the need to draw up an individual life plan and the obstacles likely to impede the successful implementation of that plan. The central problem of a Buddhist lay follower is to combine a successful lay life with Buddhist moral and spiritual principles. This problem can be solved by organizing one's life as a lay Buddhist within the framework of the Noble Eightfold Path, which represents the Master's teaching in practice. Because some degree of economic security is essential to growth in the Dhamma, the Buddha was concerned with the material welfare of his lay disciples as much as with their spiritual development. He did not deter them from seeking mundane happiness, but he stressed that in pursuing mundane goals, the lay Buddhist should take great care to avoid breaking the basic rules of morality. These rules are summed up in the Five Precepts of virtue, the minimum code of ethics to be followed by a Buddhist householder. As the Five Precepts are thus of such fundamental importance to a Buddhist lay follower, a separate section is devoted to discussing them.

The remaining sections of the essay show how to apply the basic principles of Buddhism to the other major areas of a Buddhist householder's life. The essay ends with a section briefly describing what is expected of an ideal lay Buddhist in daily life. The guiding maxim of the entire essay is: A little well done is better than a lot poorly done.

To sum up: The Buddha's teaching, which is unique in its completeness, is the most rational and consistent plan for wholesome living. It is not based on dogma or blind faith, but on facts and verifiable conclusions. It therefore offers a reasonable way of life which should be attractive to any thinking person. Moreover, the Dhamma is completely compatible with the advances of modern science and does not require clever reinterpretations to avoid clashes with scientific discoveries.

The mere fact of accepting Buddhism intellectually, however, will not ensure happiness and security. To yield its fruit the Buddha's teaching has to be utilized intelligently and constructively in all the activities of our daily life. It has to be adopted, adapted, and applied until all its basic principles are absorbed and made habitual by repeated practice, for a theoretical knowledge of Buddhism is insufficient in itself.

If one wishes to make changes in the changing personality that one now is, these changes will take time and patience. The lofty heights of Nibbana are not to be reached by a sudden leap but by quiet, persistent endeavour over a long period, guided by the Master's teaching. Let us not forget that a journey of a thousand miles begins with a single step. Daily practice, beginning with the strict observance of the Five Precepts, is the way to orderly progress along the path. Even a little practice every day brings the practitioner a little nearer to the goal each day.

I take this opportunity to offer the merit of this gift of Dhamma most gratefully and most devotedly to my parents, now no more. Such a gift excels all other gifts: //Sabbadanam dhammadanam jinati//. May it redound to their happiness.

* * * * * * * *

1. The Right View of Life

To be happy, successful, and secure, we must first learn to see ourselves and the world as they truly are and should then shape our everyday activities in keeping with this view. We must also look for solutions to our problems in terms of the relationship of cause and effect, for the universal law of causality operates in the field of human behaviour as much as it does in the physical world.

The foundation for a fruitful life is an understanding of the moral law of kamma. Kamma is volitional action, action that expresses morally determinate intentions or volitions. We need to recognize clearly that wholesome and unwholesome deeds produce corresponding good and bad results. As a person sows, so shall he reap. Good begets good, and evil begets evil. This retributive power is inherent in volitional action or kamma.

Kamma is also cumulative. Not only do our deeds generate pleasant and painful results, but in their cumulative force they also determine our character. The deeds we perform in any one life are transmitted to future lives in the form of dispositions. These dispositions constitute our character traits.

Inherent in the action is the power of producing its due result. This happens without the intervention or help of any external agency. Buddhism denies the existence of a Creator-God. Kamma is neither fate nor predestination, but our own willed action considered as capable of producing results. Understanding the kammic moral law of cause and effect, we will learn to control our actions in order to serve our own welfare as well as to promote the good of others.

There are ten unwholesome courses of action (//akusala-kammapatha//), deeds which originate from the defilements

of greed, hatred, and delusion. These are: killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, slander, harsh speech, useless talk, covetousness, ill will, and false views. Contrary to these, there are ten bases of merit (//punnakiriya-vatthu//), deeds which spring from the virtuous qualities of detachment, goodwill, and wisdom, and which generate wholesome kamma: generosity, morality, meditation, reverence, service, transference of merit, rejoicing in the good deeds of others, hearing the Dhamma, expounding the Dhamma, and straightening out one's views.

It is lack of right understanding and ignorance of the underlying laws of life that account for the prevalence of materialism in today's world, even in the traditional homelands of the Buddha-Dhamma. When people become convinced that everything perishes at death, they lose sight of lofty ethical ideals and become indifferent to the long-range consequences of their deeds. Their entire lives revolve around the blind pursuit of sensual pleasures. Thus we find that today people worship money regardless of how it is earned, hunt for pleasure no matter where it is found, chase power and fame regardless of the cost to their personal integrity.

Ignorance of the law is no valid excuse in a court of law, and so it is with regard to the moral law of kamma: the law operates regardless of whether one believes in it or not, due effects following from their respective causes. Just as an infant will get burnt if it touches fire regardless of whether or not it understands the dangers in playing with fire, so those who violate the laws of morality will have to face the consequences when their kamma ripens, regardless of whether or not they accept the teaching of kamma.

Just as a shadow is connected with an object, so is rebirth connected with kamma. Craving (//tanha//), selfish desire, prompts us to do life-affirming deeds, kamma, volitional action. No force in nature is ever lost, and moral energy is no exception. So long as craving and ignorance remain in the mind, kamma must find expression at death. The inevitable fruit of craving for existence is rebirth.

Buddhism affirms the continuity of the individual life-flux at death, but denies the existence of a permanent soul. Mind is a flux of mental processes without any persisting core, yet this flux, though insubstantial, continues from life to life as long as it is driven on by the thirst for more becoming. The mind of a dying person, owing to the latent craving for continued existence, grasps at some object, idea, or feeling connected with an action done during his lifetime, and this grasping vitalizes an appropriate germ of life. The new form of life may be human or non-human, in keeping with the kamma or moral forces generated during the deceased's lifetime. The germ of life kindled by the process of rebirth is endowed with an initial consciousness (called the patisandhicitta) in which lie latent all the past impressions, characteristics, and tendencies of that particular individual. Hence death leads to birth and birth to death. Rebirth is thus possible without a transmigrating soul.

The twin Buddhist doctrines of kamma and rebirth are the "middle way" that provides a satisfactory answer to the problem of life. The middle way avoids the extremes of theism and materialism, preserving moral accountability without the problems raised by positing an almighty yet benevolent God. A human being is the visible expression of his or her own past action. One is born from one's past kamma, supported by one's present kamma, and at death goes where one's accumulated kamma leads one.

Buddhism teaches that human beings evolve according to the quality of the kamma they have performed during their lifetime. This supplies a rational basis for morality in place of the commandments of a Creator-God. According to the Buddha's teachings, there can be regression ("kammic descent") from the human plane to subhuman realms such as the animal world, and progress ("kammic ascent") from the human plane to the heavenly planes. Taking into account the dangers of a fall to subhuman realms, one should always act with care. Virtue, based on a righteous code of conduct, protects one from regression and ensures spiritual progress.

A true follower of the Buddha accepts the moral law of kamma as just, recognizing it as the chief reason for the many inequalities among human beings in regard to health, wealth, and wisdom. He also learns to face life's losses, disappointments, failures, and adversities calmly, without complaining; for he knows that they are the result of his own past misdeeds. If he asks himself: "Why has this happened to me?" the answer will be expressed in terms of action and result. He will try to solve his problems to the best of his ability and will adjust himself to the new situation when external change is not possible. He will not act rashly, nor fall into despair, nor try to escape his difficulties by resorting to drink, drugs, or suicide, as so often happens in Sri Lanka. Such conduct only shows emotional immaturity and ignorance of the Buddha's teachings.

For a genuine Buddhist, then, one's everyday activities, by way of thought, word, and deed, are more important than anything else in life. A proper understanding of the Buddhist moral law of kamma and rebirth is essential for happy and sensible living and for the welfare of the world. In the Buddha's own words:

> The slayer gets a slayer in his turn;
> The conqueror gets one who conquers him;
> The abuser wins abuse, the annoyer frets.
> Thus by the evolution of the deed,
> A man who spoils is spoiled in his turn."

(Samyutta Nikaya, Kosala Samyutta, trans. by Sir Robert Chalmers)

Although we imagine ourselves to be a self -- a real substantial individual -- according to the Buddha's teaching we are in reality nothing more than a flame-like process, an ever-changing combination of matter and mind, neither of which is the same for two consecutive moments. All the components of our being are impermanent, unsatisfactory, and devoid of self. Life is not a being, an identity, but a becoming; not a product, but a process. There is in actuality no doer, only a doing; no thinker, only a thinking; no goer, only a going.

The Buddha teaches us how to put an end to the beginningless cycle of rebirths in which we undergo the manifold kinds of suffering. The way to end the cycle is by removing the causes that drive it forward life after life. The principal cause is craving, which assumes many forms. Craving impels a person to engage in action (kamma) designed to satisfy the craving, yet as craving is essentially insatiable the result is rebirth.

Craving is a powerful mental force latent in all unenlightened beings. The cause of craving is ignorance (//avijja//) of the true nature of life: not knowing that life is an ever-changing process, subject to suffering, and totally devoid of a self or core. All life, wherever it is found, bears this same nature: a process stamped with the three marks of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and egolessness (//anicca//, //dukkha//, //anatta//).

The Buddha realized for himself the true nature of life and through this realization attained to something beyond life and death: a reality that is permanent, blissful, and deathless. This state cannot be described but has to be realized inwardly as a matter of direct personal experience; it has to be attained for oneself and by oneself. This ultimate reality, where thought expires in experience, is Nibbana, the goal of the Buddhist path.

The Buddha's teachings may thus be condensed into these four verifiable truths, called the Four Noble Truths: suffering, its cause (i.e. craving), its cessation (i.e. Nibbana), and the way leading to cessation of suffering (i.e. the Noble Eightfold Path). These are eternal truths, truths that do not change and cannot change with time and place.

The only way for us to avoid unhappiness and dissatisfaction is to eliminate the craving that gives birth to it; for everything eagerly sought for and clung to is impermanent. Nothing lasts forever -- no person, no object, no experience. Whatever arises must perish, and to cling to the perishable sooner or later ends in suffering. It is by no means easy to eliminate craving; in fact, it is the most difficult challenge of all. But when we do so, we will reach a state of inward perfection and unshakable calm.

We can reach the end of suffering by cultivating the Noble Eightfold

Path in its three stages of morality, concentration, and wisdom -- //sila//, //samadhi//, //panna//. Morality purifies conduct and concentration makes the mind calm. When the mind is calm and concentrated, wisdom arises, clear insight, the knowledge and vision of things as they really are. With the arising of wisdom, craving in all its forms is forever destroyed; the flame of life is then extinguished for want of fuel. The Unconditioned has been won -- Nibbana, which is deathless, blissful, and real.

The Noble Eightfold Path consists of the following eight factors, inter-related and inter-connected, ordered into three groups:

Wisdom group (//panna//)
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

1. Right understanding: knowledge of the true nature of life; understanding the Four Noble Truths.

2. Right thought: thought free from sensuality, ill-will, and aggression.

Morality group (//sila//)
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

3. Right speech: abstinence from falsehood, slander, harsh speech, and useless words.

4. Right action: abstinence from killing, stealing, and sexual misconduct.

5. Right livelihood: avoiding any means of livelihood that involves harm or exploitation of others.

Concentration group (//samadhi//)
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

6. Right effort: training the mind to avoid unwholesome mental states and to develop wholesome mental states.

7. Right mindfulness: developing the power of attentiveness and awareness in regard to the "four foundations of mindfulness" -- body, feelings, mind, and mental phenomena.

8. Right concentration: cultivation of one-pointedness of mind.

These eight factors summarize the Buddha's teaching and its practice. They are the very heart of the Buddha-Dhamma. It is not enough to know and admire the Dhamma; it must be practised in daily life, for the difficulty of knowing what is right is nothing compared to the difficulty of putting it into practice. We really know something only when we do it repeatedly, when we make it part of our nature. The practical side of the Dhamma is the threefold training in morality, concentration, and wisdom, which collectively constitute the Noble Eightfold Path, the "middle way" discovered by the Blessed One for the realization of Nibbana.

Monastics and laypeople alike tread the same path. Both start from the same foundation, right understanding; both pursue the same goal, Nibbana. The only difference lies in the degree of commitment to the practice and the pace of progress. But whether as a layperson or as a monk, the systematic practice of the Eightfold Path will foster the growth of the wholesome qualities leading to liberation -- generosity, goodwill, and wisdom. As these qualities gradually reach maturity, they will weaken and finally snap the fetters of greed, hatred, and delusion which have held us for so long in bondage to the round of rebirth and suffering.

* * *

2. Benefits of Right Understanding

1. Right understanding is the foundation for developing a proper sense of values, so sorely lacking in our age. Without right understanding our vision is dimmed and the way is lost; all our efforts will be misguided and misdirected, all our plans for individual and social development must flounder and fail. Such plans will have to be based on the Eightfold Path with its emphasis on self-effort, self-control, and respect for the individual.

When wrong views prevail we will operate with a perverted sense of values: we will fling ourselves into the blind pursuit of wealth, power, and possessions; we will be obsessed by the urge to conquer and dominate; we will pine for ruthless revenge; we will dumbly conform to social conventions and norms. Right views will point us towards an enlightened sense of values: towards detachment and kindness; towards generosity of spirit and selfless service to others; towards the pursuit of wisdom and understanding. The confusion and moral lunacy now prevalent in the world can be eased, if not eliminated, if the path of the Buddha is followed. Right livelihood and right action, for instance, can help us avoid the conflicts that result from a wrong way of life and wrong action, thereby enabling a society to live in peace and harmony.

Although in the affluent countries of the West people now enjoy high standards of goods and services, the inward quality of their lives does not bear evidence of a corresponding level of improvement. The reason for the poverty of their interior life is the neglect of spiritual values. When materialism erodes the higher spiritual dimension of life, a plunge into moral nihilism is bound to follow. We see this in the alarming statistics characteristic of materialist society: in the increased rate of suicide, in the explosion of crime, in the proliferation of sexual offenses, alcoholism, and drug abuse. This shows that a one-sided stress on material development in a pleasure-seeking society is ultimately self-destructive, like a piece of iron that is devoured by the rust arising from within itself. Even knowledge and discipline on their own are not adequate, for without moral ideals they may turn a society into nothing more than a mass-scale workshop or military camp. It is only the cultivation of a proper sense of values that can make society cultured and civilized in the true meaning of those terms.

2. Having right understanding will enable us to recognize that worldly values are man-made and relative. These false worldly values lead people astray and make them suffer in vain. A Buddha teaches authentic values, real values, values that are grounded in timeless truth. A Buddha first realizes for himself the true nature of life, then he reveals to blind worldlings the Dhamma, the eternal law of righteousness and truth. This Dhamma includes the Four Noble Truths and the principles of kamma and rebirth. Any values that deviate from these principles, no matter how widely they may be accepted as the common norm, are worthless and deceptive. While those whose minds are shrouded in wrong views will be deceived by them, one with right view will realize their hollowness at once.

3. Seeing that life involves incessant change and that it is subject to many forms of suffering, one with right understanding learns to live simply and to regulate desire. A wise and virtuous person is moderate in his desires and follows the middle way in all matters. Understanding the close connection between craving and suffering, he will realize the importance of holding desire in check by simple living. One with right understanding is aware that real happiness is an inward state -- a quality of the mind -- and should therefore be sought inwardly. Happiness is independent of external things, though of course a certain degree of material security is necessary as a basis for inner development.

We require only four basic kinds of physical sustenance: wholesome food, clothing, shelter, and medicine. Complementary to these, we have four mental needs: right knowledge, virtue, guarding the doors of the senses, and meditation. These are the two sets of basic requisites for leading a lofty life. Living simply, without superfluous possessions and entanglements, leads to contentment and peace of mind, releasing time and energy to pursue higher virtues and values. It is pride and vanity that keep us tied to false goals, and the smaller the mind, the greater is the pride.

4. Buddhism upholds the objectivity of moral values, for its ethics is based on the law of cause and effect in the moral sphere, and this law, like the physical law of gravity, is an unvarying truth valid for all time. Good deeds and bad deeds will produce their respective pleasant and painful fruits regardless of the views and wishes of the people who engage in them. Recognizing the objectivity of the moral law and the undeviating connection between deeds and their results, a person with right view will abstain from wrong actions and adhere to the standards of wholesome conduct embodied in the Five Precepts of virtuous conduct (discussed below).

5. As instability is inherent in life, the most unexpected things can happen. Therefore the wise Buddhist recognizes the need to control his feelings. When calamity comes, we must face it calmly, without lamenting or falling into despair. The ability to remain equanimous amidst the fluctuations of fortune is a benefit of right understanding. We should understand that everything that happens to us happens because of causes and conditions for which we are ultimately responsible. Similarly, as we obtain some degree of emotional control, we will be able to discard irrational fears and worries. The seeming injustices of life, grievances, emotional maladjustments, etc., are all explained fully and rationally by the law of kamma and rebirth. By understanding this law, we will see that, in the final analysis, we are the architects of our own destiny.

6. A further fruit of right understanding is the ability to look at people, things, and events objectively, stripped bare of likes and dislikes, of bias and prejudice. This capacity for objectivity, a sign of true mental maturity, will issue in clearer thinking, saner living, a marked reduction of susceptibility to the pernicious influence of the mass media, and an improvement in inter-personal relationships.

7. One with right understanding will be able to think for himself. He is able to make up his own mind, to form his own opinions, to face life's difficulties armed with the principles of reality taught by the Buddha. The true Buddhist will not be a moral and intellectual coward, but will be prepared to stand alone regardless of what others say or think. Of course, he will seek advice when necessary, but he will make his own decisions and have the courage of his convictions.

8. Right understanding will give us a purpose for living. A lay Buddhist must learn to live purposefully, with a worthy aim -- both an immediate aim and an ultimate aim, the one fitting harmoniously into the other. To be truly happy we require a simple but sound philosophy of life. Philosophy is the keen desire to understand the nature of man and our destiny in the universe. It gives life a sense of direction and meaning. Without one, we either dream our way through life or muddle through life. A clear-cut philosophy makes life meaningful and fruitful, enabling us to live in harmony with our fellows and with the natural environment.

* * *

3. A Life Plan

To make the best use of our human potential, we need not only a practical aim in life, but a life plan for achieving that aim. The preceding two sections of this essay show the groundwork for developing a proper sense of values, the values essential for gaining happiness, success, and security within the mundane life and for progressing towards the ultimate goal of the Buddhist path, Nibbana. While we walk along the path to liberation, as laypeople we have to live in the world, and our immediate objective will be to make our life in the world both a means to worldly success and a stepping-stone to final liberation.

To accomplish this, we must organize our life within the framework of the Noble Eightfold Path. We can best realize our immediate aims by drawing up an individual life plan in keeping with our powers and circumstances. This life plan must be realistic. It must envisage a realistic development of our innate potential, steering us towards the fullest actualization of our possibilities.

At the start, we require an honest understanding of ourselves. It is pointless to devise a workable life plan on the foundation stone of grandiose delusions about our character and abilities. The more we find out about ourselves, by self-observation and self-examination, the better will be our chances of self-improvement. We should ask ourselves how far and to what degree we are generous, kind, even-tempered, considerate, honest, sober in morals, truthful, diligent, energetic, industrious, cautious, patient, tolerant, and tactful. These are the qualities of a well-developed Buddhist, the qualities we ourselves should emulate.

We need to improve ourselves wherever we are weak. A little practice everyday is all that is necessary. We should remember that the more often an action is performed, the easier it becomes for us to perform it in the future and the stronger becomes the tendency to do it again and again until it becomes a habit, an ingrained part of our character.

Our life plan should cover all the main areas of a normal householder's life, including occupation, marriage, the procreation and raising of children, retirement, old age and death. The happiness of lay life consists in finding out exactly what one can do and doing it well. A clear mental picture of a practical aim in life and a realistic sketch of the steps needed to achieve that aim will help guide us to the fulfilment of our ideal. We tend to become what we really want to be, provided we act realistically and effectively to realize our aim.

* * *

4. Obstacles

The following five states are likely to prevent or block the success of our efforts to lead the upright life of a Buddhist lay follower. They are called by the Buddha the five mental hindrances (//pancanivarana//) because they close the doors to both spiritual and worldly progress. Although the Buddha originally taught them as the main obstacles to meditation, with a little reflection we can see that they are equally detrimental to success in our mundane undertakings.

1. The first of the five hindrances is //sensual craving//, obsessive hankering for possessions or for the gratification of the senses. While the lay Buddhist will seek wealth and possessions as an integral part of mundane happiness, he will also be aware of the limits to be observed in their pursuit.He will recognize that if one obtains wealth and position by unjust means, or becomes excessively attached to them, they will become a source of misery and despair rather than of joy and contentment. Money alone cannot solve all our problems. Many people never learn this, and spend their time and energy accumulating wealth and the so-called "good things" it can buy. But in fact, the more they acquire the more they want. Such people can never find happiness. A lay Buddhist must be moderate in all things. Extreme desires -- for riches, the enjoyment of sex, liquor, the ostentatious display of one's success -- are sure signs of internal insecurity, things to be avoided.

2. //Ill will// or hatred, the second hindrance, is the emotional opposite of desire, yet it is an equally potent obstacle to personal development. Because we are attracted to desirable things, we are repelled by what is undesirable. Like and dislike are the two forces that delude the world, leading people astray into conflict and confusion and drenching the earth with blood. Both are born of ignorance. Desire colours everything in tinsel and drives us to acquire what we want. Hatred colours everything black and drives us to destroy what we suspect is inimical to our interests. The best way to overcome hatred is by cultivating lovingkindness, explained later in this essay.

3. //Indolence and mental inertia// is the next hindrance, the obstacle to strenuous effort. The lazy person is not inclined to strive for correct understanding or high standards of conduct. He is a drifter or a dreamer, easy prey to the thieves of craving and hatred.

4. //Restlessness and worry// are twin hindrances very much in evidence today. Restlessness is manifest in the agitation, impatience, thirst for excitement, and unsettled character of our daily existence. Worry is the guilt and remorse that one feels when one broods sadly or regretfully over an evil deed that has been done or a good deed left undone. The best remedy for a lapse or transgression already committed is to decide never to repeat it; the best remedy for neglecting to do good is to do it without delay.

5. The last hindrance is //doubt//. Doubt is the inability to decide, the lack of resolution that prevents one from making a firm commitment to higher ideals and from pursuing the good with a steady will.

These five hindrances are great handicaps to one's progress. They deprive the mind of understanding and happiness and cause much unnecessary suffering. By cultivating the five cardinal virtues -- confidence, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom -- and by constant effort one can reduce their harmful influence.

* * *

5. Relaxation

Modern life is full of stress and strain. Therefore relaxation is a necessary ingredient of happiness. By understanding the causes of stress and by regulating these causes, we can live calmly even in the midst of strenuous activity.

Hard work without tension never killed anyone. Why is it then that some people always work anxiously and feverishly? Generally, such a person is driven by craving, by intense desire. He wants to achieve his goal so eagerly, with such avidity, that he simply cannot rest until he gets it; or he is so fearful of losing something he prizes that he cannot relax and enjoy the present moment; or he is driven by resentment against those who obstruct his thirst; or he is constantly hankering after power, position, and prestige on account of some irrational need to prove his worth to himself and others.

If a person wants to avoid stress and strain, then he will have to train his mind to view everything he encounters -- persons, objects, events, and experiences -- realistically, as transient phenomena, dependently arisen through conditions. He should reflect upon them in terms of the three characteristics -- as impermanent, unsatisfactory, and without a self. Doing so will help to reduce the investment of self-concern in these phenomena, and thereby will reduce the craving and attachment for them. He should also avoid anger, anxiety, and pride -- the thoughts of "me" and "mine" -- since such emotions are productive of stress and strain. When one adopts this attitude to life, one will discover greater detachment, deeper calm, more durable peace of heart even amidst the same situations that previously produced nothing but stress and worry. The key to managing stress is through the disciplining and mastery of the mind.

One can also reduce stress by forming good work habits. One should confine oneself to doing one thing at a time, since attempts to juggle multiple tasks only lead to poor results in all of them. One should keep work and leisure separate. One should work in a relaxed frame of mind, repeatedly reminding oneself during the course of the day that one can accomplish more work and better work if one works calmly and intersperses one's routine with breaks.

The following additional disciplines will also be helpful in combatting stress and tension:

1. Keeping the Five Precepts conscientiously. The feeling of guilt increases stress. By observing the precepts, a person leads a blameless life and thereby enjoys freedom from the nagging sense of guilt that harasses one who violates the basic rules of morality. A guilty conscience is a vexing companion during the day, an uncomfortable bed-fellow at night.

2. Sense control. The mind is constantly attracted to pleasant sense objects and repelled by unpleasant objects. Wandering recklessly among the objective fields, it becomes scattered and distraught. By guarding the sense doors, this wasteful agitation is checked. The mind becomes calm and settled, and as a result one experiences an unblemished happiness.

3. Meditation. Meditation, or //bhavana//, purifies the mind. As the mind is gradually cleansed, one can see with greater clarity the true nature of life. One then becomes increasingly detached from worldly things and develops an equanimity that cannot be shaken by the fluctuations of fortune.

4. Cultivating the four sublime attitudes. The four sublime attitudes (//brahmavihara//) are lovingkindness, compassion, altruistic joy, and equanimity. These are enlightened emotions that reduce the stress and strain of daily life, improve interpersonal relationships at home and in the workplace, promote racial accord and amity, help in the development of an even mind, and increase calm and inner peace.

5. One final piece of practical advice: Time, energy, and funds are limited, while wants are unlimited. Therefore a person must have a sense of priorities. A lay Buddhist, in particular, must be able to discriminate: to know what is really essential to a wholesome life; what is desirable but not urgent; what is trivial and dispensable; and what is detrimental. Having made these distinctions, one must pursue what ranks high in the scale of priorities and eschew what ranks low. This will enable one to avoid unnecessary waste and worry, and help to promote balanced, frugal living.

* * *

6. Observing the Five Precepts

The minimal code of ethics followed by a lay Buddhist is the Five Precepts of virtue (//pancasila//). These precepts are moral rules voluntarily undertaken to promote the purity of one's own conduct and to avoid causing harm and suffering to others. Evil conduct is harmful to oneself and others and strengthens the defilements of greed, hatred, and delusion. To engage in unwholesome activity is not merely a matter of free choice: it is a violation of the cosmic moral law entailing inevitable suffering both in this life and in future existences. The opposite of evil conduct is virtue (//sila//). Virtue involves the avoidance of immoral deeds by voluntarily accepting ethical principles of restraint. Virtuous action springs from the three wholesome roots of non-attachment, goodwill, and wisdom. By undertaking moral precepts one pledges to regulate one's conduct in accordance with these three virtuous qualities.

The Five Precepts are as follows:

1. To abstain from killing living beings;

2. To abstain from taking what is not given, i.e. from stealing;

3. To abstain from sexual misconduct;

4. To abstain from false speech;

5. To abstain from intoxicants and harmful drugs.

Following the Five Precepts also implies shunning the five kinds of occupation forbidden to a lay Buddhist: trading in arms, in human beings (i.e. including slavery and prostitution), in flesh (i.e. breeding animals for slaughter), in intoxicants, and in poisons.

Virtue, though formulated negatively in the precepts, is not a mere negative state. To the contrary, it is most decidedly a powerful mental achievement. To observe the precepts conscientiously in one's daily life brings a simultaneous growth in mental purity, skilfulness, and wisdom. Refraining from killing, for example, increases compassion and lovingkindness for all living beings, two of the "sublime attitudes" extolled by the Buddha. Honesty gives courage, generosity, and love of justice. Sexual restraint results in physical strength, vitality, and keenness of the senses. Truthfulness makes for uprightness. Avoiding intoxicants and stupefying drugs promotes clarity of mind. Finally, mindfulness is essential to observing all the precepts, and one's constant effort to maintain the precepts in turn issues in an increase in the clarity of mindfulness.

The habitual practice of the Five Precepts leads to increased self-control and strength of character. The mind that succeeds in controlling desire, even to a slight degree, gains in power. Desire is a force every bit as real as electricity. When desire is uncontrolled, allowed to run riot, it expends itself in the pursuit of things that are harmful to oneself and others. The Buddha's teaching, far from encouraging the proliferation of desire, counsels us in the methods by which we may harness, divert, and sublimate the powerful force of desire and use it for worthy ends.

Virtue is the first stage in the development of the Noble Eightfold Path; as explained above, it comprises the path factors of Right Speech, Right Action, and Right Livelihood. The energy conserved by virtue is then used for the practice of the second stage, concentration of mind, which in turn is the soil for the growth of wisdom.

The observance of the Five Precepts is a voluntary act which each individual must take up on his or her own initiative. The Buddha did not formulate the precepts as commandments, nor did he threaten anyone with punishment for violating them. However, this much has to be said: The Buddha perfectly understood the workings of the universe, and he proclaimed the inviolable moral law of cause and effect: good deeds beget pleasant fruits, evil deeds beget painful fruits. The Five

Precepts are the guidelines the Buddha has bequeathed us to steer us away from evil conduct and towards the lines of conduct that will prove most beneficial for ourselves and others. When we mould our actions by the Five Precepts, we are acting in accordance with the Dhamma, avoiding future misery and building up protection and happiness for ourselves and others both here and in the hereafter. Thus the closer we live to the Five Precepts, the greater will be the blessing power of our lives.

* * *

7. Controlling the Emotions

An emotion is a state of deep feeling, an "inward stirring" which can act as a motivation for action. Emotions are often associated with the instincts, the inborn tendencies to act in specific ways in specific situations. Human beings are conditioned to a very great extent by their emotions, by their likes and dislikes. Too often their emotions are biased by self-interest and egotism, even to the extent that they overwhelm sense and reason, compelling us to act in ways that, in saner moments, we regard with dismay.

Emotions generally arise in response to the spontaneous evaluation of perceptions. A person evaluates his or her percepts -- of another person, an object, a situation -- as desirable or undesirable, as helpful or as threatening. On the basis of this evaluation an emotion will arise in response to the situation: desire for those things positively evaluated, aversion or fear towards those things seen in a negative light. Emotions may be harmful, such as lust, anger, and fear, or wholesome, such as sympathy and compassion. While desire and aversion are the prototypes of the unwholesome emotions, lovingkindness and compassion are outstanding examples of emotions that ennoble us and elevate human nature.

People vary widely in their emotional development and in the range and strength of their emotions. While one person is passionate and impulsive, another is cool and reflective; while one is quick to anger, another is patient; while one is emotionally impassive, another is capable of running through a wide range of emotions in less time than a finger snap. One important reason for these differences is that each individual brings along a different kammic inheritance of tendencies and character traits from previous lives. Whether emotions are repressed or expressed, indulged in or sublimated, depends on a combination of factors: innate temperament, family background, and the ethos and traditions of the larger society.

We cannot grow in the Dhamma or find happiness without some degree of emotional control. A person who easily gets angry spoils his own happiness and disturbs the peace of mind of others as well. Instinctive emotions are the raw material of character. If an instinctive impulse is misdirected or repressed, much harm and suffering may ensue. But if the energy that is normally channeled into this emotion is redirected towards a worthy object, the force of the emotion will be sublimated in a way that results in great benefit to oneself and to the community. For the Buddhist, the worthiest of all ideals is the attainment of Nibbana; hence it is the quest for this ideal that has the capacity to absorb and transform our emotional life. Such a noble ideal has the power of evoking and harmonizing all our emotional energies so that they guide us towards the realization of our ultimate good.

Without deliberate effort, emotions will not be under the direct control of the will. The Buddhist training aims at mastering the emotions. The first step in gaining such mastery is the observance of the Five Precepts. Practising the precepts in everyday life will help us to control the grosser forms of craving and emotion. The next step is to train the mind to control the emotions just as they begin to arise. This is accomplished by mindfulness: by objectively watching, with close attention, the emotions that arise and swiftly ascribing a name to them, a mental label thus: "mind with lust," "mind with anger," "mind with jealousy," "mind with sorrow," etc. Once we have named the emotion, we are then in a better position to let it go, without being swept away by it. The moment one calmly registers the fact that one is angry -- when one is aware of the fact that a mind with anger has arisen -- one then ceases to be angry. A mind that is occupied with the wholesome thought of mindful awareness has no scope within it simultaneously for an unwholesome thought of anger.

This same procedure should be adopted with any other harmful emotion that arises. At the start it may prove helpful if, during the course of the day, one mentally repeats to oneself a formula such as: "What am I feeling now?" or "What am I thinking now?" and immediately answers the question thus: "I am feeling angry," or "I am feeling jealous," etc. We should also investigate, even later, when and why anger -- or any other adverse emotion -- overwhelmed us //then//, and thus avoid such situations and responses in the future.

By patient and persistent practice we can gradually gain control over our harmful emotions. The discipline and effort involved is worthwhile, for it will bring greater harmony internally -- in one's own mind -- and externally, in one's relations with others. The key to such control is firm adherence to the basic precepts of morality and, above all, mindfulness of one's own thoughts and emotions.

* * *

8. Beware of Bias and Propaganda

Buddhism teaches the need for clear thinking, self-control, self-help, and meditation. Although each human being is endowed with a mind, very few of us use that mind to think for ourselves. The great majority of people today allow others to do their thinking for them.

The mind absorbs a great deal of poison from the outer environment by continuous exposure to suggestions from others. This mental passivity has become especially baneful with the development of the mass media. Radio, television, and newspapers, pulp journals and tabloids, blare their messages at us every minute of the day, and their power of penetration is reinforced by the ingrained human disposition to accept what we are told and to comply with what we are urged to do. Bombarded left and right by ten thousand inducements, we no longer think our own thoughts, feel our own emotions, or initiate our own actions; instead, we think as others want us to think, feel as others want us to feel, act in ways that will win the approval of our peers and superiors. The pull of the crowd has become irresistible.

Every time we open a newspaper, turn on the radio, or sit down before the television set, we are immediately subjected to propaganda, advertising, and subtle social suggestions. This is done daily, deliberately and systematically. All these media are teaching us to suspend our capacity for thought, or if we are to think at all, to think as they would like us to think. Newspapers, for instance, seek to command assent not only by their editorials and opinion columns, but by their layout, language, and lines of emphasis.

Those who exploit the media in this manner are generally small but powerful groups: the owners and sponsors of the media, advertising agencies, the masters of commerce. Such people are motivated primarily by self-interest, greed for wealth and power, a sense of self-importance. Often they play dominant roles in various walks of life, including politics, business, law, medicine, and education. Among the general public the role of reason tends to be subordinate to that of emotion, while mental inertia and indifference make the conquest of reason easier. Hence, by shaping public opinion through the manipulation of the media, a small minority is able to control the majority.

Those who comprise this small but powerful minority all have something to sell. Commercial advertisements make us want more and more goods that bring us no real happiness, no real peace of mind. We are told that our felicity depends on having a radio, television, video player, stereo set, and computer games. Yet, however much we deck ourselves with all these instruments of diversion, we still feel our lives painfully lacking.

The speed, power, and efficiency of all these technological and social developments within a purely materialistic society such as ours has led to a rising incidence of stress disease and mental breakdown. Those who do not crack under pressure find other escape routes, such as drugs, alcohol, and psychotic cults, while for those who cannot cope at all there remains the last resort: suicide, which has reached alarming proportions in our midst.

How then is a Buddhist to protect himself or herself from the baneful influences to which we are everywhere exposed in the modern world? As lay Buddhists we should always adopt a critical attitude towards the written and spoken word and should always apply mindfulness to protect ourselves from being emotionally swayed by those who seek to win our favour. We should stand back from the topic under review and examine it objectively from all angles. Only after appraising the alternatives should we arrive at a decision or evaluation.

When we hear a particular opinion being voiced, we should make an effort to find out who the writer or speaker is, what interests he or she represents, including political affiliations, religious leanings, and social background. We should also never forget that there are at least two sides to any issue, and that we are more likely to arrive at a correct stand if we first give unbiased consideration to both sides. Before arriving at a conclusion, one should gather all the relevant facts, maintain a calm mind free from emotional excitation, and prevent oneself from being swayed by preferences and anger, praise and blame. The same principle of objective thinking should also be applied to other matters in everyday life.

If we properly understand the working of kamma and rebirth, we will recognize that no one can be alike, and thus we will also avoid drawing comparisons; for this is a world of comparisons as well as of propaganda. The only meaningful comparison that one should make is between the person that one was a month ago, a year ago, or a decade ago, and the person that one is now: physically, intellectually, morally, and financially. If there has been no improvement, or insufficient improvement, one should inquire why this is so and remedy one's deficiencies without delay. If this annual stocktaking is done regularly, it will be most beneficial. Putting aside pride and prejudice, revising one's values and outlook, one will then lead a simpler, saner, and happier life.

* * *

9. A Happy Family Life

For the adult it is natural to love one person of the opposite sex. The lay Buddhist will recognize that there is nothing "sinful" or shameful in sex, and hence will not suffer from a guilt complex over sexual desire. At the same time he or she will be aware that sexual desire, like any other form of desire, must be regulated and controlled to avoid harm to oneself and to others.

In a successful marriage the contracting parties must realize that love is a sentiment far wider than sexual attraction. If one person really loves another, he or she has to learn to give without expecting anything in return. Only in this way can the problem of sex be solved satisfactorily. Further, the would-be partners should ask themselves, "What do I expect of my partner?" and should find out objectively to what extent the prospective partner has the requisite qualities. One might enlist the help of a trustworthy, balanced friend who has known the would-be partner for some time and might be in a better position to offer a correct evaluation. There are obvious dangers in being one's own marriage broker. Too often one is inclined to endow the would-be partner with qualities and virtues that she (or he) clearly lacks in the eyes of the unbiased observer. This danger has to be frankly acknowledged, for disillusionment might otherwise set in sooner or later, and then the stage is set for marital discontent and misery.

No doubt, in married life sex is important, but it must be kept in its proper place, as an expression of marital love. Sex is by no means the sole concern of married life; only when it is subordinated to personal love and affection does sexuality provide a truly satisfying emotional experience. Above and beyond sexual compatibility, a happy marriage calls for mutual understanding and adjustments, for sacrifices and selflessness, for tolerance and patience. Married life becomes truly a blessing rather than a curse when it is viewed as a partnership of two persons who are committed to think more of the partnership than they do of themselves, who are ready to make the mutual effort necessary to attain harmony and contentment.

Most married couples hope to have children. Children differ, for each brings his or her own kammic inheritance from many past lives, a kammic inheritance that includes potential tendencies that set the general tone and trend of the child's character. This fact indicates both the responsibilities and the limitations of the parents in the upbringing of their children.

The child spends most of the formative years of his or her life at home, and early in life learns to follow by imitation the values and lifestyle of the parents. Schools and other influential agencies cannot supplant or replace the parents. Buddhist parents should recognize their solemn obligation to serve as models for their children. They should therefore regularly observe the Five Precepts and show their children by example that the Dhamma yet lives and rules their daily lives. Parents must be aware that the child has immense potentials for both good and evil, and thus must fulfil their responsibility to help the child to develop his or her potential for good and to check the potential for evil. It is only if parents bestow their loving care and attention on their child that the child will be able to satisfy the hopes and aspirations of the parents.

The Buddha has advised parents to guide their children, to supply their needs, to see to their education, to give them in marriage at the proper time, and to attend to all other aspects of their well-being. Unfortunately, however, many parents today do not discharge these duties, with the result that too often children go astray. Responsible Buddhist parents must be prepared to forgo their own pleasure in order to attend to the upbringing of their children. They must realize that the home influence is ultimately what matters most in forming the child's character, outweighing all other outside influences to which the child may be exposed. In areas where the parents lack adequate expertise, they should be prepared to consult a non-technical manual on proper child rearing.

The first five years of a child's life are the most crucial in the formation of his or her character, and it is at this stage that they are most susceptible to the influence of the parents. Thereafter the needs of the child change, and will continue to change radically at different stages of development. Parents should remember this and meet the new needs as they arise.

In the early years three factors are essential for balanced and wholesome growth: parental love and affection; a stable home environment; and scope for creative activity and personal initiative. Young children learn largely by imitation. If parents show emotional maturity, avoid quarrels, respect and trust each other, and do likewise with their children, then the children will develop characters that are sound both morally and psychologically. When the child is brought up with love and understanding, with insight into his or her changing needs, nourished with high ideals and lofty aspirations, then he or she will have a secure foundation upon which to build a character and a future. In this way the very first steps along the Buddha's path will have been well planted.

Adolescence is a period of stress and strain, when children may be inclined to rebel against parental authority. It is therefore at this stage that the greatest love and understanding are called for. In adolescence, as the sexual instinct awakens, sensible Buddhist parents should be capable of guiding their children and helping them to adjust to the changes taking place in their bodies and their lives. When children ask their parents questions about sex, the parents should be ready to answer them calmly and briefly in a matter-of-fact way, just as they would answer any other question. If parents are unable to tell the adolescent children the facts of life in an unself-conscious manner they might give them a suitable book to enable them to instruct themselves about the subject. Above all, in this age of sexually provocative entertainment, irresponsible promiscuity, and an exploding AIDS epidemic, withholding vital information is not a means of protecting the youngster but of exposing him or her to danger.

When parental control, supervision, and proper guidance are lacking, the children often incline to delinquency and drugs. Parents should therefore take greater interest in their children, should spend more time with them, should know how they use their leisure, and should make the acquaintance of their friends. Real problem children are few; it is only problem parents who are many.

As the child reaches maturity it is the duty of the parents to help him wisely choose a suitable career as well as a mate, but the child's wishes in these spheres have to be respected. To order the young person about as if he or she were still a child is only to invite trouble.

Since we live in a world of keen competition in many areas of life, wise Buddhist parents will limit the size of their family in order to give their children the best. In developing countries like Sri Lanka, where the rate of reproduction is generally higher than the rate of production of real wealth, this is a necessary measure to eliminate poverty, especially among the working classes in both town and countryside, whose families are generally large with many dependants. Buddhism is not opposed to population control, except by means of abortion, and with the world's resources dwindling today under dense population pressure, Buddhist parents should recognize the need for family limitation to ensure the best for the children.

In a country like Sri Lanka it is the duty of the state to popularize family limitation by making freely available safe, effective, and inexpensive methods of birth control. Production that is centred on the population at large -- rather than on enhancing the wealth of a privileged few -- using appropriate technology, with just distribution of resources and extensive family planning, will increase real wealth and help to improve the quality of life of the masses, provided they also cultivate a wise sense of values. Otherwise they will always remain poor.

The moral and spiritual edification of the children should accompany their physical and emotional development. As they grow up, parents should teach them the essentials of the Buddha-Dhamma, using simple language and everyday examples. They should explain the working of the moral law of kamma and rebirth, should instruct them in the proper rules of conduct, and should clarify the reasons for practising virtue in daily life. Furthermore, in a Buddhist country children should be regularly taken to the temple, especially on quiet days. They should be enrolled in Dhamma school if such is available, and should be encouraged to ask their questions and discuss their problems with wise and virtuous bhikkhus. The Dhamma, after all, is intended to guide us in how to live this very life we are leading now. It is the art of happiness here and now, and the path to deliverance in the hereafter.

Materialism is steadily eroding traditional values, moral, spiritual, and social. The influence of materialism now reaches even the remote villages, the ancient strongholds of the Buddhist way of life. But young people who have been rightly brought up by Buddhist parents to discover the value of the Dhamma for themselves are unlikely to be led astray.

* * *

10. The Practice of Benevolence

The desire to do good, to bring about the happiness and well-being of others, is effectively cultivated in Buddhism by the systematic practice of the four "sublime attitudes" (//brahmavihara//): lovingkindness (//metta//), compassion (//karuna//), altruistic joy (//mudita//), and equanimity (//upekkha//). By cultivating these qualities a Buddhist can gradually remove the mental defilements such as hatred, cruelty, and envy, and bring into being the most exalted virtues. The sublime attitudes elevate human beings to a divine-like stature; they break the barriers that separate individuals and groups; they build bridges more solid than those constructed of stone and steel.

1. //Metta// is goodwill, lovingkindness, universal love; a feeling of friendliness and heartfelt concern for all living beings, human or non-human, in all situations. The chief mark of //metta// is a benevolent attitude: a keen desire to promote the welfare of others. //Metta// subdues the vice of hatred in all its varied shades: anger, ill-will, aversion, and resentment. The Buddha said:

> Hatreds do not cease through hatreds
> Anywhere at anytime.
> Through love alone do they cease:
> This is an eternal law.
> (Dhp. v. 5)

This stanza is of special significance to us in this nuclear era when the most appalling destructiveness has erupted all over the globe. Peace will never be achieved by meeting force with force, bombs with bombs, violence with retaliation. //Metta// or lovingkindness is the only effective answer to violence and destructiveness, whether by conventional weapons or nuclear missiles.

2. //Karuna// is the attitude conveyed by such terms as compassion, sympathy, pity, and mercy. Its basic characteristic is sympathy for all who suffer, and it arouses a desire to relieve or remove the pain and suffering of others. //Karuna// helps to eliminate callousness and indifference to others' woes. It is the direct antidote to cruelty, another vice common in the world today. It is compassion that prompts one to serve others selflessly, expecting nothing, not even gratitude, in return.

3. //Mudita// is altruistic joy, appreciative joy: the desire to see others rejoicing in their happiness, the ability to share the happiness and success of others. This attitude is the complement of //karuna//: while //karuna// shares the sorrow of others, //mudita// shares their joy. //Mudita// is the direct antidote to envy. Envy arises over the good fortune of others: it resents those who achieve position, prestige, power, and success. But one who practises //mudita// will not only be happy when others do well, but will try to promote their progress and welfare. Hence this attitude is of vital importance for achieving social concord and peace.

4. //Upekkha//, the last of the four sublime attitudes, is equanimity. //Upekkha// establishes an even or balanced mind in an unbalanced world with fluctuating fortunes and circumstances: gain and loss, fame and ill-repute, praise and blame, pleasure and pain. //Upekkha// also looks upon all beings impartially, as heirs to the results of their own actions, without attachment or aversion. //Upekkha// is the serene neutrality of the one who knows.

The constant, methodical, and deliberate cultivation of these sublime virtues in everyday life transforms the attitudes and outlook of the practitioner. They should be the foundation of all Buddhist social action, as well as of individual and collective peace and harmony. Buddhist social welfare work may take many forms, but what is most essential is the spirit in which it is performed. This spirit should be marked by the subordination of the private good to the good of the whole. For Buddhist social work to be of real value, action should spring from genuine love, sympathy, and understanding for one's fellow humans, guided by knowledge and training. Welfare work should be the perfect expression of compassion, untouched by condescension, washed clean of pride -- even of the pride of doing good. It should be a sheer manifestation of the brotherhood of all human beings.

The four sublime attitudes should be diligently cultivated with unremitting effort by every true follower of the Master. These qualities never become obsolete. They convey a universal message which transforms us into universal human beings.

* * *

11. Freeing the Mind

Mind occupies the pre-eminent place in Buddhism, for everything that one says or does first arises in the mind as a thought. To have a well-trained mind is indeed to possess a treasure. When a person trains the mind, turns inward to examine and cleanse his own mind, he will find therein a vast storehouse of happiness. Real happiness is a quality of the mind which has to be sought and found in the mind. The Buddha teaches that non-attachment to worldly pleasures is a greater happiness than the enjoyment of worldly pleasures. Nibbana is the highest happiness, the happiness of relief from suffering and from repeated birth, and this happiness is only to be attained by freeing the mind from its defilements.

The misguided worldling thinks otherwise. In his view the enjoyment of sensual pleasures is the only real happiness. He forgets, however, that sensual happiness arises merely from the gratification of desire, and thus that this happiness must fade when the desired object is obtained. Nor will the multiplication of desires make sensual pleasure permanent, for there is no permanence in the passing. The pursuit of sensual pleasures ends only in restlessness and dissatisfaction.

The aim of Buddhist mental culture is to gain direct intuitive knowledge of the real nature of existence by systematic training of the mind through meditation. This practice issues in detachment and thus frees the mind from its delusions. Meditation leads the mind from the pain-laden things of the world to the sorrowless, transcendent state of deliverance, Nibbana. The basic cause of rebirth and suffering is ignorance of the true nature of life. We consider what is passing, unsatisfactory, and empty to be permanent, a source of true happiness, and substantial. This delusion sustains the craving for more existence and leads to the accumulation of kamma. Meditation is designed to lead step-by-step to the dissolution of these delusions and thereby to freedom from the grip of craving.

There are two kinds of meditation recognized in Buddhism: the development of tranquillity (//samatha-bhavana//), which emphasizes concentration, and the development of insight (//vipassana-bhavana//), which emphasizes wisdom. These two types of meditation respectively correspond to the second and third groups of the Noble Eightfold Path, the concentration group and the wisdom group. Concentration means one-pointedness of the mind, the ability to fix the mind on a single object to the exclusion of all else. Concentration is not an end in itself, but to be developed primarily because it is the basis for wisdom, the ability to see things exactly as they are. It is this wisdom that frees the mind from bondage.

To train the mind is not at all easy, for the mind has long been accustomed to flow in the channels of greed, hatred, and delusion; through ages we have relished sense pleasures, raged with anger, wallowed in torpor, fidgeted restlessly, and vacillated with doubt. Such habits are indeed difficult to break. Moreover, it is the very nature of the untrained mind to wander from one idea to another. Thus when the meditator sits down to begin the practice, strange thoughts may dance before his mind. To overcome these disturbances, the Buddha has taught five methods of expelling distracting thoughts:

1. Develop a good thought opposed to the distracting one; for example, develop a thought of lovingkindness to expel a thought of hatred.

2. Reflect on the evil consequences of distracting thoughts; for example, ill will or anger may lead to harsh words or an exchange of blows, to making enemies, or to something worse.

3. Turn the mind away from the disturbing thought and fix it on some beneficial idea or towards some useful activity.

4. Trace the cause of the uprisen evil thought and reflect on whether it will serve any useful purpose.

5. Struggle directly with the evil thought to crush it and subdue it.

At the outset meditation will be a continual effort to pull the mind back whenever it strays from the subject of meditation. It will seem impossible to focus the attention on the selected subject for more than a few seconds at a stretch. With continued practice, however, one will refine one's skills until one can keep the mind focused steadily and calmly on the chosen topic for increasingly longer periods. Then the practice becomes more engaging, more rewarding, and also less tiring. Eventually one's efforts will culminate in one-pointedness of mind, //samadhi//.

With the attainment of the one-pointed mind, the meditator turns this pure, steady, clear mind to the contemplation of existence itself. This marks the beginning of //vipassana-bhavana//, the meditative development of insight. The meditator mindfully investigates his own compound of the "five aggregates." He sees that the body, or form, is made up of changing physical qualities, while mind itself consists of fleeting mental factors: feeling, perception, mental formations (intentions, emotions, thoughts, desires, etc.), and consciousness. He sees that these all occur in mutual dependence, all in a flow. There is no substantial self, no immortal soul within them to be called "I" or "mine." As the impermanence, the unsatisfactoriness, and the selfless nature of the five aggregates become manifest to the meditator, he realizes that nothing conditioned is worth clinging to; for everything conditioned is fleeting, and in the fleeting it is impossible to find stable happiness. This is //panna//, wisdom, the third and final stage in the Noble Eightfold Path.

With the development of wisdom, ignorance ceases in all its forms and shades. Craving and kamma, the fuel for the flame of becoming, is exhausted, and no more fresh fuel is supplied. Hence the flame of existence burns out for lack of fuel. When such a person who has reached the goal passes away, he no longer takes rebirth in any realm of becoming. He has attained Nibbana, the Deathless.

* * *

12. Mindfulness of Breathing

Mindfulness of breathing (//anapanasati//) is an excellent subject of meditation particularly useful to the busy layperson, as it can be practised safely by anyone, anywhere, at any time. To practise this type of meditation, one should first adopt a seated meditation posture. Those who can sit comfortably in full lotus or half-lotus posture may adopt those positions; those who find this difficult may assume any cross-legged sitting posture that enables them to hold upright the upper part of the body; those who find even this difficult may sit on a straight-backed chair. The torso should be held erect but not stiff; the hands should be placed one over the other on the lap; and (for those who sit in a chair) the feet should rest on the floor.

The meditator should then breathe calmly and naturally, mentally following the whole breath in and out without a break in attentiveness. At the outset one should simply breathe in and out without reflecting about it. One may fix the attention on the nostrils or upper lip, wherever the breath is felt most distinctly as one breathes in and out. There the attention should remain.

As one proceeds with the observation of the breath, one becomes more and more deeply concentrated upon it. One then feels light in body and mind, very calm and peaceful; one may even feel as if one were floating in the air. When strong calm is established and the mind becomes one-pointed, one may then turn one's attention towards the development of insight (//vipassana//), aiming to gain direct insight into the true nature of existence. This type of meditation, when successful, leads by stages to the realization of Nibbana.

Apart from its ultimate benefits, mindfulness of breathing has an immediate value that can be seen in one's daily life. It promotes detachment and objectivity. It allows one the mental distance needed to arrive at wise decisions in the countless difficulties of daily life. Regular practice of this meditation brings increased concentration and self-control, improved mindfulness, and is also conducive to healthy and relaxed living.

* * *

13. Facing Death with Equanimity

Death is the only absolutely certain thing in life, yet how many of us plan for it and prepare ourselves adequately in advance to face it calmly? All human beings must die. The body disintegrates, breaks apart, and turns to ashes and dust. The only thing we own that remains with us beyond death is our kamma, our intentional deeds. Our deeds continue, bringing into being a new form of life until all craving is extinguished. We are born and evolve according to the quality of our kamma. Good deeds will produce a good rebirth, bad deeds a bad rebirth.

The materialistic view that a human being is merely a biological result of the union of sperm and ovum which utterly terminates in death is inadequate as a total explanation of human life. Nature and nurture, heredity and the environment, cannot by themselves explain, for example, why twins born of the same parents, physically almost identical, enjoying equal privileges, brought up in the same environment, often exhibit widely different characteristics, mental, moral, and emotional. Moreover, science would meet difficulties accounting for the existence of infant prodigies and the recollection of past lives, particularly by children.

A realistic Buddhist, knowing that death is inevitable, plans for it and trains himself to face it with equanimity. He also knows that the best way to plan for death is to lead a virtuous and upright life. Thus the devoted Buddhist regularly observes the Five Precepts, performs many kind and generous acts, and endeavours to lessen his greed and hate. The fact that one has led a blameless life will be an added solace and source of strength at death. The fear of death then loses its force and sting.

In preparing for death, a householder should fulfil his obligations to his family, to others, and to his religion. In practice, this means leaving behind a sufficient income for one's family, making out a proper last will, planning one's own funeral arrangements, and providing funds for the maintenance of virtuous and learned monks who observe the rules of discipline and who can preach the correct Dhamma.

The Buddha teaches his lay followers, as well as the monks and nuns, that they should often reflect on the inevitability of death: "Death is certain, life is uncertain" (//maranam niyatam, jivitam aniyatam//). These words are a clarion call reminding us of the need to put our own house in order, morally and philosophically, without delay, and to face each day as if it were our last. The world of today would indeed be a happier and safer place to live if people the world over would only pay heed to this call.

* * *

14. The Good Buddhist

The preceding sections of this essay will help the Buddhist lay follower to understand, from a practical angle, the main points of the Buddha's teachings as they bear on the conduct of daily life. Constant practice of these principles will ensure that they are built into his character, enabling him to develop into a well-rounded human being, a centre of sanity in a confused world adrift in fashionable philosophies full of empty promises.

At the very minimum a lay follower of the Buddha must keep the Five

Precepts, which enables him to develop virtue in regard to his bodily and verbal behaviour. But one should not stop with this. One who seeks the true perfection of happiness must also attend to the cultivation of the mind. One must be mindful of the arising of unwholesome states such as greed, anger, and delusion, and know how to deal with them effectively when they threaten to throw one off balance. One should proceed even further and attempt to cultivate the mind systematically through the practice of meditation for tranquillity and insight.

The society in which we live is a reflection of the minds of the human beings who have created that society. If our society has become corrupt, rife with immorality, and destructive of the higher potentials of human nature, that is because the people who comprise that society have allowed themselves to drift into corrupt and immoral states of mind. The quality of a society inevitably rests on the quality of the lives led by the persons who make up that society. One single individual may not be able to change the whole society for the better. But each one of us can, at any rate, transform the world of our own mind.

How is this to be done? By observing the Five Precepts flawlessly, by being as mindful as possible in everyday life, by cleansing the mind of its blemishes, by cultivating the four sublime states, by meditating energetically every day, by listening to discourses on the Dhamma and clarifying one's doubts about the teaching. By following these guidelines one is sure to reap their fruits: peace of mind, contentment, the absence of inner conflicts even in the midst of our confusing and chaotic world.

A good Buddhist should ever seek the opportunity to do deeds of mercy, kindness, and charity. He should be keen on helping those less fortunate than himself. When practising giving, however, one should give with discrimination, as the Buddha advises: //viceyya danam databbam//. Thus the most needy will be benefited with the things they need most.

A good Buddhist should set apart a few minutes every day to review the day's happenings, and to see whether or not he has strayed from the Master's teachings. If so, he should inquire why he has done so in order to avoid a future repetition. Methodical reading on the Dhamma will also help one to put the whole of life into the right perspective. It is a useful habit to read daily an inspiring discourse of the Buddha, such as the Mahamangala Sutta, or to recite some verses of the Dhammapada and reflect for a few moments on their relevance to one's own life. Doing so will help one to forget one's trifling worries and troubles, to clarify one's thinking, and to recall the ultimate values and truths upon which one should build one's life.

The Buddha's teachings consist of virtue, concentration, and wisdom. Only with their practice will the Buddha-Dhamma flourish; when they are neglected, the Buddha-Dhamma will decline. This fact should always be remembered by those who are anxious to avert the decline and disappearance of the Sasana. As religion withers the world over, more and more attention is paid to empty rites, rituals, and ceremonies, while little or no attention is paid to the actual practice of the principles of religion as they bear on real life. It is this, however, that matters most.

By following the above guidelines, a good Buddhist will grow in all aspects of the Dhamma. These guidelines will help to mould one's whole personality, to instil the true principles of the Dhamma into one's understanding, to train the emotions and to discipline the will. Doing so will conduce to the ultimate best interest of oneself, and help one to make one's life a blessing for others as well.

May you and I and all other beings
be well and happy.

* * * * * * * *

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Robert Bogoda was born in 1918 in Colombo, the business capital of Sri Lanka. His secondary education was cut short by the sudden demise of his father, which compelled him to work at a modest job as a teacher. While engaged in teaching, he obtained by self study the B.Sc. (Econ.) and M.Sc. (Econ.) degrees from the University of London, specializing in Social Administration. Now retired, he pursues his interests in Buddhism and social welfare. The essay "A Simple Guide to Life" was written against this background.

* * * * * * * *

THE BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY

The BPS is an approved charity dedicated to making known the Teaching of the Buddha, which has a vital message for people of all creeds. Founded in 1958, the BPS has published a wide variety of books and booklets covering a great range of topics. Its publications include accurate annotated translations of the Buddha's discourses, standard reference works, as well as original contemporary expositions of Buddhist thought and practice. These works present Buddhism as it truly is -- a dynamic force which has influenced receptive minds for the past 2500 years and is still as relevant today as it was when it first arose. A full list of our publications will be sent upon request with an enclosure of U.S. $1.00 or its equivalent to cover air mail postage.

Write to:

The Hony. Secretary
BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy Sri Lanka

or

The Barre Center for Buddhist Studies
Lockwood Road
Barre, MA 01005 USA
Tel: (508) 355-2347

* * * * * * * *

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TITLE OF WORK: A Simple Guide to LIfe (Wheel Publication No. 397/398)
FILENAME: WHEEL397.ZIP
AUTHOR: Robert Bogoda
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: c/o Buddhist Publication Society
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: Buddhist Publication Society
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy, Sri Lanka
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: Buddhist Publication Society (1994)
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1994
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: September 1995
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

[end]

A Simple Guide to Life, by Robert Bogoda (Buddhist Publication Society "Wheel" Publication No. 397/398). This booklet aims to explain, in clear and simple terms, how to live a proper Buddhist lay life in the midst of one's worldly responsibilities.

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TITLE OF WORK: A Simple Guide to LIfe (Wheel Publication No. 397/398)
FILENAME: WHEEL397.ZIP
AUTHOR: Robert Bogoda
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: c/o Buddhist Publication Society
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: Buddhist Publication Society
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy, Sri Lanka
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: Buddhist Publication Society (1994)
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1994
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: September 1995
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

THE BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY

The BPS is an approved charity dedicated to making known the Teaching of the Buddha, which has a vital message for people of all creeds. Founded in 1958, the BPS has published a wide variety of books and booklets covering a great range of topics. Its publications include accurate annotated translations of the Buddha's discourses, standard reference works, as well as original contemporary expositions of Buddhist thought and practice. These works present Buddhism as it truly is -- a dynamic force which has influenced receptive minds for the past 2500 years and is still as relevant today as it was when it first arose. A full list of our publications will be sent upon request with an enclosure of U.S. $1.00 or its equivalent to cover air mail postage.

Write to:

The Hony. Secretary
BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy Sri Lanka

or

The Barre Center for Buddhist Studies
Lockwood Road
Barre, MA 01005 USA
Tel: (508) 355-2347

A SIMPLE GUIDE TO LIFE

by Robert Bogoda

ISBN 955-24-0125-9

Wheel Publication No. 397/398

Copyright 1994 Buddhist Publication Society

BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
KANDY Sri Lanka

* * *

DharmaNet Edition 1995

Transcribed directly from BPS Pagemaker files
Formatting: John Bullitt

This electronic edition is offered for free distribution
via DharmaNet by arrangement with the publisher.

DharmaNet International
P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley CA 94704-4951

* * * * * * * *

CONTENTS

Introduction
A Simple Guide to Life
1. The Right View of Life

2. Benefits of Right Understanding
3. A Life Plan
4. Obstacles
5. Relaxation
6. Observing the Five Precepts
7. Controlling the Emotions
8. Beware of Bias and Propaganda
9. A Happy Family Life
10. The Practice of Benevolence
11. Freeing the Mind
12. Mindfulness of Breathing
13. Facing Death with Equanimity
14. The Good Buddhist

About the Author

* * * * * * * *

INTRODUCTION

Innumerable books have been written about Buddhism, but most of these are far too exhaustive, too specialized, or too scholarly to be of much practical help to the busy lay Buddhist in search of concise guidance. A short, clear, and simple handbook on how to live a proper Buddhist lay life was therefore a much felt need. The present essay attempts to fill that gap by providing exactly what its title offers: A Simple Guide to Life.

For easy reference the essay has been divided into short, convenient sections. The first section is theoretical in emphasis. It attempts to fix in the reader's mind the essential principles of the Buddha's teaching, without complicated and sophisticated explanations. The principles discussed here should serve as a clear-cut philosophy of life, a framework which illuminates the meaning and purpose of the Buddhist life. These principles will enable the lay Buddhist to understand his or her place in the larger scheme of things, to order priorities, and to devise a proper way to achieve them. The lack of a clear philosophy of life, so widespread today, is largely responsible for the steady decline in ethical standards, both individually and socially, in Sri Lanka and in the world as a whole.

The second section is concerned with the practical implications of adopting the understanding of existence sketched in the first section. We here examine the visible benefits of accepting the Buddha-Dhamma as a way of thinking and living; in this section we will also throw a sidelong glance at what happens to a society when spiritual values are abandoned in favour of an exclusive stress on material development.

The next two sections discuss respectively the need to draw up an individual life plan and the obstacles likely to impede the successful implementation of that plan. The central problem of a Buddhist lay follower is to combine a successful lay life with Buddhist moral and spiritual principles. This problem can be solved by organizing one's life as a lay Buddhist within the framework of the Noble Eightfold Path, which represents the Master's teaching in practice. Because some degree of economic security is essential to growth in the Dhamma, the Buddha was concerned with the material welfare of his lay disciples as much as with their spiritual development. He did not deter them from seeking mundane happiness, but he stressed that in pursuing mundane goals, the lay Buddhist should take great care to avoid breaking the basic rules of morality. These rules are summed up in the Five Precepts of virtue, the minimum code of ethics to be followed by a Buddhist householder. As the Five Precepts are thus of such fundamental importance to a Buddhist lay follower, a separate section is devoted to discussing them.

The remaining sections of the essay show how to apply the basic principles of Buddhism to the other major areas of a Buddhist householder's life. The essay ends with a section briefly describing what is expected of an ideal lay Buddhist in daily life. The guiding maxim of the entire essay is: A little well done is better than a lot poorly done.

To sum up: The Buddha's teaching, which is unique in its completeness, is the most rational and consistent plan for wholesome living. It is not based on dogma or blind faith, but on facts and verifiable conclusions. It therefore offers a reasonable way of life which should be attractive to any thinking person. Moreover, the Dhamma is completely compatible with the advances of modern science and does not require clever reinterpretations to avoid clashes with scientific discoveries.

The mere fact of accepting Buddhism intellectually, however, will not ensure happiness and security. To yield its fruit the Buddha's teaching has to be utilized intelligently and constructively in all the activities of our daily life. It has to be adopted, adapted, and applied until all its basic principles are absorbed and made habitual by repeated practice, for a theoretical knowledge of Buddhism is insufficient in itself.

If one wishes to make changes in the changing personality that one now is, these changes will take time and patience. The lofty heights of Nibbana are not to be reached by a sudden leap but by quiet, persistent endeavour over a long period, guided by the Master's teaching. Let us not forget that a journey of a thousand miles begins with a single step. Daily practice, beginning with the strict observance of the Five Precepts, is the way to orderly progress along the path. Even a little practice every day brings the practitioner a little nearer to the goal each day.

I take this opportunity to offer the merit of this gift of Dhamma most gratefully and most devotedly to my parents, now no more. Such a gift excels all other gifts: //Sabbadanam dhammadanam jinati//. May it redound to their happiness.

* * * * * * * *

A SIMPLE GUIDE TO LIFE

1. The Right View of Life

To be happy, successful, and secure, we must first learn to see ourselves and the world as they truly are and should then shape our everyday activities in keeping with this view. We must also look for solutions to our problems in terms of the relationship of cause and effect, for the universal law of causality operates in the field of human behaviour as much as it does in the physical world.

The foundation for a fruitful life is an understanding of the moral law of kamma. Kamma is volitional action, action that expresses morally determinate intentions or volitions. We need to recognize clearly that wholesome and unwholesome deeds produce corresponding good and bad results. As a person sows, so shall he reap. Good begets good, and evil begets evil. This retributive power is inherent in volitional action or kamma.

Kamma is also cumulative. Not only do our deeds generate pleasant and painful results, but in their cumulative force they also determine our character. The deeds we perform in any one life are transmitted to future lives in the form of dispositions. These dispositions constitute our character traits.

Inherent in the action is the power of producing its due result. This happens without the intervention or help of any external agency. Buddhism denies the existence of a Creator-God. Kamma is neither fate nor predestination, but our own willed action considered as capable of producing results. Understanding the kammic moral law of cause and effect, we will learn to control our actions in order to serve our own welfare as well as to promote the good of others.

There are ten unwholesome courses of action (//akusala-kammapatha//), deeds which originate from the defilements of greed, hatred, and delusion. These are: killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, slander, harsh speech, useless talk, covetousness, ill will, and false views. Contrary to these, there are ten bases of merit (//punnakiriya-vatthu//), deeds which spring from the virtuous qualities of detachment, goodwill, and wisdom, and which generate wholesome kamma: generosity, morality, meditation, reverence, service, transference of merit, rejoicing in the good deeds of others, hearing the Dhamma, expounding the Dhamma, and straightening out one's views.

It is lack of right understanding and ignorance of the underlying laws of life that account for the prevalence of materialism in today's world, even in the traditional homelands of the Buddha-Dhamma. When people become convinced that everything perishes at death, they lose sight of lofty ethical ideals and become indifferent to the long-range consequences of their deeds. Their entire lives revolve around the blind pursuit of sensual pleasures. Thus we find that today people worship money regardless of how it is earned, hunt for pleasure no matter where it is found, chase power and fame regardless of the cost to their personal integrity.

Ignorance of the law is no valid excuse in a court of law, and so it is with regard to the moral law of kamma: the law operates regardless of whether one believes in it or not, due effects following from their respective causes. Just as an infant will get burnt if it touches fire regardless of whether or not it understands the dangers in playing with fire, so those who violate the laws of morality will have to face the consequences when their kamma ripens, regardless of whether or not they accept the teaching of kamma.

Just as a shadow is connected with an object, so is rebirth connected with kamma. Craving (//tanha//), selfish desire, prompts us to do life-affirming deeds, kamma, volitional action. No force in nature is ever lost, and moral energy is no exception. So long as craving and ignorance remain in the mind, kamma must find expression at death. The inevitable fruit of craving for existence is rebirth.

Buddhism affirms the continuity of the individual life-flux at death, but denies the existence of a permanent soul. Mind is a flux of mental processes without any persisting core, yet this flux, though insubstantial, continues from life to life as long as it is driven on by the thirst for more becoming. The mind of a dying person, owing to the latent craving for continued existence, grasps at some object, idea, or feeling connected with an action done during his lifetime, and this grasping vitalizes an appropriate germ of life. The new form of life may be human or non-human, in keeping with the kamma or moral forces generated during the deceased's lifetime. The germ of life kindled by the process of rebirth is endowed with an initial consciousness (called the patisandhicitta) in which lie latent all the past impressions, characteristics, and tendencies of that particular individual. Hence death leads to birth and birth to death. Rebirth is thus possible without a transmigrating soul.

The twin Buddhist doctrines of kamma and rebirth are the "middle way" that provides a satisfactory answer to the problem of life. The middle way avoids the extremes of theism and materialism, preserving moral accountability without the problems raised by positing an almighty yet benevolent God. A human being is the visible expression of his or her own past action. One is born from one's past kamma, supported by one's present kamma, and at death goes where one's accumulated kamma leads one.

Buddhism teaches that human beings evolve according to the quality of the kamma they have performed during their lifetime. This supplies a rational basis for morality in place of the commandments of a Creator-God. According to the Buddha's teachings, there can be regression ("kammic descent") from the human plane to subhuman realms such as the animal world, and progress ("kammic ascent") from the human plane to the heavenly planes. Taking into account the dangers of a fall to subhuman realms, one should always act with care. Virtue, based on a righteous code of conduct, protects one from regression and ensures spiritual progress.

A true follower of the Buddha accepts the moral law of kamma as just, recognizing it as the chief reason for the many inequalities among human beings in regard to health, wealth, and wisdom. He also learns to face life's losses, disappointments, failures, and adversities calmly, without complaining; for he knows that they are the result of his own past misdeeds. If he asks himself: "Why has this happened to me?" the answer will be expressed in terms of action and result. He will try to solve his problems to the best of his ability and will adjust himself to the new situation when external change is not possible. He will not act rashly, nor fall into despair, nor try to escape his difficulties by resorting to drink, drugs, or suicide, as so often happens in Sri Lanka. Such conduct only shows emotional immaturity and ignorance of the Buddha's teachings.

For a genuine Buddhist, then, one's everyday activities, by way of thought, word, and deed, are more important than anything else in life. A proper understanding of the Buddhist moral law of kamma and rebirth is essential for happy and sensible living and for the welfare of the world. In the Buddha's own words:

> The slayer gets a slayer in his turn;
> The conqueror gets one who conquers him;
> The abuser wins abuse, the annoyer frets.
> Thus by the evolution of the deed,
> A man who spoils is spoiled in his turn."

> (Samyutta Nikaya, Kosala Samyutta, trans. by Sir Robert Chalmers)

Although we imagine ourselves to be a self -- a real substantial individual -- according to the Buddha's teaching we are in reality nothing more than a flame-like process, an ever-changing combination of matter and mind, neither of which is the same for two consecutive moments. All the components of our being are impermanent, unsatisfactory, and devoid of self. Life is not a being, an identity, but a becoming; not a product, but a process. There is in actuality no doer, only a doing; no thinker, only a thinking; no goer, only a going.

The Buddha teaches us how to put an end to the beginningless cycle of rebirths in which we undergo the manifold kinds of suffering. The way to end the cycle is by removing the causes that drive it forward life after life. The principal cause is craving, which assumes many forms. Craving impels a person to engage in action (kamma) designed to satisfy the craving, yet as craving is essentially insatiable the result is rebirth.

Craving is a powerful mental force latent in all unenlightened beings. The cause of craving is ignorance (//avijja//) of the true nature of life: not knowing that life is an ever-changing process, subject to suffering, and totally devoid of a self or core. All life, wherever it is found, bears this same nature: a process stamped with the three marks of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and egolessness (//anicca//, //dukkha//, //anatta//).

The Buddha realized for himself the true nature of life and through this realization attained to something beyond life and death: a reality that is permanent, blissful, and deathless. This state cannot be described but has to be realized inwardly as a matter of direct personal experience; it has to be attained for oneself and by oneself. This ultimate reality, where thought expires in experience, is Nibbana, the goal of the Buddhist path.

The Buddha's teachings may thus be condensed into these four verifiable truths, called the Four Noble Truths: suffering, its cause (i.e. craving), its cessation (i.e. Nibbana), and the way leading to cessation of suffering (i.e. the Noble Eightfold Path). These are eternal truths, truths that do not change and cannot change with time and place.

The only way for us to avoid unhappiness and dissatisfaction is to eliminate the craving that gives birth to it; for everything eagerly sought for and clung to is impermanent. Nothing lasts forever -- no person, no object, no experience. Whatever arises must perish, and to cling to the perishable sooner or later ends in suffering. It is by no means easy to eliminate craving; in fact, it is the most difficult challenge of all. But when we do so, we will reach a state of inward perfection and unshakable calm.

We can reach the end of suffering by cultivating the Noble Eightfold Path in its three stages of morality, concentration, and wisdom -- //sila//, //samadhi//, //panna//. Morality purifies conduct and concentration makes the mind calm. When the mind is calm and concentrated, wisdom arises, clear insight, the knowledge and vision of things as they really are. With the arising of wisdom, craving in all its forms is forever destroyed; the flame of life is then extinguished for want of fuel. The Unconditioned has been won -- Nibbana, which is deathless, blissful, and real.

The Noble Eightfold Path consists of the following eight factors, inter-related and inter-connected, ordered into three groups:

Wisdom group (//panna//)
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

1. Right understanding: knowledge of the true nature of life; understanding the Four Noble Truths.

2. Right thought: thought free from sensuality, ill-will, and aggression.

Morality group (//sila//)
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

3. Right speech: abstinence from falsehood, slander, harsh speech, and useless words.

4. Right action: abstinence from killing, stealing, and sexual misconduct.

5. Right livelihood: avoiding any means of livelihood that involves harm or exploitation of others.

Concentration group (//samadhi//)
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

6. Right effort: training the mind to avoid unwholesome mental states and to develop wholesome mental states.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

7. Right mindfulness: developing the power of attentiveness and awareness in regard to the "four foundations of mindfulness" -- body, feelings, mind, and mental phenomena.

8. Right concentration: cultivation of one-pointedness of mind.

These eight factors summarize the Buddha's teaching and its practice. They are the very heart of the Buddha-Dhamma. It is not enough to know and admire the Dhamma; it must be practised in daily life, for the difficulty of knowing what is right is nothing compared to the difficulty of putting it into practice. We really know something only when we do it repeatedly, when we make it part of our nature. The practical side of the Dhamma is the threefold training in morality, concentration, and wisdom, which collectively constitute the Noble Eightfold Path, the "middle way" discovered by the Blessed One for the realization of Nibbana.

Monastics and laypeople alike tread the same path. Both start from the same foundation, right understanding; both pursue the same goal, Nibbana. The only difference lies in the degree of commitment to the practice and the pace of progress. But whether as a layperson or as a monk, the systematic practice of the Eightfold Path will foster the growth of the wholesome qualities leading to liberation -- generosity, goodwill, and wisdom. As these qualities gradually reach maturity, they will weaken and finally snap the fetters of greed, hatred, and delusion which have held us for so long in bondage to the round of rebirth and suffering.

* * *

2. Benefits of Right Understanding

1. Right understanding is the foundation for developing a proper sense of values, so sorely lacking in our age. Without right understanding our vision is dimmed and the way is lost; all our efforts will be misguided and misdirected, all our plans for individual and social development must flounder and fail. Such plans will have to be based on the Eightfold Path with its emphasis on self-effort, self-control, and respect for the individual.

When wrong views prevail we will operate with a perverted sense of values: we will fling ourselves into the blind pursuit of wealth, power, and possessions; we will be obsessed by the urge to conquer and dominate; we will pine for ruthless revenge; we will dumbly conform to social conventions and norms. Right views will point us towards an enlightened sense of values: towards detachment and kindness; towards generosity of spirit and selfless service to others; towards the pursuit of wisdom and understanding. The confusion and moral lunacy now prevalent in the world can be eased, if not eliminated, if the path of the Buddha is followed. Right livelihood and right action, for instance, can help us avoid the conflicts that result from a wrong way of life and wrong action, thereby enabling a society to live in peace and harmony.

Although in the affluent countries of the West people now enjoy high standards of goods and services, the inward quality of their lives does not bear evidence of a corresponding level of improvement. The reason for the poverty of their interior life is the neglect of spiritual values. When materialism erodes the higher spiritual dimension of life, a plunge into moral nihilism is bound to follow. We see this in the alarming statistics characteristic of materialist society: in the increased rate of suicide, in the explosion of crime, in the proliferation of sexual offenses, alcoholism, and drug abuse. This shows that a one-sided stress on material development in a pleasure-seeking society is ultimately self-destructive, like a piece of iron that is devoured by the rust arising from within itself. Even knowledge and discipline on their own are not adequate, for without moral ideals they may turn a society into nothing more than a mass-scale workshop or military camp. It is only the cultivation of a proper sense of values that can make society cultured and civilized in the true meaning of those terms.

2. Having right understanding will enable us to recognize that worldly values are man-made and relative. These false worldly values lead people astray and make them suffer in vain. A Buddha teaches authentic values, real values, values that are grounded in timeless truth. A Buddha first realizes for himself the true nature of life, then he reveals to blind worldlings the Dhamma, the eternal law of righteousness and truth. This Dhamma includes the Four Noble Truths and the principles of kamma and rebirth. Any values that deviate from these principles, no matter how widely they may be accepted as the common norm, are worthless and deceptive. While those whose minds are shrouded in wrong views will be deceived by them, one with right view will realize their hollowness at once.

3. Seeing that life involves incessant change and that it is subject to many forms of suffering, one with right understanding learns to live simply and to regulate desire. A wise and virtuous person is moderate in his desires and follows the middle way in all matters. Understanding the close connection between craving and suffering, he will realize the importance of holding desire in check by simple living. One with right understanding is aware that real happiness is an inward state -- a quality of the mind -- and should therefore be sought inwardly. Happiness is independent of external things, though of course a certain degree of material security is necessary as a basis for inner development.

We require only four basic kinds of physical sustenance: wholesome food, clothing, shelter, and medicine. Complementary to these, we have four mental needs: right knowledge, virtue, guarding the doors of the senses, and meditation. These are the two sets of basic requisites for leading a lofty life. Living simply, without superfluous possessions and entanglements, leads to contentment and peace of mind, releasing time and energy to pursue higher virtues and values. It is pride and vanity that keep us tied to false goals, and the smaller the mind, the greater is the pride.

4. Buddhism upholds the objectivity of moral values, for its ethics is based on the law of cause and effect in the moral sphere, and this law, like the physical law of gravity, is an unvarying truth valid for all time. Good deeds and bad deeds will produce their respective pleasant and painful fruits regardless of the views and wishes of the people who engage in them. Recognizing the objectivity of the moral law and the undeviating connection between deeds and their results, a person with right view will abstain from wrong actions and adhere to the standards of wholesome conduct embodied in the Five Precepts of virtuous conduct (discussed below).

5. As instability is inherent in life, the most unexpected things can happen. Therefore the wise Buddhist recognizes the need to control his feelings. When calamity comes, we must face it calmly, without lamenting or falling into despair. The ability to remain equanimous amidst the fluctuations of fortune is a benefit of right understanding. We should understand that everything that happens to us happens because of causes and conditions for which we are ultimately responsible. Similarly, as we obtain some degree of emotional control, we will be able to discard irrational fears and worries. The seeming injustices of life, grievances, emotional maladjustments, etc., are all explained fully and rationally by the law of kamma and rebirth. By understanding this law, we will see that, in the final analysis, we are the architects of our own destiny.

6. A further fruit of right understanding is the ability to look at people, things, and events objectively, stripped bare of likes and dislikes, of bias and prejudice. This capacity for objectivity, a sign of true mental maturity, will issue in clearer thinking, saner living, a marked reduction of susceptibility to the pernicious influence of the mass media, and an improvement in inter-personal relationships.

7. One with right understanding will be able to think for himself. He is able to make up his own mind, to form his own opinions, to face life's difficulties armed with the principles of reality taught by the Buddha. The true Buddhist will not be a moral and intellectual coward, but will be prepared to stand alone regardless of what others say or think. Of course, he will seek advice when necessary, but he will make his own decisions and have the courage of his convictions.

8. Right understanding will give us a purpose for living. A lay Buddhist must learn to live purposefully, with a worthy aim -- both an immediate aim and an ultimate aim, the one fitting harmoniously into the other. To be truly happy we require a simple but sound philosophy of life. Philosophy is the keen desire to understand the nature of man and our destiny in the universe. It gives life a sense of direction and meaning. Without one, we either dream our way through life or muddle through life. A clear-cut philosophy makes life meaningful and fruitful, enabling us to live in harmony with our fellows and with the natural environment.

* * *

3. A Life Plan

To make the best use of our human potential, we need not only a practical aim in life, but a life plan for achieving that aim. The preceding two sections of this essay show the groundwork for developing a proper sense of values, the values essential for gaining happiness, success, and security within the mundane life and for progressing towards the ultimate goal of the Buddhist path, Nibbana. While we walk along the path to liberation, as laypeople we have to live in the world, and our immediate objective will be to make our life in the world both a means to worldly success and a stepping-stone to final liberation.

To accomplish this, we must organize our life within the framework of the Noble Eightfold Path. We can best realize our immediate aims by drawing up an individual life plan in keeping with our powers and circumstances. This life plan must be realistic. It must envisage a realistic development of our innate potential, steering us towards the fullest actualization of our possibilities.

At the start, we require an honest understanding of ourselves. It is pointless to devise a workable life plan on the foundation stone of grandiose delusions about our character and abilities. The more we find out about ourselves, by self-observation and self-examination, the better will be our chances of self-improvement. We should ask ourselves how far and to what degree we are generous, kind, even-tempered, considerate, honest, sober in morals, truthful, diligent, energetic, industrious, cautious, patient, tolerant, and tactful. These are the qualities of a well-developed Buddhist, the qualities we ourselves should emulate.

We need to improve ourselves wherever we are weak. A little practice everyday is all that is necessary. We should remember that the more often an action is performed, the easier it becomes for us to perform it in the future and the stronger becomes the tendency to do it again and again until it becomes a habit, an ingrained part of our character.

Our life plan should cover all the main areas of a normal householder's life, including occupation, marriage, the procreation and raising of children, retirement, old age and death. The happiness of lay life consists in finding out exactly what one can do and doing it well. A clear mental picture of a practical aim in life and a realistic sketch of the steps needed to achieve that aim will help guide us to the fulfilment of our ideal. We tend to become what we really want to be, provided we act realistically and effectively to realize our aim.

* * *

4. Obstacles

The following five states are likely to prevent or block the success of our efforts to lead the upright life of a Buddhist lay follower. They are called by the Buddha the five mental hindrances (//pancanivarana//) because they close the doors to both spiritual and worldly progress. Although the Buddha originally taught them as the main obstacles to meditation, with a little reflection we can see that they are equally detrimental to success in our mundane undertakings.

1. The first of the five hindrances is //sensual craving//, obsessive hankering for possessions or for the gratification of the senses. While the lay Buddhist will seek wealth and possessions as an integral part of mundane happiness, he will also be aware of the limits to be observed in their pursuit.He will recognize that if one obtains wealth and position by unjust means, or becomes excessively attached to them, they will become a source of misery and despair rather than of joy and contentment. Money alone cannot solve all our problems. Many people never learn this, and spend their time and energy accumulating wealth and the so-called "good things" it can buy. But in fact, the more they acquire the more they want. Such people can never find happiness. A lay Buddhist must be moderate in all things. Extreme desires -- for riches, the enjoyment of sex, liquor, the ostentatious display of one's success -- are sure signs of internal insecurity, things to be avoided.

2. //Ill will// or hatred, the second hindrance, is the emotional opposite of desire, yet it is an equally potent obstacle to personal development. Because we are attracted to desirable things, we are repelled by what is undesirable. Like and dislike are the two forces that delude the world, leading people astray into conflict and confusion and drenching the earth with blood. Both are born of ignorance. Desire colours everything in tinsel and drives us to acquire what we want. Hatred colours everything black and drives us to destroy what we suspect is inimical to our interests. The best way to overcome hatred is by cultivating lovingkindness, explained later in this essay.

3. //Indolence and mental inertia// is the next hindrance, the obstacle to strenuous effort. The lazy person is not inclined to strive for correct understanding or high standards of conduct. He is a drifter or a dreamer, easy prey to the thieves of craving and hatred.

4. //Restlessness and worry// are twin hindrances very much in evidence today. Restlessness is manifest in the agitation, impatience, thirst for excitement, and unsettled character of our daily existence. Worry is the guilt and remorse that one feels when one broods sadly or regretfully over an evil deed that has been done or a good deed left undone. The best remedy for a lapse or transgression already committed is to decide never to repeat it; the best remedy for neglecting to do good is to do it without delay.

5. The last hindrance is //doubt//. Doubt is the inability to decide, the lack of resolution that prevents one from making a firm commitment to higher ideals and from pursuing the good with a steady will.

These five hindrances are great handicaps to one's progress. They deprive the mind of understanding and happiness and cause much unnecessary suffering. By cultivating the five cardinal virtues -- confidence, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom -- and by constant effort one can reduce their harmful influence.

* * *

5. Relaxation

Modern life is full of stress and strain. Therefore relaxation is a necessary ingredient of happiness. By understanding the causes of stress and by regulating these causes, we can live calmly even in the midst of strenuous activity.

Hard work without tension never killed anyone. Why is it then that some people always work anxiously and feverishly? Generally, such a person is driven by craving, by intense desire. He wants to achieve his goal so eagerly, with such avidity, that he simply cannot rest until he gets it; or he is so fearful of losing something he prizes that he cannot relax and enjoy the present moment; or he is driven by resentment against those who obstruct his thirst; or he is constantly hankering after power, position, and prestige on account of some irrational need to prove his worth to himself and others.

If a person wants to avoid stress and strain, then he will have to train his mind to view everything he encounters -- persons, objects, events, and experiences -- realistically, as transient phenomena, dependently arisen through conditions. He should reflect upon them in terms of the three characteristics -- as impermanent, unsatisfactory, and without a self. Doing so will help to reduce the investment of self-concern in these phenomena, and thereby will reduce the craving and attachment for them. He should also avoid anger, anxiety, and pride -- the thoughts of "me" and "mine" -- since such emotions are productive of stress and strain. When one adopts this attitude to life, one will discover greater detachment, deeper calm, more durable peace of heart even amidst the same situations that previously produced nothing but stress and worry. The key to managing stress is through the disciplining and mastery of the mind.

One can also reduce stress by forming good work habits. One should confine oneself to doing one thing at a time, since attempts to juggle multiple tasks only lead to poor results in all of them. One should keep work and leisure separate. One should work in a relaxed frame of mind, repeatedly reminding oneself during the course of the day that one can accomplish more work and better work if one works calmly and intersperses one's routine with breaks.

The following additional disciplines will also be helpful in combatting stress and tension:

1. Keeping the Five Precepts conscientiously. The feeling of guilt increases stress. By observing the precepts, a person leads a blameless life and thereby enjoys freedom from the nagging sense of guilt that harasses one who violates the basic rules of morality. A guilty conscience is a vexing companion during the day, an uncomfortable bed-fellow at night.

2. Sense control. The mind is constantly attracted to pleasant sense objects and repelled by unpleasant objects. Wandering recklessly among the objective fields, it becomes scattered and distraught. By guarding the sense doors, this wasteful agitation is checked. The mind becomes calm and settled, and as a result one experiences an unblemished happiness.

3. Meditation. Meditation, or //bhavana//, purifies the mind. As the mind is gradually cleansed, one can see with greater clarity the true nature of life. One then becomes increasingly detached from worldly things and develops an equanimity that cannot be shaken by the fluctuations of fortune.

4. Cultivating the four sublime attitudes. The four sublime attitudes (//brahmavihara//) are lovingkindness, compassion, altruistic joy, and equanimity. These are enlightened emotions that reduce the stress and strain of daily life, improve interpersonal relationships at home and in the workplace, promote racial accord and amity, help in the development of an even mind, and increase calm and inner peace.

5. One final piece of practical advice: Time, energy, and funds are limited, while wants are unlimited. Therefore a person must have a sense of priorities. A lay Buddhist, in particular, must be able to discriminate: to know what is really essential to a wholesome life; what is desirable but not urgent; what is trivial and dispensable; and what is detrimental. Having made these distinctions, one must pursue what ranks high in the scale of priorities and eschew what ranks low. This will enable one to avoid unnecessary waste and worry, and help to promote balanced, frugal living.

* * *

6. Observing the Five Precepts

The minimal code of ethics followed by a lay Buddhist is the Five Precepts of virtue (//pancasila//). These precepts are moral rules voluntarily undertaken to promote the purity of one's own conduct and to avoid causing harm and suffering to others. Evil conduct is harmful to oneself and others and strengthens the defilements of greed, hatred, and delusion. To engage in unwholesome activity is not merely a matter of free choice: it is a violation of the cosmic moral law entailing inevitable suffering both in this life and in future existences. The opposite of evil conduct is virtue (//sila//). Virtue involves the avoidance of immoral deeds by voluntarily accepting ethical principles of restraint. Virtuous action springs from the three wholesome roots of non-attachment, goodwill, and wisdom. By undertaking moral precepts one pledges to regulate one's conduct in accordance with these three virtuous qualities.

The Five Precepts are as follows:

1. To abstain from killing living beings;

2. To abstain from taking what is not given, i.e. from stealing;

3. To abstain from sexual misconduct;

4. To abstain from false speech;

5. To abstain from intoxicants and harmful drugs.

Following the Five Precepts also implies shunning the five kinds of occupation forbidden to a lay Buddhist: trading in arms, in human beings (i.e. including slavery and prostitution), in flesh (i.e. breeding animals for slaughter), in intoxicants, and in poisons.

Virtue, though formulated negatively in the precepts, is not a mere negative state. To the contrary, it is most decidedly a powerful mental achievement. To observe the precepts conscientiously in one's daily life brings a simultaneous growth in mental purity, skilfulness, and wisdom. Refraining from killing, for example, increases compassion and lovingkindness for all living beings, two of the "sublime attitudes" extolled by the Buddha. Honesty gives courage, generosity, and love of justice. Sexual restraint results in physical strength, vitality, and keenness of the senses. Truthfulness makes for uprightness. Avoiding intoxicants and stupefying drugs promotes clarity of mind. Finally, mindfulness is essential to observing all the precepts, and one's constant effort to maintain the precepts in turn issues in an increase in the clarity of mindfulness.

The habitual practice of the Five Precepts leads to increased self-control and strength of character. The mind that succeeds in controlling desire, even to a slight degree, gains in power. Desire is a force every bit as real as electricity. When desire is uncontrolled, allowed to run riot, it expends itself in the pursuit of things that are harmful to oneself and others. The Buddha's teaching, far from encouraging the proliferation of desire, counsels us in the methods by which we may harness, divert, and sublimate the powerful force of desire and use it for worthy ends.

Virtue is the first stage in the development of the Noble Eightfold Path; as explained above, it comprises the path factors of Right Speech, Right Action, and Right Livelihood. The energy conserved by virtue is then used for the practice of the second stage, concentration of mind, which in turn is the soil for the growth of wisdom.

The observance of the Five Precepts is a voluntary act which each individual must take up on his or her own initiative. The Buddha did not formulate the precepts as commandments, nor did he threaten anyone with punishment for violating them. However, this much has to be said: The Buddha perfectly understood the workings of the universe, and he proclaimed the inviolable moral law of cause and effect: good deeds beget pleasant fruits, evil deeds beget painful fruits. The Five Precepts are the guidelines the Buddha has bequeathed us to steer us away from evil conduct and towards the lines of conduct that will prove most beneficial for ourselves and others. When we mould our actions by the Five Precepts, we are acting in accordance with the Dhamma, avoiding future misery and building up protection and happiness for ourselves and others both here and in the hereafter. Thus the closer we live to the Five Precepts, the greater will be the blessing power of our lives.

* * *

7. Controlling the Emotions

An emotion is a state of deep feeling, an "inward stirring" which can act as a motivation for action. Emotions are often associated with the instincts, the inborn tendencies to act in specific ways in specific situations. Human beings are conditioned to a very great extent by their emotions, by their likes and dislikes. Too often their emotions are biased by self-interest and egotism, even to the extent that they overwhelm sense and reason, compelling us to act in ways that, in saner moments, we regard with dismay.

Emotions generally arise in response to the spontaneous evaluation of perceptions. A person evaluates his or her percepts -- of another person, an object, a situation -- as desirable or undesirable, as helpful or as threatening. On the basis of this evaluation an emotion will arise in response to the situation: desire for those things positively evaluated, aversion or fear towards those things seen in a negative light. Emotions may be harmful, such as lust, anger, and fear, or wholesome, such as sympathy and compassion. While desire and aversion are the prototypes of the unwholesome emotions, lovingkindness and compassion are outstanding examples of emotions that ennoble us and elevate human nature.

People vary widely in their emotional development and in the range and strength of their emotions. While one person is passionate and impulsive, another is cool and reflective; while one is quick to anger, another is patient; while one is emotionally impassive, another is capable of running through a wide range of emotions in less time than a finger snap. One important reason for these differences is that each individual brings along a different kammic inheritance of tendencies and character traits from previous lives. Whether emotions are repressed or expressed, indulged in or sublimated, depends on a combination of factors: innate temperament, family background, and the ethos and traditions of the larger society.

We cannot grow in the Dhamma or find happiness without some degree of emotional control. A person who easily gets angry spoils his own happiness and disturbs the peace of mind of others as well. Instinctive emotions are the raw material of character. If an instinctive impulse is misdirected or repressed, much harm and suffering may ensue. But if the energy that is normally channeled into this emotion is redirected towards a worthy object, the force of the emotion will be sublimated in a way that results in great benefit to oneself and to the community. For the Buddhist, the worthiest of all ideals is the attainment of Nibbana; hence it is the quest for this ideal that has the capacity to absorb and transform our emotional life. Such a noble ideal has the power of evoking and harmonizing all our emotional energies so that they guide us towards the realization of our ultimate good.

Without deliberate effort, emotions will not be under the direct control of the will. The Buddhist training aims at mastering the emotions. The first step in gaining such mastery is the observance of the Five Precepts. Practising the precepts in everyday life will help us to control the grosser forms of craving and emotion. The next step is to train the mind to control the emotions just as they begin to arise. This is accomplished by mindfulness: by objectively watching, with close attention, the emotions that arise and swiftly ascribing a name to them, a mental label thus: "mind with lust," "mind with anger," "mind with jealousy," "mind with sorrow," etc. Once we have named the emotion, we are then in a better position to let it go, without being swept away by it. The moment one calmly registers the fact that one is angry -- when one is aware of the fact that a mind with anger has arisen -- one then ceases to be angry. A mind that is occupied with the wholesome thought of mindful awareness has no scope within it simultaneously for an unwholesome thought of anger.

This same procedure should be adopted with any other harmful emotion that arises. At the start it may prove helpful if, during the course of the day, one mentally repeats to oneself a formula such as: "What am I feeling now?" or "What am I thinking now?" and immediately answers the question thus: "I am feeling angry," or "I am feeling jealous," etc. We should also investigate, even later, when and why anger -- or any other adverse emotion -- overwhelmed us //then//, and thus avoid such situations and responses in the future.

By patient and persistent practice we can gradually gain control over our harmful emotions. The discipline and effort involved is worthwhile, for it will bring greater harmony internally -- in one's own mind -- and externally, in one's relations with others. The key to such control is firm adherence to the basic precepts of morality and, above all, mindfulness of one's own thoughts and emotions.

* * *

8. Beware of Bias and Propaganda

Buddhism teaches the need for clear thinking, self-control, self-help, and meditation. Although each human being is endowed with a mind, very few of us use that mind to think for ourselves. The great majority of people today allow others to do their thinking for them.

The mind absorbs a great deal of poison from the outer environment by continuous exposure to suggestions from others. This mental passivity has become especially baneful with the development of the mass media. Radio, television, and newspapers, pulp journals and tabloids, blare their messages at us every minute of the day, and their power of penetration is reinforced by the ingrained human disposition to accept what we are told and to comply with what we are urged to do. Bombarded left and right by ten thousand inducements, we no longer think our own thoughts, feel our own emotions, or initiate our own actions; instead, we think as others want us to think, feel as others want us to feel, act in ways that will win the approval of our peers and superiors. The pull of the crowd has become irresistible.

Every time we open a newspaper, turn on the radio, or sit down before the television set, we are immediately subjected to propaganda, advertising, and subtle social suggestions. This is done daily, deliberately and systematically. All these media are teaching us to suspend our capacity for thought, or if we are to think at all, to think as they would like us to think. Newspapers, for instance, seek to command assent not only by their editorials and opinion columns, but by their layout, language, and lines of emphasis.

Those who exploit the media in this manner are generally small but powerful groups: the owners and sponsors of the media, advertising agencies, the masters of commerce. Such people are motivated primarily by self-interest, greed for wealth and power, a sense of self-importance. Often they play dominant roles in various walks of life, including politics, business, law, medicine, and education. Among the general public the role of reason tends to be subordinate to that of emotion, while mental inertia and indifference make the conquest of reason easier. Hence, by shaping public opinion through the manipulation of the media, a small minority is able to control the majority.

Those who comprise this small but powerful minority all have something to sell. Commercial advertisements make us want more and more goods that bring us no real happiness, no real peace of mind. We are told that our felicity depends on having a radio, television, video player, stereo set, and computer games. Yet, however much we deck ourselves with all these instruments of diversion, we still feel our lives painfully lacking.

The speed, power, and efficiency of all these technological and social developments within a purely materialistic society such as ours has led to a rising incidence of stress disease and mental breakdown. Those who do not crack under pressure find other escape routes, such as drugs, alcohol, and psychotic cults, while for those who cannot cope at all there remains the last resort: suicide, which has reached alarming proportions in our midst.

How then is a Buddhist to protect himself or herself from the baneful influences to which we are everywhere exposed in the modern world? As lay Buddhists we should always adopt a critical attitude towards the written and spoken word and should always apply mindfulness to protect ourselves from being emotionally swayed by those who seek to win our favour. We should stand back from the topic under review and examine it objectively from all angles. Only after appraising the alternatives should we arrive at a decision or evaluation.

When we hear a particular opinion being voiced, we should make an effort to find out who the writer or speaker is, what interests he or she represents, including political affiliations, religious leanings, and social background. We should also never forget that there are at least two sides to any issue, and that we are more likely to arrive at a correct stand if we first give unbiased consideration to both sides. Before arriving at a conclusion, one should gather all the relevant facts, maintain a calm mind free from emotional excitation, and prevent oneself from being swayed by preferences and anger, praise and blame. The same principle of objective thinking should also be applied to other matters in everyday life.

If we properly understand the working of kamma and rebirth, we will recognize that no one can be alike, and thus we will also avoid drawing comparisons; for this is a world of comparisons as well as of propaganda. The only meaningful comparison that one should make is between the person that one was a month ago, a year ago, or a decade ago, and the person that one is now: physically, intellectually, morally, and financially. If there has been no improvement, or insufficient improvement, one should inquire why this is so and remedy one's deficiencies without delay. If this annual stocktaking is done regularly, it will be most beneficial. Putting aside pride and prejudice, revising one's values and outlook, one will then lead a simpler, saner, and happier life.

* * *

9. A Happy Family Life

For the adult it is natural to love one person of the opposite sex. The lay Buddhist will recognize that there is nothing "sinful" or shameful in sex, and hence will not suffer from a guilt complex over sexual desire. At the same time he or she will be aware that sexual desire, like any other form of desire, must be regulated and controlled to avoid harm to oneself and to others.

In a successful marriage the contracting parties must realize that love is a sentiment far wider than sexual attraction. If one person really loves another, he or she has to learn to give without expecting anything in return. Only in this way can the problem of sex be solved satisfactorily. Further, the would-be partners should ask themselves, "What do I expect of my partner?" and should find out objectively to what extent the prospective partner has the requisite qualities. One might enlist the help of a trustworthy, balanced friend who has known the would-be partner for some time and might be in a better position to offer a correct evaluation. There are obvious dangers in being one's own marriage broker. Too often one is inclined to endow the would-be partner with qualities and virtues that she (or he) clearly lacks in the eyes of the unbiased observer. This danger has to be frankly acknowledged, for disillusionment might otherwise set in sooner or later, and then the stage is set for marital discontent and misery.

No doubt, in married life sex is important, but it must be kept in its proper place, as an expression of marital love. Sex is by no means the sole concern of married life; only when it is subordinated to personal love and affection does sexuality provide a truly satisfying emotional experience. Above and beyond sexual compatibility, a happy marriage calls for mutual understanding and adjustments, for sacrifices and selflessness, for tolerance and patience. Married life becomes truly a blessing rather than a curse when it is viewed as a partnership of two persons who are committed to think more of the partnership than they do of themselves, who are ready to make the mutual effort necessary to attain harmony and contentment.

Most married couples hope to have children. Children differ, for each brings his or her own kammic inheritance from many past lives, a kammic inheritance that includes potential tendencies that set the general tone and trend of the child's character. This fact indicates both the responsibilities and the limitations of the parents in the upbringing of their children.

The child spends most of the formative years of his or her life at home, and early in life learns to follow by imitation the values and lifestyle of the parents. Schools and other influential agencies cannot supplant or replace the parents. Buddhist parents should recognize their solemn obligation to serve as models for their children. They should therefore regularly observe the Five Precepts and show their children by example that the Dhamma yet lives and rules their daily lives. Parents must be aware that the child has immense potentials for both good and evil, and thus must fulfil their responsibility to help the child to develop his or her potential for good and to check the potential for evil. It is only if parents bestow their loving care and attention on their child that the child will be able to satisfy the hopes and aspirations of the parents.

The Buddha has advised parents to guide their children, to supply their needs, to see to their education, to give them in marriage at the proper time, and to attend to all other aspects of their well-being. Unfortunately, however, many parents today do not discharge these duties, with the result that too often children go astray. Responsible Buddhist parents must be prepared to forgo their own pleasure in order to attend to the upbringing of their children.

They must realize that the home influence is ultimately what matters most in forming the child's character, outweighing all other outside influences to which the child may be exposed. In areas where the parents lack adequate expertise, they should be prepared to consult a non-technical manual on proper child rearing.

The first five years of a child's life are the most crucial in the formation of his or her character, and it is at this stage that they are most susceptible to the influence of the parents. Thereafter the needs of the child change, and will continue to change radically at different stages of development. Parents should remember this and meet the new needs as they arise.

In the early years three factors are essential for balanced and wholesome growth: parental love and affection; a stable home environment; and scope for creative activity and personal initiative. Young children learn largely by imitation. If parents show emotional maturity, avoid quarrels, respect and trust each other, and do likewise with their children, then the children will develop characters that are sound both morally and psychologically. When the child is brought up with love and understanding, with insight into his or her changing needs, nourished with high ideals and lofty aspirations, then he or she will have a secure foundation upon which to build a character and a future. In this way the very first steps along the Buddha's path will have been well planted.

Adolescence is a period of stress and strain, when children may be inclined to rebel against parental authority. It is therefore at this stage that the greatest love and understanding are called for. In adolescence, as the sexual instinct awakens, sensible Buddhist parents should be capable of guiding their children and helping them to adjust to the changes taking place in their bodies and their lives. When children ask their parents questions about sex, the parents should be ready to answer them calmly and briefly in a matter-of-fact way, just as they would answer any other question. If parents are unable to tell the adolescent children the facts of life in an unself-conscious manner they might give them a suitable book to enable them to instruct themselves about the subject. Above all, in this age of sexually provocative entertainment, irresponsible promiscuity, and an exploding AIDS epidemic, withholding vital information is not a means of protecting the youngster but of exposing him or her to danger.

When parental control, supervision, and proper guidance are lacking, the children often incline to delinquency and drugs. Parents should therefore take greater interest in their children, should spend more time with them, should know how they use their leisure, and should make the acquaintance of their friends. Real problem children are few; it is only problem parents who are many.

As the child reaches maturity it is the duty of the parents to help him wisely choose a suitable career as well as a mate, but the child's wishes in these spheres have to be respected. To order the young person about as if he or she were still a child is only to invite trouble.

Since we live in a world of keen competition in many areas of life, wise Buddhist parents will limit the size of their family in order to give their children the best. In developing countries like Sri Lanka, where the rate of reproduction is generally higher than the rate of production of real wealth, this is a necessary measure to eliminate poverty, especially among the working classes in both town and countryside, whose families are generally large with many dependants. Buddhism is not opposed to population control, except by means of abortion, and with the world's resources dwindling today under dense population pressure, Buddhist parents should recognize the need for family limitation to ensure the best for the children.

In a country like Sri Lanka it is the duty of the state to popularize family limitation by making freely available safe, effective, and inexpensive methods of birth control. Production that is centred on the population at large -- rather than on enhancing the wealth of a privileged few -- using appropriate technology, with just distribution of resources and extensive family planning, will increase real wealth and help to improve the quality of life of the masses, provided they also cultivate a wise sense of values. Otherwise they will always remain poor.

The moral and spiritual edification of the children should accompany their physical and emotional development. As they grow up, parents should teach them the essentials of the Buddha-Dhamma, using simple language and everyday examples. They should explain the working of the moral law of kamma and rebirth, should instruct them in the proper rules of conduct, and should clarify the reasons for practising virtue in daily life. Furthermore, in a Buddhist country children should be regularly taken to the temple, especially on quiet days. They should be enrolled in Dhamma school if such is available, and should be encouraged to ask their questions and discuss their problems with wise and virtuous bhikkhus. The Dhamma, after all, is intended to guide us in how to live this very life we are leading now. It is the art of happiness here and now, and the path to deliverance in the hereafter.

Materialism is steadily eroding traditional values, moral, spiritual, and social. The influence of materialism now reaches even the remote villages, the ancient strongholds of the Buddhist way of life. But young people who have been rightly brought up by Buddhist parents to discover the value of the Dhamma for themselves are unlikely to be led astray.

* * *

10. The Practice of Benevolence

The desire to do good, to bring about the happiness and well-being of others, is effectively cultivated in Buddhism by the systematic practice of the four "sublime attitudes" (//brahmavihara//): lovingkindness (//metta//), compassion (//karuna//), altruistic joy (//mudita//), and equanimity (//upekkha//). By cultivating these qualities a Buddhist can gradually remove the mental defilements such as hatred, cruelty, and envy, and bring into being the most exalted virtues. The sublime attitudes elevate human beings to a divine-like stature; they break the barriers that separate individuals and groups; they build bridges more solid than those constructed of stone and steel.

1. //Metta// is goodwill, lovingkindness, universal love; a feeling of friendliness and heartfelt concern for all living beings, human or non-human, in all situations. The chief mark of //metta// is a benevolent attitude: a keen desire to promote the welfare of others. //Metta// subdues the vice of hatred in all its varied shades: anger, ill-will, aversion, and resentment. The Buddha said:

> Hatreds do not cease through hatreds
> Anywhere at anytime.
> Through love alone do they cease:
> This is an eternal law.
> (Dhp. v. 5)

This stanza is of special significance to us in this nuclear era when the most appalling destructiveness has erupted all over the globe. Peace will never be achieved by meeting force with force, bombs with bombs, violence with retaliation. //Metta// or lovingkindness is the only effective answer to violence and destructiveness, whether by conventional weapons or nuclear missiles.

2. //Karuna// is the attitude conveyed by such terms as compassion, sympathy, pity, and mercy. Its basic characteristic is sympathy for all who suffer, and it arouses a desire to relieve or remove the pain and suffering of others. //Karuna// helps to eliminate callousness and indifference to others' woes. It is the direct antidote to cruelty, another vice common in the world today. It is compassion that prompts one to serve others selflessly, expecting nothing, not even gratitude, in return.

3. //Mudita// is altruistic joy, appreciative joy: the desire to see others rejoicing in their happiness, the ability to share the happiness and success of others. This attitude is the complement of //karuna//: while //karuna// shares the sorrow of others, //mudita// shares their joy. //Mudita// is the direct antidote to envy. Envy arises over the good fortune of others: it resents those who achieve position, prestige, power, and success. But one who practises //mudita// will not only be happy when others do well, but will try to promote their progress and welfare. Hence this attitude is of vital importance for achieving social concord and peace.

4. //Upekkha//, the last of the four sublime attitudes, is equanimity. //Upekkha// establishes an even or balanced mind in an unbalanced world with fluctuating fortunes and circumstances: gain and loss, fame and ill-repute, praise and blame, pleasure and pain. //Upekkha// also looks upon all beings impartially, as heirs to the results of their own actions, without attachment or aversion. //Upekkha// is the serene neutrality of the one who knows.

The constant, methodical, and deliberate cultivation of these sublime virtues in everyday life transforms the attitudes and outlook of the practitioner. They should be the foundation of all Buddhist social action, as well as of individual and collective peace and harmony. Buddhist social welfare work may take many forms, but what is most essential is the spirit in which it is performed. This spirit should be marked by the subordination of the private good to the good of the whole. For Buddhist social work to be of real value, action should spring from genuine love, sympathy, and understanding for one's fellow humans, guided by knowledge and training. Welfare work should be the perfect expression of compassion, untouched by condescension, washed clean of pride -- even of the pride of doing good. It should be a sheer manifestation of the brotherhood of all human beings.

The four sublime attitudes should be diligently cultivated with unremitting effort by every true follower of the Master. These qualities never become obsolete. They convey a universal message which transforms us into universal human beings.

* * *

11. Freeing the Mind

Mind occupies the pre-eminent place in Buddhism, for everything that one says or does first arises in the mind as a thought. To have a well-trained mind is indeed to possess a treasure. When a person trains the mind, turns inward to examine and cleanse his own mind, he will find therein a vast storehouse of happiness. Real happiness is a quality of the mind which has to be sought and found in the mind. The Buddha teaches that non-attachment to worldly pleasures is a greater happiness than the enjoyment of worldly pleasures. Nibbana is the highest happiness, the happiness of relief from suffering and from repeated birth, and this happiness is only to be attained by freeing the mind from its defilements.

The misguided worldling thinks otherwise. In his view the enjoyment of sensual pleasures is the only real happiness. He forgets, however, that sensual happiness arises merely from the gratification of desire, and thus that this happiness must fade when the desired object is obtained. Nor will the multiplication of desires make sensual pleasure permanent, for there is no permanence in the passing. The pursuit of sensual pleasures ends only in restlessness and dissatisfaction.

The aim of Buddhist mental culture is to gain direct intuitive knowledge of the real nature of existence by systematic training of the mind through meditation. This practice issues in detachment and thus frees the mind from its delusions. Meditation leads the mind from the pain-laden things of the world to the sorrowless, transcendent state of deliverance, Nibbana. The basic cause of rebirth and suffering is ignorance of the true nature of life. We consider what is passing, unsatisfactory, and empty to be permanent, a source of true happiness, and substantial. This delusion sustains the craving for more existence and leads to the accumulation of kamma. Meditation is designed to lead step-by-step to the dissolution of these delusions and thereby to freedom from the grip of craving.

There are two kinds of meditation recognized in Buddhism: the development of tranquillity (//samatha-bhavana//), which emphasizes concentration, and the development of insight (//vipassana-bhavana//), which emphasizes wisdom. These two types of meditation respectively correspond to the second and third groups of the Noble Eightfold Path, the concentration group and the wisdom group. Concentration means one-pointedness of the mind, the ability to fix the mind on a single object to the exclusion of all else. Concentration is not an end in itself, but to be developed primarily because it is the basis for wisdom, the ability to see things exactly as they are. It is this wisdom that frees the mind from bondage.

To train the mind is not at all easy, for the mind has long been accustomed to flow in the channels of greed, hatred, and delusion; through ages we have relished sense pleasures, raged with anger, wallowed in torpor, fidgeted restlessly, and vacillated with doubt. Such habits are indeed difficult to break. Moreover, it is the very nature of the untrained mind to wander from one idea to another. Thus when the meditator sits down to begin the practice, strange thoughts may dance before his mind. To overcome these disturbances, the Buddha has taught five methods of expelling distracting thoughts:

1. Develop a good thought opposed to the distracting one; for example, develop a thought of lovingkindness to expel a thought of hatred.

2. Reflect on the evil consequences of distracting thoughts; for example, ill will or anger may lead to harsh words or an exchange of blows, to making enemies, or to something worse.

3. Turn the mind away from the disturbing thought and fix it on some beneficial idea or towards some useful activity.

4. Trace the cause of the uprisen evil thought and reflect on whether it will serve any useful purpose.

5. Struggle directly with the evil thought to crush it and subdue it.

At the outset meditation will be a continual effort to pull the mind back whenever it strays from the subject of meditation. It will seem impossible to focus the attention on the selected subject for more than a few seconds at a stretch. With continued practice, however, one will refine one's skills until one can keep the mind focused steadily and calmly on the chosen topic for increasingly longer periods. Then the practice becomes more engaging, more rewarding, and also less tiring. Eventually one's efforts will culminate in one-pointedness of mind, //samadhi//.

With the attainment of the one-pointed mind, the meditator turns this pure, steady, clear mind to the contemplation of existence itself. This marks the beginning of //vipassana-bhavana//, the meditative development of insight. The meditator mindfully investigates his own compound of the "five aggregates." He sees that the body, or form, is made up of changing physical qualities, while mind itself consists of fleeting mental factors: feeling, perception, mental formations (intentions, emotions, thoughts, desires, etc.), and consciousness. He sees that these all occur in mutual dependence, all in a flow. There is no substantial self, no immortal soul within them to be called "I" or "mine." As the impermanence, the unsatisfactoriness, and the selfless nature of the five aggregates become manifest to the meditator, he realizes that nothing conditioned is worth clinging to; for everything conditioned is fleeting, and in the fleeting it is impossible to find stable happiness. This is //panna//, wisdom, the third and final stage in the Noble Eightfold Path.

With the development of wisdom, ignorance ceases in all its forms and shades. Craving and kamma, the fuel for the flame of becoming, is exhausted, and no more fresh fuel is supplied. Hence the flame of existence burns out for lack of fuel. When such a person who has reached the goal passes away, he no longer takes rebirth in any realm of becoming. He has attained Nibbana, the Deathless.

* * *

12. Mindfulness of Breathing

Mindfulness of breathing (//anapanasati//) is an excellent subject of meditation particularly useful to the busy layperson, as it can be practised safely by anyone, anywhere, at any time. To practise this type of meditation, one should first adopt a seated meditation posture. Those who can sit comfortably in full lotus or half-lotus posture may adopt those positions; those who find this difficult may assume any cross-legged sitting posture that enables them to hold upright the upper part of the body; those who find even this difficult may sit on a straight-backed chair. The torso should be held erect but not stiff; the hands should be placed one over the other on the lap; and (for those who sit in a chair) the feet should rest on the floor.

The meditator should then breathe calmly and naturally, mentally following the whole breath in and out without a break in attentiveness. At the outset one should simply breathe in and out without reflecting about it. One may fix the attention on the nostrils or upper lip, wherever the breath is felt most distinctly as one breathes in and out. There the attention should remain.

As one proceeds with the observation of the breath, one becomes more and more deeply concentrated upon it. One then feels light in body and mind, very calm and peaceful; one may even feel as if one were floating in the air. When strong calm is established and the mind becomes one-pointed, one may then turn one's attention towards the development of insight (//vipassana//), aiming to gain direct insight into the true nature of existence. This type of meditation, when successful, leads by stages to the realization of Nibbana.

Apart from its ultimate benefits, mindfulness of breathing has an immediate value that can be seen in one's daily life. It promotes detachment and objectivity. It allows one the mental distance needed to arrive at wise decisions in the countless difficulties of daily life. Regular practice of this meditation brings increased concentration and self-control, improved mindfulness, and is also conducive to healthy and relaxed living.

* * *

13. Facing Death with Equanimity

Death is the only absolutely certain thing in life, yet how many of us plan for it and prepare ourselves adequately in advance to face it calmly? All human beings must die. The body disintegrates, breaks apart, and turns to ashes and dust. The only thing we own that remains with us beyond death is our kamma, our intentional deeds. Our deeds continue, bringing into being a new form of life until all craving is extinguished. We are born and evolve according to the quality of our kamma. Good deeds will produce a good rebirth, bad deeds a bad rebirth.

The materialistic view that a human being is merely a biological result of the union of sperm and ovum which utterly terminates in death is inadequate as a total explanation of human life. Nature and nurture, heredity and the environment, cannot by themselves explain, for example, why twins born of the same parents, physically almost identical, enjoying equal privileges, brought up in the same environment, often exhibit widely different characteristics, mental, moral, and emotional. Moreover, science would meet difficulties accounting for the existence of infant prodigies and the recollection of past lives, particularly by children.

A realistic Buddhist, knowing that death is inevitable, plans for it and trains himself to face it with equanimity. He also knows that the best way to plan for death is to lead a virtuous and upright life. Thus the devoted Buddhist regularly observes the Five Precepts, performs many kind and generous acts, and endeavours to lessen his greed and hate. The fact that one has led a blameless life will be an added solace and source of strength at death. The fear of death then loses its force and sting.

In preparing for death, a householder should fulfil his obligations to his family, to others, and to his religion. In practice, this means leaving behind a sufficient income for one's family, making out a proper last will, planning one's own funeral arrangements, and providing funds for the maintenance of virtuous and learned monks who observe the rules of discipline and who can preach the correct Dhamma.

The Buddha teaches his lay followers, as well as the monks and nuns, that they should often reflect on the inevitability of death: "Death is certain, life is uncertain" (//maranam niyatam, jivitam aniyatam//). These words are a clarion call reminding us of the need to put our own house in order, morally and philosophically, without delay, and to face each day as if it were our last. The world of today would indeed be a happier and safer place to live if people the world over would only pay heed to this call.

* * *

14. The Good Buddhist

The preceding sections of this essay will help the Buddhist lay follower to understand, from a practical angle, the main points of the Buddha's teachings as they bear on the conduct of daily life. Constant practice of these principles will ensure that they are built into his character, enabling him to develop into a well-rounded human being, a centre of sanity in a confused world adrift in fashionable philosophies full of empty promises.

At the very minimum a lay follower of the Buddha must keep the Five Precepts, which enables him to develop virtue in regard to his bodily and verbal behaviour. But one should not stop with this. One who seeks the true perfection of happiness must also attend to the cultivation of the mind. One must be mindful of the arising of unwholesome states such as greed, anger, and delusion, and know how to deal with them effectively when they threaten to throw one off balance. One should proceed even further and attempt to cultivate the mind systematically through the practice of meditation for tranquillity and insight.

The society in which we live is a reflection of the minds of the human beings who have created that society. If our society has become corrupt, rife with immorality, and destructive of the higher potentials of human nature, that is because the people who comprise that society have allowed themselves to drift into corrupt and immoral states of mind. The quality of a society inevitably rests on the quality of the lives led by the persons who make up that society. One single individual may not be able to change the whole society for the better. But each one of us can, at any rate, transform the world of our own mind.

How is this to be done? By observing the Five Precepts flawlessly, by being as mindful as possible in everyday life, by cleansing the mind of its blemishes, by cultivating the four sublime states, by meditating energetically every day, by listening to discourses on the Dhamma and clarifying one's doubts about the teaching. By following these guidelines one is sure to reap their fruits: peace of mind, contentment, the absence of inner conflicts even in the midst of our confusing and chaotic world.

A good Buddhist should ever seek the opportunity to do deeds of mercy, kindness, and charity. He should be keen on helping those less fortunate than himself. When practising giving, however, one should give with discrimination, as the Buddha advises: //viceyya danam databbam//. Thus the most needy will be benefited with the things they need most.

A good Buddhist should set apart a few minutes every day to review the day's happenings, and to see whether or not he has strayed from the Master's teachings. If so, he should inquire why he has done so in order to avoid a future repetition. Methodical reading on the Dhamma will also help one to put the whole of life into the right perspective. It is a useful habit to read daily an inspiring discourse of the Buddha, such as the Mahamangala Sutta, or to recite some verses of the Dhammapada and reflect for a few moments on their relevance to one's own life. Doing so will help one to forget one's trifling worries and troubles, to clarify one's thinking, and to recall the ultimate values and truths upon which one should build one's life.

The Buddha's teachings consist of virtue, concentration, and wisdom. Only with their practice will the Buddha-Dhamma flourish; when they are neglected, the Buddha-Dhamma will decline. This fact should always be remembered by those who are anxious to avert the decline and disappearance of the Sasana. As religion withers the world over, more and more attention is paid to empty rites, rituals, and ceremonies, while little or no attention is paid to the actual practice of the principles of religion as they bear on real life. It is this, however, that matters most.

By following the above guidelines, a good Buddhist will grow in all aspects of the Dhamma. These guidelines will help to mould one's whole personality, to instil the true principles of the Dhamma into one's understanding, to train the emotions and to discipline the will. Doing so will conduce to the ultimate best interest of oneself, and help one to make one's life a blessing for others as well.

May you and I and all other beings
be well and happy.

* * * * * * * *

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Robert Bogoda was born in 1918 in Colombo, the business capital of Sri Lanka. His secondary education was cut short by the sudden demise of his father, which compelled him to work at a modest job as a teacher. While engaged in teaching, he obtained by self study the B.Sc. (Econ.) and M.Sc. (Econ.) degrees from the University of London, specializing in Social Administration. Now retired, he pursues his interests in Buddhism and social welfare. The essay "A Simple Guide to Life" was written against this background.

* * * * * * * *

THE BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY

The BPS is an approved charity dedicated to making known the Teaching of the Buddha, which has a vital message for people of all creeds. Founded in 1958, the BPS has published a wide variety of books and booklets covering a great range of topics. Its publications include accurate annotated translations of the Buddha's discourses, standard reference works, as well as original contemporary expositions of Buddhist thought and practice. These works present Buddhism as it truly is -- a dynamic force which has influenced receptive minds for the past 2500 years and is still as relevant today as it was when it first arose. A full list of our publications will be sent upon request with an enclosure of U.S. $1.00 or its equivalent to cover air mail postage.

Write to:

The Hony. Secretary
BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy Sri Lanka

or

The Barre Center for Buddhist Studies
Lockwood Road

Barre, MA 01005 USA
Tel: (508) 355-2347

* * * * * * * *

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
TITLE OF WORK: A Simple Guide to LIfe (Wheel Publication No. 397/398)
FILENAME: WHEEL397.ZIP
AUTHOR: Robert Bogoda
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: c/o Buddhist Publication Society
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: Buddhist Publication Society
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy, Sri Lanka
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: Buddhist Publication Society (1994)
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1994
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: September 1995
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

[end]

=-=-=-

realização de certa ou de certas finalidades.
Signo ou sinal a unidade, concreta ou abstrata, real ou imaginária, que, uma vez conhecida, leva ao conhecimento de algo diferente dele mesmo.
Símbolo é aquilo que, por convenção, manifesta ou leva ao conhecimento de outra coisa, a qual substitui.
É importante notarmos a diferença entre signo e símbolo. No que toca estritamente à linguagem humana, pois só ela é a linguagem objeto da escrita da linguística, os signos linguísticos diferem dos símbolos porque estes não constituem necessariamente sistema e podem sozinhos e sem nenhuma oposição "simbolizar". A oposição é um princípio fundamental para a determinação da existência dos signos linguísticos.
Por fim, intercomunicação social, porque linguagem é sempre um estar no mundo com os outros, não como um indivíduo particular, mas como parte do todo social, de uma comunidade.
Dentro da grande diversidade de comunidades, grupos e linhagens de família surgem diversos meios diversificados de se usar tais sistemas, signos e símbolos dentro da intercomunicação social.
Os falantes dessas diversidades, por motivações de ordem política, cultural ou religiosa, tendem a procurar, graças a um largo período histórico, um veículo comum de comunicação que manifeste a unidade que envolve e sedimenta as várias comunidades em questão. Geralmente, nessas condições, se eleva um dialeto - em geral o que apresenta melhores condições políticas e culturais - como veículo de expressão e comunicação que paire sobre as variedades regionais e se apresente como espelho da unidade que deseja refletir o bloco das comunidades irmanadas.
Esta unidade linguística ideal - que nem sempre cala o prestígio de outros dialetos nem afoga localismos linguísticos - chama-se língua comum.
Por motivações de ordem cultural e para conter, na medida do possível e razoável, a força diferenciadora, centrífuga, que caracteriza o perpétuo devenir das línguas, pode-se desenvolver dentro da língua comum um tipo de outra língua comum, mais disciplinada, normatizada idealmente, mediante a eleição de usos fonético-fonológicos, gramaticais e léxicos como padrões exemplares a toda a nação, a serem praticados em determinadas situações sociais, culturais, religiosas e administrativas do intercâmbio superior.
Assim, com o objetivo de criar tal meio amplo de comunicação entre tais comunidades, identificando, criando e desenvolvendo dentro delas suas linguagens exemplares e corretas surge a Grámatica como uma forma de estabelecer um padrão uniforme e correto no sentido de prover um sistema de signos e símbolos coerente e claro para o melhor entendimento entre as mesmas.

Através da mágica de podermos expressar a realidade externa e interna da qual experieciamos através de sons surge o estudo fonético e fonológico que abordára o estudo dos aspectos acústicos e fisiológicos dos sons reais e concretos dos atos linguísticos e o estudo dos fonemas, vistos como uma unidade acústica que desempenha função linguística distintiva de unidades linguísticas superiores dotadas de significado.
Com o objetivo de preservar, registrar e propagar os atos linguísticos cria-se um sistema de unidades ordenados que expressam os sons e, mais adiante, seus respectivos significados.
Assim, surge o sistema gráfico, o qual, nas línguas em que, ao lado da realidade oral, existe a representação escrita de um sistema convencional dessa oralidade chamado sistema gráfico ou ortografia, este sistema se regula, em geral, ora pela fonética, ora pela fonologia, o que conduz a uma primeira dificuldade para se chegar a um sistema ideal, que exigiria uma só unidade gráfica para um só valor fônico. Neste particular tornou-se necessário não se confundir letra com o som da fala. Letra é a representação gráfica com que se procura reproduzir na escrita o som, o que não signifia identificá-los.
Aqui poderiamos chegar talvez a conclusão de que não só o tibetano mas, enfim, todas as línguas são sagradas. Não por serem originárias de um poder divino, não por estarem vinculadas a algum aspecto religioso mas sim como algo muito estimado que inspira uma profunda veneração quando reconhecemos o quanto profundo é o processo de sua base essencial, de seu mecanismo de funcionamento, e por fim da perfeição limitada mas funcional de seu uso e transmissão de sentidos indicando experiências e perspectivas.

Quando retornamos para as origens do povo tibetano, de acordo com sua própria perspectiva, é dito que foram originados da união de uma espécie de ogra que vivia na montanha Kailash e um deidade.
Apartir daí surge a concepção que sua língua é um mistura de um aspecto inferior apartir da ogra e das línguas mundanas e superior apartir da deidade.
Olhando por uma perspectiva dentro da tibetologia achamos uma diferente forma de olhar, relações e comparações com outras línguas.
A língua tibetana, de acordo com tibetologistas, pertence ao grupo linguístico Tibeto-Burmanes, o qual é uma das duas maiores linhas dentro da superfamília sino-tibetana. Este grupo abarca em torno de 250 línguas faladas principalmente na região dos himalayas, no plato tibetano e na vizinhança de Mekong e Salween. Dentro desta família linguística há somente duas ancientes línguas que apresentaram-se em uma forma literária: o Burmanês apartir do século XII e o Tibetano apartir do século VII. Ainda que muito diferentes o parentesco comum entre estas duas línguas significa que compartilham certas caracteríscas fonológicas, de sintaxe e de vocabulário.

O grupo linguístico Tibeto-Burmanês faz parte da superfamília Sino-Tibetana que compara-se em tamanho e diversidade com a famílila Indo-Européia de línguas, a qual inclui línguas tais como o inglês, Grego, Russo, Persa, Hindi, Francês, Sueco, etc. À parte da família Tibeto-Burmanesa, a família Sino-Tibetana inclui as línguas Koreana e Chinesa (consistindo principalmente das línguas de Wu, Hakka, Mandarin e Min). Entretando, este grupo de línguas, encontra-se distantemente relacionado entre si.
O Tibetano, com exceção do Burmanês, ambos em termos de sintaxe e vocabulário, é completamente diferente das outras principais línguas vizinhas: Hindi, Napalês, Mongol e das línguas Turcas (Uigur, Kazakh, Tatar, etc).
A língua tibetana em seus vários dialetos é falada por uma área do tamanho da europa ocidental, alongando-se a oeste desde Baltistão no Paquistão até Sichuan na China ao leste. Ao norte o raio linguístico do Tibetano se extende para além do Lago de Kokonor na província de Qinghai na China. Ao Sul seus limites vão até a parte sudeste dos himalayas abrangendo o Butão, Sikkim e Ladhak na India, os altos vales de Mustang e Dolpo e as regiões habitadas pelos Sherpas e Solukhumbu no Nepal.
Aqui, de acordo com o ponto de vista dos tibetanos, sua língua é sagrada pois contém em parte a descêndencia de uma deidade não-mundana. Ainda assim, podemos ver com outros olhos mais críticos e observadores a questão através dos estudos de tibetologistas sobre o tema como mencionado acima.

O sâncrito pelo qual foi a base gramatical e modelo linguistico da língua tibetana descreve sua origem de uma forma diferente que dentro da visão budista não é uma noção absoluta de sua origem mas sim em um âmbito relativo e religioso hinduista que de fato aconteceu de forma sutil e simbolica em um aspecto relativo. Por ser esta base a fonte da língua escrita tibetana e de toda sua literatura mestres e estudiosos budistas do passado e do presente demonstram um grande respeito e sentimento de gratidão a estas fontes divinas da língua indiana sânscrita e de acordo com a visão hinduísta sobre a origem de sua língua sânscrita segue-se o seguinte.

A palavra Nada significa som e indica a primeira vibração na Energia Espiritual, quando ela se expressa na criação do mundo material. A forma abreviada de nada é chamada de bindhu (gota). Nada, a vibração sutil do som transcendental, apareceu primeiramente no éter do coração do demiurgo Brahma. Dessa vibração sutil transcendental surgiu omkara, composto de três fonemas que representam a Verdade Absoluta em todas as três fases – a Personalidade de Deus, a Alma Suprema e o Ser Absoluto. Dele o Senhor criou todos os sons do alfabeto – vogais, consoantes, semivogais, sibilantes e outros – distintos por características tais como a medida longa e a breve.
Por isso afirma-se que o alfabeto sânscrito, em sua ordem, surgiu do Senhor Narayana, quando Ele primeiramente manifestou o conhecimento védico no coração de Brahma.
A palavra sânscrito (samskrta) significa refinado e é a formada pela raiz verbal kr "fazer" mais o prefixo sam "junto, perfeito". O sânscrito vincula-se a parte padronizada da língua original da humanidade que caracterizou a civilização ariana, chamada de devabhasa "a linguagem dos deuses". Outra parte é o prácrito (prakrti) de onde surgiram todas as línguas vernáculas e dialetos conhecidos. O sânscrito e o prácrito têm coexistido lado a lado desde os tempos védicos primordiais.

Aqui, de acordo com o ponto de vista dos tibetanos, sua língua é sagrada pois contém em parte a descêndencia de uma deidade. Ainda assim, podemos ver com outros olhos mais críticos e observadores a questão através dos estudos de tibetologistas sobre o tema como mencionado acima.

Quando entramos na área da língua literária tibetana entendemos que sua origem esta completamente mesclada com um próposito religioso-espiritual.
A língua tibetana, no seu país de origem, o Tibete, foi praticada durante muitos séculos sem uma escrita propriamente tibetana e consequentemente uma gramática o que ocasionou a uma inexistência literária durante um grande período.
De acordo com as escrituras é dito que durante o reinado do rei tibetano Songtsen Gampo (sron btsan sgam po, tib.), o qual reinou em torno de 627-650 d.C., o rei budista enviou Thomi Anuu (thon mi anui bu, Tib) para a Índia na companhia de 16 assistentes para que estudasse escrita e a língua sânscrita com a motivação de que Thonmi pudesse voltar ao Tibete e criar uma escrita e uma gramática tibetana para que, assim, os ensinamentos budistas pudessem vir a ser traduzidos e estudados em sua própria língua.

Thonmi Annu passou em torno de 7 anos na Índia estudando com muitos mestres budistas e eruditos. Posteriormente em meados de 650 d.C. retorna ao Tibete e cria um sitema linguístico começando pelo alfabeto tibetano e posteriormente compondo 8 tratados sobre a escrita e gramática tibetana.
Entre estes 8 principais tratados de Thonmi somente 2 sobreviveram devido a seis deles terem sido destruidos pelo rei Langdarma no século X .
Os dois remanescentes geralmente são mencionados através de uma só palavra em tibetano e constituem a gramática tibetana propriamente dita (sum rtags,tib.) que é de impressindivel valor para que se possa penetrar no significado e entendimento da literatura tibetana.
O termo "sum tak" em tibetano significa Trinta (sum cu, tib) e Sinais (rtags, tib.) o que é uma abreviação do título do primeiro dos oito tratados referente a "Os Trinta, A Gramática Raiz" (lung du ston pa rtsa ba sum cu pa, tib.) e do título do sexto dos oito tratados referente a "Gramática da Aplicação dos Sinais de Gênero" (lung du ston pa rtags kyi 'jug pa, tib.).
Acredita-se que os outros tratados consistiam-se principalmente de comentários, explicações detalhadas e adições a tais Gramaticas Raizes onde posteriormente certas imcompreensões e aspectos obscuros que vieram a se evidenciar na prática gramatical e no estudo dos textos foram discutidos e debatidos por muitos grandes eruditos, gramáticos e linguísticos tibetanos deixando sempre a incerteza sobre o que o próprio inventor Thonmi Annu escreveu em seus outros tratados mas com a convicção de que ele certamente abordou tais aspectos que permaneceram obscuros.
Tal descrição da origem da língua escrita e literária dos tibetanos deixa claro o seu propósito. Ou seja, o rei Songtsen Gampo, o qual era um devoto budista, reconheceu que a religião e a literatura dos ensinamentos budistas não poderiam ser praticados, estudados e propagados se não houvesse uma escrita e gramatica pela qual se preservaria e serviria como fonte dos ensinamentos budistas para o povo tibetano.
Com esta motivação mandou Tonmi Sambhota a India estudar sânscrito, língua pela qual os ensinamentos budistas estavam em seu íntegro incluindo todos os três veículos hinayana, mahayana e vajrayana. Apartir daí com uma escrita e gramatica desenvolvida e estabelecida começou-se um grande movimento de traduções destes textos provindos do sânscrito para a língua tibetana. Para dar estrutura a todo este movimento e estabelecer de fato o budismo no solo tibetano iniciou-se também a construção de monastérios onde o primeiro foi o magnífico monastério de Samye Ling no Tibet.

Com grande devoção, perseverança e prática muitos tibetanos passaram a manifestar diversos e elevados níveis de realização. É dito que mesmo os grandes tradutores da época chamado de "Lotsawas" não eram somente simples tradutores mas em sua grande maioria eram seres muito eruditos e realizados.
Dentro do primeiro tratado do criador do sistema da língua tibetana, o mestre Tonmi Sambhota, o qual chamou-se de "Os Trinta, A Gramática Raiz", Tonmi abre o texto em versos e termina da seguinte forma.

“Para aqueles detentores de supremas qualidades,
A estas Jóias eu me prostro.
Para aquele que fala todos os sons verbais,
A Mandjughosha eu me prostro"

"Aquele que, no passado, eliciou as bases das palavras,
A Sadashivah eu me prostro.
Aos especialistas que fizeram precisas composições escritas e, Ao Guru eu me prostro. Disto segue-se..."

"O que forma a base subjacente a todos os treinamentos e é
A causa dos comentadores dos Vedas;
A base de todos os nomes, frases e expressões;
A conexão de letras será explicada."

(Este são os quatro primeiros versos da tradução completa do primeiro tratado da língua tibetana de Tonmi Sambhota, tradução do tibetano para o português por Gabriel Jaeger)

O que significam tais versos?
Por quê Tonmi faz homenagens e se prostra ao Senhor Shiva, sendo ele um budista e Shiva uma deidade hinduísta?
Por qual razão Tonmi cita no texto os comentadores dos Vedas?

De acordo com o grande Pandita Situ Chokyi Jungne Rinpoche (aprox. 1700-1774 d.C.), o qual é considerado como talvez o maior gramático tibetano após o próprio criador Tonmi Sambhota escreveu diversos comentários sobre os textos originais de Tonmi. Em seu "Situ Shalung", ou "As Afirmações Definitivas faladas pelo próprio Situ", Situ Rinpoche comenta tais versos anteriores da seguinte forma.

Ele explica que no primeiro verso as homenagens de Tonmi vão para aqueles de supremas qualidades que são qualquer coisa que tenha as supremas qualidades de ter gradualmente completado os dois própositos de ter as duas verdades do caminho da cessação e ter inteligência e liberação e cita como exemplo disto as Três Jóias, o Buda, Dharma e a Sanga.O qual se refere a Manjusrhi como aquele que fala todos os sons verbais Situ Rinpoche comenta que devido a falar todas expressões verbais sonoras, ele é considerado o Senhor da fala ou Manjushri. Diz que Manjusrhi é a corporificação da fala iluminada a qual tem a qualidade da gentileza de ser livre das faltas da fala convencional. Termina dizendo que Manjushri por ser a essência do supremo conhecimento de todos os Budas, por ser a causa dos sons da fala deste supremo conhecimento e por ser a sua fala a fonte de todas as expressões sonoras ele é então homenageado como sendo o orador dos sons verbais.
No segundo verso o qual Tonmi homenageia o senhor Shiva ele comenta que esta homenagem é feita aquele que foi no passado o extrator das consoantes e vogais as quais formam as bases de todos os nomes, palavras e expressões, o qual é conhecido no mundo como o Senhor dos deuses Shiva. E aqui Situ Rinpoche diz que a homenagem de Tonmi ao Senhor Shiva como sendo o extrator de todos as letras esta em conformidade com o que é explicado na tradição textual dos Brahmanês sobre os vinte e quatro criadores onde o Senhor Shiva é o criador das letras. Continua o segundo verso homenageando e se prostrando a todos os especialistas que comporam os textos capazes de incluir sua sabedoria com respeito ao conhecimento das palavras e seus significados através de ensinar como fazer expressões verbais da língua e em como compôr o significado escrito corretamente citando e incluindo especialmente os próprios mestres de Tonmi como Guru Brahman Livikara e assim por diante.
No terceiro verso Tonmi aborda o aspecto extraordinário do conhecimento das conexões de letras (Gramática) como sendo a causa dos comentadores dos Vedas e a base essencial de todos os nomes, frases e expressões. Neste caso Situ Rinpoche explica que o que Tonmi quer dizer aqui é que a conexão entre letras forma a base de todos os três principais treinamentos de Buda em Shila(disciplina ética), samadhi (perfeita atenção)

e prajna (sabedoria) e também é a causa dos expositores de todo o completo sistema textual dos quatro Vedas exteriores de Rigveda, Yajurveda, Samveda e Arthavaveda junto com suas ramificações.
Aqui concluimos os própositos da língua tibetana dos quais a tornam sagrada para o seu povo e para muitos outros adeptos ao budismo. Fica claro a grande preciosidade desta língua no sentido de que foi especialmente criada para que os ensinamentos extraordinariamente preciosos de Buda pudessem ser traduzidos, estudados e aplicados resultando por fim na liberação do sofrimento e insatisfatoriedade cíclica e na compreenção e sabedoria completa sobre os dois níveis da realidade relativa e absoluta. É dentro desta perspectiva que os tibetanos em sua grande maioria se relacionam com sua língua e sistema gramatical, é com este grande respeito e admiração pela base na qual o budismo se estabeleceu no tibet até os dias de hoje e que apartir de lá se espalhou pelo mundo que tal língua pode ser considerada inspiradora e passível de profundo respeito e veneração levando a dar sentido a torná-la algo sagrado para os tibetanos e budistas de sua tradição.
Um outro aspecto que é uma seção particular sagrada incluida dentro da língua tibetana são os métodos e ensinamentos contidos na literatura vajrayana ou tântrica no budismo.
Dentro desta literatura encontramos os mantras ou sílabas especiais que expressam a essência de qualidades, sabedoria e realizações supremas como também a própria natureza de todas as coisas.
Tais sílabas são consideradas extremamente sagradas e são vistas como portais de acesso a tais aspectos supremos quando praticadas perfeitamente.

Terminado a abordagem de suas bases, origens, propósitos agora podemos vir a contemplar os seus resultados desde uma forma grosseira até o resultado que tem por base o seu verdadeiro propósito inicial, ou seja, a transmissão dos ensinamentos e da visão de Buda e dos grandes mestres subsequentes.
Da mesma forma como abordado anteriormente, o próprio inventor da escrita e grámatica tibetana Tonmi Sambhota no final de seu primeiro tratado chamado "Sumtchupa" menciona os resultados que surgem com base no conhecimentos da língua da seguinte forma.

"Tendo se tornado um especialista nas conexões dos sufixos;

O siginificado das escrituras, das conexões e"
"Das Upadeshas do Guru, da combinação destes três,
Se chegará sobre o topo do significado.
Pessoas diligentes para com seu treinamento
Primeiro devem aprender os tons."

"Os três, prefixos, nomes-base e sufixos
São o seu treinamento para a leitura.
As quatro conexões dos sufixos;
Conecte-os para com o propósito de ouvir, contemplar e ensinar."

"Através dos meios de tais ramos,
Pela finalidade do fruto, se encontra-rá o significado.
Através destas etapas do treinamento,
Mesmo alguém de pouco empenho,"

"Rapidamente tornar-se-á desobstruído o seu melhor entendimento.
Por esta razão, primeiro treine nisto.
Então, tendo também ouvido os extensos,
Para com o treinamento que se tem fé,"

"Escute, dos Gurus, seus principais textos.
Aceitando o Acharya como tal,
Abandonando completamente a preguiça e a distração,
Apoiada sobre um bom caráter e fé,"

"Tal pessoa irá tornar-se rapidamente realizada.
Para esta, deve-se instruir com o passar do tempo,
Para com o oposto deste é o inverso."

(Este são os sete últimos versos da tradução completa do primeiro tratado da língua tibetana de Tonmi Sambhota, tradução do tibetano para o português por Gabriel Jaeger)

Da mesma forma veremos o amplo sentido destes versos de Tonmi apartir dos comentários de Situ Rinpoche em seu comentário sobre os mesmos.
O final da metade do primeiro e a primeira metade do segundo verso Tonmi menciona que ao se tornar um especialista nas conexões entre letras, nas escrituras e na transmissão oral do guru se chegará ao exato significado de qualquer tradição textual que se estiver estudando.

"Tendo se tornado um especialista nas conexões dos sufixos;
O siginificado das escrituras, das conexões e"
"Das Upadeshas do Guru, da combinação destes três,
Se chegará sobre o topo do significado.

Situ Rinpoche comenta que tal verso quer dizer que tornando-se hábil nas conexões dos sufixos e querendo-se estudar os extraordinários campos do conhecimento, então do significado das escrituras dos campos ordinários de conhecimento, da extensão dos tratados compostos por Rishis e Panditas tais como artes, cura, astrologia, poesia, sinonímia, composição e drama e, também, os extraordinários tópicos do conhecimento tais como as excelentes palavras do Buda junto com os seus comentários unidos a razão de se tornar especialista na conexão entre letras e na transmissão oral do guru o qual é o especialista nos significados dos principais treinamentos, tais três fatores irão favorávelmente se tornar um e se chegará perfeitamente no significado exato de qualquer tradição textual que se deseja compreender e assim facilmente tornando-se realizado em tal área.
O final da metade do segundo, o terceiro, quarto e a primeira linha do quinto verso Tonmi aborda o treinamento, o próposito, o resultado e o meio de se atingir tal objetivo.

Pessoas diligentes para com seu treinamento
Primeiro devem aprender os tons."
"Os três, prefixos, nomes-base e sufixos
São o seu treinamento para a leitura.
As quatro conexões dos sufixos;
Conecte-os para com o propósito de ouvir, contemplar e ensinar."
"Através dos meios de tais ramos,
Pela finalidade do fruto, se encontra-rá o significado.
Através destas etapas do treinamento,
Mesmo alguém de pouco empenho,"
"Rapidamente tornar-se-á desobstruído o seu melhor entendimento.
Por esta razão, primeiro treine nisto.
Então, tendo também ouvido os extensos,
Para com o treinamento que se tem fé,"

"Escute, dos Gurus, seus principais textos.

Aqui Situ Rinpoche explica que para qualquer pessoa iniciante, no começo de seu treinamento é essencial colocar esforço no aprendizado correto da leitura e da pronúncia das letras. Tendo-se aprendido como ler, então, há os sufixos e os prefixos, como explicado no segundo tratado de Tonmi entitulado "A Aplicação do Sinais de Gênero". Tais explanações e regras gramaticais encontradas neste tratado facilitarão o "ouvir as explicações do Guru", "comtemplar o seu correto significado" e, "após ter-se tornado perito nas mesmas ensiná-las a outros".
Seguindo Situ Rinpoche continua explicando que pelo poder de tais dois ramos da leitura e da gramática, aqueles, pela finalidade de obter o fruto, a maestria do treinamento pelo qual se teve empenho, se irá chegar ao conhecimento do significado. Tendo-se chegado neste ponto, deve-se então cultivar a experiência do mesmo diz Situ Rinpoche.
Assim, Situ Rinpoche termina sua explicação dizendo que pelo treinamento dentro deste tipo de sequencia mesmo pessoas que desempenham um pequeno esforço, deixando de lado aqueles com grande empenho no ouvir e refletir, irão rapidamente ter seu entendimento desobstruído. Por esta razão, aqueles que desejarem se tornar versados deveriam começar seu treinamento neste próprio texto, "Os Trinta". Tendo entendido este, deveriam absorve-lo junto a compreensão e maestria do segundo tratado, " A Aplicação do Sinais de Gênero" e outros textos gramaticais extensos. Assim, para tais treinamentos que formam a base dos três veículos (hinayana, mahayana e vajrayana) pelos quais se tem fé e se quer treinar, deveria-se ouvir os principais e secundários textos dos Gurus.

As três últimas linhas do penúltimo verso e o último verso Tonmi Sambhota aborda as características do estudante do qual se deve instruir.

Aceitando o Acharya como tal,
Abandonando completamente a preguiça e a distração,
Apoiada sobre um bom caráter e fé,"
"Tal pessoa irá tornar-se rapidamente realizada.
Para esta, deve-se instruir com o passar do tempo,
Para com o oposto deste é o inverso."

Aqui Situ Rinpoche explica o que seria um vaso propício a ser ensinada as instruções deste shastra. Aceitando o Acharya que esta oferecendo as instruções como o Acharya (mestre) por honra-lo e demostrar gratitude a ele. Com respeito a circunstâncias adversas, ter persistência a qual abandona ambos a preguiça do pouco interesse pelo tema a ser treinado e a distração por outras atividades. Com respeito a circunstâncias conducivas, ter uma perseverança respeitosa na base de um bom caráter e fé no valor superior do tema pelo qual se esta treinando. Alguém o qual tiver tais três características irá, por meio disso, tornar-se rapidamente realizado em seu específico treinamento. Assim, quando tal pessoa for reconhecida, ela deveria ser instruída com o passar do tempo. O oposto do vaso explicado anteriormente - alguém que não tem respeito pelo Acharya, que tiver preguiça e distração, que tiver um mau caráter e não tiver fé - não é um vaso propício, assim para tais pessoas tal entendimento pelo qual se deveria ser instruído com o passar do tempo é o inverso e por agora eles não deveriam ser instruídos. Ainda assim, se após eles venham a se tornar buscadores e estiverem bem motivados, eles também deverão ser bem ensinados como discípulos diz Situ Rinpoche terminando seu comentário ao primeiro tratado de Tonmi Sambhota.

Penso que desta forma concluimos uma pequena e limitada abordagem do aspecto sagrado da língua tibetana em termos de suas bases, origens, propósitos e resultados. Penso que talvez muitos tibetanos tenham visões mais místicas a respeito de sua língua e, principalmente, a respeito do poder das sílabas mantricas. Tais crenças e visões particulares não abordei aqui. Concentrei mais na questão da própria origem da língua escrita e literária em conexão com o budismo, ou, criada apartir da motivação de estabelecer o budismo no Tibet.
Sobre fontes literárias do assunto de forma específica peço aos membros da lista que ajudem pois eu não conheço.
Espero ter ajudado de alguma forma.
Peço que se alguma parte do texto for usada em algum outro trabalho que seja mencionada as fontes e autor pois facilitará futuros esclarecimentos de possíveis dúvidas.
Foram acrescentados versos do Primeiro tratado gramatical de Tonmi Sambhota chamado "Os trinta, A Gramática Raiz" traduzidas do tibetano para o portugues por mim, caso tais versos forem usados peço da mesma forma que informem o tradutor.

Paz,
Gabriel
gabriel@montanhadourada.org
www.montanhadourada.org

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "Lotsawanet group.
To post to this group, send email to Lotsawanet---Lingua-Tibetana@googlegroups.com
To unsubscribe from this group, send email to Lotsawanet---Lingua-Tibetana-unsubscribe@
For more options, visit this group at http://groups.google.com/group/Lotsawanet---Lingua-Tib
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

=-=

==========
(c) Copyright information: This is an electronic version of the book: A Guide to Awareness.
This book is copyright: Mahamakut Rajavidyalaya Press, Phra Sumeru Road, Bangkok 102
You may use this electronic version for personal use but all commercial rights are reserved Rajavidyalaya Press.
==========

A GUIDE TO AWARENESS

DHAMMA TALKS on the FOUNDATIONS of MINDFULNESS (Satipatthana Sutta)

by

H.H. Somdet Phra Nyanasamvara
Supreme Patriarch of Thailand (Venerable Suvaddhano Bhikkhu)

Wat Bovornives Vihara
Bangkok, Thailand

*

This Guide to Awareness is a translation from the series of Dhamma talks published in the T

Naew Patibat Nai Satipatthan (lit: The Way of Practice in the Satipatthana).
The venerable author, HH Somdet Phra Nyansamvara is the Supreme Patriarch of Thailand Bovornives Vihara, a large and famous monastery in the old city of Bangkok. It is a centre fo and is well known among westerners interested in Dhamma, many of whom have received c venerable author as Preceptor.
HH Somdet Phra Nyansamvara was born in Kanchanaburi Province, about 130 kilometres n 2456 B.E. (1913). When he was thirteen years old, he became a novice and in 2476 B.E. he ordination. On going back to continue his studies in Bangkok he was given new ordination a Suvaddhano, with the Supreme Patriarch Vajiranyanavong as Preceptor, at Wat Bovornives
After furthering and completing his Dhamma and Pali studies to the highest grade (grade nin Ven. Chao Khun Phra Brahmamuni as abbot in 2503 B.E. (1960). It was therefore in carryin the late abbot when in 2504 B.E. (1961) he gave this series of Dhamma talks.
He was awarded the ecclesiastical title of 'Somdet' in 2515 B.E. (1972) and has held variou administration of the Thai Sangha. (These more recently included: membership in the Coun the management board for Mahamakut Buddhist University; Head of the National Buddhist F Foundation for Lepers, just to name a few.) In 2532 B.E. (1989), he became the leader of all Thailand, being made the nineteenth supreme patriarch of the Bangkok era.
The Dhamma talks were presented to both monks and lay people. Afterwards the monks wo verses from the Pali texts, followed by a period of group meditation. They were therefore, no but a guide for those listening actually to put into practice.
A translation such as this has many difficulties, not the least of which being the profundity of and the inadequacy of our understanding and translating abilities. We therefore hope reader check these teachings out in their own practice and experience.
This translation is respectfully dedicated to the venerable author who gave 'new life' by orda bhikkhus and who has helped so many of us from the west.

The Translators

* * *

In an attempt to make this translation accessible to all, we have translated most Pali terms. I scholars should note that on their first occurrence the Pali word is usually shown in brackets translation is normally consistent throughout the book. Several words were left untranslated equivalent was either difficult to find or too clumsy compared to the original. We have includ the end of this electronic book that will (attempt to) show diacritical marks. End Notes will als the end of the document.
As the venerable author mentions in his Introduction, he had to recap and summarize on pre because people often missed some of the sequence of Dhamma talks. However, this transla repetition.

* * *

Introduction

Tan Chao Khun Phra Brahmamuni (Suvaca Thera) originally organized a series of Dhamma Vihara. He would present a sermon and then, after the monks chanted, everyone would sit i
I was invited to continue with this and as I considered it beneficial I accepted the task. Howe pointed out that I was not a meditation teacher. I still had responsibilities concerned with tea various other duties, and so could not fully practise developing myself, let alone attain to a le train others. My Dhamma explanation therefore always had to depend on the scriptures, and stray from them, I also felt as if I had lost my way. I had to rely on the footprints of those gon show the way, which I could not manage on my own.
At first, the sermons of Tan Chao Khun Brahmamuni were read out. Then, in the Rains Retr (1961), I started to present talks of my own. These were tape recorded and later transcribed
The Maha Satipatthana Sutta, the Great Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness, is re
Wat Bovoranives Vihara. I can recite all of it which helped when I was presenting my Dhamm Discourse is a major pillar in the practice of both calm and insight, and so was chosen as the present.
The Dhamma talks were given twice weekly, on the evening of the quarter moon day and th
those that came to listen did not attend on every occasion, I would usually summarize and re earlier talks.
Previously, I wrote about my reliance on the scriptures but in some places my explanation m from the normal interpretation. I nearly cut such passages out but in the end didn't, for I am s if those additional thoughts which popped up of themselves are incorrect, they will receive th my readers for not being intentionally misleading. I will therefore leave them there for Dhamm investigate and consider.
These twenty-two Dhamma talks should be read and carefully considered, so as not to stray practice in the foundations of mindfulness.

* * *

The teaching presented here follows the way found in the Discourse on the Foundations of M contains the essential and graduated steps of practice. It is a way which those who practise appreciate. However, some people may charge that it is inappropriate and lacking benefit be feeling of weariness and depression. It is rather likely that the people who say this are actua realizing the truth. It's similar to being fearful of the doctor's examination of one's illness or c one's eyes to the truth. This is not a characteristic of a clever person.

If you read this book, you will discover the truth of the 'knots' and problems that exist within y short, this can be described as the 'knot of suffering.' You may also then see the method to safeguard against this suffering. When actually trying out this practice, you will be able to cu suffering in accordance with the Buddha's Teaching. You will also experience a joy unknown

* * *

This book has already been reprinted many times in Thai. I therefore requested Bhikkhu Ariy Kantasilo to translate it into English so as to make it more widely available. I would now like both for bringing this work to completion and I hope it will be of benefit to all.

Somdet Phra Nyanasamvara

(HH the Supreme Patriarch of Thailand)

* * *

TALK 1

Kammatthana: The Place of Work

Kammatthana is a place of work, and here it means where one works on one's mind. In virtu mind is forever thinking and concocting, leading to the arising of lust (raga) and greed (lobha aversion (dosa) and to the birth of delusion (moha). The mind is then enveloped in the contr and affairs and habitually smothered in defilements. Such a disquieted and unstill mind can just as there is no rest for the waves of the sea.
The mind infiltrated with such defilements is so biased and unbalanced that it can't recogniz can't see conditions for what they really are. For instance, the mind bound up with lust or gre towards the pleasant, attractive side of things, creating a predilection for a certain thing. Liki becomes biased and it will then appear 'perfect,' 'good' or 'quite nice' --depending on how m it. Even if something is really not at all good, one assumes it to be so because one is attract through the prejudice of lust and greed.

When the mind is warped by hatred, it will then take the negative side and turn away from th hated the most will then appear 'totally bad' or --according to the level of one's aversion-- 'pl
'not so good,' etc.
The mind imbued with delusion finds it even harder to see the truth. It's as if one is half-blind things only dimly. Even one's conjectures probably do not accord with the truth because the obscured with delusion.
Lust, greed, hatred and delusion not only unbalance and agitate the mind but also block the wisdom (pannya) which would be able to penetrate to the actual state of things. The Lord Bu taught about the two places which can be established for working on the mind, the two kamm Samatha kammatthana is the mind's working place to develop calm (samatha).
Vipassana kammatthana is where the mind can attain insight (vipassana) into the truth.
Working for calm is the first step because the mind needs relief from the defilements which b it. One can then practise for insight as the tranquil mind is balanced and free from the bias o defilements. Whatever is then investigated can be seen clearly for what it really is, and this i insight begins to develop.

The Refuges (Sarana)

Just as the earth receives and supports our footsteps, so it is necessary, right from the begin developing these work places, to have a shelter and solid foundation for the mind. The mind the Triple Gem (Ti-Ratana): the Buddha, the Dhamma , and the Sangha.
One must first determine the Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha as one's true refuge, and recoll their special virtues and qualities. Thus, the Lord Buddha is truly the Awakened One; the Dh Way of practice to the end of all defilements and suffering; and the Sangha are those who a the Dhamma Way to its fruition. The cultivating of a profound appreciation for the qualities o requires a deep understanding of what the Buddha taught: that it indubitably leads to the en suffering. The more one can perceive the profundity of Dhamma the more one can apprecia the Lord Buddha. One's mind will then go for refuge to the Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha w wavering.
Establishing one's mind in the Refuge of the Triple Gem is the preliminary step in the develo kammatthana working places. So will you all please resolve to accept this refuge for your mi trust and faith in Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha --and also a trust and confidence in your ow practise. This especially applies to the kammatthana work which you have determined to pra leads to calmness and tranquillity, to wisdom and insight. It is the true and certain support fo
Precepts and Moral Virtue (Sila)

Now the ground or foundation for the mind's support can be laid. This is moral virtue (sila) w the natural (pakati) state of the mind undisturbed by the defilements. These defilements will the mind into intending (cetana) and setting into motion wrong actions through body and mi may find yourself unable to maintain this natural state of mind because of business or work However, once you enter the place of Dhamma practice, you must firmly resolve to refrain fr behaviour. In other words, do not break the five precepts(1).

At this present time you must be especially careful to guard the natural virtue of the mind. D to be pulled down into unskilful ways. When you can sustain this natural state of mind, you endowed with moral virtue. Once this virtue is present, it forms the foundation on which to re mind. When your mind has such a foundation, together with a refuge safeguarding your Dha of the defilements' attacks, then an opportunity opens up: an opportunity to follow the way o establish a place to cultivate your own mind.

4th August 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 2

The Foundations of Mindfulness: Satipatthana

The Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness (Satipatthana Sutta) directly takes up and training of the mind. In fact the Lord Buddha even said that it is the only way to transcend so the Dhamma that needs to be seen and to come to the end of suffering with the realization o therefore, includes the perfection both of calm and insight. However, one initially needs to kn basis of practice, the kammatthana. This, as I have mentioned previously, means a place of for the mind. It requires the determination to establish a foundation for one's practice. But wh find this base for one's concentration?
Endeavouring to establish the mind in the affairs of external objects --a visual object, a soun taste, tangible or mental object(2)-- can only lead the defilements to infiltrate the mind. The based in the defilements rather than in the kammatthana. Thus the decision of exactly where one's practice becomes crucial.
The Lord Buddha taught that we should direct our attention back inside ourselves. The foun mind's development will be found right here inside ourselves and not at all in external things specific, inside oneself refers to the body (kaya), feeling (vedana), mind (citta) and mental ob
--all complete in each one of us.

Body (Kaya)

Turning one's attention back to oneself, looking from the outside in, one first comes across t notices that, whether awake or asleep, a basic and essential function is breathing. There mu another bodily postures --walking, standing, sitting or lying down. There are then the second such as, when walking, one bends the arms and legs or one turns and glances around. Eve here now there is always a certain natural way for positioning your feet for sitting.
Then there are the other parts to this body (rupa-kaya) made up of the external and internal Externally there is the hair on the head, body hair, nails, teeth and skin, and internally such t flesh, tendons, bones, bone marrow, bile, kidneys, heart, etc.
These bodily constituents can all be reduced and considered in terms of elements (dhatu). F organs which tend to hardness come under the earth element; those which are fluid, under t those that are 'heating,' under the fire element; and those that produce motion, under the wi
As long as all these elements are properly associated together, the whole body appears nor disperse then what's left is a dead body. For example, if the wind element fails then the brea
The body then becomes bloated and decays until only bones remain, and eventually even th will disintegrate. Before its formation this body did not exist, and so in the final event it return nonexistence. This is the section on the body.

Feeling (Vedana)

In a living body where the elements are in harmony together there is also feeling: Pleasant f (sukha-vedana), painful feeling (dukkha-vedana) or neutral feeling which is neither-painful-n (adukkha-m-asukha vedana)(3). For example, this body experiences feelings of cold and he hardness.

Mind (Citta)

An intact body with elements smoothly functioning together forms a support and resort for th of everyone's mind varies. Sometimes lust is uppermost and sometimes it subsides; sometin delusion and sometimes they subside.

Mental Objects (dhamma)

Examining the mind to a deeper level, one finds that it is always involved and concerned wi affairs, some of these being good, some bad, and some in between. These follow the princip phrases:
Kusala dhamma all mind objects which are wholesome.
Akusala dhamma all mind objects which are unwholesome.

Abyakata dhamma all mind objects which are indeterminate or neutral.
These are all found in one's mind.
So we can now say that this body, these feelings, this mind and these mental objects are tog myself, and right here is where the Discourse advises us to base our attention and mindfuln practice though, we first concentrate on just one of these bases.

Concerning the Breath

The first point is that to use the in-and-out breathing as the base for establishing mindfulnes body must always have breath but we never pay any attention to it. So our practice is now to to bear on this natural breathing pattern.
The Lord Buddha explains (in the Discourse) that one holds the body erect(4) and firmly esta mindfulness. Mindfully one breathes in, mindfully one breathes out. Instead of sending the m one concentrates it wholly on the breath. This will lead to a more subtle awareness. Breathin breath, be aware of it. Breathing out a long breath, be aware of it. Be aware of a short in-bre out-breath, but do not tense or force the breathing. Just let go and breathe naturally --but be The Discourse then continues with instruction to note the whole body. Experience and know the breath goes in and out. Expand your awareness to cover the whole body including both (nama-kaya) and the corporeal group (rupa-kaya).
Considering the mental group, be aware of the state of the mind, of the present condition of and concentration. How are they at this moment? Note the body through awareness of its po How are you sitting? From the soles of your feet upwards, and from the crown of your head completely aware of your body.
After we fully accomplish this awareness of both groups, the Discourse then goes on to teac in-and-out breathing. This does not involve any forcing or holding of the breath, but is a natu down. When the mind becomes refined, so in turn does the breath. The Lord Buddha taught unquiet then the breathing will be rough and gross. However, should the mind become calm also becomes more refined and subtle. Sometimes the breathing may even seem to have st need to panic. You have simply calmed down while the breathing still remains.

The Four Fundamentals of Practice

You must have energy and determination (atapa) in your practice, and this includes conscie example, you determine to practice for a specified time period and so must therefore fulfill th any slackness or cutting short. Even though you may feel frustrated and want to give up, you accomplish your objective. With such conscientiousness everything develops smoothly and the first essential in the practice.
The second principle is awareness and clear-comprehension (sampajannya) of oneself at al absent-minded or negligent by falling asleep or losing mindfulness. Permitting sleep and allo attention to fade indicates a lapse of clear-comprehension in your kammatthana practice. Th from the path and falling into a chasm or pit. Therefore, awareness and clear-comprehensio guarded and supported. They thus form the second fundamental in the practice.

The next principle, mindfulness (sati), is awareness fixed and firmly established without any the chosen object(5). Should another mental object suddenly interrupt leading to rapture (pit then don't lose yourself in it but quickly return to your base. For example, reject all distractio your full attention back to the in-and-out breathing.
Once mindfulness is well established, your practice can develop without the harm that may absent-mindedly drifting away with the thoughts and moods that have arisen. The harm com readily abandon mindfulness and become a heedless daydreamer. Therefore, steadfastly es mindfulness. Don't allow it to drift away. This is the third principle.
The fourth principle is to overcome hankering and dejection concerning the world(6). This is point, for whenever one encounters a pleasant mental object in one's practice, one must con deceit and a false perception. Likewise, if an unpleasant experience arises --such as a ment which provokes fear-- then one must again be mindfully aware that none of it is real. Being neither-glad-nor-dejected with anything that arises, one continually brings mindfulness back established object and anchors it there. In this way concentration (samadhi)(7), and eventua (pannya), will arise and one's practice will progress well.
These four fundamentals are essential for everyone who practises. If they are dispensed wit thereby abandoned --with possibly harmful results. But with these principles well established can only be beneficial and develop well.

5th August 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 3

Expanding and Summarizing on the Section Concerning Breathing

I would now like to expand the explanation on mindfulness of breathing (anapana-sati). The sitting erect in the samadhi-posture with mindfulness alert and firmly fixed on the in-and-out ways for developing such mindfulness are then given:
1. Breathing in a long breath one knows, 'I am breathing in a long breath.' Breathing out a lo knows, 'I am breathing out a long breath.'

2. Breathing in a short breath one knows, 'I am breathing in a short breath.' Breathing out a s knows, 'I am breathing out a short breath.'
3. 'Experiencing the whole body, I shall breathe in,' thus one trains oneself. 'Experiencing th shall breathe out,' thus one trains oneself.
4. 'Calming the activity of the (breath-)body, I shall breathe in,' thus one trains oneself. 'Calm activity of the (breath-) body, I shall breathe out,' thus one trains oneself.

In the first and second stages --of breathing in and breathing out a long breath, and breathin breathing out a short breath-- one has to realize exactly how one is breathing at that momen the ordinary, unforced breathing which normally goes unnoticed. With careful attention one v the breaths are either long or short. When fatigued or tired, one can see that the breathing b perhaps with panting or gasping. When the mind is upset and unquiet, one may also tend to than when one is calm. Breathing exercises may also involve deep breathing.
With the body rested and peaceful, the breathing becomes quieter and more refined. When tranquil, the breathing is even more delicate and refined. At first your mindful attention on th not seem to bring any fruitful results. However, with persistence the mind will become more established, allowing contentment (chanda), rapture (piti), and gladness (pamojja) to arise. T first taste of the fruits of the tranquil mind, the mind endowed with samadhi, which will encou onwards in your practice.
The third stage --of experiencing the whole body with the breath-- is concerned with being a corporeal group and the mental group. Be aware of your posture as you sit practising here, c your hands and feet. Take note of the state of your mind and the clarity of your mindfulness concentration. Such an awareness of the whole body indicates a broad mindfulness. This m experiencing the whole body becomes experiencing the whole breath-body with each breath
One notices, in simple terms, that the in-breath enters at the nose, passes midway at the he the navel, whereas the out-breath starts at the navel, passes the heart and ends at the nose gauge for helping to direct one's attention. However, following the breath in and out will actu and unfocus the mind. The Lord Buddha therefore taught that one should fix the mind on tha the in-breath starts and the out-breath ends, i.e. where the breath contacts the nostrils or up single point is the mark (nimitta) where one stations the mind. With each in-and-out breath o touching that mark (the nostrils or upper lip), and this is known as experiencing the whole bo breath-body.
This can be compared to sawing a piece of wood. Attention is focused solely on the cutting p the complete length of the saw as it moves back and forth. Seeing that one point is like seei and, similarly, in attending to just that single mark one experiences the whole breath. This is stage.
Calming the activity of the breath-body is the fourth stage of training. This does not involve a or holding of breath in an attempt to force it to become more refined. Rather, it involves a str the mind's concentration and calm. When the mind is calm and refined, so is the breath. The stimulating and exciting the mind, achieves only tension and stress.

The practice of concentration or samadhi is for peace and tranquillity in both body and mind.
and mind are still, the aim of this part of the practice is reached. However, the essence here stage three (above), with the fourth stage following on from there.

Counting and "Buddho"

In the beginning of the practice, trying to use only the Pali (textual) instructions may be too d accomplish. Therefore additional devices to engage and hold the mind have been offered. F (mental-) counting of the breaths. This can first be done in a slow pattern by counting each s out breath as follows:
Inhale (count) one... exhale (count) one Inhale (count) two... exhale (count) two Inhale (count) three... exhale (count) three Inhale (count) four... exhale (count) four Inhale (count) five... exhale (count) five Then return again to counting one--one; two--two... etc., but this time continuing the sequen end with six--six. Repeat the sequence again, returning to one--one (and so on) but this time seven--seven; then back to one--one and then up to eight--eight; one--one then up to nine--n the completed sequence from one--one to ten--ten.
After completing a full sequence from one to ten, begin the cycle again as before, i.e. one--o and so on, until reaching one--one to ten--ten again.
When the mind is sufficiently steady, a pattern of more rapid counting can be used. This ent counting one with the inhalation and two with the exhalation. Continue this sequence until yo Then, returning to one continue until you reach six. Carry on these rounds until you reach te
These counting techniques can be individually adjusted to one's own practice so as to achie results. One possible adaptation, for example, is to count from one straight through to ten an counted ten, return to one and start the cycle again.
If plain counting does not suit you then the word 'Buddho' may be used instead. Inhale (men 'Bud-', and exhale, (mentally-) reciting '-dho'. Inhale 'Bud-', exhale'-dho,' and so on.
Counting or using a mantra word such as Bud-dho is a useful aid in the beginning stages of can be compared to using lined paper to guide the hand when we were first learning how to suitable degree of competence, steadiness of mind and practice has been attained, the devi Bud-dho should be discarded, with a pure mindfulness carrying on alone. This is the genera practice, and each practitioner should decide what is most suitable. This method is purely fo of calm, and will bring peace and stability to the mind.

I would like to remind you of the four fundamentals of practice: Conscientious perseverance full and clear comprehension (sampajannya) and mindfulness (sati). These are always esse practice.

The Benefits of Samadhi

The unquiet, restless mind wastes time and effort with its lack of application and focus. We r a book but cannot concentrate due to disturbing and proliferating thoughts. However, a minc described above) in calm and steadfastness allows us to apply ourselves. For example, we to that book and can quickly digest and understand it, with a better recall as well. Thus the g benefits of the trained, stabilized mind manifest not only in a passive resting of the mind in h also in whatever activity we may engage in.

1st August 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 4

Review of the Basic Practice

Samatha kammatthana is the place of work to bring calmness and stability to the mind. Vipa where insight into the truth arises in the mind.
One begins practice by taking refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma and Sangha because one is f Buddha's Dhamma rather than any other way. Faith (saddha) and confidence (pasada) in th opened up the Way for our practice to follow-- is the going for refuge.
You should determine to keep at least the Five Precepts. Even your sitting here now is also improve your moral virtue. With your refuge, faith and precepts established, you can now pra insight.
The practice leading to a calm and stable mind is elucidated in the Great Discourse on the F Mindfulness (Maha Satipatthana Sutta) as mindfulness of breathing. One establishes mindfu in-and-out breath, long or short (etc.), experiencing the whole body and calming the breath-b (Buddhist) Teachers have also offered supplementary ways: focussing the attention at one p breathing cycle (i.e. at the nostrils or upper lip where the breath makes contact), for example counting to help, or by reciting 'Bud-dho'. There are other variations, but they always boil do the mind in one place. When your mind becomes one-pointed, you can be sure everything is any rate, just keep your mindfulness focussed and you will be able to make the mind one.

Characteristics of the Mind

I would like to explain a little more about the nature of the mind; how difficult it is to tame and with its habitual jumping and racing about. Even with mindfulness fixed on a single object, it continually buck and pull away. Where does the mind jump to? It struggles around among m following after desires, wishes, attractions and the obstacles (palibodha) which are worries a These external involvements are those concerns which we think and conceive about. Once the mind they agitate as worries and anxieties. If they are many and you are unable to throw the mind can't be pacified. However, everyone with true determination can expel them and a

The Method of Examining the Mind

Mindfulness is essential for guarding the mind right from the beginning. Any inattention, and have darted away in a flash. The mind must then be speedily led back inside if mindfulness

If one checks to see why the mind had darted away, one may find the cause in something lik car, of people walking past, or the noise of something falling. The mind zips away to that par and then starts to roam further afield. It may have wandered on through many varied episod realizes the fact and is able to return it to one's determined point. However, should another the mind may then be off again --continuing on from one thing to another in what might seem though it spans many different episodes.
Using mindfulness, always return the mind to your chosen point and, carefully establishing examine it there. The mind will then be pacified and, when checked in any particular episode go off there again but will rather follow some other affair instead. This method must be repea mind is tamed and able to come to calm with contentment (chanda), rapture (piti) and ease give a taste of the first stages of calm and samadhi, furthering your satisfaction in the practic facilitating the focusing and settling of the mind in samadhi.

Posture

Following on from the section on breathing is the section on posture (iriyapatha-pabba). Her teaches the use of clear-comprehension. When walking, one is aware of one's walking; whe aware of one's standing, and likewise with sitting or lying down. When changing position, be movement. Aim to keep up this clear-comprehension and awareness.
On close examination one finds intention (cetana) present before any position is taken up, o moves to change that posture. For example, there is the intention to walk or to sit. However, walking or sitting, one's clear-comprehension is liable to be broken by the mind's straying av of other affairs. Therefore, make sure that clear-comprehension is aware and safeguarding a presently in.

Clear Comprehension (Sampajannya)

Another section (sampajannya-pabba) also deals with clear-comprehension, classifying the more detailed way. Be aware of what you are doing. At the moment of taking a step forward looking or turning, of stretching the body out or contracting it in --whatever you are doing-- b aware. Dressing, eating, drinking, relieving yourself: notice how these things proceed. This i standing, sitting, lying down, speaking, being silent, going to sleep and waking. This constar is the practising of clear-comprehension. It will safeguard you from carelessness and neglige only benefit.

On Impurities (Patikkula)

This section (Patikkula-pabba) deals with the impure or unclean aspect of the body. One exa the soles of the feet below, upwards to the crown of the head. It is surrounded and encased of various foul and repulsive impurities.
These are the bodily parts:
hair of the head (kesa), hair of the body (loma), nails (nakha), teeth (danta), skin (taco), flesh sinews (naharu), bones (atthi), bone-marrow (atthiminjam), kidneys (vakkam), heart (hadaya diaphragm or membranes (kilomakam), spleen (pihakam), lungs (papphasam), large intestin intestines (antagunam), undigested food (udariyam), excrement (karisam), bile (pittam), phle (pubbo), blood (lohitam), sweat (sedo), fat (medo), tears (assu), skin grease (vasa), spittle (l mucous (singhanika), oil of the joints (lasika) and urine (muttam).
These number thirty-one but the Lord Buddha also pointed to the brain-in-the-skull (matthak which makes thirty-two bodily parts in all.
Even though the Lord Buddha actually intended this teaching for the monks (bhikkhu sangha very much the truth concerning the various parts of this body, and lay people might therefore manner of examination for themselves. He pointed out that this body is so compounded that rotten and putrid, as is seen when it becomes a corpse. But when it can still be nurtured and one can also manage to depend on its support. This impure aspect is not usually observed u it to see for oneself --when it's always ready to manifest.
All of this is concerned with calming and assuaging the mind from its satisfaction and passio for one's own and other people's bodies. If you wish to realize this calm then use the method for examination and contemplation. It is especially important in your samadhi practice, when such attachment for both your own and other people's bodies becomes vital. This, then, is o in the firm establishing of your mind in calm and tranquillity.

12th August 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 5

Two Methods of Calm (Samatha)

I have already explained two methods for making the mind calm and stable. There is mindfu which centres the mind in one-pointedness through awareness set on the in-and-out breaths
the body (kayagata-sati) which uses examination of the various bodily components to penetr nature.

The Elements (Dhatu-kammathana)

Another method is the examination of the elements. 'Element' (dhatu) here refers to having s characteristics rather than to coming from the same root. Thus those body parts that are har as the earth element (pathavi-dhatu); those parts that are fluid are referred to as the water e (apo-dhatu); those that are warming are the fire element (tejo-dhatu); and those that are in m element (vayo-dhatu).
We previously analysed the body into thirty-one or thirty-two internal and external componen
the elements we analyse them in the following manner:
1. The earth element is the head hair, body hair, nails, teeth, skin, flesh, sinews, bones, bon kidneys, heart, liver, membranes, spleen, lungs, large gut, small gut, undigested food and ex
All of these and any other bodily parts that are hard are designated as the earth element.
2. The water element is the bile, phlegm, pus, blood, sweat, fat, tears, skin grease, spittle, m the joints and urine. Any other component parts that are fluid can be designated as the wate
3. The fire element is that heat which warms the body (yena santappati); the heat which cau decline and deteriorate (yena jiriyati); the heat which makes the body feverish (yena pariday digestive-heat for whatever we eat, drink, chew or taste (yena asitapitakhayitasayitam samm gacchati). Any thing else in the body that has a heating characteristic is designated as the fi
4. The wind element is the upward-blowing wind (uddhangama vata); the downward-blowing the wind in the abdomen (kucchisaya vata); the wind in the bowels (kotthasaya vata); the wi through all the limbs (angamanganusarino vata) and the in-and-out breathing (assasopassa which has a moving or blowing quality is designated the wind element.

5. The space element. In other discourses the space element (akasa dhatu) is presented as this being the empty spaces and cavities of the body: the ear canals (kannacchiddam); the s (nasacchiddam); the mouth orifice (mukhadvaram); the gullet (yena ca asitapitakhayitasayita space where the food remains (i.e. the stomach) (yattha ca... ...santitthiti); the orifice from w is expelled (i.e. the rectum) (yena ca ....adhobhaga nikkhamati). Any other empty space or c is also designated as the space element.

Separating-out One's Elements

It is quite normal for each one of us to be attached to his or her body, thinking of it as myself examine it in terms of elements, separating all the hard parts out as earth element, the fluid element, the warm parts as the fire element, the airy parts as the wind element and the emp space element. That which we adhered to as me and mine will then be seen as elements.
Analyse your body and take out each element --one at a time. Take out all the hard parts, le elements together. Now remove the water and then the fire element, and you are left with th when that is taken out then all that remains is empty space.

Methods of Separating the Elements

One can examine the elements following the Lord Buddha's Way (as above) or one might us analysis reducing everything to molecules and atoms. After removing each of the elements that of that which one was attached to and thought of as me and mine the only thing which r element. Just empty space with no me and mine or self.
This analysis of elements is one strategy to use in curbing attachment to this body which ma mine, and as myself. The situation is just the same with external things where other people a have the same nature and properties. One can then release one's attachment for people an one's thinking in terms of self. The mind then calms and is firmly settled.
This is one method in the practice of calm. However, both mindfulness of the body (which w with) and this analysis of elements is calm mixed with insight. This insight will arise, without pretension, out of the analysis when the elements are clearly seen for what they really are -- person, no myself or their self. The mind previously absorbed and suffering in its me-ness a allow everything to come to calm. This is the factor leading to a calm and cool mind.

Stillness and Peace --or Thinking

The examination of the bodily parts and elements does not bring one-pointedness of mind b active analysis and investigation. In mindfulness of breathing however, the aim is for one-po does not use investigation. Use whichever method seems most appropriate to you at the tim mind might be content with stillness and at other times it will want to think. When your mind stillness, use mindfulness of breathing. However, if it likes to go out, thinking of this and that instead of giving it a free rein arrange a tour for it in your own body. Keep it within these bou soles of your feet up to the tips of the hair on your head, circumscribed within the skin. As it there, examine the bodily parts or the elements.

This Body as a Work Book

The study of calm and insight is in fact the study of this body. It's much like the student docto big text book-- which is just this very body. All his studies are contained here. The practice o insight is similar to this, but with the objective being a firmly established, calm mind together seeing and true insight. And a final letting-go.

19th August 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 6

Concentrating on a Single Object

I have already explained about stabilizing the mind by way of calm using various techniques breathing, mindfulness of the body and examination of the elements. The choice rests with t
When one decides to establish the wandering mind in one-pointedness, mindfulness of brea Should the mind wish to go roaming, let it explore the body or elements. However, mindfulne remain with each object until it is clearly discerned. For example, moving one's concentratio body, one examines the hair of the head and body, nails, teeth, skin, flesh, sinews or bones bones as a single object and through fixing one's mindfulness see them as one's own skelet the mind in one place.

Reflection on a Corpse

Previously, I have been referring to the scrutiny of the living body, but the lifeless body or co be examined. Compare this body with the corpse abandoned in the cemetery for one, two o and festering until only mouldering bones remain. One's contemplation of this will give rise t disenchantment and then bring calm to the mind. With practice one then becomes accustom unafraid of them. This is another method which uses reflection or examination.

Two Types of Samadhi

Briefly speaking, there are two types of concentration: threshold or neighbourhood concentr samadhi) and absorption concentration (appana samadhi). The type of samadhi where the m examines brings one only to the threshold because the mind is not yet one-pointed, whereas centres in one-pointedness as absorption samadhi is firm and unwavering. Concentrating on breathing, even the establishing of mindfulness on one specific part in the body, can also lea samadhi.

The Instruments for Practice

The instruments for one's practice must include applied-thought (vitakka) and sustained-thou Applied-thought is the capability of applying the mind to the meditation object of samadhi, wh sustained-thought is the sustaining and engaging of the mind together with the meditation ob
When concentrating on the breath, one must direct and apply the mind at the nostrils or upp air enters and leaves. Sustained-thought is then used to keep the mind firmly engaged on th Whenever one is careless in one's practice and mindfulness is lost, the mind will dash away must then be used again to catch and return the mind to its former station, engaging and sus without allowing it to fall away to another object.
The Lord Buddha compared applied-thought with the sound of a bell when first struck, susta likened to the reverberations of the bell. Both of these are always necessary in one's practic sustained thought are essential because the mind is continually liable to slip away from the m object, requiring applied-thought to lift it back and sustained-thought to sustain and engage i this is constantly practised, the mind becomes pacified and stationary so that the fruits of sa to appear: a pervading rapture (piti) and, even more than that, ease (sukha) arises througho body and mind. With contentment of both body and mind the mind becomes unwaveringly co object: This is one-pointedness (ekaggata).
When one has yet to experience the rewards of rapture and happiness, then one's practice w frustrating and tiresome. However, with the continued development of applied and sustained and happiness will arise and then the one-pointedness of samadhi will be born as the first fru samadhi practice. This by itself will give satisfaction in one's practice and enable it to develo flourish.
The points to note in my talk today are as follows: Applied-thought lifts and directs the mind object. Sustained thought engages and sustains the mind together with the meditation objec ease of body and mind will arise followed by the one-pointedness of mind which is samadhi.

20th August 2504 B.E. (1961)
* * *

TALK 7

Summarizing the Body Section

Today, I will complete my explanation concerning the section on the body in the Discourse o of Mindfulness. I would therefore like briefly to summarize some of the main points in review Lord Buddha actually taught this Discourse to monks, those lay people proposing to calm th use this practice to advantage and receive the resultant happiness.
The Lord Buddha taught that one must first establish mindfulness inside one's own body. As different organs and parts, the examination takes up one part at a time. On establishing min the body one recognizes that breathing is a natural experience common to everyone. He the breathe in-and-out mindfully. One should be aware of the breath's length, but concentrate on (at the nostrils or upper lip) rather than following the breath along. The mind, the body and th all become calmer and more refined; yet even though you may feel that the breathing has ac not release your concentration from its established point.
There are two ways of taking up another part of the body for examination. One way is to leav and turn to concentrate on some other part. Another way is to retain mindfulness of breathin then couple it with the contemplation of a part of the body. This combined contemplation can while the mind has yet to reach one-pointedness. At this stage one can use thinking as a he the mind from going outside. When it wants to go out then let it go into this body.
You should also be aware of other areas. Note your posture and inspect your body to see ho Notice the present posture, if you are sitting for example, and then the various sub-positions the feet and hands are placed. Being clearly aware of all of this is clear-comprehension (san After being aware of the body's posture, one can then scrutinize the body itself more closely component parts and organs. Some parts are directly discernible to the eyes (such as the ha and skin) and some cannot be seen (such as the flesh, sinews, bones and the various intern start off by examining them all in general or go straight in to pick out and closely inspect eac depends on your own preference.
After examining the body's component parts, one can view them to a deeper level by analys elements. Extract out the hard parts as earth element, the fluid parts as water element, the w fire element, and the blowing parts as the wind element. The remaining empty spaces are th

If the body and its elements were actually separated in this way then this assemblage or bod and life would be lost. However, when the elements associate together then this assemblage alive. It is breathing, it changes its posture, and its various external and internal parts are in working together. This, then, is the body we have here now.
One can further investigate and see that when the elements dissociate the wind element wil
the in-and-out breath. After the wind element, the fire element extinguishes, leaving the once
Then the water and earth element will gradually disperse until nothing remains except the em space element. Before each one of us was born, this body did not exist, and eventually it mu nothingness.

The Nine Cemetery Contemplations

Carrying one's investigation on to another level, one finds that once the wind and fire elemen body ends up being called a corpse. That corpse isn't anything other than this body. When t assembled together, it's a living body, when they have dispersed, it's a corpse.
Although the Lord Buddha taught us to examine this body, actually to see the corpse within therefore explained the use of a real corpse so as to be able to compare the two. Everyone another, had to come across someone dying or a corpse.(8) Nowadays, however, the corps dressing and making-up that its true nature does not appear. Therefore, we have to rely on t

1. Reflect on a corpse dead for one, two or three days: bloated, turned an ugly green colour
2. Next contemplate on the corpse thrown away (in a charnel ground) being devoured by ma vultures and ravens, dogs and jackals tearing at and eating the corpse.
3. From there consider the corpse stripped of its flesh by the animals but with the skeleton s with blood and flesh and held together by the tendons.
4. And further consider the skeletal corpse devoid of flesh yet still spotted with blood and he the tendons.
5. From there consider the skeletal corpse devoid of flesh and blood, yet held together by th
6. Then consider that skeletal corpse with all its holding tendons gone, the former skeleton n here and there. The bones of the feet have gone one way, the bones of the hands another.
pelvis, spinal vertebrae, ribs, breast bone, arm bones, the shoulder blades, the neck vertebr teeth and finally the skull have all come apart in different directions. They are now just bare
7. ...yet those bones are recent and therefore still white...
8. ...and after a year passes they are reduced to being just heaps of old bones.
9. Then the bones rot and decay and become dust; blown and scattered by the wind so that called bones anymore.

The examination as taught by the Lord Buddha takes this body up part by part. Examine a li foresee how it too must inevitably be without life. The fear that may sometimes arise in this c usually comes from lack of knowledge. This ignorance and loathsomeness make one imagin danger lurking. But when one discerns what it is all about --and that in truth there's no dange then that fear will fall away. Once you have mastered your timidity you will be someone eage the truth, no longer afraid of ghosts and the like.

Inspecting the House

My explanation of the investigation of the body requires the mind to make an inspection tour like moving to a new house which also needs an initial inspection. One tours the whole hous where everything is. However, this does not mean one must always be on the move, continu one did not need to rest. When one really needs to rest, to sit or lie down, then one must sto
The complete inspection of the house finished allows one to choose, according to one's pref where to place the chair or bed so one can rest. The Lord Buddha, therefore, offered many c which I have been explaining here. He pointed out the way to enter into this body and inspec entirety. When in need of rest, one can then sit or lie down where one is comfortable. One c breath by settling mindfulness on a single point there, or rest in any one of the thirty-two par body. One establishes a single focus, for example, in the bones until the skeleton manifests can contemplate the corpse. Whatever aspect appeals to you --be it living or dead-- that is u
If you are satisfied with the breath as the mark, then centre your mind unwaveringly on just c there. If the mind wants to move around then let it tour through the other parts --but make su within the body. Otherwise you can use both together, but this is not yet samadhi, for that re centring, a gathering together at one point.

26th August 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 8

The Body: Inside and Outside, Arising and Disappearing

Would you all now centre mindfulness inside your own body. The mind may now try to escap involving itself in various worries. This happens because everyone tends to have concerns a work, family, home or other areas. Use mindfulness and clear-comprehension. Be determine aside and lead the mind to collectedness inside your own body.

You may fix your concentration at the nostrils or upper lip or on any of the other objects whic explained previously. According to the Discourse (Satipatthana Sutta), being aware of the br with knowing the internal and the external, and knowing the arising and the disappearing.
Observing the external according to the conventional understanding means knowing the bre
the nostrils or upper lip. This conventional frame of reference is one which everyone who wa will experience and this is called seeing the external.
Looking at the internal with the ultimate understanding is the seeing that the very breath is m four elements. Hold your hand near your nose so that the exhalation strikes it. You will then hardness in the contact, some blowing, some moistness and some warmth. The experience element; moistness is the water element; blowing, the wind element; and warmth, the fire ele is just the breath, from a more profound viewpoint it is composed of the four elements. This the internal. Looking at the external with conventional understanding (sammati) one sees the at the internal with ultimate (paramattha) understanding there are the four elements.
Taking this now on to another level: The seeing of the breath is the external, whereas the se is the internal. This latter is the concentrating of the mind, fixing it so that the mark or sign ar is similar to a photograph: The object filmed being external, and the image on the lens or on internal. Focus your mind to see the external and the internal.
When you concentrate in this way, you will see arising and disappearing. Breathing-in is the breathing-out is the disappearing. The inhalation is also actually the bringing in of the four el the exhalation is the removing of them. This then, is an arising and a disappearing every tim While people are still breathing, they are attached to the various things, but when that breath does their conscious recognition of clinging to anything. The aim of the Lord Buddha's Teach the body in the body is therefore to see and be aware of the internal and the external, the ar disappearing. Be aware of the existence of your body, especially of the breathing, but only to necessary for knowledge and to establish mindfulness. Let go and do not grasp at anything. body exists and this breath exists and at the same time release everything. Let go. Empty yo it clear and at ease. Firmly establish your mindfulness on the object you have fixed upon.

Feeling (Vedana)

Sitting here in practice you may experience some discomfort or pain. You may ache or feel s being bitten by mosquitos, or else you may feel restless and fidgety. Even though you may h and mental pain, just be aware of whatever is painful. Bodily discomfort, mental discomfort - distress? One can find the cause in the material or carnal things, the baited hooks or amisa.
these are the things which cause the various forms of suffering. If you feel some mental disc a stifled or oppressed feeling-- and your mind won't settle down, then examine to find its cau that your mind is concerned with numerous anxieties and is unable to come to collectedness be in that you have never practised tranquillity meditation before and the mind still runs off h

It has never been still before and therefore is not satisfied with such a state. Be aware that t a cause, a baited-hook, present in the things that come in and bring suffering. When you are practice and experience bodily and mental pain, look to see where it originates. Do not subm keep up the practice according to one's original intention. That pain will then gradually fade a foundation will be established more firmly so that such stability brings forth happiness.
When you experience a pleasant feeling of either body or mind, then be aware of it as such.
a cooling breeze which refreshes your body, and no ache or stiffness is present. Consider w pleasant bodily feeling. If it came from the environment, the weather and such like, or your a you changed your posture, then realize that this is still material, baited-hook pleasure. It is a on external things.
Be aware of the cause of any pleasant mental feeling. Sometimes it may arise when the min pleasurable involvement outside and is lost therein. You can then see its dependence on ex is baited-hook pleasure. However, when the mind is steady and centred in calm with rapture and mental happiness present then this is a non-material happiness (niramisa). This is pleas external baited attractions. That bodily ease should also be seen as arising from the mind's s not from external material things.
As the mind steadily stabilizes, that pleasure will become more and more stilled and refined experienced as neither-painful-nor-pleasant. The mind is then firmly centred. This neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling is independent of external things.
When using mindfulness of breathing in your samadhi practice you must also note the feelin first they will be painful and then they will subside and pleasant feeling will be experienced. W becomes more and more refined, pleasant feeling will fade, and intermediate, neither-painfu feeling will arise. At this level of practice, the mind is established and firm but there is still a n check that the baited, externally fed, feelings of either pain or pleasure do not arise. One's le will then bring a non-material happiness which should be used to encourage one's contentm
However, do not also become attached to that happiness. Just aim for one-pointedness of m

27th August 2504 B.E. (1961)
* * *

TALK 9

The Body and Feeling: Together in Review

The cultivation of the mind aims for a steady, calm mind and a penetrative insight into the tru explained this, stage by stage, following the Lord Buddha's Way set forth in the Great Disco Foundations of Mindfulness, this being the only way to realize one's aim. Even His other Tea summarized into this form. Therefore, we shall reconsider this way of practice right from the Centre the mind and focus on your own body and feelings.

Seeing the whole body concerns: mindfulness of breathing; knowing the whole body, both th
the corporeal group; calming the mind, body and breath; being aware of one's present postu external and internal bodily parts and organs; reducing those to their elements; seeing that w dispersal of the elements what remains is a corpse in its varying stages of decomposition, u nothing left to assume as body. This examination of one's body is a wide-ranging, overall ins the practice of samadhi requires the resting of the mind in any one particular bodily part. For one finds that mindfulness of breathing suits one then concentrate on that one point.
In the initial stages of practice there will be pain in both body and mind. There are the aches in unaccustomed positions and the mind's discomfort from being forced to be still and calm w practised before. Realize that this is painful feeling arising in outside attractions with their ba Past bodily comfort and that feeling of pleasure is then used to lure it into pain. The mind, ha thinking as is its want, becomes distressed when it is forced to gather into calm. However, w persistence and unwavering determination, such pain will fade away and happiness will aris then be at ease and the mind serene.
But on no account can mindfulness be allowed to lapse. If it is lost then the mind will race ou of external objects. Whenever you catch the mind engrossed in such pleasures then fully rea baited-hook pleasure and based in external attractions. Be similarly aware of that bodily plea external lure. These things that induce the mind to dodge outside are of critical importance b out it does not stop at just one excursion. The sound of someone walking or speaking, or of other noise, may immediately lead the mind away, and then it will continue on into myriad in allow the mind to become engrossed in these external attractions with their baited hooks. Sh mind in such pleasures, then realize their origin and bring it back to the object of your samad one-pointedness.
Sometimes a neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling may similarly arise from the mind's excursi involvements. So make yourself aware of this.
Always be watchful and lead the mind back to its samadhi object so that it becomes stilled a sensuality and all unwholesome states. You can then be confident that the happiness which completely untainted by external lures and is born from tranquillity. This happiness gives a ta initial stage of practice. However, do not lose yourself in it, but continue to steady the mind i object.

Focusing and Settling the Mind

After understanding feeling as I have explained, now turn inwards to the mind itself. Look an condition, its state and disposition. As you focus there you will experience that the feeling sh mind as well --but only if you watch carefully. You will find that any bodily distress runs into t while any mental distress is already directly concerned with the mind. This gives rise to dislil also known as hatred or aversion (dosa). However, I feel that this word seems a little too str use 'dislike'. It has a broad meaning because everyone dislikes suffering. Suffering, once pr the arising of dislike and as it intensifies so the aversion arises more sharply. Therefore this what can be called aversion, arises through painful bodily and mental feeling (dukkha vedan is contacted, then bodily and mental pain must arise before it becomes a matter for aversion is therefore the fuse for aversion and dislike. When this is the case, be aware that the mind i with hatred or aversion, that dislike has already arisen in the mind.

In the opposite case, pleasant bodily and mental feeling (sukha vedana) will lead to liking. O call this lust (raga) but again it seems rather too strong a word. 'Liking' may seem too genera just understand that it refers to the beginning of lust. Lust here starts with the subtle forms o and hankering, everything which involves liking. Every type of fondness, or one may call it lu first springs from pleasant feeling. The contact that brings bodily and mental comfort and ea leads on to hankering, attachment and lust. Therefore be aware whenever these have arisen

That feeling which is intermediate --neither-painful-nor-pleasant (adukkha-m-asukha vedana experiencing of whatever is already familiar. At the experience of something new, a pleasan arise, as when one acquires something one hankers for. However, after the initial excitemen may begin to feel quite indifferent towards it and this is neutral feeling. This feeling then shift mind where it creates an attachment to that thing. Such attachment, developing from an initi an indifferent feeling, is really a type of deception because the object is still not released. Th which is a stinginess and jealous guarding, makes that object impossible to relinquish. Even no longer thrills and excites, it can still not be given up. It's like all those other things we own squirrelled away. This attachment is a form of deception. When it arises in your mind be awa (moha) is present.

Pleasant and painful feelings flash to and fro, inciting the springing forth of liking or disliking, intermediate feeling is discernible only if one carefully examines the underlying ground. One to appreciate its great extent. The mind is, in fact, deceived and attached to many of these i experiences which lack any of the flashing back and forth of pleasure-and-fondness and pai the truth of all of this in your own mind.

At the opposite pole also be aware when the mind is free and unstained by lust, hatred and attachment. When the mind cannot be established in the samadhi practice of mindfulness o because of its wandering out with liking, hating, and deceiving. It's therefore always necessa watch on your mind and to realize when it has wandered away. That awareness will allow th calmness.

At this stage in your practice, discouragement or restless and fretful thoughts may arise. Be feelings and steadily lift the mind so that it brightens and takes heart. Otherwise realize that dejection arises only because one has yet to receive the happiness resulting from tranquillity therefore, give up on the practice. Do not indulge in those restless whirling thoughts, but use bring everything back.

On some occasions your mind may be expansive and broad. Be aware of it. Also be aware s become narrow and cramped. The expansive mind has high spirits which must be moderate they should go to excess. While if the mind becomes too narrow and cramped it will bring su be careful not let this happen. A lot of happiness may make the mind over-expansive and to whereas too little may make it narrow and cramped. Such extremes must therefore be avoid what is just right and most suitable.
Sometimes the mind will feel unsurpassable --when, for example, one wants to work and pra possible-- whereas sometimes the mind appears clearly surpassable, even rather slack. Thi negligence. In these cases one must also adjust, make a give-and-take, so that they balanc not think that you can be extra-superior, for you will thereby also become overhasty. Similarl too much slackness and negligence. Carefully balance them together and as one's practice it steadily, stage by stage.
Sometimes the mind will be steady and established, and at other times it will lack this quality this. The well-established mind is right and good, but you must examine to see the reason if and wander away. There must be something lacking, some omissions in your practice which stabilizing. You must find the causes and bring the mind back to stability.
Sometimes the mind is liberated, and at other times it is unliberated. At the mundane level th releasing, letting go of something and achieving calm in one's practice. When the mind cann means one cannot relinquish, and the mind keeps returning to outside involvements, been c work, for example. If you allow the mind to go on in this way, then your practice won't be pro sitting in practice you must therefore always succeed in your efforts to release yourself from entanglements and worries, and bring the mind back to calm. This can then be called the mi state of mind free from external preoccupations will then smooth the way for your sitting prac therefore maintain a constant vigilance concerning the state of your mind.
Understanding the way of practice expounded by the Lord Buddha means being aware of th feeling and being aware of the mind. Establish one of them --such as mindfulness of breathi the practice of samadhi. But for that practice to progress, an awareness of feeling and mind occasion be required. You must be able to focus on feeling and the mind with its involvemen steady the mind and firmly establish it in the chosen object.

3rd September 2504 B.E. (1961)
* * *

TALK 10

The Section on the Mental Objects (dhamma)

The Five Hindrances (Nivarana)

Our cultivation of the mind is aimed both at firmly establishing calm and at developing the ar wisdom and insight. We depend on the practice as laid down by the Lord Buddha which I ha stages.
We begin by developing calm and firmly establishing the mind. If you are happy with mindful then focus on the in-and-out breath, as I have already explained. While practising, you must and mind because if the mind has not yet reached one-pointedness, the various sense-base
The ear hears sounds, the body receives the touch of objects and because the mind is still r mental objects will arise. The feelings which arise go immediately to the mind. Painful feeling bring disliking, pleasant feeling brings liking while intermediate feeling brings delusion and a Constant mindfulness is needed to watch over all of this to make one's concentration firm ar
When your effort to help establish and centre the mind fails or else does not progress in dev then you must see where the obstruction lies. The Lord Buddha called these obstacles the h (nivarana). They bar the mind from samadhi and you should be aware of their features. Ther hindrances:
1. Sensual desire (kamacchanda): Satisfaction that external objects are worth desiring and such desire is present, it leads the mind out and prevents its concentrating, thereby thwartin
2. Ill-will (byapada): Dislike for the practice or for external objects. When the mind is darkene or dislike then it is a danger to samadhi.
3. Sloth and torpor (thina-middha): Drowsiness and discouragement which dull the mind and sluggish and lethargic. When this hindrance arises it is a danger to samadhi.
4. Restlessness and worry (uddhaccakukkucca): Fretfulness and agitation concerning extern by rapture arising from the practice. This annoyance mixed with dislike makes one feel fretfu samadhi impossible.
5. Sceptical doubt (vicikiccha): Wavering and uncertainty concerning one's motivations for p concerning the method and fruits of practice. For example, one has misgivings about wheth practise at all, or one questions why one is doing it, for what advantage. The danger to one's practice is vacillation about which of the various methods I have explained should be taken u section concerning the body, or feeling or mind? To be uncertain about choosing the right w about the way of practice. This makes the mind vacillate and samadhi becomes impossible.
unsure about the benefits of practice or about whether certain things will appear. These anti expectations about future results, or about seeing various things, are a danger to samadhi.
You must therefore look at your mind: What state is it in at this moment? Is the inclination (c external things or is there already some towards the object of samadhi? If the inclination is s towards the external, then there won't be any for the internal and samadhi will be difficult to must therefore arrest such zeal for externals and endeavour instead towards the object of sa matter so much that zeal towards the samadhi-object has not yet arisen, for that will come o of the fruits of samadhi are gained.

Examine your mind for the darkness of dislike. Is it all caught up in those external objects w dislike? Is it starting to build up dislike towards the practice? If you indeed find that such is th then endeavour to restrain those disturbing objects and reject the dislike for the practice. Th of such dislike avoids the subsequent prejudice and bias to the point where you can experie samadhi when such dislike subsides. This is similar to disliking a person or thing because o only their faults and bad points. Whenever one manages to see their good qualities then tha stilled. Your reluctance and dislike for the practice will therefore disappear when you have a experienced samadhi.

Now, when the impulse and aversion towards external objects subsides and reluctance abou diminishes, the mind will come to calm. Another antagonist to that calm will then appear: dro state of calm and this drowsiness are very similar. This becomes evident when one calms th to a Dhamma talk, for instance-- and one also feels drowsy. The untrained mind is usually c restlessness, or if it's not restless, it's drowsy. Thus there is a need to take great care that o doze-off, which would effectively extinguish any mindfulness. Mindfulness, recollection and a always essential for the development of samadhi. As the samadhi becomes more refined, o clear-comprehension and mindfulness must be clearer and more subtle. The greater clarity promotes an equally greater steadfastness of samadhi. The practice of samadhi does not th a sort of deadened-unconsciousness. The way to solve this problem of drowsiness is by rea arises because one has let mindfulness and awareness slip in trying to calm the mind. Wher is much the same: One lets go of awareness and, in turn, one falls asleep. In practice, there cannot be given up otherwise sleepiness will descend. You must fully deploy awareness and will prevent such drowsiness from occurring.

As soon as you feel sleepy, use this method together with a fixing on the arising of bright ligh that it is as bright as noon in the mind through the vividness and brilliance of awareness and The mind is radiant with full, clear comprehension and mindfulness. There can be no dimmin one were trimming down a lantern's flame-- because that can lead only to sleep.

Also, do not allow any wild and unsettling thoughts concerning the way of practice because development of samadhi. Be sure to focus on the meditation object. If you decide on mindfu then concentrate fully there. However, also be aware of the ways of feeling and mind, as I ha explained. This allows you to correct anything that might spoil the samadhi and also avoids a the mind. In mindfulness of breathing this will stop any irregularity which would cause restles irritation. If you give free rein for the mind to enjoy the rapture and happiness of the early fru samadhi, then that excitement will lead to restlessness. Such restless and proliferating thoug constantly guarded against, as I have mentioned before.

Sceptical doubt and conjecture also need putting down. Be clear and certain in your practice speculating on any future effects, or thinking, "What will I see? What will appear? What will i to establish the mind firmly in the object of samadhi, with awareness and mindfulness full an refined the samadhi becomes, the more sophisticated and comprehensive the mindfulness a

By getting to know the features and characteristics of these hindrances which bar the mind f can prevent their occurrence. If they have already arisen, you must endeavour to wipe them prevent and eliminate these hindrances is what leads to progress and success in your sama

4th September 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 11

Summarizing the Stages of Practice

This Dhamma Teaching is a training aid in the cultivation of the mind. It is directly concerned and therefore in listening to what the Lord Buddha taught, you must aim to bring it into yours it there. When you can see the truth in yourself, then you will also be able to see Dhamma.
The practice is aimed both at calming the mind and at attaining to clear knowledge and true been explaining this practice of calm stage by stage, but have yet to start on the way of insig following sections will now begin to explain the practice of insight which leads to wisdom and
First, however, I will summarize and lead in from my earlier teaching.
Centring the mind in oneself aims at calming the mind through concentrating, for instance, o breath together with an awareness of the mind. In your practice have clear comprehension a sitting here now, for example-- and examine the thirty-one or thirty-two parts of the body, fina them as elements. When the elements disperse, the living body becomes a corpse and deco bones remain. Eventually even those bones will completely disintegrate.
While the body is still alive, it has pleasant, painful and intermediate feelings. One must be a of these feelings arise dependant on external attractions (with their baited hooks) and some practice itself. As such feelings quickly shift into the mind, one must also be fully aware of th pleasant feeling arises it brings hankering to the mind. Painful feeling will bring dejection and feeling a state of deluded attachment.
The danger of the hindrances lies in that they prevent the mind from making progress or bec in samadhi. Sensual desire, ill-will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and worry, and sceptical d culprits here. The root of these hindrances lies in various external anxieties and concerns wh been shaken off, or else in feeling itself. The pleasant feeling, with its baited hook in externa attractions, goes into the mind where liking arises which sways the mind away into those ple objects. The samadhi is thus ruined. The same is true with painful feeling, which deflects the through aversion, and intermediate feeling, which can bring drowsiness, restlessness and do therefore be ever watchful and aware lest any of these hindrances start to arise.

In the beginning one must constantly be on guard, examining and combatting all the various samadhi. One's samadhi may not yet be firmly established but such self-examination is still giving the mind free rein to wander outside. It's like inspecting and surveying one's own hous of practice, concentration on breathing must be combined with an examination of feeling, mi hindrances that might arise. It is therefore a twofold practice. Inspecting the mind in the ordi often lead to one's original aim being overtaken by other, proliferating thoughts. In the begin has to be used --but keep it inside (for instance, by using counting or reciting 'Bud-dho' toge breath). Such thinking is a preventive inspection to forestall any threat to the developing sam one's concentration succeeds in overcoming such dangers, one's practice of mindfulness of example) will strengthen and become steady and sure.

The Method of Practice for Attainment Concentration (Appana Samadhi)

At this level of practice one depends on applied and sustained thought or reflection. Howeve means applying the mind to the samadhi object --to the (long or short) in-and-out breaths for applied-thought can be compared to the first striking of a bell, whereas sustained-thought is reverberation. This sustained-thought is the supporting of the mind close to the object of sam allowing it to fall away.
In practice though, the mind often tends to slip away from the samadhi object, and mindfulne it back. Applied and sustained thought will therefore be constantly needed until the mind bec established enough for rapture to pervade both mind and body. However, you should not the with this rapture. Instead, continue concentrating steadily on the samadhi object, and ease o will arise. This ease is still more refined and the mind will then be firmly centred in a single o is one-pointedness free of intrusive concerns and is born from detachment and peace.
The mind, having progressed this far, is at the first stage of attainment concentration: samad become fixed and established. Previous to this it was still neighbourhood concentration. This attainment samadhi requires: applied thought lifting the mind to the meditation object; sustai supporting the mind there; rapture pervading body and mind; ease of body and mind; and on focussed firmly on a single object. This is the happiness arising from one's samadhi practice In the beginning of one's practice, when one has yet to experience rapture and ease the mi established in samadhi. But with the arising of rapture and ease, the samadhi becomes stea said to experience the flavour of samadhi. One will then come to see the benefits and advan practice of which one was ignorant before.
Even in the activities of the world, a type of rapture and ease is needed. If they are lacking t be able to continue such (external) activities, as watching a film or a play. It is similar in Dha practice, where the fruits of rapture and ease are necessary for the establishing of samadhi, progress. This rapture and ease of samadhi are far more refined and rare than other kinds, a greater happiness and coolness to the mind.

The achieving of this rapture and ease rest with a constant developing of applied and sustai Whenever you resolve to practise, try to keep it up every day. For instance, you may decide day just before retiring to sleep or on awakening each morning. Such a consistency of practi easier to control and when it has progressed sufficiently, the fruits of rapture and ease will a followed by the first stage of samadhi, which is known as one-pointedness. The firmly establ mind no longer needs applied and sustained thought because it is now stable in itself. Applie thought can therefore be left behind and you need not tire yourself with them. All that now re rapture, ease, and one-pointedness of mind.
When rapture pervades body and mind there is still some exhilaration present. However, as more refined, rapture fades and is left behind, and only ease and one-pointedness remain.
As the mind continues to become more and more refined, that ease is also left behind and o one-pointedness and an equanimity (upekkha) which is neutral, neither painful nor pleasant. fully established in this high level of samadhi.
However, it is not necessary for you to attain this high state of samadhi. You can consider a level of applied and sustained thought, rapture, ease and one-pointedness, as doing quite w samadhi practice. The mind will then be able to stay in that state for as long as you want. Ho as you exit from that samadhi you will have to come into contact and be disturbed by various and concerns until you next rest in that peaceful state. The role of samadhi is only to establis comfortable resting place for the mind. The Lord Buddha then offered a training in the devel which is the wisdom clearly to see and to know the truth.

The Beginnings of Insight (Vipassana)

In developing insight it is first necessary to base the mind in samadhi. Otherwise wisdom wil difficulty. One follows the methods of samadhi which the Lord Buddha laid down and which explained, stage by stage. Once the mind is sufficiently concentrated, one turns to investiga oneself. One examines this myself: this one sitting here with such and such a name, as is co the world for each person. Search out: 'what is this thing so designated by that name?' Real summing and assembling into parts and groups from the soles of the feet up to the hair on th encased by skin. It is right here, within this area, where what we understand as I-myself app it out --Where is this I-myself?

The First Section Concerning the Aggregates (Khandhas)

The Lord Buddha taught at this stage to separate out the corporeal aggregate. This compris body made up from the elements of earth, water, fire, wind and space together with the sens

These can be put aside and called the physical or rupa aggregate (rupa khandha).
We can now go on to inspecting the aggregate of feeling. There are painful or pleasant or in (neither-painful- nor-pleasant) feelings. For example, bodily and mental feelings of contentm mental feelings of distress, or intermediate feelings. These can be put aside and called the a feeling (vedana-khandha).
Inspect the perception aggregate, with its recognition of this and that, recalling someone's na and various other subjects. These can be put aside and called the aggregate of perception ( Inspect the aggregate of mental formations, thinking of this issue and that concern. These ca the aggregate of mental formations (sankhara-khandha).
Inspect the aggregate of consciousness which is the knowing and experiencing through the auditory organ, olfactory organ, tactile organ and the mind (mano) which variously knows. Th aside and called the aggregate of consciousness (vinnana-khandha).
The rupa aggregate is one portion, the feeling aggregate is another, that of mental formation thinking) is another, and the aggregate of consciousness is another portion. Or one separate the rupa, vedana, sannya, sankhara, and vinnana groups. What is called me-myself is made aggregates. They are assembled into groups, conglomerations and into one piece. Yet sepa different parts forms the beginning of the practice of insight. This requires a focussed exami realization of the characteristics of each of the aggregates and you will have to come to clea all.

9th September 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 12

Explaining the Five Aggregates

In this practice of calm and insight, the way of insight begins with an investigation into the fiv (panca-khandha). I will recapitulate these for you. Please centre your mind, looking inwards aggregates in yourself.
Focus so as to know about the rupa aggregate or group, which are the great-entities and pri matter (maha-bhuta-rupa). The hard portion being the earth element, the fluid portion being the heating portion being the fire element, the moving and blowing portion being the wind el empty spaces being the space element. See that your physical body (rupa-kaya) is solid bec element, is moistened through the water element, is warmed by the fire element; is aired an because of the wind element and has various cavities which are the space element. The pro of the physical body are called the great entities.

This body also has a sensory system. There are the visual organs, the auditory organs, the the gustatory organ and the tactile sense organs. There is the condition of femininity or mas is a softness and suppleness, not being stiff like a corpse. There is the display of different m body and speech. All these various properties and qualities are termed the derivatives (upad secondary properties dependent on the great-entities. The physical body, made up from bot and their derivatives, is together known as the corporeal or rupa aggregate (rupa-khandha).
we grasp and hold to as me-and-mine, as self, and it is therefore called the grasping aggreg (upadana-khandha).
Originating as an embryo in the mother's womb, this physical body grows and develops with nutriment. This food is none other than the four elements (earth, water, fire and wind) which consumed so that the body can grow and flourish. The corporeal or rupa aggregate therefor food (or the four great-entities) and the body ceases when its food is ended, or through vario which come together to destroy it.
After examining the rupa aggregate and understanding its properties, its arising and its disap look into the feeling aggregate. This consists of pleasant, painful and neither-painful-nor-plea I'll give some examples: Should a cooling, refreshing breeze flow by while you are sitting he pleasant feeling. However, if a mosquito bites or you feel an ache, this is painful feeling. Wh is left after disregarding painful and pleasant feeling is what is called intermediate, neutral or neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling. This intermediate feeling is usually the most basic one a commonly present but unnoticed if one does not investigate. People normally only show inte or pleasant feeling intrudes.
Look to see exactly how feeling manifests. Examine throughout your body and you will find i arises because of contact (phassa). That breeze touching the body and the biting mosquito contact. There must also be consciousness (vinnana) for contact to be complete. Feeling ari this completed contact which must include both the sense impression and consciousness. L
the feeling will disappear and this arising and disappearing is, in fact, the natural course of th yourself to see the properties of feeling (vedana); how it arises and disappears.
Now move to look at perception (sannya). This is the perceiving and recognition of sights, so tastes, tangibles (which touch the body) and of the affairs which the mind thinks about. See and note how perception arises. It arises dependant on contact together with feeling, and dis lack of contact or according to the natural course of things. Look to see these properties of p arising and its disappearing.
Now move to look at the mental formations (sankhara). This is the thinking about sights, sou tastes, tangibles and mental objects. See into your own thinking and realize that mental form dependant on contact together with perception. They disappear according to their natural co there is no more contact.

Now move on to look at consciousness (vinnana) which is the knowing of seeing sights or o (etc.). If the sense organs (which I mentioned before) are whole and functioning, consciousn actually to see a form (for example) in order to know that form. The auditory organ needs co know the hearing of a sound; the olfactory organ needs consciousness to know the smelling gustatory organ needs consciousness to know the tasting of a flavour; the mind base (mano to know about the mental images and ideas (dhamma). Consciousness is therefore oversee (ayatana).
If consciousness is lacking then even though the visual and auditory senses organs be whol seen or sound heard. It's similar to a corpse: however newly-dead it may be, the visual and will still not be able to see and hear. Consciousness is therefore what knows throughout all t eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body and the mind.
Consciousness arises dependant on mind-and-body or nama-rupa. Thus the body (rupa-kay mental group (nama-kaya), which is feeling, perception, mental formations, together with co present and supporting each other. The body needs to be living --as it is for us here now-- fo to arise. If there is no nama-rupa or if it has already dispersed, then consciousness also can aware of the properties of consciousness, its arising and disappearing, right here in your ow Feeling, perception, mental formations and consciousness are known as the grasping aggre and hold to each of them as mine, as me-myself.

Concerning the Sense Bases (Ayatana)

The normal state of affairs is for the mind to be supported in the rupa aggregate, while for th aggregates (nama-khandha) to arise firstly requires consciousness, that knowing of the sens condition of contact together with consciousness then leads to the arising of feeling, percept formations (or thinking). One thinks about something and the knowing about that is consciou circular fashion, feeling (for example) arises. Therefore the condition for the arising of the m aggregates lies with nama-rupa or mind-and-body which conditions the arising of consciousn here I mean this corporeal or rupa group complete with the mental group (as I have explaine not defective. They have life, a nervous system and functioning sense bases. You must ther sense bases because this is the avenue by which the mental factors arise. The sense bases Internally the eye (cakkhu) or visual organ, and externally the visible form (rupa) which is se one pair.
Internally the ear (sota) or auditory organ, and externally the sound (sadda) heard --this form
Internally the nose (ghana) or olfactory organ, and externally the odour (gandha) smelt --this

Internally the tongue (jivha) or gustatory organ, and externally the flavour (rasa) tasted --this pair.

Internally the body (kaya) and its tactile organ, and externally whatever touches as a tangibl (photthabba) --this forms one pair.
Internally the mind (mano or mana), and externally the mental-object (dhamma) --this forms mental objects consist of various past sensory impressions (sights and sounds, for example mind as a subject to think upon.
These are called the sense bases, being that which connects and joins the internal connecti connection. For example, the eye (as internal connection) joins to the visual object (as the e connection).
These various sense bases are active in their connecting and joining in everyone from their morning until their going back to sleep. For example, if you should open your eyes now,(9) t visual form must come together. Similarly, with one's ears and sounds. Some of the sounds from this Dhamma talk and some from the cars outside and various other noises. The nose and tastes, the body and tactile sensations, and the mind and thoughts (as mind objects) ar up together all the time.
At the same moment there may be many different conjunctions of the sense bases. For insta connect with many different sounds occurring at the same time. The wind may touch the bo object in correlation-- or waft some odour to the nose. Summarizing, one may say that these bases are connecting up all the time and they not only join each pair together but also tie the involve that as well.
When the eye and a visual form come together, then the mind is tied in as well, bound to thi concerning that form. Similarly, the mind is bound into considering a sound when ear and so to follow after an odour when nose and smell join. On examination, one finds that everyone's and bound into involvements with visual forms, sounds, odours, tastes, tangibles and menta thoughts of past sights and sounds. The mind is thus pulled into involvements by six ways a but be restless and without peace.
Even while you sit here trying to bring the mind together in samadhi, the various sense base pull the mind astray in myriad ways. This is what blocks any samadhi from developing. Ther to see the characteristics of these six sense bases and realize that when they connect up in they bind and lead the mind off on a wild race into various involvements.
Why are they able to tie the mind down? Because of heedlessness, a lapse of mindfulness, true and penetrating knowledge (nyana). With sufficient mindfulness and knowledge, the mi overcome and bound up with the sense bases. But there must be enough mindfulness and k beginning neither mindfulness nor knowledge is quick enough, but with practice and training and quick enough to guard against straying into the ways of the six sense bases. This is the samadhi can be established. The mind with samadhi is then capable of seeing into the chara activities, seeing their way of operation. When you yourself can steadily inspect this racing b between the sense bases and have realized their nature, they will then be unable to bind the with them. And they will then just continue on past following their own way.

10th September 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 13

Recapitulation of the Four Foundations of Mindfulness

Internally and Externally

Firstly, will all of you centre your mind inwards to examine yourself and see what really is tru time. This means setting the mind on your breathing and being aware of the ongoing inhalat
It means being aware of your posture --sitting with your hands and feet arranged in whateve
the mind into examining the actual parts and organs of your body: up from the soles of the fe the crown of one's head, all encased by skin. Focus and analyse those parts into elements:
element, the fluid as water element, the heating as fire, the moving as wind and the cavities element. Contemplate a corpse as seen outside and then compare it with your own body --w likewise reach such a state and end finally as rotting bones. Focus into your own body in this externally and internally, seeing both the arising and the disappearing.
In examining the external, one uses mindfulness to see various characteristics in their conve appearance. Knowledge (nyana), which can penetrate through such appearances, is used to internal. Standing outside, looking at the exterior shape and characteristics of one's house is external examination, while the internal examination is more like the actual entering inside. C knowledge will be able to see through conventional appearances without being held by their Inside the body, this means seeing in terms of its arising and disappearing. For example, th counted as the arising, and the out-breath as the disappearing. You must see that in every p body there is a continual arising and disappearing. Look until you can actually see this right Everyone normally can see only the arising and persisting without being aware of the disapp instance, we all experience being alive, and though we know that there must be a passing a seen here and now. Our investigation must proceed with knowledge, seeing arising followed the present. Being able to see this indicates we are discerning the body with knowledge and internal. In the beginning we must use mindfulness to see the external, and then we turn to t arising and the disappearing.
Whatever feeling you are experiencing at this present moment. Look at it now. Is it pleasant neither-pleasant-nor-painful? Does it arise from external attractions (with their baited hooks) then it is termed worldly, being hooked by carnal attractions (amisa) but if it develops from th samadhi, then it is called unworldly or spiritual (niramisa). It is then free from those attraction their baited hook. Therefore see the present feeling for what it really is. Looking with mindful exterior feeling, whereas seeing with knowledge penetrates to the interior feeling or the arisi disappearing.

Look further into the mind, because feeling itself also stirs the mind. Pleasure stirs up hanke stirs up dejection while neither-pleasure-nor-pain stirs up and fixes the mind in attachment, v condition of delusion. Seeing with mindfulness the outer mind and comprehending its proper penetrates with knowledge to the inner mind to see the continual arising and disappearing.

Look at the affairs and concerns of the mind or see what conditions of mind have developed hold the mind back from samadhi and stop knowledge. They are the hindrances which block from arising. Be aware of sensual desire if it is now present in your mind. If there is ill will, sl torpor, restlessness and worries or sceptical doubt --be aware of that.

Those things which become objects to draw the hindrances out into one's mind are rupa. Wh inclined out to know them and a hindrance has arisen, then that is nama. If no object comes mind or the mind does not incline out to know about an object, then it is as if rupa or nama is and the hindrances do not arise. It is therefore necessary in examining the hindrances to foc nama to see the object and the mind inclining out to receive that object. Where does the obj enters by way of the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind (mano) and the mind (citta) goe that object through, those same six sense doors. Whichever avenue the mind inclines out th in a state of breaking out. This characteristic of this ordinary or commonplace mind is therefo work shooting up with streams of sparks. These latter are the restless, proliferating processe can't be seen unless the mind is concentrated. One therefore must know both about the ente about the mind's inclining out to receive them. Why should the mind be like this? Because w receive them it becomes bound up with the object, for that object is also coming in to tie-up v This is what we call the fetters (samyojana).

If the mind does not go and tie-in, then the object will pass on its way without involvement. T compared to water droplets falling onto a lotus leaf. They roll off without sticking or adhering hindrances arise in one's mind because the incoming object sticks and attaches. When it be mind then it is known as a fetter. You must therefore look and see these fetters for what they mind.

The Factors of Enlightenment (Bojjhanga)

When mindfulness is set, watchful and aware, it will steadily become stronger and swift enou with the mind. It normally cannot keep up, which is what gives the fetters and hindrances an arise. This swift mindfulness is instantly aware of the sight's or the sound's entry through the

of the mind's involvement and tie-in and of the subsequent liking or despising. If mindfulness enough to know this sequence, then there won't be much of a problem. It will be aware from with a sight or sound that they have come to provoke and incite the arising of liking or despis the sight or sound is really nothing more than that, whereas the seed of liking and despising here in ourselves, in the mind. This mind brings such a predilection out with it to receive the it likes, and takes the despising out to meet one it doesn't. It can be compared to when a sat its striking surface meet and a flame is produced. The fires of lust, hatred and delusion flare even when the match is present if there is no striking surface, it won't ignite. Therefore that and that which goes out to receive it must accord with each other. The fire (the fetters and th will therefore not ignite when mindfulness is up to the mark. This mindfulness is the enlighte mindfulness (sati-bojjhanga).

When the enlightenment factor of mindfulness has been born one can then start to investiga correctly by selecting and sifting. This means a discrimination of what is wholesome and goo unwholesome and bad; what is detrimental and harmful, and what is harmless; what is evil a is rare and refined; the dark side and the light side. This ability to sift through and discrimina concerning these things is called the enlightenment factor of the investigation of phenomena (dhamma-vicaya-bojjhanga).(10)

This is about the things inside our mind: the wholesome and unwholesome, the harmful and good and the bad, all within this mind. One's discrimination is not quick enough when one re becomes mindful of an affair only after it has arisen and died away and when the action, wh has already been carried through. This indicates a sluggish mindfulness that is not abreast o knows after it's all over whether anything good or bad had been said or done. But when min of whatever is happening, one is able to discern what is skilful or not, what is good or not an One will then hold only to the good side and refrain from the bad.

The effort and energy which arises from one's investigation and holding to the good and reje called the enlightenment factor of energy (viriya-bojjhanga). The hindrances which then aris and the samadhi can be fostered and safeguarded. When an object enters through any of th just lets it pass on through, without sticking or tying in as a fetter. Whatever is not good can gradually abandoned, and the good safeguarded.

When this is the case, rapture will arise --a spiritual (niramisa) rapture without a baited hook therefore an inner rapture or the enlightenment factor of rapture (piti-bojjhanga).

With the enlightenment factor of rapture, both body and mind grow calm. This is the enlighte tranquillity (passaddhi-bojjhanga), which is imbued with an inner happiness.

With such inner happiness the mind will become composed and steady. This is the enlighter samadhi (samadhi-bojjhanga).

When one fixes on this samadhi to make it steadfast then this becomes the enlightenment fa (upekkha-bojjhanga).

These seven factors of enlightenment arise step by step but for them to be born at all one m practice right from the beginning. If you set your mindfulness on breathing in and out, then m firmly based and steady. Eventually, it will be alert to the objects that come-in and to the min inclination to go out to them. When mindfulness and attention are constant, the object will be tie-in and bind the mind, giving rise to fetters and hindrances. All of this means that at this le practice the mindfulness and investigative powers must be highly refined. Focus on this. Co yourself the truth of things as they really are.

17th September 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 14

Integrating into the Noble Truth of Suffering

Will you all please compose and focus your mind within. See the body, the feeling and the m the mental objects, which means examining the hindrances, the sense bases and the factors have already explained all of this, stage by stage, so this time I'll just offer these few heading many and various subjects but they can't yet be correctly brought together into a single way --especially when the mind is still so agitated and restless. Therefore, I will now present an i correct way of practice so that you won't lose your way through uncertainty.
Firstly, centre the mind and set mindfulness on the single point at the nostrils or upper lip (as for mindfulness of breathing. Be aware of the breath's contact at this single point, right here At this moment, is there bodily and mental pleasure, pain or an intermediate feeling? Set the and then look in at the mind. Is it agitated or calm? If you are comfortable in body and mind, be calm. Otherwise, it will be unquiet and restive. Focus so as to know the actual situation a Examine yourself. If there is still restlessness, then that restlessness itself will be a hindranc blocks the mind from samadhi. See if such hindrances are present.
Examine this nama-rupa. This is the assembled (physical-) body (rupa-kaya) sitting here. Ho just an inanimate doll, for it is living matter together with mind. It has avenues by which the m objects and various concerns and affairs --sometimes via the eyes, or ears, or nose, or tong sometimes via the mind (mano). If you were to open your eyes now, you would immediately other, while your ears may hear the noise of a car or the sound of speaking --including this D given here now. Meanwhile, the nose smells, the tongue tastes, the body has sensations fro from the heat, and the mind thinks of various things.
If the mind is not composed and concentrated, it will go off thinking of this issue and that affa once it is centred, it will think only of one single thing. The sounds of this talk contacts your e determine to listen, then your mind will incline out to know and you hear that sound. This 'he consciousness. Upon listening whatever pleasure, pain or neither-pleasure-nor-pain is prese feeling. The mind inclines out to know, and to note and perceive; it can recollect the sounds and is therefore able to bring them together and one can then get the idea. If you hear and c word or the next, then you can't possibly put together any idea. This 'remembering' can also perception. When you have got the idea or percept together, then the thoughts that follow st there are the mental-formations. The mind then inclines out to know about that thinking and the way; this is consciousness again.

The pain, pleasure or indifference that arises when consciousness knows, following thinking
'remembering' of whatever we are thinking about is perception, while the thought-fabricating mental formations. And all of this because the mind inclines out to know. It's this very conditi known as nama. Every person at every moment when awake and not sleeping is therefore n continually arising and intricately involved together.

Set yourself, therefore, to see rupa. Where is one to look? The eyes, the ears, the nose, the
--this is where to look. Setting mindfulness there, realize that whatever form the eye sees to physical eye is called rupa. Similarly, whatever sound is heard and the ears themselves, wh smelled and the nose itself, whatever touch the body contacts and the body itself and whate tasted and the tongue itself, are all called rupa.

We are now taking the affairs of sights and sounds (for example) as an object for the mind to However, if there were mere rupa without a mind inclining-out to know, then even though the they would be as if blind, the ears would be as if deaf, the nose without smelling, the tongue and the body insensible and numb. The reason why the eyes see, the ears hear, the nose s tastes and the body feels is because the mind inclines-out to know --and this condition is wh nama.

After you have focussed on rupa, set your attention on nama. This means seeing into your m experience it constantly inclining-out to receive various affairs via the eyes or ears (for exam condition of consciousness is then apparent as 'seeing' or 'hearing', and that of feeling as pa or indifference. Perception manifests as marking and remembering and mental-formations a fabricating. Therefore the knowing about nama is the looking into the mind to see when it inc acknowledge various things.

Fixing one's attention so as to clearly see nama-rupa will bring forth the enlightenment facto surefooted and steadfast mindfulness. An unsteady mindfulness can't catch up with nama-ru training. However, once it can keep up with them, it will clearly discern the mind, as it incline terms of various conditions. It will then see that consciousness has arisen, feeling, perceptio mental-formations have all arisen. This is the foundation and base of mindfulness (Satipatth greater clarity it becomes the enlightenment factor of mindfulness.

From this mindfulness with its clear-seeing of nama-rupa an investigation and discrimination be born. In the beginning this will be a sorting out right here within, distinguishing that 'this is 'this is feeling,' 'this is perception,' 'these are mental formations' and 'this is consciousness.'

still uninstructed one considers them all to be assembled together as a unit or entity and ind
The mature and fully fledged mindfulness, however, will be able to discriminate what is what enlightenment-factor and thus energy, rapture, tranquillity of mind and body, a composed an equanimity will be born.
This fixing of the mind on nama-rupa, as I have explained, means a focussing on the concer established mind. Look at the mind inclining-out to know various things and distinguish whic on the avenues of the eyes or ears (and which are themselves rupa). You will there find the nama-rupa.

The Noble Truth of Suffering

The truth of nama-rupa is, conventionally speaking, one of birth as beginning, ageing as mid the end. Consider the origin of the physical body and the mind joining it as the mental group living body, which all of us possess. This period of origination is known as birth (jati). There i process of change and development: the body grows and matures through the various ages one, of old age (jara). This is a process which will continue right up until the final episode, wh death.
However, such thinking may give rise to some apprehension and alarm. We have all passed present ageing and in the future lies death. So why should we be only afraid of old age and because we feel that we are mixed up and involved in all this too; that 'I am born,' 'I grow old
To experience oneself as participating in this way is indeed likely to cause apprehension.
Whenever one comes up against bodily pain or mental suffering --one is ill for example, or m distressed-- then one detests and doesn't want anything to do with it. It is completely unwish Generally speaking, everyone hates suffering and when 'growing old' is seen as suffering or old age. Similarly, one hates death, sickness and ill health as all being suffering. Everyone h experience some such suffering, either much or little. We have all felt bodily pain, we are in ageing and though we have not yet died we fear death and don't want to die. Therefore, it ca we haven't seen suffering, for every one of us has come up against it. But because this bring anxiety, dislike and loathing, it cannot be what is called the Noble Truth of Suffering. The Lo wished for us to see the Noble Truth of Suffering (Dukkha Ariya Sacca) which on experienci hatred, old age, sickness or death. The worldly understanding of suffering brings only loathin illness and death, which are all unwished for and unwanted. This certainly is not the Noble T Buddha which on realization means a going beyond ageing, sickness and death.
Now then, how should we go about seeing this? According to the Lord Buddha's way as exp Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness, one must establish mindfulness to keep up w nama-rupa. Look and see these in your mind until you know their arising and disappearing e break. The inclining-out of the mind (which is nama) as consciousness, for example, after ar a certain affair, then disappears. It then arises again with another affair and again disappear single hour the mind inclines-out as consciousness (for example) to receive and know of cou Rupa which is the connection or communicating channel for the outward inclining of the min

One moment it's a form for the eyes to see, the next it's a sound for the ears to hear; all com a complex unremitting concatenation. Nama-rupa is therefore always arising and disappeari birth, develops and changes with age and finally passes away in death. The person who is l oneself-- at this arising and disappearing can't say that he also arises and disappears togeth because he is there seeing them in their constant arising and disappearing. This being the c practise separating what is seen from that which sees. Separate inside yourself. Practise thi until you know those things which must arise and cease. That which sees this knows accord their arising and ceasing, yet does not itself arise and cease. When this knowledge arises th certainly practised to realize the Noble Truth of Suffering of the Lord Buddha. Seeing this Tr happiness and comfort, without suffering along with those things that must arise and disapp age, nor be ill or die because that which is born, ages and dies is in the nama-rupa which is that which sees is something else.
This much alone will bring a happiness without any feeling of suffering and there will be a let release within. The Noble Truth of Suffering of the Lord Buddha is not therefore anything to feared as is sometimes thought. It is something which when realized --or even only examine condition-- brings happiness.

18th September 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 15

'Ordinary' Suffering and Mind-made Suffering

I will now present some Dhamma which comes from the section on the Truth of Suffering (D of you focus and centre your minds on your own nama-rupa. This fathom-long and span-wid is the rupa or bodily group (rupa-kaya). Nama is the condition of the mind as it inclines-out t and sounds (for example), which is called consciousness; to feel pleasure, pain or intermedi perceive; and to think and process, which is mental-formations. With such concocting goes a 'knowing' which is back to consciousness again. Set up the seeing into this nama-rupa so as properties inside you and especially to discern the mind's outward-inclining to know about va

The sound of my speaking and your ear make contact and the mind inclines-out to know hea inclines-out to the noise outside and there is consciousness and then feeling, perception and formations. Notice and be quick to catch all of this.

'Ordinary' Suffering

After clearly seeing the nama-rupa within you, think back into the past to its conception in th beginning, which is called birth (jati). This is termed 'knowing the past'. There is then the cor process of growth and change. That development and change up until now is called 'the pas which is currently taking place is called 'the present part'. Future change will carry on until fi nama-rupa breaks up and disperses. This continuing change is ageing (jara) while the ultima death (marana). This death ahead is called 'the future'. Reflect upon and see death, the fina the future.
This seeing of the past and future is still only a thought process and not yet (true) knowledge Thinking in this way may also give rise to aversion and apprehension about these inevitable therefore consider birth, death and the present (old-) ageing as being 'ordinary'(11) and inev much aversion and fear of ageing and death one has indicates the extent of one's misappre truth. But properly seeing this inevitable norm will stop such negative feeling.
An appreciation of the inevitable course of things allows the truths of birth, ageing and death integrated into one truth. This truth can be seen in the present by an inward-seeing to the 'be 'middle' and the 'end' -- much as on opening one's eyes one views the whole of a certain thi thing in its entirety; one views the whole course of events from the beginning at birth, the mi to the end in death. The seeing-in-the-present of all of this is knowledge which penetrates to of the inevitable course of things.
The seeing here and now of nama-rupa in its entirety will stop the arising of any aversion or these conditions, because one knows them to be normal and inevitable. They aren't anythin extraordinary, nor are they anything to be liked or despised. This is one type of suffering, tha 'Ordinary'.

Suffering which the Outward-inclining Mind Contrives

To see another type of suffering, focus on your mind inclining-out, becoming nama, as I've a Reflect and think back to the time just before its inclining-out to know a sight or sound (for ex
Seeing that form or hearing that sound is consciousness, followed by feeling --pleasant, pai intermediate.

Sorrow (Soka)

Suffering manifests on some occasions as sorrow (soka). For example, separating from a lo going far away or through death, or hearing of such a separation will, with consciousness, le feeling and appears as sorrow (soka).

Lamentation (Parideva)

Sometimes one's thought-processes proliferate under the power of that sorrow and fill the m lamentation. If it is strong then it will appear as crying and bewailing one thing or another. Th lamentation (parideva).

Pain (dukkha) Mental Suffering (Domanassa)

Some suffering does not directly concern the mind, for instance, when the body is ill and in p called bodily pain. However, such bodily pain can also force suffering onto the mind. On bein worry about its severity and one's chances of recovery. There are also many other ways for afflicted, including mental distress and regret, and these can all be summarized as mental su

Despair (Upayasa)

On some occasions, one may encounter difficult and needy circumstances; feeling stifled an will preclude any happiness. Wherever one feels such oppression, one will struggle to escap the saying: 'A confined body is bearable, but not a stifled mind.'
All these forms of suffering --sorrow, lamentation, bodily-pain, mental suffering and despair-- condition of painful feeling (dukkha vedana) and arise when the mind inclines-out to see a fo sound (for example). That form and sound are the seed for the subsequent arising of feeling of suffering. Perception is then a perceiving or remembering of suffering, and mental formati processing and fabricating of suffering.
Thinking back, one should be able to see that all this suffering originated from the mind's inc nama. Sorrow, for example, is also a type of nama for it is painful feeling. By considering on experience one knows that suffering arose dependant on nama-rupa. Now examine the pres the mind? Is it inclining-out to see forms and to hear sounds or to consider about all those is away? Is there any suffering present? Any sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress or despair?
If you do find suffering, then see and understand that it all arose from some issue or other -- issues can only come in through the eyes or ears (etc.) as I have already explained, and not else. The mind's inclining-out to know which is nama, or consciousness, feeling, perception mental-formations, then puts together suffering, sorrow, and lamentation (etc.). Should the m incline-out to receive and process the sights and sounds, then suffering cannot arise. You m to see and understand how such suffering --this second type of suffering--can arise in your m

This presentation about suffering is in two parts. Firstly, there is the 'ordinary and inevitable' suffering and then there is the suffering arising dependant on the mind's inclining-out to rece process. In coming to understand these two parts you must initially focus on and understanc within yourself, Seeing its natural and inevitable course, with its beginning, middle and end a together at one point. Look at nama as the mind inclines-out to receive and process various Will you all now please apply yourselves to listen(12) and investigate so as to know about th which the mind receives and processes, as I have been explaining.

24th September 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 16

Suffering because of Association and Separation

Firstly, will you all please centre your mind within yourself. Focus into nama-rupa: rupa being body with its various functioning senses, while nama is the condition of the mind --which als rupa-- as it inclines out to know sights and sounds (etc.).
See the birth of this nama-rupa, its end or death and in between its constant changing which this whole sequence in the present moment and the inevitable condition (dhammata) of nam This is the Truth of Suffering, the true state of 'ordinary suffering' and is not something to be Any fear and aversion or, going to the opposite extreme, any enjoyment can only arise beca realized its true nature.
After seeing and understanding the 'ordinary suffering' we turn to focus on the mind's inclinir receive and process suffering. We can then see that this very mind is what contrives the aris suffering from bodily pain, and mental distress from various external affairs. If the mind did r process, then suffering could not arise in its various manifestations, as I have explained prev These various properties of mind-contrived suffering can be reduced to two: association with people which are disliked and unwelcome and, secondly, separation from all those things ar loved.
This association and separation are also 'normal and inevitable' and become suffering beca storing away of appreciative wishes and fondness in the mind can be classified as hankering to disfavour and displeasure is dejection. In short, one can say that this 'disliking-and-liking' submerged deeply in the mind. It is not until one encounters something or someone that the themselves. When this happens and dislike emerges --as when one sees a form, hears a so of some such disagreeable sight or sound --then it is termed coming into association with un

One sees or hears something about some disagreeable person and such association leads suffering.
Contrariwise, being separated from something or someone liked also leads to suffering. This sometimes characterized by sorrow or lamentation, by bodily pain which also distresses the by despair. Therefore, these can all be reduced to just two causes: Association with any per one dislikes and separation from that which one likes.
In truth though, this disliking-or-liking does not originate from anyone or anything but from ou which has stored it away. It is therefore this mind with its likes and dislikes that contrives the forms of suffering. As this suffering is painful feeling it is part of nama and there is also there perception of suffering (dukkha-sannya), and mental-formations of suffering (dukkha-sankha lights a fire and constantly adds fuel to prevent its going out, so our own mind starts up suffe contrives to maintain it there in the mind. On coming to see the outward-inclining mind as it suffering --at the same time seeing the roots of liking and aversion buried there-- one realize in, these two causes. One's discernment into the suffering of the mind has thus come to quit level.
One may look at the external or the internal. Here the external means being aware of the as separation in one's nama-rupa. Think back as far as your memory goes and examine your e this. Throughout your life, from the child's body growing into an adult's and then on into this you can see the continuing association and separation from the physical body. The childhoo association with one's being a child. With growth and maturity, one becomes separated from association with being adult. As life's stages pass, so one separates from the preceding stag with the next on up to the present. This association may be agreeable at some stages along disagreeable at others. But it cannot always be the way we want it to be. Disagreeable stage associated with and agreeable stages separated from and left behind.
Consciousness is much the same. The mind inclines-out to receive an object and initially co
If it inclines-out to see a form then it is eye-consciousness (cakkhu-vinnana); to hear a soun ear-consciousness (sota-vinnana). However, for the mind to see or hear, it must always dep and auditory organs, even though those eyes and ears are variable and mutable. The eyes blurry; the ears will eventually be hard of hearing. Then the mind's inclining-out won't be able hear as distinctly or effectively as before. The other sense-doors are similar. The body when decrepit is no longer as serviceable or adaptable as before. So again one must be separated agreeable consciousness with its distinct hearing and clear vision and associate with less ef hearing.
Feeling is also the same. Even though the inclining-out mind finds the pleasant feeling agree have it that way all the time. Painful feeling is found disagreeable but it is not always present Intermediate feelings may appear either agreeable or dull and disagreeable, yet even so we always like that. Thus, we must continually associate with feelings which we do not like and those we do.

Perception follows after feeling in the same way. Sometimes one's memory and perception a and at other times they are not so good. And that is not all, for whenever we recollect things things we do not care for are remembered too. If we see or hear something disagreeable bu remember it, there's nothing to be taken up and thought and concocted about. However, wh will quickly be taken up and processed in thought. It's just not possible not to want to remem those things we dislike intensely will be remembered more clearly than the things we like. Th associate with percepts that we find disagreeable and be separated from those we like.

The thinking processes of mental-formations are also the same. The various forms of sufferi through the stage of thought processing. Otherwise, they won't arise. Sometimes a touch of processed and, perhaps because of concern or apprehension, becomes blown up into majo mental-formations are therefore of vital importance and form a basis for the uprising of suffe not like suffering why do you concoct and think it up? Who does this thinking? Your own min come and think it up for you. Even though you do not wish for suffering, you always --withou and process those thoughts that lead to suffering. You may not like suffering yet you indulge thinking! How can you ever escape suffering when it is like this?

These mental formations are also always coming into association and separating away. On associate with disagreeable proliferating thoughts and at other times one is separated from a processes. But it is always oneself who originates these thought concoctions leading to asso separation and suffering. One will not stop the processing and therefore one must continue t mental-formations which breed suffering. One must suffer and cannot find a way out.

Examine and see these conditions of 'associating with' and 'separating away' in your own na you discern that the root cause of it all lies submerged as likes-and-dislikes in one's mind. P and comprehend this liking-and-disliking which leads and draws the mind away into the path turns consciousness into suffering-consciousness (dukkha-vinnana), feeling into suffering-fe into suffering-perception and mental formations into suffering-mental formations. When we p truth of this, the liking-and-disliking will subside and be stilled. That mind proceeding down th suffering will now come to peace, and consciousness will cease to be suffering-consciousne cease to be suffering-feeling, perception will cease to be suffering-perception and mental for cease to be suffering-mental formations. This means to say that the mind has stopped conc itself and so suffering will subside.

This, then, is the strategy to halt the processing of suffering for oneself. You must practise to suffering and its way of operating within this nama-rupa. This is the only way to remedy the s mind.

Will you pay close attention while listening to what will be chanted now, and reflect upon tha Suffering contained in these lines of the Lord Buddha Teaching, taken from the Great Disco Foundations of Mindfulness:

Appiyasampayoga-- association with the disliked.
Piyavippayoga-- separation from the liked.

25th September 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 17

Suffering Through Non-fulfilment of One's Hopes and Desires

I will now present Dhamma on the Noble Truth of Suffering (Dukkha Sacca) in the section; 't of one's wishes is suffering.'
First of all, gather your mind together within yourself for this is where the Lord Buddha direct teaching. Other people, following him, have similarly explained his teaching as pointing withi to Dhamma you must therefore turn to see inside yourself. You will need to search out the fi the nama-rupa. When one encounters them one must also come to the true state of being w Suffering (Dukkha Sacca). This is because this Truth manifests in the five aggregates or nar a basis for it. Anyone aspiring to comprehend suffering must therefore focus investigation or wisdom and insight. The wisdom and insight of the Lord Buddha's Teaching manifest in the that nama-rupa, wisdom and insight cannot arise. It is similar to a person wanting to stand: I ground, then there is nowhere to stand. Therefore, will each one of you now incline your min examine your own nama-rupa.
Inspect your fathom-long, span-wide body. Examine nama as the mind is inclining-out to kno knowing about? At the present time you are listening to this talk so the mind should incline-o consciousness of sound. The pleasure, pain or indifference arising from this hearing is feelin and remembering about this hearing is perception; and the processing mind following the iss mental-formations. This condition of the mind inclining-out is nama and when it inclines-out t sounds then it is nama-in-external-sounds.
Each person therefore, exists only together with nama-rupa. If this is transcended, then 'pers appear. It is here in this nama-rupa that this 'I, me-and-mine' appears and is grasped hold of is a concocting process of the mind and as such is a form of mental-formations which is ano the mind's inclining-out. You should therefore examine this feeling of 'me-and-mine': How de does it lie? You will then find that it only goes as far as the nama-rupa. If mental-formations, feeling and seeing or hearing (etc.) are all lacking, then one has no experience of feeling or
all. The physical body alone is merely like a hunk of wood totally without sensation or though of 'self-and-other' has completely gone. It's similar to being asleep, when feelings of 'self-an various cavorting thoughts are entirely lost. Whatever a person's status, he or she must fall conditions.

This sense of 'self-and-other' in its varying forms therefore appears only in the nama-rupa. V
'self-and-other', 'mine-and-thine' are present then direct your vision towards the condition of wanting something. Therefore, with complete penetration into nama-rupa you must also dete existing in the mind.
There are two forms of desire, one being that which is realizable, and the other that which is
The desires and wishes that can be fulfilled are concerned with those objectives which are p
But this does not mean that they can all be attained just by wishing, for the appropriate caus put into effect. For example, in making a 'realizable wish' to attain virtue and good, one must the appropriate skilful ways to produce the right causes.
Do not criticise or find fault with desire per se, because the wish to attain virtue and the prac achieve that is quite correct and right. This 'desire for good' the Lord Buddha called 'resolve'
'determination' (adhitthana). The Bodhisatta resolved to attain Buddhahood by steadily follo Followers (Savaka) had also previously resolved to steadily attain to their state. If a person i towards the completion and realization of his desire and that aspiration is made up with 'true then it can be called 'true resolve' (sacca-adhitthana). The Lord Buddha counted this 'true-re the Perfections (Parami).
The type of desire which is unattainable goes against the principles of nature. Birth, ageing, death are normal and inevitable. Sorrow, heartache, bodily pain, mental-distress and depres inevitably exist according to the state of things. To wish them away, forbidding their appeara against the ways of nature. This desire can never be realized and so it too must add to the n as the 'nonfulfillment of one's wishes.'
Now, come and consider this body and the mental group: this nama-rupa which I have alrea originated in birth; is developing and changing into old age; is painful and troublesome throu and, finally, it must break up with death. This is the inevitable nature of nama-rupa. Examine
If it still includes grasping and holding, if it still contains desires, then there must also be sorr distress. It cannot escape them. The only way is to release and let go.
When one lets go of something then one escapes all the sorrow involved with that thing. If o everything then one is freed from all anguish. But if you cannot yet relinquish, then your gras inevitably bring suffering when your desires remain unfulfilled. Therefore focus to see these desires in your mind and then examine the suffering that arises when those wishes fail. See is.
Penetrating to this truth brings forth an up-to-the-mark wisdom which is able to separate and suffering from one's mind. The nama-rupa will then follow its natural course while the observ observation is mindfulness and a combined mindfulness-and-wisdom (sati-pannya), which d concocting desires and suffering. Nama-rupa will then be seen following its natural course. I is a burning house. While one remains inside there will be agitation and panic, but on leavin look back. One can now look-on that burning house without feeling any heat in oneself. One knowledge. The happiness that springs forth from calmness and tranquillity will then appear.

Each person must confront both his own suffering and that of the various people he is conce with. If one collects all that suffering and loads it away in the mind, grasping and holding on this can only increase one's agitation and unhappiness. However, if one can steadily dislodg such suffering without adding any more, then the mind will be able to emerge unscathed.
It may not be possible for anyone always to evade the suffering stemming from external sou suffering can be avoided. We usually bring the external suffering into our minds as mental d therefore as if the suffering has two layers or levels: both the external and the inner. Those following the Lord Buddha's Teaching know how to lighten and relieve the situation by leavin suffering alone outside without burdening the mind with it. Even if one then finds oneself in t (external) suffering, one's mind remains content. Such happiness of mind allows mindfulnes remedy whatever external suffering may possibly be cured. But if the mind fully accepts and with the external suffering, then there is no way it can remedy the situation.
In order to separate these types of suffering you must depend and rely on the Way of practic the Lord Buddha. Firstly, set yourself to see nama-rupa and know the state of its suffering. F mental suffering which arises from the non-fulfilment of unattainable desires. Penetrate to th the desire subsides, the mind grows calm and tranquil. When you have realized this then yo full benefit from your study into the Truth of Suffering of the Lord Buddha and will finally find

2nd October 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 18

Summarizing the Aggregate of Suffering (Dukkha Khandha)

Will you all please collect your mind together and focus within yourself. Listen to this teachin and examine it within so as to see Dhamma there. You won't realize Dhamma from just the that would be just a memorizing or an intellectual understanding, whereas understanding the is seeing Dhamma with wisdom. Therefore, now centre on yourself. Focus to see from the g the subtle and refined:
Be aware of your breathing. Every one of us must breathe in and out.

Be aware of your present sitting posture. How are your hands and feet placed? How is your Examine the whole of your body: up from the soles of the feet, down from the hair on your h skin.
Analyse it into the elements of earth, water, fire, wind and space. Reflect on extracting each the body until only the space element remains. Then consider how before conception this bo space element, and how finally it returns to emptiness.
Now, recombine those elements together into your complete body which has feelings of plea neither-pleasure-nor-pain; and which is the resort of the mind.
Those feelings stimulate the mind. For example, if there is a pleasant feeling then 'liking' is f it is a painful feeling then 'disliking' is made up; and with a neutral feeling the mind is caught 'attachment', which is a condition of delusion.
Go further in to another level, to that condition of mind which 'likes', 'dislikes' and 'attaches' t myriad things. Be aware of the present state of your mind: Now.
By penetrating this far you will be able to distinguish the composition of the mind. The mind while 'liking', 'detesting' and 'delusion' make up another. They are combined and entwined to these admixtures to the mind which are the hindrances that block any progress in wholesom virtue.
Even though you may have steadily centred your mind following these instructions, those ac will always be waiting to draw the mind out again. You must therefore be ready for this by pl where the distracting agents enter --i.e. by way of the eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body and th is the mind which holds and retains so many issues and concerns, and so it needs extra-spe
However, do not go in and forcibly suppress it, for that only gives rise to fatigue, over-strain irritability. Therefore, allow the mind to follow its wishes, but carefully note how it goes out. W that comes and ties-in to haul the mind out again? Being quick enough to catch all of this giv picture: All these issues and affairs enter by way of the eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body or els mind itself. The mind's restless, fretful thinking proliferates on every side and so it cannot be one-pointedness.
Do not use any force. Simply watch and note --but make sure you know in time and can kee mind will then become pacified by itself and calm down. This is because the mind is the 'elem with intelligence an intrinsic part. When the opportunity for self-knowing arrives, then such kn be born without any programming being necessary, for the essence is already there.
This arising of self-knowledge is accompanied by an even firmer mindfulness, with the mind capable of investigating and distinguishing its own condition. It will know the components of entry of all the admixtures. This steady centring of the mind until it is able to investigate the p within oneself displays the mind's ability to distinguish, the truth inside, and it is this which is Factor of Enlightenment.
Now, consider the source teaching of the Lord Buddha which is the 'Truth of Suffering'. One with the intellect, memorizing following the Lord Buddha's Teaching. He presented for our at of Suffering:

"Birth is suffering, old age and death are suffering. Suffering has this nature and follows thes
He then continued,
"Sorrow is suffering, lamentation, bodily illness and its acceptance into the mind are sufferin distress and despair are suffering."
"Association with all unwelcome, unloved things is suffering; separation from all beloved thir suffering;" and, "Nonfulfillment of one's desires is suffering."
After giving one's intellectual attention to these Teachings of the Lord Buddha, now reflect, ' one of us already encountered this suffering?'. "Birth is suffering, old age is suffering": One r that birth is suffering and if one isn't yet old then old age will still be unknown. But as it stead approaches and the body becomes more and more decrepit, then one may understand. "De however, as you haven't yet died you can't know it. Even so, you are still afraid and do not w far as 'sorrow and lamentation etc.,' are concerned, you will all have encountered them to so therefore variously appreciate their anguish. Bodily and mental dis-ease can also be recogn
As you have not encountered the truth of every type of suffering-- especially that of birth, old death-- you will need to reflect and investigate first so as to understand exactly why they are
This state of suffering follows the natural conditions and the course of the five aggregates ar aggregate (rupa-khandha) which is this bodily-group (rupa-kaya); feeling aggregate which is and, an intermediate, neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling; perception aggregate which variou and perceives; mental-formations aggregate being the thought processing; consciousness a knowing of seeing a form or hearing a sound (etc.). Rupa is rupa, but feeling, perception, me and consciousness are called 'nama' which is the condition of the mind inclining-out to know of the seeing a form or hearing a sound is firstly consciousness, (then) the experience of ple neither-pleasure-nor-pain is feeling, the recollecting is perception and the processing though mental-formations. In short, we can call all of this rupa-nama or nama-rupa.
The origination of this nama-rupa is birth, its continuing growth and mutability is old age and is when it breaks up in death. One can therefore reduce this birth-old age-death to arising ar
At first there is arising and finally there is disappearing. This is the natural course of things.
Since the natural course of things is like this, the Lord Buddha described it as suffering. This understood to mean that nothing can permanently exist: that everything from its arising until extinguishing must transform and change. This period of transformation between birth and th
This, then, is the real truth of suffering, the true state of things which every one of us alive ne nama-rupa must encounter. The ordinary worldling (puthujjana) grasps and holds to the nam
'me-and-mine' and 'self' and so takes over the inevitable suffering of nama-rupa into his own how sorrow and bewailing rise as suffering in one's mind.
The Lord Buddha therefore summarized all suffering into terms of the five aggregates, or on nama-rupa. However, if one can release the grasping and holding of nama-rupa, then one n with birth, old age, death, nor is one involved in nama-rupa with its inevitable pain. Nama-ru continues on alone, according to its nature. This is the experience of all the Noble Ones (Ari However, the ordinary worldling grasps the nama-rupa to himself and thereby contrives his c sorrow. We ourselves are the ones who process our suffering because our minds are combi contrive our own sorrow, our own lamentation and bemoaning and admit into our mind the c

The mind itself is what processes mental distress and despair.
It is this very processing and contriving that we call the 'mental-formations' which arise throu assembling of consciousness, feeling and perception. One can therefore see that the mind's nama is the instigator of suffering and the sole source of mental suffering for the mind. As na with rupa, the nature of suffering is found right here in the nama-rupa. This means it must be --arising and finally ceasing. It is both the nature of mental suffering and the processor of su the mind. This is why the Lord Buddha summarized all suffering as being nama-rupa, or the
However, to actually process suffering this nama-rupa must also be combined with a graspin Set yourself to see the Truth of Suffering following the Lord Buddha's Teaching by sorting ou and verse and then gather them all together again in this nama-rupa or five aggregates. Brin this body and in the mind's inclining-out to receive and process suffering.
By seeing and understanding the truth of this, you will gain knowledge of the Truth of Sufferi Buddha. Your previous intellectual understanding will then steadily develop into wisdom and that this Truth is not anything to fear and hate but something which needs to be comprehend then bring one happiness and tranquillity. One's understanding will then be equal to the sour so that one will no longer be deceived into admitting suffering into oneself. By not processing then no longer be contrived and so will subside. This will bring happiness and peace.

9th October 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 19

The Section on the Origin of Suffering (Samudaya)

I will now present a Dhamma teaching concerning the 'Section on the Origination of Sufferin explaining the cause of suffering. Will you all incline your minds inwards and focus in the pre the state there? In what direction is it thinking? Fix your mindfulness so that it can keep up a the mind is taking issue with.
The mind goes out thinking towards forms by way of the eyes, towards sounds through the e through the nose, towards tastes through the tongue, and towards tangible objects through t thinks about previous involvements with sights and sounds (etc.). However, the mind doesn' to know, but also grasps and holds on to those objects.

This condition of inclining or voyaging-out to seize hold of sights and sounds is craving (tanh (upadana). Craving can also be understood, in a general way, as the struggling and excitatio the mind. But a more subtle investigation reveals the outward-voyaging of the mind to grasp Craving and grasping are therefore coupled together. When a sight or sound impinges on th organs, and flows on towards the mind, the mind inclines-out to receive it. However, if grasp involved, there is just plain nama and no craving. But if it should then incline-out and grasp h object then this is craving. One can distinguish the excitation and reaching-out of the mind a while the actual seizing-hold and clinging-to an object is 'grasping'. When only the single ter used though, one should understand this as also covering grasping.
This grasping-hold of an object, clamping it into the mind without releasing it to pass through wish for that object. If the object is agreeable and pleasing, then one will want possession a it. But if it is disagreeable, one will then want to get rid of it. However, as one is still grasping it --even though one doesn't like it-- one can't release and be free of it. The Lord Buddha the these properties into three: sensual craving (kama-tanha), craving for existence (bhava-tanh for non-existence (vibhava-tanha).
Sensual craving is love and desire for an object. A craving for existence somewhere or othe to a wanting of mastery or possession over that object of sensual desire. The craving for no desire to be rid of this or that state, really meaning whatever state one does not like.
These three types of craving also include grasping which holds the object in the mind withou Likeable and dislikeable objects are both seized hold of and so 'liking' and 'disliking' regularl the mind. Both liking and disliking cause restlessness and agitation. Why is this? It is just be still seize hold of the likeable and dislikeable.
It isn't that the mind only inclines-out towards a single object, for in fact they are many. Wha appears by way of the eye or ear (etc.), the mind runs-out to seize hold of it. It's always like craving continually in action in the mind without ever calming down. The Lord Buddha theref is always craving towards a new condition. We may now crave for a certain visual form (etc.
new object, the desire for that will make us discard the old object. This rejection and new gra on and on without ceasing. The new object is also seized as 'a possession over which one h is constantly repeated, moving on from object to object. This discarding of the old object ca subsumed under 'craving for nonexistence' which is that struggling to get rid of the present o an object has run its course and gone then the mind struggles again to take in a new one.
If one could remain with a single object then craving would stop in the old without moving fo object. But this craving has no end. It continually creeps forward having to discard its old obj grasping of the new. When this is the case, even though craving's characteristics are divide all go together as one. Craving never ceases its inching forward through the myriad objects.
the property of always reaching-out for the new and novel. Continually. On-and-on, engross the objects and always preoccupied with wanting more and more. It is never satiated.

Examine your mind and watch out for craving as it projects-out to receive objects. You may this condition of mind, but in the beginning you won't be quick enough. Even so, it's still goo follow behind until the mind is swift and agile enough to catch up with itself.
To catch the mind as it reaches-out to grasp, set your mindfulness on the six sense-channel internal and external ayatana): The eye and the form it sees are one pair; the ear (sota) and hears are a pair; the nose and the odour it smells are one pair; the tongue and its taste are a and its tangible object are a pair; and the mind and the issue it thinks upon are a pair. This c that you must focus on them all simultaneously, but be ready to fix upon any object as it mal should be a visual form then set your mindfulness on the eye and on that form; if it is a soun the sound and the ear (and so on).
Now then, let's try this: allow your mind to go out, being very watchful and aware as it gradu will then find consciousness as the knowing of seeing a form or the knowing of hearing a so and 'hearing' is consciousness and you will find a similar situation when you focus on any of base pairs.
Focus on contact. What is it you see or hear? You see a sight; you hear a sound. And for th successfully seen the form and 'seeing' must come together as contact. A sound and hearin sense bases likewise-- must contact before a sound or smell (etc.) are successfully experien Next focus on feeling. If the object that comes into contact is agreeable, then pleasant feelin is disagreeable then painful feeling arises; and if it is a neutral or indifferent object, then neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling arises.
Focus on perception which recollects and perceives following the feeling.
Focus on volition (sancetana) or the intentionality of the mind which follows on from percepti is perception arising from pleasure, then one's mind sets itself towards that pleasure. Simila towards pain when perception is based in suffering, and towards neither-pain-nor-pleasure w is like that.
At this point you should have come upon craving as the mind inclines and reaches-out to gra Whatever way the mind chooses and intends, so it runs out and grasps in that direction. If it a perception following on from pleasant feeling, then sensual craving will arise. If it is toward then craving for existence will arise, and if it's towards a perceived painful feeling, there will for nonexistence, which is the wanting to rid oneself of that painful state. When the mind inte perceived intermediate feeling, then any one of these types of craving may arise. This is the mind's inclining-out with craving to grasp an object.
Focus on applied-and-sustained thought (vitakka-vicara), which is reflection or discursive th will see that these have fallen under the power of craving.
By following this sequence you will appreciate that it all starts with the eye and form or ear a (etc.) when the mind gradually, step by step, inclines-out to seize and hold. This, then, is cra applied-and-sustained thought must follow under its power.

One can now say that this state of craving directly depends on nama-rupa. The eyes and for (etc.) are corporeality while the mind residing with it and inclining-out to receive objects is m this is not a normal, plain nama, for instead of letting go the object is seized hold of. Whethe is liked or disliked it is still grasped hold of, and this is what forms craving. This craving arise dependant on rupa and nama and nowhere else. It can be reckoned a nama-dhamma becau like the mental-formations.
Why does the mind concoct and contrive in this way? Because there are still underlying defi cankers (asava) in the inclining-out mind. This is the latent proclivity (anusaya) of craving lyi resident in the mind. Normally it does not show its face and remains as if not there, but shou or alluring object make contact then that latent tendency bursts out to take the object which Set yourself to see this.
When you can focus on this without lapse, then the latent tendencies won't have any chance the alluring object won't be able to provoke or 'seed'. The latent defilements will then be wea 'seed' has not invigorated. With such mindfulness set, vigilant and alert, it will be able steadi and destroy that part of the mind which is latent-defilement.
This craving, therefore, is the origin of the mind's suffering. The mind inclines-out to seize ar object, and when inevitably, in accord with its nature, that object changes and transforms, so arises in the mind. However, with constant vigilance the mind will not be able to seize hold o can then let go of them and thereby release one's suffering as well.
This craving and the suffering it causes both depend and reside in the nama-rupa and your therefore be focussed there and in the mind. Mindfulness will then steadily quicken and beco alert.

10th October 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 20

The Section on the Extinction of Suffering (Dukkha Nirodha)

I will now speak about the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha). The Buddhist Teaching is refuge (sarana) for the world because it can explain the extinction of suffering. This is crucia is what we are aiming for. If it could not teach this then it would be without essence and basi However, a method of practice to bring about that extinction is also needed, though actually way remains the task and responsibility of each individual person.

Even though the Teaching is genuine and true, if the person does not follow the way of prac be able to achieve the extinction of suffering. Therefore, the task is up to the individual to fol practice to effect the required results. This practice is directly concerned with the mind. Toda will first explain the result and fruit of that practice: the extinction of suffering. This is the maj essential fruit of the practice enabling one to see the truth of the Teaching of the Lord Buddh Will you now please centre your mind and watch its inclining-out towards knowing various af present moment it is inclining-out to receive the sound of this Dhamma Teaching. If you are you should be able to notice its condition. Is it calm and cool? A feeling of calmness and tran indicates that the Dhamma being offered externally and the inner Dhamma of your centred m --capable of leading the mind out away from suffering. And this present calmness of mind is cessation of suffering. It might only be a momentary suppression while the mind is centred in so, realize that when it resides constantly with Dhamma there will be a constant cessation a Now will you focus on that 'inclining-out to know' about external affairs --the affairs of forms sounds being heard (etc.) and those former sights and sounds (etc.) already known and stor the mind (mano). These affairs are either welcomed with 'hankering,' unwelcomed with 'deje and delusory. The mind immediately knows agitation and heat, and cannot be calmed down hankering, dejection, and deluded attachment. This heated excitation of the mind is a subtle suffering, though you may not be aware of that. Only after experiencing a calm mind with Dh appreciate such agitation as being one form of suffering. Most people will usually only know little, about the blatant forms of suffering --sorrow, lamentation, pain, mental distress and de all grow out of this subtle type of suffering.
Reflecting more carefully on why this should be the case, one finds that it is because the I b in the myriad affairs. What are these affairs?
Focus on this body: It is composed of the various elements; it is a fathom long and a span w sitting here now. We have a 'sense' that this body is me and however it exists we accept tha Looking at our face in the mirror, we feel that these are 'my features.' Looking at our photogr it as showing 'me'. Not only is there this 'feeling of self' we also wish for this 'myself-in-this-b proceed in an agreeable way. Compliments about this body are welcome, but any criticism i though we know for sure that some particular part is not so good, we are still glad of any flat the opposite --and even though we know it is flattery we still like it. This, then, is another asp how desire becomes mixed in.
Focus back on the mind inclining-out. In truth this experiencing-engaged-with-desire (which about) is a condition of that mind going-out to know. It first sees the rupa form --perhaps see in a mirror-- and this seeing is consciousness. If one likes it then that is pleasure, or even if or is indifferent, it is still all feeling. There is perception, and then mental-formations fashion about one's body and so that 'sense' and those thoughts of my body (as I explained above) nama, as the mind inclines-out to know. This nama is mixed and blended with craving togeth clinging. When it is like this, then all one's experience and thoughts are mixed and permeate defilements.

Even though one may feel contentment with one's body, it remains, in truth, rupa while that ' nama. After more careful investigation one finds that any feeling of contentment one has in t compare to that of the calm mind with Dhamma. Once one has experienced the calm arising become self-evident.
Now there is still another important point to consider: We must continually deceive ourselves of this rupa-and-nama. Their true nature is really bound up with impermanence (aniccata), s
--because they can't remain stable-- and not-self (anattata). All rupa and nama must procee in birth to an end, with continued change in between. This rupa which everyone is so attach have this transformation and change. Thus, we must think up ways to fool ourselves into fee and satisfaction with this ever changing rupa. For instance, though it is ageing, we manage t old. If someone then declares to us that it is old we are displeased; while if they say the opp glad--even though it's obvious to all that it truly is old! We like it when they deceive us even a constantly make sure to fool ourselves too; putting it off and thinking 'not just yet, not just ye to worry about that until later.' When this rupa changes, heading towards its extinction, we m hold it back and so a struggle and agitation ensues. Happiness is impossible if our thinking g course of nature and refuses to accept its law.
This all results from craving that gives rise to grasping and clinging. We first seize hold of so 'myself' and then go on to grasp hold of something else. We grasp and that thing's arising be arising, its changing becomes our changing and its final extinguishing becomes our decline therefore constantly spin with the nama-rupa as it is continually arises, changes and ceases whirling-around is the heart of suffering and is far from that peace and stillness which is hap when the nama-rupa fails to follow the plans we had on first grasping hold of them --and yet to hold on to them-- another load of suffering is added: Sorrow, lamentation and all the other suffering that we have already mentioned.
To remedy this situation and end suffering therefore requires a focussing on that 'self' that sp with the myriad things in their arising and extinguishing. This specifically means the spinning nama-rupa, both internally and externally. Focus to see that when 'self' spins with them, ther suffering too; and the less it does so, the less suffering it must endure.
To actually reduce this spinning, you must focus on the desire and grasping within yourself.
is craving arising'; 'this is grasping and clinging arising.' Realize that, 'a lot of desire means a suffering' and 'less desire and grasping means less suffering.' The complete lack of desire a the complete absence of suffering, and this is what forms the extinction of suffering (dukkha
However, in the beginning stages of practice it isn't yet possible to give up all desire and gra Therefore make sure that you are wise in your selection of what to desire. Don't desire and g evil; instead just take firm hold of whatever is good and skilful. This alone will extinguish the that arises from doing evil, and one will also receive the happiness that comes from progres of virtue. When you have practised and trained yourself to the full limit of goodness, then the to wish for good any more --because one is already there. At this point there is no need to w anymore --but that is the final and ultimate stage.

At this present stage, you must still want to hold onto goodness which is virtue and moral pr samadhi and onto wisdom. Use the precepts to extinguish the suffering involved in wrong ar behaviour. Use samadhi to avoid the hindrances when they arise in the mind, so as to extin suffering. Use a trained wisdom as the tool to extinguish the suffering arising from the more agitation, desires and grasping.
Speaking of using wisdom to investigate: Focus it in the rupa-and-nama and penetrate to its arising and passing away. Then whatever object is encountered will be received by this wisc through to its arising and passing away, and it will be extinguished when it reaches the mind hankering or dejection one has, however befooling and delusory the object may appear, on of it will be extinguished by wisdom's insight into the arising and passing away. The object th power and the mind is no longer jolted or upset by it.
Normally however, when objects reach an ordinary person's mind they completely adhere ar form is seen or a sound heard, it enters in and sticks fast in the mind. These objects have th agitate the mind, but when wisdom with insight into arising and passing away is developed, away. This, then, is the resolution and conclusion. It is the end for suffering, which will never in to possess the mind. This is the way of practice to extinguish suffering.
The means and strategy for steadily removing suffering, step by step, is an assiduous and p investigation into nama-rupa to see its arising and passing away; and a training to clear the see the principles of the natural course of things. The curing of the inner suffering will enhan mindfulness and wisdom so that they can try to deal to the best of their ability with the extern that one may confront.
When one is skilled in this Buddhist Way of practice, one will be able to contend with any for Even if one is surrounded by (external) suffering, one can still deliver and safe-keep the min Teaching is a religion which offers a refuge that is really reliable because it teaches a genuin extinguish suffering. But to realize this, you will have to study and practise in the way I have here. Then you will receive the results in a gradual extinguishing of suffering, according to th your practice.

17th October 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 21

The Truth of Extinction United with the Truth of the Path

Please will you now centre your mind within yourself. Focus on the mind with its mental-obje seeing the mind as it thinks about its present thought, concern or preoccupation. Is your min Whilst listening to this Dhamma talk, this means seeing the mind as it is thinking upon that D being heard. The object is now the Dhamma subject that is being heard and thought about.
The Discourse explains that suffering originates because of craving, and that craving both a in delightful-and-pleasurable-things (piyarupa satarupa). As craving ends in the place where extinguish there. This doesn't refer to external things, but to these very objects and preoccup mind.
The object as a delightful-and-pleasurable-thing, which the mind is mulling-over, is really for a person with our eyes, the mind takes over that visual form as a mental image. It appears in full and complete image of that person. If, instead of a person, one sees a tree, a mountain o thing, then the mind takes it over and it appears complete in the mind as a tree, mountain or one hears a sound through the ears, the mind will take that subject as a complete image into mind takes in visual forms from the eyes, sounds from the ears (and similarly for all six sens mental images. Thus, those objects manifest as entities in the mind.
The mind, however, doesn't take everything in as images. A sight or sound or anything that interesting feature is released to pass on by, while those things that do are taken in as imag therefore, is why the Lord Buddha used the term 'delightful and pleasurable thing' for anythin fascinates and enthrals the mind to the point where it is taken in as an image.
Craving and grasping will permeate that image and it can then be considered that the origina craving is born. If there is no image or delightful-and-pleasurable-thing, then craving has nov Later though, when they are present in the mind, craving can indeed arise. This is why it is s arises it does so in the delightful-and-pleasurable-things --which are exactly these images a Why does craving arise? Because not-knowing or delusion is watching those mental objects delusion is watching, images will become evident as either agreeable, disagreeable or enthr watches with knowledge instead of delusion, one will see that it is all only a matter of mental taken in and fashioned by the mind into entities. The form which the eye sees is really outsid to fix itself in the mind because an image is fabricated of it. This can be compared with takin Even though the real thing is outside, it appears as if it is fixed in the film. In fact, of course, just an image caught there and not the real thing at all. A person's mind which fabricates a m similar to that film which catches different forms through a lens arrangement, which itself ca the visual organ.
Now then, focus that knowing to investigate through into another level. There is the mental i form which becomes fixed and fashioned in the mind, and then there is external matter. This experienced as a person, tree, mountain or some other thing, and it too is compounded and these things existed before the elements came together to make them up and, once arisen, change and finally disperse. Therefore they are just elements combined together, the earth the hard parts, the water element the fluid parts, the fire element the warmth, the wind elem and the space element the empty spaces. This being so, they all must be void --void of entit Focus that knowing (which is not delusion) to see the mental image dispersed as elements. empty of entity and self. When this voidness is evident, then that mental image-- whether ag disagreeable or deluding-- will dissolve. Craving will then have nothing to seize-on and so m abate. This is why, when craving extinguishes, it does so in the delightful-and-pleasurable th The important point here is that if the mind takes in and watches that mental image of a delightful-and-pleasurable thing with delusion, craving will immediately spring up. This is the origination of suffering. If however the mind can see it all with knowledge as void of entity or craving will at once subside. This is the route for the extinction of suffering. The crucial thing extinguishing craving therefore lies with knowing. This training of the mind to develop knowl the Path (magga) -- the way of practice to end suffering.

The knowing mind is also the calm, stilled, mind and so the training in tranquillity is also the suffering.

The stilled mind is in its natural state and so the training to establish this naturalness can als the Path to end suffering.

The importance therefore lies in the training of the mind to know, to be still and calm and to

The direct way for the mind to know is through knowing about suffering, knowing the cause knowing the extinction of suffering and knowing the Path of practice to attain to the extinctio

Knowing suffering means knowing the delightful-and-pleasurable mental images and objects merely delightful and pleasurable things that must all arise and disappear in the mind. It mea even the external substance is also of a nature to arise and pass away, being composed of entity or self. Focus to know the truth about these mental-images and about the myriad exte lead to such images.

This knowing of suffering is therefore not just a looking at any distress that has arisen in one mind. That's not all it is. People experience various degrees of bodily or mental distress bec unable actually to see suffering and therefore cannot free the mind from suffering. Those wh and know the truth about delightful-and-pleasurable mental images and external things will with those things, and so will not suffer.

Knowing the cause of suffering means carefully focussing on craving and grasping. The con disliking or deluded attachment for a mental-image, signifies that craving has sprung up. Lea and know this craving, and it will then subside.

Focus into this subsiding, this extinction of suffering which one is encountering. In truth, we continuously overwhelmed by suffering. Suffering arises only when craving is born. Even if practise, on some occasions suffering will lessen and subside. This can be seen as an occa suffering. On coming to practise Dhamma, one extinguishes suffering by focussing on that a stills and cools the mind. The mind will then be characterized by naturalness, stillness, know clarity and brightness. These are the features of the extinction of suffering. You must realize Knowing the way of practice to the extinction of suffering involves a focussing on the causes that extinction: The mind must be knowing, stilled and natural. One does not simply allow su and cease of itself, for that might not only take a long time but also be highly dangerous. On develop that knowing, stillness and naturalness, for these lead to the cessation of suffering b craving and grasping.

Craving arises and ceases in the same place, that place being delightful-and-pleasurable-th mental-images. But to extinguish craving requires the development of that knowingness whi delusion. When that knowing is in constant supervision, objects can no longer come in and b arising of suffering, because craving can no longer be provoked --for one is then fully aware

18th October 2504 B.E. (1961)

* * *

TALK 22

The Truth of the Path (Magga)

Today we have reached the topic of the Eightfold Path (Magga) and I will therefore take the time so you can see them in and for yourself. The Path has eight factors:
The first factor is right view (samma-ditthi). This is the understanding of suffering, of the orig suffering, of the extinction of suffering and of the path leading to the extinction of suffering.
See this suffering in your own self whenever you encounter it. Understand it then. Realize th aggregates arise at birth and then must grow old and die. This is their inevitable course. If yo cling to these five aggregates as being me-and-mine, then when they become engaged in su Focus on your going along with this suffering of the five aggregates.
See the cause of the arising of suffering. This is seeing the mind's craving and desire, which creators of all of the different forms of suffering.
See the abating and subsidence of suffering. This is the mind bright and clear of craving bec has waned. At this time, if such craving has subsided you will have relief from suffering, eve temporarily. See this temporary cessation of suffering in the mind and notice the knowledge which is able to relieve and still that suffering. Seeing this understanding is seeing the Path.
Focus in yourself to see the present condition of suffering, its cause and origination, its extin

Path.
The second factor is right thought (samma-sankappa). This is thought free from sensual des and cruelty.
Focus to see the thought and reflections going on in your mind. What are they about? When free from sensuous desire --as when you are reflecting on Dhamma-- then be aware of it. Th pulled away to like, desire and find satisfaction in the affairs of visual objects, sounds, odour tangibles.
When there are thoughts free of ill will and vindictiveness, and thoughts free of cruelty, then that. See and be aware of your thoughts and reflections.
The third factor is right speech (samma-vaca). This is abstaining from lying, tale bearing, ha foolish babble. See this in your own mind. Is there such thought of abstinence present or no observed, this indicates that the factor of right speech is present. You don't need to speak th being silent with such abstinence is already considered right speech.
The fourth factor is right (bodily) action (samma-kammanta). This is abstaining from killing, s unlawful sexual behaviour (or from breaking the rules of celibacy). See if this abstinence is p mind. If it is, then you should understand that this is right action. There is no need to do anyt for the abstinence is already considered right action.
The fifth factor is right livelihood (samma-ajiva). This is the abstaining from wrong livelihood following one's livelihood in a correct and proper way. Focus in the mind to see your present the necessities of life supporting it obtained by right or wrong means? If you note that they w right and correct way, then you can consider this as right livelihood.
The sixth factor is right effort (samma-vayama). This is the effort of avoiding or overcoming e unwholesome things, and of developing and maintaining wholesome things.
Focus to see unwholesomeness or evil, and wholesomeness or virtue in your own mind --for first arise. Inspect to see about your actions (kamma) which arise from within the mind. If yo is thinking of doing unwholesome actions or evil, then make an effort to avoid that action. If y reveals the mind is already concerned with unwholesomeness or evil, then make an effort to abandon that, so as not to do it again. Such evil actions can be avoided. We are capable of unwholesomeness.
Now focus to see the virtue or wholesomeness . That virtue which you have not yet done bu doing --make an effort to do it. That virtue which you have already done --make an effort to m and develop it further.
This matter requires you to train your endeavour and effort. 'Effort' can be understood as me dauntless' in the abandoning of evil and in the pursuit and implementation of goodness and dauntlessness is necessary because of the obstacles which block such an effort: the inner o defilements (kilesa) in one's mind and the external surrounding circumstances that can also These defilements are lust, hatred and delusion or desire which pull away to avoid virtue but doing of evil. The external situation comprises those people, things or any of the various out engage and pull the mind into evildoing and away from virtue. When this is the case if the m easily daunted it will suffer defeat from the defilements within itself. It will also fail against the external circumstances and be misled into doing evil and being far from virtue.

You must therefore strengthen your effort and dauntlessness so that the mind is intrepid and the defilements within it as well as those misleading external circumstances. You can then a cultivate virtue, as has already been explained. Inspect your mind to see if there is present v effort, that dauntlessness which can defeat the inner defilements and the external situation.
dauntless, without being weak, lazy or sluggish, you will be able to abandon evil and cultivat all kinds of evil can be avoided and all kinds of virtue accomplished. You can then consider of right effort is present.
The seventh factor is right mindfulness (samma-sati). Inspect what you are recollecting or be at this moment. If your recollection is concerned with affairs of lust or greed, hatred or delusi is not right mindfulness. This lust, greed, hatred and delusion can be referred to in short as a hankering and dejection --and this is the sort of mindfulness and recollection which lead ther mind. The mind must recollect or shift out to take in an agreeable issue for hankering to aris disagreeable issue which results in dejection. This sort of mindfulness leads defilements into mind. However, this is not right mindfulness (samma-sati).
Right mindfulness is the recollection that brings in only those matters which will relieve and a hankering-and-dejection and lead to calmness and purity in the mind. It comprises: The reco examination of one's complete body. This has been explained previously stage by stage in t mindfulness of the body (kayanupassana); the examination of pleasant, painful and interme presented in the section on mindfulness of feeling (vedananupassana); the examination of th present state as presented in the section on mindfulness of the mind (cittanupassana); the e objects of mind as presented in the section on mindfulness of mental objects (dhammanupa
The preceding explanation was graduated step by step, but in brief one can say, recollect an feelings, mind, mental objects and issues. Be aware so that you know in your mind the cond feeling, mind, mental objects and issues. Adopt these things as objects to manifest clearly in example, when you focus on a bodily part, then manifest that clearly as an object in your min feeling, condition of mind or mental issue manifest as a clear object in the mind. This is the e seeing, being the manifesting of objects gathered together. Hankering and dejection concern occur because one does not see its arising and disappearing. When one can see the disapp arising, then hankering and dejection cannot be born or will occur too late. The object where dejection sought to establish themselves is not viable anymore because it is about to disapp Focus on your mindfulness. When you see that it is established in the foundations of mindfu feelings, mind, or mental objects) and that it is centred within rather than swerving away afte objects, this indicates --even if one is only at the beginning stage-- that it is the start of right mindfulness (samma-sati). When this mindfulness is swift and fully agile it will immediately c the arising and disappearing and will therefore be able to prevent hankering and dejection. T mindfulness well established, full and swift. Inspect the mindfulness within yourself: If it has characteristics, you can be sure it is right mindfulness (samma-sati).

The eighth factor is right concentration (samma-samadhi). This is the setting and establishin samadhi and, when it focuses on an object, fixing on it firmly. This also must rely on mindful Mindfulness recollects in the body, feelings, mind and mental objects while samadhi centres itself in the body, feeling, mind or mental object. If mindfulness is present but samadhi isn't f established, then an awareness and understanding of various things cannot arise. If mindful present, then samadhi can't be established. This means that they must go together: mindful and samadhi established in that object. Inspect to see this in yourself. If your mind is still uns not firmly established, then samadhi has not yet arisen. Later, when the mind has advanced firmly established together with mindfulness, it gives rise to knowledge (nyana). This is right or right samadhi.
Of the eight factors of the Path, right speech, right action and right livelihood together form r (sila). In short this is the natural mind which is orderly and restrained without any thought of in a wrong way. When you inspect your mind and find this naturalness, then you can conside virtue: right speech, right action and right livelihood within yourself. There's no need to look f things, just check to see if the mind is natural. If it is, then that is moral virtue.
Right effort, right mindfulness and right concentration are together known as samadhi. This i stilled and firmly established. Inspect your mind to see if it is stilled and firm within the deter object without any wavering. There's no need to reckon up samadhi's components ; just che mind is stable and calm. If it is, then that is samadhi.
Right view and right thought together make up wisdom (pannya) which is knowing. Inspect y whether that knowing, which is wise to the arising and disappearing of things, is present or n then it can immediately deal with any defilements. It will either know before the defilements a late, it will finally realize and again quickly cut them out. This knowing is wisdom, and by see single thing you won't need to reckon up all the composite factors.
If we summarize all of this we can say, focus on the natural mind, the calm established minc in the mind. We can then expand into the Eightfold Path according to the conditions I've alre To summarize again: We can see that the natural mind, the calm established mind and the k be one. The natural mind must be a calm established mind, which must in turn be a knowing be brought together as one. This is what the Lord Buddha meant when He spoke of virtue b wisdom; of samadhi being virtue and wisdom, and of wisdom being virtue and samadhi. This the Path into one.
This Eightfold Path can be summarized and reduced to three, and then further to one, which convergence. Everyone has this way of practice within himself to a greater or lesser extent.
Inspect this Path in your own mind. Examine the detailed and comprehensive aspect of the the more integrated aspects of the threefold and the unified forms. With constant inspection state of the Path within yourself: whether it is slack and undeveloped or exalted and mature.

always see and know the true state of the Path within yourself it is called 'attannyu' --a know
The Path will then be steadily developed and cultivated.
Will you now prepare to listen with attention while the monks chant concerning this Path. Aft determine set your minds on practising for calm and tranquillity.

25th October 2504 B.E. (1961)

==========

END NOTES

(1) The Five Precepts (Panca Sila) are:
1) I undertake the training to abstain from the killing of any living being.
2) I undertake the training to abstain from stealing.
3) I undertake the training to abstain from wrong sexual behaviour.
4) I undertake the training to abstain from lying and wrong speech.
5) I undertake the training to abstain from the use of intoxicants (alcohol and drugs etc.).

(2) These six external objects and their corresponding sense organs are referred to through talks. Sometimes eye-and-visual-object and ear-and-sound are given as general examples, to each sense base. Also note that mind (or mano) together with mental-object (or dhamma) sixth sense pair. This dhamma and the Dhamma of the Triple Gem have different meanings
(3) Throughout these Dhamma talks these three types of feeling will be referred to, sometim abbreviated form.
(4) This will usually mean sitting in a cross-legged, 'samadhi-posture.' All of those present lis Dhamma talk would have taken up this posture.
(5) 'Object' here, and normally throughout this translation, renders the Thai word arom. The term (arammana) referred only to sense objects, though in everyday speech it has now com more like 'mood'. Often, therefore, there is an emotional edge to this word.
(6) This is a rendering of the Thai 'yin-dee, yin-rai' and will reoccur repeatedly throughout thi refers to the opposite tendencies of welcoming, being pleased and hankering after somethin displeasing, unwelcome rejection of something.
(7) Samadhi is the state when the mind is established; it is the fixing of the mind on a single also be translated as 'concentration,' though in this book it is often left untranslated as it is a widely known.

(8) In Thailand cremations are very much part of the social scene. They form an important ri unlike a marriage ceremony directly concern Buddhism and the monks.
(9) Everyone listening would have had his or her eyes closed, sitting in samadhi posture.
(10) The factor of enlightenment of dhamma-vicaya is often taken to stand for investigation o doctrine (Dhamma), though here it is the investigation of bodily and mental phenomena (nar
(11) In the Thai this is 'tamadar' (Pali: dhammata). In this context it has a meaning as somet natural, inevitable and therefore normal or ordinary course of events.
(12) Immediately after the Dhamma talk the monks present would chant some appropriate p suttas.

==========

A BRIEF GLOSSARY

The brief definitions offered here accord with the usage of this present work. To work around with showing diacritical marks, full Pali spelling is shown (when needed) in [brackets] using t long a = aa; long i = ii; long u = uu; dot under n m d or t = .n .m .d or .t; n tilde = ~n

Abyakata [abyaakata]: Indeterminate.
Akasa [aakaasa]: Space.
Akusala: Unwholesome, unskilful.
Amisa [aamisa]: The worldly, carnal type of happiness and pleasure. It is compared to a bait attractive object which contains suffering. (Cp. niramisa.) Anapana-sati [aanapaana-sati]: Mindfulness of the in-and out-breathing.
Anatta [anattaa]: 'not-self.'
Anicca; (Aniccata) [aniccaa; aniccataa]: Impermanent; (Impermanence.) Anusaya: Proclivities, inclinations, tendencies.
Arammana [aaramma.na]: Object.
Ariya: Noble. (opp. putthujjana.)
Arom (Thai): Mental object, preoccupation. (cp. arammana.)
Asava [aasava]: Canker.
Avijja [avijjaa]: Ignorance, nescience.
Ayatana [aayatana]: Sense base.

Bhikkhu: Mendicant monk.
Bhuta [bhuuta]: Being, entity.

Bodhisatta (Pali); (Skt. Bodhisatva): A being who aspires and works towards Buddhahood.
Bojjhanga [bojjha.nga]: Factors of Enlightenment.
Buddha: One who became perfectly awakened through self discovery of Dhamma. Normally present age.
"Bud-dho": A word that is (silently) recited to aid in concentration practice.

Cakkhu: The eye; as a sense door.
Cetana [cetanaa]: Intention.
Chanda: Intention, desire, will or zeal.
Citta: Mind; being the third foundation of mindfulness.

dhamma: Usually means mental object; the forth foundation of mindfulness.
Dhamma: The liberating law discovered and proclaimed by the Lord Buddha.
Dhatu [dhaatu]: Element.
Dosa: Hate.
Dukkha: Suffering or pain.

Ekaggata [ekaggataa]: One-pointedness of mind.

Jara [jaraa]: Ageing, decay.
Jati [jaati]: Birth; from conception to parturition.

Kamma (Pali); (Skt. Karma): Action.
Kammatthana [kamma.t.thaana]: 'Working-ground' for the practice of meditation; a term for '
meditation.'
Kaya [kaaya]: 'Group,' 'Body'; here may refer to the corporeal group or physical body (ruupa mental group (naama-kaaya).
Kayagata-sati [kaayagataa-sati]: Mindfulness with regard to the body.
Khandha: Aggregate.
Kusala: Wholesome, skilful.

Lobha: Greed or lust.

Magga: Path; The Truth of the Path.
Mahabhuta [mahaabhuuta]: The 'Primary Elements'; also dhatu.
Mano: Mind, especially as a base (ayatana).
Marana [mara.na]: Death.
Moha: Delusion.

Nama [naama]: (lit: 'name'); 'mind', mentality.
Nama-rupa [naama-ruupa]: (lit: name-&-matter or name-&-form); 'mind and body'; Phenome Nibbana [Nibbaana]: The extinction of suffering; the supreme goal; the Unconditioned.
Nimitta: The mark or sign which is taken up in concentration practice.
Niramisa [niraamisa]: Happiness or pleasure as an unworldly, non-carnal sort; without the ba amisa.)
Nirodha: Ceasing, cessation.
Nivarana [nivara.na]: Hindrances.
Nyana [~naa.na]: Knowledge.

Pakati (or pakati-sila): The normal, 'without crisis' state of affairs. (The natural or genuine mo distinguished from prescribed morality.)
Pali [Paali]: The ancient Indian language of the suttas.
Panca-khandha [pa~nca-khandhaa]: The five aggregates.
Pannya [pa~n~naa]: Wisdom, discernment.
Paramattha sacca: Truth in the highest, ultimate, or absolute sense. (Opp. sammati.) Parami [paramii]: Perfections. Ten qualities leading to Buddhahood.
Patikkula [pa.tikkuula]: Impure.
Phassa: Contact.
Piti [piiti]: Rapture.
Piyarupa Satarupa [piyaruupa saataruupa]: The delightful and pleasurable things.
Puthujjana: Worldling. (Opp. Ariya.)

Raga [raaga]: Lust.
Rupa [ruupa]: 1) Matter, substance, corporeality (see Khandha); 2) Visual Object (see Ayata

Sacca: Truth.
Saddha [saddhaa]: Faith, confidence, trust.
Samadhi [samaadhi]: Concentration. Upacara and appana samadhi are 'neighbourhood' and concentration.'
Samatha: Calm, tranquillity.
Sammati: Conventional, (cp. paramattha sacca.)
Sampajannya [sampaja~n~naa]: Clear comprehension, often paired with sati.
Samudaya: The origin, arising (of suffering.)
Sancetana [sa~ncetanaa]: Intention.
Sangha [sa.ngha]: The Community who truly practise following the Lord Buddha's Dhamma.
Sankhara [sa.nkhaara]: Mental-formations. The processes that concoct and fashion.

Sannya [sa~n~naa]: Perception. (In Thai it has also come to mean recognition.)
Sarana [sara.na]: Refuge.
Sati: Mindfulness.
Satipattana [satipa.t.thaana]: Foundations of Mindfulness.
Savaka [saavaka]: Noble Disciple.
Sila [siila]: Moral virtue.
Sukha: Pleasure, happiness, ease.
Sutta: Discourse.

Tanha [ta.nhaa]: Craving.
Ti-Ratana: Three Jewels; the Buddha, Dhamma and the Noble Sangha.

Upadana [upaadaana]: Grasping, holding.
Upekkha [upekkhaa]: Equanimity, indifference.

Vedana [vedanaa]: Feeling.
Vicara [vicaara]: Sustained thought, reflection.
Vinnana [vi~n~na.na]: Consciousness.
Vipassana [vipassanaa]: Insight.
Viriya: Energy, exertion.
Vitakka: Applied thought, reflection.
==========

A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 12:49 AM
This thread is being offered for reader's consideration regarding the practice of meditative al so much confusing and contradictory information buzzing around the web on the subject of j effort to set the record straight according to someone's actual experience of the practice, I a this thread will assist others who are intrepid enough to "give it a go," and who, despite all th press out and about on "official" and "unofficial" Buddhist web forums, are willing to endeavo and practice this often misunderstood aspect of Buddhist meditation training and accomplish

Let me start by dispelling the predominate myth about absorption that is being spread by we Buddhist Community E-Sangha (now defunct). Often you will hear or read that mastery of ab almost unknown in the present contemporary world; that "it is no longer possible for people achieve the mastery of meditative absorption." Nothing could be further from the truth! Desp have read (or heard repeated elsewhere) on such websites, meditative absorption (otherwis not all that difficult to achieve, given the right conditions and training opportunities. It just tak practice and the correct instruction and encouragement.

And once a person begins to get an accurate idea of what jhana is, how it feels, and what to almost impossible to stop them from achieving it. Correct knowledge is self empowering. Of best learnt and practiced with someone face to face; that is, with a teacher or guide from wh receive personal guidance and instruction as well as to be able to discuss their progress. Th substitute for hands on, in-person instruction when it comes to the slippery subject of endea communicate information about subtle mental states. Yet, even if one does not have a perso teacher, it is still possible to learn about and practice absorption, as long as one has access instruction and feedback. So, barring a lack of either of these two stipulations, there is no ex person not to take up the study of meditative absorption and to eventually succeed at its pra negative press about it notwithstanding.

There is a reason why jhana is talked about so much by the Buddha in the Pali suttas, and t is a meditative state which assists the mind in deepening one's abilities of concentration and present-moment awareness, otherwise known as sati or mindfulness. In many suttas, the Bu extolling the virtues of the jhanas and how he has used them to develop clarity to mind and i practice of satipatthana. This is because just as a pond whose bottom has been stirred by a up with muddy debris, when that pond is allowed to become still, the debris will once again s bottom of the pond. And the pond's bottom will become clear, transparent, and easily discern the mind when it is allowed to become still, settled, and calmed.

This is perhaps why you always see the term calm (samatha) placed before the term insight articles and essays. It is usually necessary first to calm the mind down before insight can rea expected to arise. Insight into whatever subject is being examined is made possible with the calm mind. And oftentimes, insight will just pop out at the observer unbidden, seemingly fror for this and many other reasons why in the discourses one finds time and time again the Bu entry into meditative absorption in order to accomplish this or that achievement in realizatior

For the sake of expediency and the avoidance of "attention deficit disorder" in readers, I will make these posts relatively short (although not too short) so that people have an opportunity absorb (contemplate) what is being explained. Interspersed between the tips and instruction be mention of some of the controversial aspects that have been discussed in other web fora to bring these controversial points out in the open and to address them straighforwardly. The reader and practitioner, however, is still responsible for discerning the truth and sanctioning version of these explanations they ultimately accept and follow.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 12:30 AM as a reply to Ian And.
How I Came to Practice Jhana

I didn't begin to look into absorption practice as it is explained in Buddhist literature until I wa years into my meditative practice. At the time, being ignorant of it, I couldn't have told you wh difference was between samadhi and jhana. All I knew was that from the descriptions I had r they both sounded very similar. What I eventually learned through the experience of a matur there is a subtle difference which characterizes each of these two seemingly mysterious and

Though I came to the practice of meditative absorption not totally certain about what it was c could ever achieve it, I did have a kind of explorer's curiosity and a "throw caution to the win which helped to overcome any negative thoughts or doubts I might have somehow secretly h my mind. With nothing to lose but time, diving headlong into the practice seemed the only re practical thing to do if I wanted to learn anything about the practice of absorption. This is sim that if I can do it, then anyone can do it. I'm not all that much smarter than anyone else. The anyone needs is to be able to recognize, differentiate, and identify subtle mental movement.

you see it, and not to deny it or downplay it. It is that mental movement, sometimes subtle a gross, that needs to be seen and brought to our awareness.

When it came time to actually attempting the practice of the jhanas, rather than rely on the s academically dry yet wonderfully detailed description provided by the celebrated Buddhist m Gunaratana in his essay "The Jhanas" (which was an abridged version from his book The P Insight: An Explanation of the Buddhist Jhanas), I went with a much briefer Internet version entailed a description written by Leigh Brasington ("The Jhanas in Theravada Buddhist Med lay practitioner and jhana teacher, whose description was more accessible to me and seeme intuitive sense.

At this point it may be helpful to gain a better idea about the difference between what ordina opposed to what jhana samadhi is as it is discussed within the context of Buddhist meditatio experience and understand it, samadhi refers to — and has traditionally been defined as — What this refers to in layman's terms is the mind's ability to concentrate on, for example, an breath without becoming distracted (as by interposing thought). Being able to focus on that examine it for several minutes in succession without distraction or unnoticed distraction. Wh correctly within this context, then, samadhi takes on a more prosaic and mundane definition thus separating it from other contexts in which it may have been viewed as a more glorified Gotama the Buddha was nothing if not down-to-earth and practical when it came to describi meditation and how he employed it in the process of realization of the Dhamma he taught.

Even during the time of the Buddha there were other ascetics and renouncer/wanderer type men," who taught a meditative technique known as dhyana or jhana. This meditative discipli Buddha-to-be, we are told, by two meditation teachers who had a significant affect on the tra Alara Kalama taught Gotama how to practice the first seven levels of jhana (the four materia first three immaterial jhanas) while Uddaka Ramaputta taught him about the eighth immateri meditation teachers, one at a time, attempted to recruit Gotama to help them teach others a of the systems of meditation that they both taught. However, Gotama declined them both, sa yet found what he was seeking, and that he would carry on alone in search of his goal of the suffering.

In ordinary terms jhana can be described very simply as "absorbed concentration" or "absor many modern day meditation masters call appana samadhi or "fixed concentration"). Just ho absorption samadhi differs from the normal everyday brand of samadhi becomes evident wh level or depth of concentration that is ultimately achieved while one enters and remains in th "fixed concentration."

In normal samadhi, the mind becomes able to remain focused on an object without becomin object. In other words, there is a modicum of effort being made in order to remain in this stat occurs when the mind finds a particularly pleasant sensation on which to become focused a allowing the mind to become automatically (and effortlessly) fixed on the object of observatio difference lies, on the one hand, in the amount of effort needed (or not needed) to maintain t on the other hand, in the perception of the mind's becoming pleasantly (at least during the fi jhanas) locked on the object of observation while having entered the state of absorption. On reaches the fourth jhana, what remains left of the mental constituents are the two factors of tranquility" and "clear awareness" which was developed during the previous three levels, alo enduring sense of "mindfulness and equanimity."

Because jhana is characterized by its effortlessness, attaining this state makes it the perfect taking up contemplation of any object or subject that the observer wishes to examine. The m ease. It is also able to remain fixed and focused on its object without any trouble, and throug bare attention (meaning not conditioned by personal prejudice or biased views), it is able to nature of the phenomenon under observation. This is why the Buddha was so insistent in ex development of absorption among the members of his sangha. It provided a major tool for th wished to put an end to ignorance and thus attain awakening in this very lifetime.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
6/10/12 10:39 PM as a reply to Ian And.
A Practical Look at Jhana Practice — Part One

As Leigh Brasington points out in his piece on "The Jhanas" in the post above, there is very instruction on how to "do" jhana practice in the sutta discourses. Be that as it may, people ha been learning how to practice them for thousands of years. So, they must not be that difficul do. Yet, because these are subtle mind states not easily described nor easily understood by with observation of these subtle mental phenomena, they can be a bit slippery for a beginne

In a practical sense, when just starting out, it is probably best not to think too much about th itself or how to identify which level you are in, but rather to concentrate on inducing the plea sensations necessary to carry one into absorption. You can read through the instructions tha in order to get an idea of how the mind processes these instructions, but your focus should b of meditation (such as the breath) and endeavoring to experience the simple pleasantness ( of the breath.

As far as verifying where you have been in relationship to the instructions, this can be done as you sit and review (contemplate) what just occurred. As your mindfulness becomes stron and months to follow, you will be able to do this review in real time as you are meditating. Bu beginning, it is probably best to keep things simple and to just focus on accomplishing those will allow the mind to relax enough to drop down into absorption.

Many meditators have experienced feeling a sort of pressure in the center of the forehead b brows. This sensation is evidence of the establishment of concentration. If you should be on experiences this phenomenon, once it occurs, you should begin focusing on the pleasantne order to relax and calm the mind even more. As Brasington points out, "by shifting your atter meditation subject to a pleasant sensation, particularly a pleasant physical sensation, and d than not becoming distracted from the pleasant sensation, you will 'automatically' enter the f

At this point in the process, it is probably best not to overwhelm the mind with details about a simpler and less complicated the instruction, the easier it will be for the beginner to enter ab this early stage of the practice, it is probably best just to obtain as much experience as one c able to enter jhana so as to grow confidence in one's ability to achieve this state. Once you h there and are confident of your ability to identify absorption, you'll be able to accomplish it ov again in subsequent sessions without much effort.

The brief three step formula at the end of Brasington's description of the first jhana which ou achieve this level of jhana is probably the best description to pay attention to. I know it helpe better idea of what jhana is and to gain confidence in being able to enter absorption. What w here in this opening instruction is just to gain experience in entering absorption so that you c see and feel what it is, so that you can identify it when it occurs. And whatever helps to get y the beginning, be it a little rough and ragged on the edges, can be refined later as you begin sharpen up your practice.

The hint in the second step about the "positive reinforcement feedback loop" captured my im mind picked it up and ran with it. This suggestion alone can throw you headlong into a prolo
But you have to make certain that it is stable and relatively effortless. You don't want to end

"unmistakeable altered state of consciousness" as is mentioned in the third step (meaning th with everything that Brasington states in his piece). Clarity of awareness, imperturbability pe the sitting practice, and comprehension of the meditation subject is what you want to achiev of consciousness equate to dullness and sluggishness of mind, not mental clarity or brightne want to end up in a trance state. Jhana the way the Buddha practiced and taught it has noth trance states.

One thing you will need to become wary of is becoming too concentrated on the pleasure el absorption. An over saturation of the pleasure factor can also cause a sluggishness of ment creating a dullness of mind. This is the opposite of what you want to ultimately achieve. It is point where the application and establishment of sati (mindfulness) is cultivated to counterac dullness. Actually, sati needs to be cultivated and sustained before attempting to practice ab very inception of the sitting.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 12:59 AM as a reply to Ian And.
A Practical Look at Jhana Practice — Part Two

My practice didn't really begin to take off until I was able to finally bring the mind to stillness quietude. The importance of attaining to mental stillness was only tangentially mentioned wh meditation practice. Most of the emphasis was on performing the meditation technique itself mantra and therefore was not focused on obtaining mental quietude. Since the aspect of me never really emphasized throughout the greater portion of the first twenty years of my practic developed it, and therefore arrived late to the game. Once I realized how important this was
I immediately set out to correct this aspect of my practice.

What does this have to do with being able to attain to meditative absorption? Everything. Th one-pointedness of mind (cittassa-ekaggata) and to focus on a single object is dependent o Concentration is strengthened and increased only when the mind's movement is subdued a present enabling sustained focus. The fourth level of jhana itself is dependent upon there be pervading deep peacefulness and quietude of the mind. It blocks out distracting thought, thu concentration upon the object of meditation. So, mental serenity is crucial to the attainment

There's a difference between a calm mind and a still mind. A calm mind may have a few tho around yet be relatively calm, while a still mind is completely without thought! Although the w often used to indicate tranquility or serenity when associated with samatha meditation, I am specifically to demonstrate a nuanced difference between a relatively calm mind and a still m learn that you can still your mind at will, that can be quite a revelation indeed! It means that y banish all verbal and non-verbal thought from the mind at a moment's notice, which if you've before is quite a feat.

Being able to still the mind at will is very important as contemplation of the dhammas (mean well as those aspects of the Dhamma in the Satipatthana Suttas such as the Five Hindrance Aggregates, the Six Sense Spheres, the Four Noble Truths etc.) is more difficult to achieve w ability. If the mind remains distracted by the "monkey mind" replaying its catalog of thought o you'll spend all your contemplation time attempting to see though the fog being presented by in order to get through to the subjects of the Dhamma.

There are some methods one can use in order to bring the monkey mind into check. One of
I used before I was exposed to Buddhist meditation techniques. The only reason I mention it WORKED. It involves simply telling the mind to STOP whenever mental proliferation begins. telling the mind to STOP will not be effective. You must do it with INTENTION! A serious and INTENTION must be present. It's important to note that it is not necessary to repeat a verba mind, but to saturate each instance when a thought arises with a strong desire or intention to the sheer repetition of this command, with intention, the mind will eventually become harnes method is a direct assault upon the monkey mind in order to subdue it.

When any other thought enters the mind one crushes it with the intentional command to STO determined the perseverance, the better the result. The restless mind begins to give up the s substitute every approaching thought with the command to stop, the periods of absolute quie longer. At first it is only for a few seconds, but with constant practice there come minutes of peace. This method of the direct approach to quieting the mind can be practiced at any time walking down the street, sitting in a bus, in fact all day long whenever the mind is not immed in some necessary mental activity.

You can even use it as you begin meditating, if need be. In this instance, once you have com stop, you simply return to your object of meditation and carry on from there. If another intrud comes along, you tell it to stop, and then immediately return to your meditation object, resum meditation. I know it sounds hokey, but it works.

If you'd rather not use this direct method to subdue the mind, you can follow the traditional B of just bringing the mind back to the meditation object each time you notice that it has straye on the same principle as the method described above, namely with intent. It's just a slightly approaching it. What these methods accomplish are two things at once: it exercises and stre of mindfulness each time you notice the mind has strayed away from the meditation object, your will to maintain control over the direction of the mind. In time, you will discover that a si application of willful intent will stop the wandering mind in its tracks so that you may resume meditation.

As your mindfulness (sati) increases, you will notice that your ability to concentrate has simu increased also. Mindfulness and concentration are close cousins of one another. The differe fact that concentration is generally focused upon a single object for observation, while mindf an open and full-minded awareness of the entire atmosphere in general. Mindfulness is awa physical and mental atmosphere, whereas concentration is generally focused on one or the atmospheres to the exclusion of the other.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 1:09 AM as a reply to Ian And.
A Practical Look at Jhana Practice — Part Three

Throughout the course of this exposition, I wish to share with the reader certain informationa which I have personally found to be of benefit to my education and understanding of this pra they will be of benefit to others here, too.

One of the monastics from whom I have been able to confirm much of what I know is the We Thanissaro Bhikkhu. Geoffrey DeGraff is his given name before he became a monk in the T the mid-1970s. He is widely known and quite popular in some circles, notwithstanding some grown around him in orthodox circles regarding the perceived stance he has taken in certain Dhamma.

All that aside, my reason for introducing him here is that he is a universally recognized mast and has, over the years, written extensively and quite effectively on the subject of Buddhist r Thanissaro was taught meditation by a little known but highly noted Thai teacher, Ajaan Joti turn was a student of the nationally recognized Thai meditation master Ajaan Dhammadharo therefore a highly qualified contemporary source for information about the practice of medita and books are well worth reading and contemplating.

A few years ago, he wrote a short piece about jhana meditation entitled Jhana Not by the Nu piece, he shared some interesting facts about the process of learning meditation, and in part things of which to take heed regarding meditative absorption. Of particular note was the met used to teach him. Ajaan Fuang, although hands on in many respects, mainly taught medita approach. If you read the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of this essay you will see wha up in the sentence: "So as a teacher, he tried to instill in his students these qualities of self-r ingenuity, and a willingness to take risks and test things for themselves."

You will learn more — and will learn it more quickly — if someone takes this approach with y
if someone were to take you by the hand and lead you through the practice step by step. Th two approaches forces the student to actively take responsibility in his own meditative devel learn quickly how to develop mindful awareness in order to keep up with all the observations that he's being asked to keep up with. This not only keeps him engaged with the practice, bu practice from becoming boring or stagnant.

Another point brought up in this piece is the precariousness of practicing jhana. Because of concentration ability of most people's minds in the beginning stages of establishing a practic have a tendency to misapprehend where their practice is taking them. They can get caught u leading them away from the ultimate goal. An example of this can be seen in the section wh moha-samadhi or delusion-concentration. "When you emerge, you find it hard to identify wh focused." This can come about "when the breath gets so comfortable that your focus drifts fr the sense of comfort itself, mindfulness begins to blur and your sense of the body and your s lost in a pleasant haze."

In this pleasant haze, the mind is exposed to a highly suggestive mind state wherein almost can be taken literally for the truth. A person can delude himself into believing almost anythin mind state, which is akin to an hypnotic trance. It is a dull and not a bright and clear state of therefore to be recognized when it occurs and dropped immediately. One way to drop this st your mindful alertness of the internal and external surroundings and to refocus your attentio meditation object (such as the breath) in order to bring the mind out of this state.

What I call establishing mindfulness, Ajaan Fuang calls establishing "all-around awareness." will recognize, regarding the two states of "wrong concentration" discussed toward the end o it is this "all-around awareness of the breath energy throughout the body, playing with it to ga ease, and then calming it so that it [won't] interfere with a clear vision of the subtle movemen mind" that plays a part in subduing these two states of wrong concentration.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 1:14 AM as a reply to Ian And.
A Practical Look at Jhana Practice — Part Four

What does absorption feel like? What does one experience? How do you know when you've anything that is universal about the experience that can be explained so that I can understan

For someone who has never experienced absorption before, these are all very good and imp it should be understood that attempting to write about and describe delicate mind states to th reader with whom one has not personally met and spoken can be difficult if not somewhat pr difficult enough to explain these states in person to someone whose meditation experience i attempting to describe these states to someone who is coming to the practice for the first tim understood by the reader that he should endeavor to get as clear a reference as is possible definitions of the words being used so that he will not misapprehend the concepts being des

Someone who has had some experience with meditation — with observing the phenomena meditation — should in general have a slightly easier time understanding these concepts. Yo still quite easy to miscomprehend a term being used and thus to practice under a misapprehe clear about the terminology and the experiences they refer to is something that becomes ea regular practice. First hand observation of your actual meditation practice is your best teach these points in mind, they will serve you well as you endeavor to understand what you read

With this in mind, let's take a look at a few descriptions of the first four levels of jhana accord way they are presented in the discourses, using some descriptions given by prominent medi well as from our own experience of these factors. The first four levels of jhana practice are th important with regard to the awakening process which takes place in Buddhist mental trainin are fundamentally necessary if one is pursuing what is known as the "wet" approach to awak
the so-called "dry" approach. More on the differences between these two approaches later.

For now, just for a quick and immediate understanding of these terms, the "wet" approach re absorption within the practice in order to strengthen the mind's ability to concentrate on the r subject matter needed for the awakening process to take place, whereas the "dry" approach of the use of absorption for this purpose. "Dry meditators" therefore do not take the time to d jhanas before taking up vipassana meditation subjects, whereas "wet meditators" do develo undertaking insight contemplations.

If one's level of concentration is already strong, he may not need to develop the jhanas in or success in contemplation of the insight subjects. The decision to develop meditative absorpt on a case by case basis. In general, though, most of us are lacking in a really strong skill ba our untrained proficiency at concentration, and therefore need some assistance with develop strengthening this ability. This is where training and development in the practice of absorptio in gaining the necessary skill level needed to be able to maintain our mental focus on an obj uninterrupted for an extended period of time.

In the next sections, we will take a slightly more in-depth look at the first four levels of jhana with an emphasis on endeavoring to understand the fluidity of how quickly the mind can mov breadth that these descriptions cover so as not to be susceptible to a false understanding of

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 1:33 AM as a reply to Ian And.
A Practical Look at Jhana Practice — Part Five

If you have read the two referenced essays on The Jhanas (linked to in an above post) you factors being present in jhana on the first four levels of the attainment. If you have not read t essays, please take some time here and now to do so, as it will be necessary to understand

In Buddhist meditation, the development of concentrative absorption in the case of the first j described in terms of the following five factors:

* directed attention (vitakka)
* sustained attention or examination and evaluation (vicara)
* joy/rapture/elation (piti)
* happiness/pleasure/bliss (sukha)
* equanimity (upekkha)

For simplicity's sake, we will be referring to the jhana factors as they have been outlined wit suttanta (the discourses of the Buddha) as opposed to other sources (principally the comme Visuddhimagga and the extra-canonical Abhidhamma material) within the orthodox Therava definitions of these other sources would only be confusing to the beginning practitioner, as w unnecessary complication to the practice. Those who are interested in exploring these other them up at another time.

You will have noticed that the first two factors present in the first level of jhana are vitakka a
These two Pali terms have been variously translated as "applied thinking," "applied thought, attention," and "directed thought" in reference to the first of these two terms (vitakka); and "s thought," "sustained attention," "discursive thought," "investigation," and "examination and e reference to the second of these two terms (vicara). Yet, what are these two factors referring

The two terms, as Ven. Gunaratana has pointed out in his essay, signify two interconnected aspects of the mental process involved in the pursuit of absorption. Vitakka refers to the min attention and awareness to the principal object of meditation. In anapanasati meditation (mi breathing), this object is the breath. Directing the mind toward the breath, then, in this case, action necessary in order to begin the descent into meditative absorption. The mind must fin object upon which to focus in order for it to begin to become calm and tranquil.

Once the mind has found and become focused upon its object, it then proceeds to "investiga that object, to "sustain" its attention on the object. This "examination" and "evaluation" of the necessary in order to establish the pleasant sensation that will arise once the absorption pro become stronger and grows in strength. Vicara refers to the mind's examination and inspect meditation object for the purpose of extending the awareness of its pleasant components. R

(jhana) is a pleasant experience, and not an unpleasant experience. By attending to the plea breathing process, one can take the mind deeper and deeper into that pleasant experience.

Although this is a process of "letting go" in order to experience the pleasantness of the breat one should not totally let everything go, as retaining mindfulness (sati) of this process then b important. The factor of sati prevents the mind from becoming dull and sluggish, from desce "altered state of consciousness" wherein one is only vaguely aware of his surroundings, both physical. Sati keeps the mind bright and energetic in its awareness of the breath, which allov vicara to do their work of latching onto the object of the breath and introducing the mind to it sensation in which the mind can become absorbed.

Vitakka and vicara are the subtle mental factors which assist the mind in contacting the first
They are the first two aspects of absorption necessary for the mind to begin the process of b in an object. Once the mind becomes absorbed in its object (in this case, the breath), then v can be let go of as they have already completed their work. This letting go of these two jhan the mind to enter the second jhana automatically.

Once the mind becomes absorbed in the meditation object, appana-samadhi or "fixed conce
"unification of mind" on its object), takes over the responsibility of keeping the mind absorbe mind having to make any effort to apply and sustain itself on the object. For simplicity of exp in its infancy appana-samadhi is the "positive reinforcement feedback loop" that Leigh Brasi his piece. In its maturity, this samadhi will be experienced as a mental unification or concent object of meditation.

The first jhana can sometimes pass very quickly once the mind becomes absorbed in its obj further by letting go of vitakka and vicara. The relinquishing of these two factors automatical mind into the second second level of absorption. Once the mind becomes absorbed in an ob of jhana which come afterward can sometimes pass relatively quickly, and oftentimes unnoti meditator.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 1:51 AM as a reply to Ian And.
A Practical Look at Jhana Practice — Part Six

Piti is the third factor present in the first level of jhana. It has been variously defined as "rapt
"joy," "gladness," or "elation." Although it can be a very subtle yet specific joy, piti is associat state of deep tranquility. When it combines with sukha (pleasure, bliss or happiness), the fou factor, these two factors help propel the mind into appana-samadhi, since sukha follows piti

The standard example of piti would be like the gladness or elation experienced by a man wa tired and thirsty, seeking shelter from the sun, when he suddenly comes upon an oasis with pond of clear water. Now, stop for a moment and imagine how you would feel being in such Imagine this circumstance as vividly as you are able to. At the first sight of the oasis, it is piti elation) that arises in the man as he feels contentment at the sight of this object of relief. Su would equate to the actual experiencing of the pleasure of relief of the shade and thirst quen he partakes of these.

In terms of temporal length, when it is acting as a transition between gladness and happines absorption process, piti only lasts a relatively short time, long enough for sukha to arise whe off. In this vein, piti has been compared to varying degrees of interest in an object as desirab expecting to bring happiness, whereas sukha is the happiness itself once the benefit of the o enjoyed. As the meditator makes contact with the desired object, sukha then takes over and Ideally, this is how a healthy absorption occurs. It occurs as something quite natural in the m does it of itself automatically.

On occasion, an unhealthy absorption occurs when piti explodes and is experienced as a st bursts can last as long as ten seconds or more and are an example of gross piti, which shou possible. Leigh Brasington talks about his experience with this phenomenon when it happen retreat. The retreat master immediately told him that this was not helpful, and that he should its emergence.

While this is something to be aware of, it should not frighten away any potential practitioners this type of occurrence is generally rare and usually based upon an exaggerated expectatio practitioner. In nearly 30 years of practice I have never experienced anything close to this de the arising of piti. If the vehicle one uses (such as anapanasati) to access jhana is practiced with mindfulness, absorption should arise quite easily and naturally without any wild after-eff

Once piti has done its job of inducing absorption and has subsided, sukha takes over as the enabling absorption to persist and to deepen. The practitioner does not need to think about s it to do its work. The only thing the practitioner needs to focus on is the smoothing out of the itself. The rest should take care of itself automatically. By "smoothing out" I refer to the proce experiencing inner tranquility combined with the unification of the mind on the pleasantness meditation. As these two factors are experienced, the mind will transition to the third level of sukha, clear awareness (sampajanna), equanimity (upekkha), and mindfulness (sati) are the subsides.

Although pleasant, both piti and sukha are nevertheless agitating factors when it comes to th calming and tranquilizing the mind. The happiness, pleasure or joy of sukha becomes a palp the mind when it is experienced in the mind's journey toward deeper tranquility. Once absorp established, however, this pleasant mental agitation must also fade away if the mind is to re tranquil state needed for it to increase its ability of concentration in the fourth level of jhana.

As sukha subsides, the mind transitions naturally into the fourth level of jhana where equani and mindfulness (sati) remain. This level of absorption is profoundly peaceful. The breath m whisper of which the mind is only fleetingly aware, and the mind is without agitation or ruffle yet it is able to remain firmly fixed on the object of the breath. It is from the level of the fourth that the immaterial jhanas can be accessed and explored, although for awakening's sake, th
The only skill the meditator needs for awakening to occur is the ability to reach the first four even only the first jhana. Anything else is icing on the cake.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 2:17 AM as a reply to Ian And.
How Others Have Experienced Absorption — Part One

What follows in this section are a few of the alternative descriptions of the process of absorp have personally found helpful. They are by no means the only descriptions available, just a f come across in my own struggle to better understand these processes. They reflect commo of understanding the process of absorption with which I am able to confirm from my own exp

This first excerpt I found posted in a Buddhist forum. I've left in the poster's comments at the middle of the post as they seem relevant and instructive to the tone of the post and the ever used by Ajahns Chah and Dhammadaro Lee. Both Ajahn Chah and Ajahn Lee were beloved Dhamma teachers. Among other things, it seems to say: "If simple village women can attain you." The person who posted this, a friend of mine, is a bhikkhu in the Thai Forest Tradition.
~ ~ ~

actually these are also ways of developing pannya (wisdom) by contemplating the ways in w
He didn't make a sharp distinction between samatha and vipassana. For him it was just two practice. Here are some more details from Ajahn Chah:

There may be different phenomena contacting the senses, or thoughts arising. This is called (vitakka). It brings up some idea, be it about the nature of compounded phenomena (sankha or whatever. Once the mind has brought it up, the mind will want to get involved and merge object that is wholesome, then let the mind take it up. If it is something unwholesome, stop it
If it is something wholesome, then let the mind contemplate on it, and gladness, satisfaction will come about. The mind will be bright and clear as the breath goes in and out, these initial appear, and the mind takes them up. Then it becomes discursive thought (vicara). The mind with the object, exerting itself and merging with it. At this point, there is no sleepiness.

After an appropriate period of this, take your attention back to the breath. Then as you contin will be the initial thought and discursive thought, initial thought and discursive thought. If you contemplating skillfully on an object such as the nature of sankhara, then the mind will exper tranquility, and rapture is born. There is the vitakka and vicara, and that leads to happiness this time, there won't be any dullness or drowsiness. The mind won't be dark if we practice li be gladdened and enraptured.

This rapture will start to diminish and disappear after a while, so you can take up the initial th
The mind will become firm and certain with it, undistracted. Then you go on to discursive tho mind becoming one with it. When you are practicing a meditation that suits your temperame then whenever you take up the object, rapture will come about, the hairs of the body standin enraptured and satiated.

When it's like this, there can't be any dullness or drowsiness. You won't have any doubts. Ba between initial and discursive thought, initial and discursive thought, over and over again, an comes. Then there is bliss (sukha). ...

Q: Are vitakka and vicara the same?

A.Chah: You're sitting and suddenly the thought of someone pops into your head-that's vitak thought. Then you take that idea of the person and start thinking about them (in detail). Vitak it up, vicara is investigating it. For example, we pick up the idea of death, and then we start it: "I will die, others will die, every living being will die, when they die where will they go…? " stop! Stop and bring it up again. When it gets running like that, stop it again, then go back to of the breath. Sometimes the discursive thought will wander off and not come back, so you h

Keep at it until the mind is bright and clear.

If you practice vicara with an object that you are suited to, you may experience the hairs of y standing on end, tears pouring from your eyes, a state of extreme delight, many different thi comes.

Q: Can this happen with any kind of thinking, or is it in a state of tranquility that it happens?

A.Chah: It’s when the mind is tranquil. It’s not ordinary mental proliferation. You sit with a ca then the initial thought comes. For example, I think of my brother who just passed away. Or some other relatives. This is when the mind is tranquil - the tranquility isn’t something certai moment the mind is tranquil. After this initial thought comes, then I go into discursive though line of thinking that’s skillful and wholesome, it leads to ease of mind and happiness, and the rapture, with its attendant experiences. This rapture came from the initial and discursive thin place in a state of calmness. We don’t have to give it names such as first jhana, second jhan
We just call it tranquility.

The next factor is bliss (sukha). Eventually, we drop the initial and discursive thinking as tran deepens. Why is that? The state of mind is becoming more refined and subtle. Vitakka and v coarse, and they will vanish. There will remain just the rapture, accompanied by bliss and on mind. And when it reaches full measure, there won’t be anything - (there is equanimity, and) empty. That’s absorption concentration (appana samadhi).

We don’t need to fixate or dwell on any of these experiences. They will naturally progress fro next. At first there are initial and discursive thought, rapture, bliss, and one-pointedness. The discursive thinking are thrown off, leaving rapture, bliss, and one-pointedness. Rapture is th scriptures usually say, “with the fading of rapture…”), then bliss, and finally only one-pointed equanimity remain. It means the mind is becoming more and more tranquil, and its objects a decreasing, until there is nothing but one-pointedness and equanimity. (From 'Everything is It's true that in some Suttas the Buddha mentions an intermediate state called "avitakka vica directed thought and a little bit of evaluation). I would see that as staying with the theme of n not wandering elsewhere, but there still being the need to move the attention around the the ("becoming familiar with it"). It's a kind of rippling of the mind, it's not perfectly still. That com later, when the preliminary work has been done, and it's a natural result of that.

Ajahn [Dhammadaro] Lee has a nice description of this process:

Directed thought (vitakka) - focusing on the breath without getting distracted - is like planting
Evaluation (vicara) is like loosening the soil around the roots, giving it fertilizer, and watering the roots to the topmost branches. The body, which can be compared to the soil, will soften, fertilizer and water to penetrate down to the roots. Rapture is like the tree's being fresh and bursting into bloom. (There are five kinds of rapture: (1) an unusual sense of heaviness or li body; (2) a sense of the body floating; (3) a sense of coolness or heat; (4) a sense of thrill pa the surface of the body; (5) the body beginning to sway.) Pleasure means stillness of body a Hindrances. Singleness of preoccupation means being neutral toward other things, perfectly preoccupation. This is what the Buddha was referring to when he said that concentration ma of great benefit, great rewards.

The factors of jhana -- directed thought, evaluation, rapture, and pleasure -- all have to be ga breath if you want to reach singleness of preoccupation. Directed thought is like laying claim land. Evaluation is like planting it with seed. When the seed bears fruit, that's rapture and ple

Keeping awareness with the breath is directed thought. Knowing the characteristics of the br evaluation. Spreading the breath so that it permeates and fills the entire body is rapture. The serenity and well-being in body and mind is pleasure. When the mind is freed from the Hindr one with the breath, that's singleness of preoccupation. All of these factors of jhana turn min factor of Awakening.

Spreading the breath, letting all the breath sensations spread throughout all the elements an body -- the blood vessels, the tendons, etc. -- is like cutting a system of connecting roads th wilderness. Any country with a good system of roads is bound to develop, because commun

Gavesako

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 2:29 AM as a reply to Ian And.
How Others Have Experienced Absorption — Part Two

If you go to some of the more reputable Buddhist forums (E-Sangha being one of them), you exchanges between practitioners regarding a difference of opinion over the depth of concen for meditation to reach samadhi (and thus the first jhana), and whether or not certain phenor present during that depth. This can be confusing if you are new to this practice, and can cau regarding what one can reasonably expect to find at the various levels of jhana while practic

The reason for the difference of opinion arises from the fact that within the "modern" Therav there are basically two main positions regarding the practice of absorption. One, following th tradition (the Visuddhimagga, the Patisambhidamagga* etc.), asserts that jhana, once reach level on, excludes physical sensations such a sounds from cognition. The second position, f suttanta (the traditional Buddhist canon of Pali discourses), does not make such statements regarding the first three material (rupa) jhanas during samatha practice, except that such ex understood at the deeper levels of absorption — from the fourth rupa jhana in samatha prac four immaterial (arupa) jhanas.

In my own practice of samatha jhana, I noticed that sound was cognizable through the first t absorption, but that at times when the mind became absorbed in the fourth level that there w difference. That difference had to do with the inability of the mind to become distracted from even though sound might be heard. The sound was external, but in no way disturbed the int
In these tranquil states of mind, sense contact may be quickly noted by the mind, but that no extent of the disturbance as the mind immediately returns to the object of meditation. It's bar ripple on the mind's smooth and calm surface. Ajahn Chah has stated quite clearly that:

"In appana samadhi the mind calms down and is stilled to a level where it is at its most sub
Even if you experience sense impingement from the outside, such as sounds and physical s external and is unable to disturb the mind. You might hear a sound, but it won't distract your

Such an experience in no way excludes sound from the early stages of the classical absorpt another account, Ajahn Chah recounts an experience he once had while staying in a forest m

"I once stayed in a forest monastery that was half a mile from a village. One night the village celebrating with a loud party as I was walking meditation. It must have been after 11:00 pm a a bit peculiar. I'd been feeling strange like this since midday. My mind was quiet. There were thoughts. I felt very relaxed and at ease. I did walking meditation until I was tired and then w my grass-roofed hut. As I sat down I barely had time to cross my legs before, amazingly, my to delve into a profound state of peace. It happened all by itself. As soon as I sat down, the m truly peaceful. It was rock solid. It wasn't as if I couldn't hear the noise of the villagers singin dancing - I still could - but I could also shut the sound out entirely."

The statement he makes at the end — that he could "also shut the sound out entirely" — sa capability of a tranquil mind. Later on he makes the following statement: "Then I understood unifies in samadhi, if you direct your attention outward you can hear, but if you let it dwell in emptiness then it's perfectly silent." These descriptions agree with my own experience of thi

*Note: The Visuddhimagga and the Patisambhidamagga are ancient commentarial expositio during the early first millennium.

Note: Appana means the directing or fixing of the one-pointed consciousness on an object developed form of vitakka - initial application of the mind, one of the jhana factors. Thus "ap means "fixed samadhi," or "full or complete concentration" which is the concentration level e absorption jhana.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 2:48 AM as a reply to Ian And.
How Others Have Experienced Absorption — Part Three

There are several reputable meditation teachers within the Theravada tradition to learn from or spoken about the steps or stages necessary for the attainment of absorption. Among thes prominent contemporary figures within the tradition: the Thai meditation master Ajahn Chah 1992), the American master Thanissaro Bhikkhu (Geoffrey DeGraff, b. 1949-), and the Engl Brahmavamso (Peter Betts, b. 1951-).

For those who are unfamiliar, Ajahn Brahmavamso, an Englishman who goes by the shorter a student of the Thai master Ajahn Chah for nine years before being asked to assist in estab monastery near Perth, Western Australia in 1983, where he is now the the spiritual director o Society of Western Australia. Thanissaro Bhikkhu, an American who travelled to Thailand in Ajahn Fuang Jotiko until the latter's death in 1986, helped established the Metta Forest Mon

Center, California in 1990 where he is currently its abbot.

As one might imagine, each of these meditation masters, having come from different training perspectives, might have occasion to be varied in their explanations about the process of m since one, Ajahn Brahm, was a student of the other, Ajahn Chah, you might tend to think tha describe absorption in a similar way. But this is not necessarily the case. Thanissaro Bhikkh comes closer to Ajahn Chah's descriptions of the practice of jhana than does his own studen does not mean that two of these masters are right and the third is wrong when looking at the It just points out that different people perceive things in different ways. It is up to us, as indiv practitioners, to decide which description best fits our own perception of the experience.

In the 2004 Fall issue of Buddhadharma magazine, Ajahn Brahmavamso published an exce included descriptions of the practice of jhana absorption. Toward the end of that article there following paragraph:

"Another feature of jhana is that it occurs only after the nimitta is discerned as described abo Furthermore, you should know that while in any jhana it is impossible to experience the body pain), hear a sound from outside or produce any thoughts, not even “good” thoughts. There singleness of perception, an experience of nondualistic bliss that continues unchanging for a This is not a trance but a state of heightened awareness. This is said so that you may know whether what you take to be a jhana is real or imaginary."

What is of particular note in the above paragraph are the passages which are underscored. paragraph, one might come away with the impression that according to Ajahn Brahm, true a which excludes certain perceptions of phenomena altogether, and that unless one's absorpt that one is truly not experiencing absorption according to Ajahn Brahm's mind map. Howeve view without question or further examination may lead one into a possible confusion regardi is. To his credit he does qualify that this state is not a trance. Yet curiously, he contradicts hi calling it a "state of heightened awareness" without identifying the nature of the subject of wh aware. If one is not aware of the body, sounds or thoughts, of what, exactly, is one's awaren Curiously, he doesn't say.

On the one hand, Ajahn Brahm seems to be asserting that unless one's absorption reaches (the total exclusion of all sense impingement from the outside or the inside), then it is not tru And yet even his own teacher, Ajahn Chah states quite clearly that: "In appana samadhi the is stilled to a level where it is at its most subtle and skilful. Even if you experience sense imp from the outside, such as sounds and physical sensations, it remains external and is unable mind. You might hear a sound, but it won't distract your concentration." The appana samadh unification of mind, that he is speaking about is, generally speaking, equivalent to the first fo jhana.

In an interview which Thanissaro Bhikkhu did with Richard Shankman for his book The Expe
In-Depth Exploration of Buddhist Meditation, Thanissaro mentions: "There are also states of sensory input is not totally cut off, but it doesn't intrude on the mind. With these states there' ability to observe what's going on in the jhana while you're still in it. It's a little like the first jha piggybacking on the other jhanas, because you can evaluate what's going on and you can s stress, what you're doing that's causing the stress, and you can see how you can drop that p activity." Here, Ajahn Thanissaro states what Ajahn Brahm neglects to state: that what is hei awareness of what is going on in the jhana while you're still in it, meaning that insight is poss one is in the kind of jhana experience described by Ajahn Thanissaro.

So, who is telling it like it is? In my experience, I have experience both scenarios, although n exact same context or circumstance. And it is a good thing that I have, since if I had blindly a Brahm's definition of jhana, my mind might not have been open to the possibility of Ajahn Ch Thanissaro's) definition as also being true. Can both these descriptions be true? Well, yes th me explain how. The difference comes about because of the different circumstances of bein

Under one scenario, in cultivating tranquility, when the goal of the meditation is calmness (sa effort to cultivate deeper and deeper levels of calmness, the mind is able to dive so deeply w that all exterior phenomena (sound, touch, and smell in particular) can be drown out from the perception of them. Within the so-called ninth jhana, "the cessation of perception and feeling (sannavedayita-nirodha, also known by the designation nirodha-samapatti), mind's ability to anything has temporarily ceased and a profound peacefulness or lack of any movement (me whatsoever is what is recalled once the meditator returns to normal consciousness from this circumstance, this is taking samatha practice to its ultimate limits, that is, there is nothing els experience beyond "the cessation of perception and feeling."

Under the second scenario, in cultivating insight (vipassana), when the goal of the meditatio one of the themes of the Dhamma, the mind in samadhi, in focusing upon the chosen Dham maintain its focus upon the subject despite any disturbance from an exterior phenomenon su the mind in samadhi is focusing on an insight theme it can be aware of disturbances from th remaining unified upon its subject. The awareness of the outside disturbance in no way inter unification of the mind on its meditation subject. It is as though this awareness of the disturb on the periphery of one's attention, just as when one is visually focused upon an object and periphery another object.

Now, to be perfectly fair, Ajahn Brahm would likely deny that the circumstance that he was s involved "the cessation of perception and feeling" or the ninth jhana. As he clearly states in t quotation he is referring to "any jhana" and not just one specific level of jhana. One possible seeming dilemma might be found in Thanissaro Bhikkhu's writings wherein he echos the ser suttas that "some develop strong powers of concentration before developing strong discernm gain a sound theoretical understanding of the Dhamma before developing strong concentrat both strong concentration and sound discernment are needed to bring about Awakening."

This explanation would seem to infer that perhaps Ajahn Brahm's interpretation of his discer as well developed as he thinks. Whether or not one accepts this explanation, it certainly serv way to explain the difference between the perception of the master (Ajahn Chah) on the one perception of his student (Ajahn Brahm) on the other.

As for myself, I have always been taught to observe my own experience of any phenomenon nothing else. My experience tells me that the possibility of sense impingement is present in a four jhanas, unlike Ajahn Brahm's unyielding assertion above, and that the essence of Ajahn Thanissaro's statements are correct: that any sense disturbance from the outside remains e unable to distract the mind's concentration.

As Thanissaro Bhikkhu stated further on in the interview: "When you're fully into even this so particularly from the second one up, you're not going to be doing any thinking or evaluating a can pull back a little bit without destroying that state, because it's not totally dependent on bl all outside input." This also accords with my experience of jhana.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 1:41 PM as a reply to Ian And.
How Others Have Experienced Absorption — Part Four

Three or four years ago, when my practice was more intense and I was meditating a minimu day, I spent a great deal of time on the Internet discussing in forums various fine points of th with other accomplished practitioners. What I'd like to present in this segment is a collage of personal perspectives which I think may be helpful to those who are looking at the practice o the first time and seeking some footholds to hang onto.

There's really nothing that competes with personal experience when it comes to being able t discuss these subtle states of mind. In other words, reading the descriptions without having and being able to discern the phenomena being discussed will be next to useless for most re understand these descriptions, you have to have had some experience with these states wit the experience of others.

This first perspective is one given by Thanissaro Bhikkhu in his book Wings to Awakening. It here first because it describes the first stages of the absorption experience. Absorption or sa are not such esoteric terms that they should frighten or scare people away on account of be to attain or to understand. Once you have an idea what it is about, then it becomes a more a If you've ever caught yourself in a reverie absorbed in a book or watching TV or playing a vi contemplating outdoor nature and suddenly been brought back to reality by a loud noise or s disturbance, then you have an idea what absorption is all about. It's when the mind becomes object or an activity wherein the mind is pleasantly blinded to everything but the subject of its In many instances, there is a pleasant sensation which accompanies absorption, which may depending on the individual.

One important point to take hold of here is that the jhana state can be induced to occur by th Consider the following passage from the Atthakanagara Sutta (MN 52):

"Venerable Ananda, has any one thing been proclaimed by the Blessed One who knows and fully enlightened, wherein if a bhikkhu abides diligent, ardent, and resolute, his unliberated m be liberated, his undestroyed taints come to be destroyed, and he attains the supreme secu that he had not attained before?"

"Yes, householder, one such thing has been proclaimed by the Blessed One."

"What is that one thing, venerable Ananda?"

"Here, householder, quite secluded from sensual pleasures, secluded from unwholesome st upon and abides in the first jhana, which is accompanied by applied and sustained thought, pleasure born of seclusion. He considers this and understands it thus: 'This first jhana is con volitionally produced. . . .' "

What Ananda is saying here, in echo of the Buddha, is that through an intentional action (ce absorption can be brought on at will! How this can be accomplished is described in the link b section from Thanissaro's book Mind Like Fire Unbound. This isn't the only way that absorpt on; rather, the simile is used in order to suggest one way in particular. One can use just abo experience to help in bringing on this state.

Thanissaro: "The singleness of jhana means not only that awareness is focused on a single that the object is reduced to a single quality that fills the entirety of one's awareness, at the s that one's awareness broadens to suffuse the entire object. This mutual pervasion of awaren state of expansion is what is meant by absorption. The similes used to illustrate the various repeatedly make mention of "expansion," "suffusing," "stretching," and "filling" [§150; also M 82-85], culminating in the fourth jhana where one's body is filled with a bright sense of aware sense of expansion and making-single is also indicated in passages that teach specific med
The directions for keeping the breath in mind, for instance, state that one should be sensitive body while breathing in and out. This accounts for the term "mahaggata" — enlarged or exp describe the mind in the state of jhana. . . ."

"For the purpose of getting into jhana, though, the most interesting passages in the Canon a analogies: the bath man, the lotuses in the lake, the man covered with white cloth."

Thanissaro's translation of this section of the Canon (regarding the bath man, the lotuses in is in his book Mind Like Fire Unbound. It begins at the section titled "Habits & practices." If y trouble finding the first jhana, the instruction found here can help to jumpstart the experience that there is enough ability to manipulate your sense of conscious awareness so as to follow as they lead you into the correct amount of mental unification on the sensations involved wit absorption. If you are finding it difficult to keep the instruction in mind as you go through this this usually indicates a lack of mindfulness, the necessary first ingredient for establishing an
In such a case, it is probably best to just practice anapanasati for a while in order to build up mindfulness before attempting to practice absorption.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 3:17 AM as a reply to Ian And.
How Others Have Experienced Absorption — Part Five

One of the more experienced practitioners I have conversed with on the forums is a Canadia Schatz. He is a very dedicated and highly accomplished meditator. What follows are some c jhana which should dovetail nicely with what Ajahn Thanissaro has written.

Geoff Schatz: "The mind reaches a level of stillness in the second jhana which it realizes is r than applied thought and discursive examination. This is a very refined state of mental unific and the mind is calm and serene like the still surface of a pond. Once in a while there may b but the surface mind is calm and silent for the most part and any momentary ripples are eas because the mind is unified with the support object (the entire internal felt sense of the body see "The Four Jhanas" section of MN 119: Kayagata-sati Sutta which gives vivid similes for jhana, which can be incorporated with anapanasati).

"One could still think if one needed to, this is a state of full expansive awareness where the r internal felt sense of the body are unified. The mind is settled and is not intentionally suppre settled, silent mind just knows that this is a satisfying state. When I'm in retreat my mind rem stage of inner silence most of the time, and continues to remain largely silent for days or eve afterward. I've been told that eventually this inner silence becomes a permanent state — the attaining deep stages of jhana and also formless and cessation attainments are what aid the this inner silence (as well as essential ethical conduct and discernment — sila, samadhi, and to be integrated). . . .

"The jhanas are entered in the set sequence of first, second, third, and fourth jhana. You wo skip over any stage in order to get to the next higher stage. Of course over time and especia a lot, one can enter into the deeper jhanas quickly. And I've also found (and this has been c others) that over the years the level of initial piti-sukha becomes more refined and subtle, an mind are either already at a level of pliancy when one sits down, or else pliancy is easily atta sitting, which is essential for piti-sukha. Also, it's possible for experiences of bliss to occur ev the first jhana, but if one just disregards them they will eventually subside.

"The mind is a complex system—the most complex system in the universe—and it is variabl precise way that it is going to settle down for every individual or even any particular individua every time.

"The four jhanas are basically four stages of an increasingly unified state of samadhi. (I like pebble descending through the depths of a pond.) The four levels of jhana are just signposts present at each deepening stage. But the thing is that these are just general stages, and be individual is unique there can be variations on this basic archetypal model of mental unificati "the four jhanas." I think it's more important to just continue to practice and not be too worrie exactly which stage we are at at any given point while practicing."

What is interesting about these quotations are the valuable hints that they provide to the ale the second paragraph, for example, the underscored section lets us know that frequent prac helps increase mental silence, which is something that I too have noticed. It also helps to inc concentration and mindfulness. While this won't necessarily happen overnight, it is somethin to and something which should stir interest and diligence in us as practitioners of meditation

The only statement (not made by Geoff, but one he reported on) that I have to disagree with regarding the "inner silence" becoming "a permanent state." I do agree that it can become m not in one's experience. But "permanent," no. However, to be fair, this may only be a differe perception and differing connotations of the word "permanent" as it's being used in this state that people do not understand about the statement by the Buddha that "Sabbe sankharas ar sankharas (conditioned formations) are impermanent." It should be clear from this that what that has been formed or compounded, all formations or compounded things are impermane clearly echoed again and again throughout the suttas as in the Atthakanagara Sutta (MN 52 quoting the Buddha, explicitly states that: "But whatever is conditioned and volitionally produ impermanent, subject to cessation." Since mental silence is a conditional formation, it too is Although it is not beyond one's ability to set up the right conditions for its arising or of being personally induce its arising once the mind becomes disturbed by discursive thought. In that able to agree that it can certainly seem to be permanent.

Not only is there support for this stance within the discourses, but there is support within one experience. Often are the times when I have lamented to myself about the impermanence o formations. I had once thought, based upon a few observations made of highly trained peop be some metaphysical trick that one can learn which allows a person to maintain their mindf uninterrupted, the continuity never seeming to be broken. But then I recalled having observe people at other times when their mindfulness was broken; as well I have observed instances when mindfulness is at a low ebb the mind can be led into heedlessness, unless I intentiona sati. This is especially true the older I become.

If you wish to maintain your mindfulness, you have to work at it with diligence. The same is t silence to a certain degree. Yet, that work is made infinitely easier once one figures out how practice absorption. Since the breath is always with us, and if we learn how to volitionally pr jhana, then our contact with the breath leaves us but a step away from inducing an intense l concentration and mindfulness. By shifting our attention to the breath, one can induce the fir fixed concentration) in waking consciousness. And by maintaining a modicum of attention or thereafter, this heightened sense of concentration and mindfulness stays with us for the dura we are able to perform this function and maintain our awareness of it.

The third paragraph provides the hint that over time, the way one perceives the speed at wh enter absorption changes as we become more familiar with the state. In my own practice I n that I was able to enter jhana within five minutes of sitting down to meditate; and later on I le could enter them within one to two minutes of sitting. The speed at which one can enter abs with the increased levels of mindfulness (sati) and concentration (cittassa ekaggata, or one-mind) which develops over time as one regularly practices absorption. And if one is attentive of being able to enter the jhana state, one can at any time simply concentrate on the breath meditation object one uses) in order to calm and tranquilize the mind at any time during one This, of course, also increases one's level of concentration and mindfulness in those momen focused upon. It is an example of being able to bring on increased mindfulness at will.

Also in the third paragraph, we learn that the initial intensity of piti/sukha can become more subtle as one's practice progresses. This, too, is something I have noticed in my practice. Pi have often given me pause for contemplation as they can sometimes be difficult to identify.
little hint about them helped to assure me that I was not losing my discernment of these fact learning how to discern their subtle arising. The use of the word "pliancy" in his comment ref access to the conditions necessary for these factors to arise. When you know how to bring pleasant sensation of the breath, for example, then you know how to set up the conditions fo arising.

The fifth paragraph lets us know that there are no hard and fast rules regarding the stages o arises. That this experience can vary according to the perception of the practitioner. What is the meditator to realize is that whatever model he uses, the impression of tranquility, pleasa sensation, and mental unification upon an object or subject of meditation is a universal expe absorption. And that however one internally is able to come to these realizations is what is i that they fit any particular mental model that we might have pre-conditioned ourselves to exp

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 3:22 AM as a reply to Ian And.
The Practical Use of Jhana Within One's Practice — Part One

The model used by the Buddha for the development of wisdom entailed the enactment of tw the mind and then develop clear seeing. The whole basis for the path that he promulgated e development of these two simple qualities. In one sutta he referred metaphorically to these t
"swift pair of messengers" who would deliver their message of reality (nibbana) to the lord o (consciousness) and then leave by the route by which they had arrived (the Noble Eightfold pair of messengers" was his designation for serenity (samatha) and insight (vipassana).

Many modern students of the Dhamma have been taught that there are two separate medita taught by the Buddha as vehicles for awakening. One is samatha (calm or tranquility) medita and the other is vipassana (insight or clear seeing) meditation. The view that these are two s of meditation, however, is only true of a certain modern approach to the training, which itself by Buddhist meditation masters in southeast Asia, ostensibly on the premise of making the p their students to comprehend. This view has been spread to the West piggybacked on the s influential Western meditation teachers who received their introduction and training in Buddh Asian countries like Burma, Sri Lanka, and Thailand. Incredibly, the division of these two qua meditation into two entirely separate meditation systems does not receive any support from themselves, which remain the most authoritative source for information on practice. The disc student to develop calm and clear seeing together as one process and not necessarily as se

As one classically trained Western monk has written in his essay One Tool Among Many: Th in Buddhist Practice, Thanissaro Bhikkhu points out that there are many passages in the dis two qualities are yoked together and how they are seen to complement one another:

"Another passage (A.X.71) recommends that anyone who wishes to put an end to mental de addition to perfecting the principles of moral behavior and cultivating seclusion — be commi and endowed with vipassana. This last statement is unremarkable in itself, but the same dis the same advice to anyone who wants to master the jhanas: be committed to samatha and e
This suggests that, in the eyes of those who assembled the Pali discourses, samatha, jhana all part of a single path. Samatha and vipassana were used together to master jhana and th — were developed even further to give rise to the end of mental defilement and to bring rele suffering. This is a reading that finds support in other discourses as well."

In Ven. Thanissaro's essay he mentions that samatha is said to be a method which fosters s mental calm, called absorption or jhana. And that vipassana is said to use the development for the practice of moment-to-moment mindfulness on the impermanence of events as they a present moment. Through this practice of mindfulness — epitomized by the practice of satip literally means "the establishment of mindfulness" — a sense of dispassion toward all events the mind, leading to a release from suffering. Indeed, this was all the Buddha ever claimed t system of training to accomplish, as he often stated that: "Formerly and also now, I make kn and the cessation of suffering."

In the next section, we will examine briefly how samatha and vipassana — or calm and clea used to work together toward the ending of the mental effluents which cause suffering. Whil qualities of mind can be taught as separate systems of development, it really makes no sens that way as they are so closely related that the mind will naturally incline toward their combin the process of unbinding.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 3:30 AM as a reply to Ian And.
The Practical Use of Jhana Within One's Practice — Part Two

It may be fair to say that the majority of modern Buddhist practitioners, in the beginning at le process of calming the mind to be the most difficult feat to accomplish. And therefore it seem suppose that the Buddha taught this skill first before having his students undertake the more gathering insight once the mind has thus settled into serenity. Yet, a close reading of the dis that this was not always the case. What the discourses reveal is a concerted effort on the Bu teach serenity and clear seeing together whenever possible, and to let the student's natural toward one or the other of these two qualities of mind guide the direction of their practice.

The flexibility of this method is revealed in a passage from the Yuganaddha Sutta describing which serenity and clear seeing are utilized in working together, leading to ending of the pas ignorance that make up suffering. Either serenity practice precedes clear seeing, clear seein serenity, or they both develop back to back at the same time. This isn't as complicated as it seem. The mind is an incredibly flexible and complex process which is able to adapt to a var with ease. It is this incredible fluidity of range that the mind possesses which allows it to be a this.

In order for the mind to know when serenity is present, it must be able to discern or recogniz the case. On the other hand, in order for it to be able to see clearly, it must be relatively caln ease. All it takes is a few crucial mind-moments in either of these states for it to be able to c of these two determinations. In other words, even in a fluctuating situation (between calm ar circumstances) when the mind is not totally calm in all moments, in those moments when it i to see clearly. And in those fleeting moments when it is able to see clearly, it is able to ident factors which assist it in becoming calm. This is how it learns how to identify such abstract experience/conceptions such as jhana (or absorption) or how the five aggregates work toge illusion of a personality.

Integral with the effort to teach serenity is the encouragement of the practice of sila (virtue o The importance of sila cannot be stressed enough. Its practice is the foundation for a practic (samatha). Without a clear conscience, mental calm in contemplation and meditation will be by. A guilty conscience can be a hotbed of mental agitation. If a person is lying, cheating, st whatever, these actions can weigh on the mind, distracting it from being able to calm down v meditation. If an individual is having a difficult time being able to calm the mind during medit one of the first places they should look in self examination in order to determine the source c disturbance.

So, while a practitioner may start with a practice in samatha in order to help calm the mind s be able to develop clear seeing (vipassana) and not become distracted by thoughts unrelate subject, the quality of seeing clearly is also at work, assisting the mind to recognize how it is achieve tranquility. This process can also be reversed, with the practitioner beginning with a clear seeing in order to figure out how to calm the mind through correcting ignorance. In eith the mind knows how to achieve the goal it is aiming at — for example, serenity — it can mor that goal in order to proceed with the development of the second quality of clear seeing, who removing mental defilements and correcting ignorance. In this way, serenity and clear seein working together in anyone's practice.

Top Top

Ian And

Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
11/11/10 11:02 AM as a reply to Ian And.
The Practical Use of Jhana in One's Practice — Part Three

The ingenuity of the Buddha's method is that it works simultaneously with the cultivation of e main ingredients of the path of development that he recommended. Concentration (unificatio samadhi) is achieved in serenity (samatha) training. This is the quality of mind that allows it t one-pointedly on an object. Right Concentration (samma samadhi; the eighth step of the No is achieved with proper discernment or clear seeing into the true nature of phenomena and e with the other seven path factors of the Noble Eightfold Path; in other words, with proper min wise or appropriate attention (yoniso manasikara) contextualized within the noble eightfold p Mindfulness (sati) is achieved with the ability to maintain awareness of the present moment, by strong concentration and the practice of satipatthana. Right Mindfulness (samma sati; the the Noble Eightfold Path) is achieved through the practice and maintenance of "the four esta mindfulness" (cattaro satipatthana) on form, feeling, mind states, and mind objects (phenom is mindful of these four areas of observation is able to correct any misapprehension that mig conditioning as long as Right View is present.

Integral to the establishment of both concentration and mindfulness is samadhi (and/or jhana of calm and concentration experienced in samadhi (and absorption samadhi) are transferred from meditative contemplation to ordinary states of conscious awareness once formal medit allows the mind to remain in a profound inner peaceful state of serenity called passaddhi, or tranquility. This state of passaddhi, when combined with Right View and Right Thought, is w to "see things as they really are." Although this state is only temporary due to the impermana nature, its duration can be extended or can be re-established once it has subsided as long a active. Sati, that is, in the sense of mindful awarenesss or recollection of the object of aware object which for purposes of this example is the breath.

The breath is a perfect object for maintaining tranquility induced by sati because one can be mindful of the breath even while other events are actively capturing the mind's attention. Alth may not be fully focused on the breath in the foreground (as it generally is during a formal m session), the fact that it remains mindful of the breath in the background allows the continuit inner tranquility (passaddhi) to continue unimpeded during ordinary consciousness. The abil feat is aided and strengthened by the practice of deep levels of absorption (jhana) during for which in turn helps to develop stronger levels of concentrative ability outside of formal medit words, the mind is not straining to maintain mindfulness of the breath during these moments able with ease to remain undistracted by the actions of outer events or inner thoughts in the maintaining its background focus upon the breath.

The practice which makes all this possible is the practice of absorption. Jhana is thus used a the mind in the cultivation of the qualities of concentration and mindfulness. Without a practi absorption, the mind, in many instances, would be hard pressed to be able to maintain mind concentration in the wake of the many distractions and stimulations that impede upon it on a momentary basis. A mind that is "concentrated, purified and cleansed, unblemished, free fro malleable, workable, established, and having gained imperturbability" is able, at will, to over five hindrances (in particular, sloth and torpor and restlessness and worry in addition to sens will, and skeptical doubt). It is therefore less likely to become distracted from its subject of ap attention.

As Thanissaro Bhikkhu has written: "Mindfulness is what keeps the perspective of appropria mind. Modern psychological research has shown that attention comes in discrete moments. to something for only a very short period of time and then you have to remind yourself, mom to return to it if you want to keep on being attentive. In other words, continuous attention—th observe things over time—has to be stitched together from short intervals. This is what mind keeps the object of your attention and the purpose of your attention in mind."

Mundane concentration and mindfulness are qualities of mind that are absolutely necessary mind to be able to respond appropriately when having to make determinations. In a practica establishing and nurturing concentration and mindfulness you stay with unpleasant things no them, but to watch and to understand them. Once you've clearly seen that a particular qualit or lust) is harmful for the mind, you are able to see that it must be abandoned if you wish to skillful qualities. You are presented with an opportunity to make whatever effort is needed to or that quality and to nourish skillful qualities in its place by bringing in other factors of the pa Right Intention and Right Action.

In being able to recognize that tranquility and clear seeing are used together to master jhana is used to strengthen tranquility and clear seeing, we are able to confirm for ourselves from experience how samatha and vipassana are utilized together rather than as separate practic obvious to us, then, that the practice of the one enhances the practice of the other. It's all ab the mind to settle down so that it may be used to get to the bottom of things — to see them a and not as we may have been conditioned to see them.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 3:55 AM as a reply to Ian And.
The Practical Use of Jhana in One's Practice — Part Four

Inevitably, the question arises: "How does one switch from samatha to vipassana in the mid It's really quite easy; it can literally happen in the blink of an eye! That's how quickly the aler move. As long as sati is established, it just takes changing one's focus from the breath to a s insight. One directs the mind to, for instance, the theme of one's feeling or to observing the s (whether it is with or without anger, lust or whatever) or to whatever other subject matter one observe to gain more insight. It's just a matter of making the determination and doing it. All t (or can happen) within a state of absorption.

Many are taught that absorption, real absorption, is supposed to be an all-consuming activity to practice vipassana one must first surmount (or come out of) the practice of absorption in o switch from calm to insight practice. If you've been following along with this series of brief es you know that nothing could be further from the truth. Insight can take place within absorptio can remain in the background while the subject of insight is focused upon and examined in t it takes is but a slight adjustment of the mind, and wah-lah, the switch is made.

The only thing that changes is that the mind switches from a focus on deepening levels of tra directing thought and investigation toward a different theme (insight into the Four Noble Trut or into the nature of the five aggregates). For people to say that this is not possible within th state is just not supported by personal experience or by the discourses. True, one may have from the fourth jhana and reestablish directed thought and examination from the first jhana.
occurs naturally and automatically within the mind without any fuss or strenuous effort, and n is not inconsistent with what is described in the discourses.

In order to make this switch in focus happen, a significant level of mindfulness must have be present in the mind. Without sati and without perhaps having beforehand established an insi observation, the mind can find it difficult to change from the pleasant object sensation of a p contemplation of the breath to another subject. Observing the peacefulness of the breath ca and relaxing experience that one can become inescapably caught up in it. It may serve as a from whatever chaos we've had to endure during our normal everyday life, and we find ours leave it. This is why it is often wise to determine an insight (vipassana) subject before we un meditation session. This helps, in the midst of the pleasantness of having established calm, (recollection being a key feature of the "presence of mind" aspect of sati) about the insight s to contemplate in more depth.

It is also important to point out that insight is not limited to taking place during formalized me Contemplation on matters of insight can take place either during meditation (as it often does moments of waking consciousness when we have decided to contemplate on a certain subje reading and contemplating the subject matter of a book. The important factors that are alwa matter which method is utilized, are the tranquil and concentrated nature of the mind. A calm mind is necessary in order for clear seeing to arise.

The Pali discourses of the Buddha and the exegetical material (the commentaries on the Pa different pictures of the role that the establishments of mindfulness (satipatthana) play in the Some state that developing the establishments of mindfulness is a prerequisite for jhana, wh basis for transcendent discernment (liberation or awakening). Others make no mention of ab that one goes directly from the establishments of mindfulness to the transcendent. On the su seem to indicate that there are two alternative paths: one with jhana and one without. This re contradicts many passages which maintain that jhana is necessary for the development of tr discernment. Some of these passages simply say "concentration" instead of jhana. Within th insight practitioners (that method of vipassana which is supposedly without jhana) they see defining "concentration" — as it is referenced within the discourses — according to the way defined within those very same discourses, which is as "right concentration," which in turn re other than jhana.

As the Buddha once stated (AN 6.64): "Knowledge of the ending of the effluents, as it has co to one who is concentrated, I tell you, and not to one who is not concentrated. So concentra monks. Non-concentration is no path at all."

We also find suggestions in other passages indicating that the development of the establish mindfulness (satipatthana) implicitly entails the full development of the seven factors of enlig (bojjhangas), which include mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, tranquility, concentra equanimity. Because these factors are not only closely associated but also in some cases co this would indicate that the proper development of satipatthana incorporates the practice of and of itself.

This reading is confirmed by the Satipatthana-vibhanga Sutta (SN 47.40) which states that t satipatthana is through the noble eightfold path, which includes jhana. It is also confirmed by Anapanasati Sutta (MN 118), which describes how the establishments of mindfulness relate of breath meditation. These sixteen steps are also a description of how jhana is developed a vehicle for fostering discernment and the ending of defilements of the mind. From this it bec the outline for the establishments of mindfulness practice is a description of the stages in the mastery of jhana and its application for ending mental effluents.

Top Top

Nikolai .
Nikolai . Posts: 1092
Join Date: 1/23/10

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
10/26/10 8:51 AM as a reply to Ian And.
Wow, Ian! That's a lot of great info on jhana.
Kenneth Folk and myself did a guided tour of the jhanas on youtube. It doesn't really give ins yogi to get into each jhana but the descriptions may help.

http://www.youtube.com/results?search_query=GUIDED+TOUR+JHANAS&aq=f

Edited to include: The way myself and others have cultivated the jhanas is by riding up the jh observing the Witness. The Witness being that sense of observer at the back of the head (th give that impression). You can locate the Witness by asking "Who am I?" and you may get t localized area coming up as the answer to that question. Or it's easy to tell where the Witnes get to the 6th jhana as the Witness is that infinite consciousness looping back on itself contin the head. You can become aware of it's constant presence in all the jhanas. You look at it as kasina. Sooner or later the other jhanas start arising one after the other naturally as you do t rise up the arc to your cutting edge, which is the highest jhana you have access to. Each tim arc, your cutting edge will continue to progress on upwards. So it is taking a non-manitpulati the cultivation and mastery of jhana access..to a degree.

So that may be one way of cultivating the jhanas. A yogi at 1st or 2nd path would probably b type of practice though as getting to the 6th jhana takes some practice. I never did much jha pre-path except to stare at a kasina. I think I may have gotten to 2nd or 3rd jhana doing this.

path, jhana access became much much easier. Maybe this approach could help someone p

Some links of jhanic interest:

http://kennethfolkdharma.wetpaint.com/page/Jhana+and+%C3%91ana

http://kennethfolkdharma.wetpaint.com/page/Deeper+Into+Jhana

http://kennethfolkdharma.wetpaint.com/page/20+Major+Strata+of+Mind

The Vimuttimagga and the infinite conciousness as a kasina:See page 130 :

http://www.scribd.com/doc/32131566/The-Path-of-Freedom-Vimuttimagga

Nick

Top Top

Eric Bause
Eric Bause Posts: 97
Join Date: 8/24/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
11/1/10 10:46 AM as a reply to Ian And.
Ian,

Thanks for assembling and distilling this very useful information in one place. It's a valuable

Eric

Top Top

Ian And

Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
11/2/10 1:40 AM as a reply to Eric Bause.
Eric Bause:
Ian,

Thanks for assembling and distilling this very useful information in one place. It's a valuable

Eric

Actually, it was at the request of Tarin Greco that this thread came about here at the DhO. H
I had posted it in another forum and asked if it could be placed here also. So, you have Tari that.

I'm glad that you find it useful. I wish I had had something like this when I was undergoing th learning about jhana practice. It would have made things a bit easier (although in the actual was still a great deal of individual work to be done; it took a while before I was able to see it as I have outlined here, and to feel confident about my descriptions). I endeavored to cover
I came across in my own practice in order to serve as examples and warnings for those who absorption.

Top Top

boeuf f
boeuf f Posts: 60
Join Date: 2/4/10

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
11/11/10 9:42 AM as a reply to Ian And.
Thanks Ian for this! It is dense and takes time to consider, etc., but very helpful. So much co out there on this subject.

Consolidates a lot of info about jhana and refreshes and reminds my practice.

Regards,
Bruno

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
11/11/10 11:26 AM as a reply to boeuf f.
boeuf f:
Thanks Ian for this! It is dense and takes time to consider, etc., but very helpful.

It's not necessarily meant to be read and digested all in one reading (although it probably do reading through once just to become familiar with what is being discussed). But rather used that one can return to time and time again when they are endeavoring to "get" something ab aspect of the practice. One's practice is a gradual process. Use it in that way, and you shoul should help speed the process up.

boeuf f:
So much confusing info out there on this subject. Consolidates a lot of info about jhana and reminds my practice.

Yes. That is exactly what I meant to do, which is to consolidate the information so that other and pick up where they left off. I also wanted to address and dispel some of the "mythology" jhana that is found on some Buddhist sites with regard to this practice. A lot of that mystery a information" can side track a person's practice such that it takes them longer to figure out wh about the practice so that they can get on with it. Once you have a fairly accurate idea abou you are supposed to be concentrating on accomplishing (without all the mumbo jumbo being can disregard the mumbo jumbo and get down to business.

I'm glad this has been helpful for you.

All the best,
Ian

Top Top

prem kumar
prem kumar Posts: 12
Join Date: 4/21/10

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
12/2/10 11:23 AM as a reply to Ian And.
Dear Yogis,
In the blog which i had posted about Types of Samadhi - Concentration practices and relate benefit if the meditators. The URL is insight knowledges http://insightsofvipassana.blogspot.com/2010/11/three-fundamental-concepts-what-is.html .
the article and be benefited by dhamma.

with metta

prem

Top Top

Bruno Loff
Bruno Loff Posts: 701
Join Date: 8/30/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
2/8/11 9:52 AM as a reply to prem kumar.
Ian can I post your two sticky threads, about jhana and mindfulness practice, in the wiki (I'll authorship clear, and point to this thread)?

Top Top

adam ,
adam , Posts: 105
Join Date: 2/19/11

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
2/21/11 8:49 AM as a reply to Ian And.
I'm still stuck on one thing, I've heard from different sources about whether to focus on the b spot, like nostrils/upper lip or to try to feel it throughout the body. Also some people say to co focusing on the breath and some say to focus on piti feelings.

Top Top

Ian And
Ian And Posts: 386
Join Date: 8/22/09

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
2/21/11 9:50 AM as a reply to adam ,.
adam gregory greene:
I'm still stuck on one thing, I've heard from different sources about whether to focus on the b spot, like nostrils/upper lip or to try to feel it throughout the body.

Hello Adam,

It really doesn't matter which area one focuses on as long as one chooses one area and rem that. The purpose is to allow the mind to calm down and to experience the pleasure of the br tip of the nostrils, or throughout the body) as these experiences are for the most part brough fabrication of mind. That is to say, they are brought on deliberately and consciously by the m you understand how this mechanism works through having experienced it, it will become mo

It should be understood that it is also quite possible to enter jhana attainment through a natu which the mind just goes to or experiences these pleasures of mind all on its own, without th meditator making a conscious effort to do so. This is how I first experienced these states. Ye experience this state in a natural way can take a bit longer to enter than when making a dire enter jhana deliberately and consciously, which is why Gotama gave instruction about a con method for entry.

adam gregory greene:

Also some people say to continue focusing on the breath and some say to focus on piti feeli

In jhana meditation on entering the first and second levels of jhana, piti arises quite on its ov not need any extra attention. Piti is actually a movement of mind that is anathema to the atta fourth jhana, which is why it subsides as one goes from the second jhana to the third. Sukha happiness) is also a movement (disturbance) of the mind (present in the first three levels of needs to be attenuated so that mind can rest quiescent in the fourth jhana. The reason for th so that mind is able to "see things (phenomena) as they are," and to thereby gather insight i object is being examined. If the mind is excited or agitated in any way, this can act as a dete distraction) to the attainment of insight. Piti and sukha are agitations of mind that assist the jhanic levels of concentration, but once that level is attained, they can become a hindrance t progress in insight.

If this doesn't quite yet make sense to you, it will once you are able to experience these stat full glory, and when you understand unequivocally how you attained to them.

In peace,
Ian

Top Top

adam ,
adam , Posts: 105
Join Date: 2/19/11

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
2/21/11 11:24 AM as a reply to Ian And.
thanks that was helpful, I'm just going to meditate till I see it for myself

Top Top

Pål S.
Pål S. Posts: 138
Join Date: 8/16/10

Recent Posts Recent Posts

RE: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread
9/30/12 4:18 PM as a reply to adam ,.
Converted this to .mobi format so I could read it on my kindle.
Attachments: A General, All Purpose Jhana Thread - Ian And.zip (55.5k)

Going Dogging (Mature lady takes on two) byTomW50©

As I went to get us a nightcap I saw the barman glance across to Eileen and smile. I followe that Eileen had apparently carelessly allowed her skirt to ride up over her stocking tops and her legs was giving him and I a good stretch of creamy thigh and a flash of her newly shave when she saw us glancing across and slowly crossed her legs to leave her short tight black few inches short of her lace top hold-ups.

As he gave me our drinks he smiled and said" you are a lucky man". I realised this view had earlier that evening by the guys, we had hoped would be our business partners.

Eileen and I were celebrating our 26th wedding anniversary by taking in the World famous D long weekend in Birmingham and as part of a plan to start a new business. Eileen had told r give me a weekend to remember and certainly it had started off in some style.

It had been a remarkable evening in that my previously rather prudish wife had acted unbeli night from how she dressed, her flirting with our proposed business associates and now teas barman.

I have just turned 50 while Eileen is 47. Like many couples the initial lust for each other had kids and business pressures came along and our sex life had almost rather petered out to p fortnight. This was usually after say a night at the golf club where Eileen had "glammed" up had a few drinks.

The opportunity to sell our business gave us the opportunity for early retirement and we dec to a more rural location outside of where we lived and to start a small hobby business aroun of showing dogs. We decided to look for a couple of canine distributorships and where bette visit to the show at Birmingham..

We had set up a couple of meetings in advance with a couple of US companies with rather u took the opportunity to visit them on their stands and invite them for dinner at our hotel.

When we were going over our presentations before leaving home, I was surprised at how ex probably because she was taking the lead in a new business for the first time. I have to say in this new business venture made me look at her differently and I have to say with more int she was rather the "dogsbody" in my previous business. We had a couple of bottles of wine lot of fun in our discussions and when we were putting together the advantages of a compar

distributorship, I suggested one of our main assets was a very sexy lady with very good ass

Although this was stated a little tongue in cheek, Eileen still has good "assets." She is blond pretty, shapely legs, an hour glass figure (although more mature than when we met) - she n curvaceous 40c 30 40 -- and her breasts and ass when she chooses to show them off still g half her age.

I jokingly stated she should dress to show her assets off when we met our proposed busines was a little surprised and quite turned on to hear her say that that "was in hand" as she had bit of a new wardrobe. She modelled one quite transparent top for me and her heavy unbrae promise to wear it without a bra when we were away was enough to give us one of our best some time. I really took a new interest in going to the dogs! And I couldn't wait to see the res wardrobe.

After arriving at our hotel at 11.30 am, Eileen changed into one of her new outfits for taking the show to meet up with some of our proposed new partners. She looked absolutely fabulo jeans with brown suede over the knee boots; tight white cross over sweater with no bra and jacket. The shape of her big breasts and thick nipples were quite obvious through the tight s ripe thighs and prominent pussy mound looked magnificent in the skintight jeans. She had o up than normal and the overall effect was absolutely fantastic. It was fairly obvious that she literally taken my suggestion to "seduce" our prospective partners into giving us the agency.

As we pushed through the crowds surrounding the stands I noticed she got quite a few adm followed her up the stairs between the various halls I couldn't help lusting after the big well-r jutting ass cheeks.

The stand of the company that we had targeted for the main agency we wanted was quite in staffed by two smart young guys in their late twenties in red blazers, white shirts, cream trou shoes. At first glance I thought they might be gay as many guys in the dog world are and tha makeover would be in vain. My first impressions appeared to be right because Rob the slim definitely appeared to be gay and although Mel, a taller heavier built black guy gave Eileen t I assumed that when he said he was the partner of Alan the guy we had come to see, he me partner. I think Eileen was relieved to hear that the principal partner, Alan, was in the bar.

Mel phoned him and we arranged to meet in the international bar. Alan certainly didn't look g large -- 6'3" rather loud ex US marine in his early fifties. And by the way he looked Eileen ov obviously liked what he saw. Over drinks he said he was interested in our proposition but he approach from a large pet wholesaler who could guarantee much larger initial distribution. H we could chat things over, over dinner but we would need to see if we could up our propose level.

This was disappointing but we said we would look forward to seeing him at our hotel that ev to see some of our other potentials.

We got a much better reception at our second stop which was a company managed by Stine blonde Swedish lady, in her early forties. It very much looked like a "done deal" and we agre with her the following evening to tie it down. Three other stops were equally rewarding altho were only backups to Alan's company's products.

When we went back to the hotel I said to Eileen that we needed to pull out "all the stops" to account -- I didn't realise she would take it quite so literally.

I showered first and worked on some figures while Eileen showered and although the pressu had quite put sexual thoughts out of my head they re-appeared when Eileen came out in he was getting on.

Eileen has a very prominent pussy mound that I have always loved but she thought looked s tight trousers and while she trimmed it regularly she objected to my suggestion to shave it. E out of the bathroom after her shower her robe slipped and to my delight I could see that apa line of blonde curls above her clit -- her mound and lips were completely hairless. I couldn't h this might be my consolation prize!

I found it difficult to concentrate on finalising the figures but put thoughts of exploring the sha off until after our meeting. I finished off and went into the bathroom for a final brush up while dressed.

I was delighted to see she had dressed " business sexy" in a smart new outfit with short blac (possibly a little short for business) and fitted black jacket with a black lacy basque top belo her figure and legs off dramatically and I thought that if Alan wasn't impressed with our figur with Eileen's!

Alan and Mel were already in the bar at around 8.00 and I noticed both guys went out of the Eileen in greeting with Alan's hand rather lingeringly passing down her waist to the top of the did so. Alan ushered us into rather low-level seats opposite him while he sent Mel to the bar drinks. I noticed Alan's eyes went to Eileen's ripe thighs and the flash of creamy thigh above hold-ups as she sat down pulling her skirt down.

In spite of Mel's assumed orientation I noticed he too glanced at Eileen's thighs and down he he brought the drinks back. Alan suggested we chat over dinner about our proposals and the centred mainly on Crufts, the growth of his business and the role played by Mel (his junior pa direct contact if we got the distributorship. After Mel and I had ordered a couple more rounds fairly relaxed and familiar by the time we moved in to dinner.

Over a very good dinner with four very good (and expensive) bottles of wine, which Alan ins for, we discussed our families etc. I noticed when Eileen got up to go to the loo both guys' ey to the sway of her butt in the very tight short skirt. Both commented on how sexy she was an
I was. Neither could believe she was the mother of two early twenties kids.

Over brandy Alan and I got into finer detail on our proposition and the competing one while M were chatting about various matters including how he was enjoying Birmingham nightlife. I c was flirting with him outrageously possibly because she didn't see him as a threat.

At the coffee and brandy stage he got up to go to the loo I was shocked when Alan said, "Ei have taken quite a shine to Mel -- you're not alone, he's been quite a hit with the ladies this t

Eileen said she did find him very attractive but she had thought he was gay. Alan smiled and gay, but Mel was 100% heterosexual and in fact had spent most of the time since he had me if she wasn't married how much he'd like to get her into bed!

I was a little stunned when she said she could see now that he clearly wasn't. Alan smiled a the size of Mel's cock she would have no doubt! He quickly went on to say he had seen it wh teamed" an air hostess who they met on the plane over. I was even more stunned when she enjoyed it and when he said he had, she followed up with the question had the girl enjoyed i the way she couldn't get enough she certainly did." He went on to say that Mel had a fearsom real "cock hound" with women of all ages.

It was a slightly surreal experience to hear what I thought was my prudish wife get involved i talk with a virtual stranger but she had obviously set out to impress as a "woman of the world was going to faze her

When Mel came back, Alan embarrassed Eileen by telling him that Eileen had thought he wa and pecking Eileen on the cheek said, "If you weren't married I'd love to show you that I defi girls or even better real sexy women like yourself."

With a few more brandies flowing the conversation did get a bit more risqué and I was surpr Eileen letting Mel help her off with her jacket to leave her sitting in a very transparent basque breasts beautifully presented by the cupping effect of the basque cups. It left nothing to the i with not only her deep cleavage on display above the top, but her thick nipples very obvious diaphanous material.

When I left the table to go to the loo I heard both guys compliment her on her breasts and th conversation had obviously continued in a sexual vein, because when I came back I was rat Eileen discussing whether she preferred stockings and suspenders or hold ups and informin wearing hold-ups tonight. They said they preferred suspenders.

Alan suggested we move out to the bar for a nightcap and as I signed for dinner, Mel helped jacket and the two guys and Eileen went though to the bar. I was rather surprised to see her the low leather chair opposite the two guys with her legs crossed and seemingly oblivious to was showing acres of thigh above the lace tops of her stockings.

When I pushed Alan for a decision on our proposals he said "You are still a long way behind volume so I would need to sleep on it. I would prefer to discuss it with Mel in the morning wh distracted by Eileen's short skirt! Lets meet up for dinner tomorrow evening at our hotel."

Both guys pecked Eileen on the lips before they got a taxi back while I suggested a final nigh and she obviously decided to share the view with the barman and me!

When I got back to her with the drinks and sat down opposite her it was all I could do to stop putting my hand up her skirt as she slowly and seductively opened and closed her legs to fla at me. My feelings were mixed in that I was really excited by my wife being so overtly sexy b concerned about what the two US guys might think.

When I mentioned this to her she smiled and said, " I know what both of them were thinking me how attractive they found me. And both of them couldn't take their eyes of me when I sh are seeing now."

Apparently both had told her in quite graphic detail how sexy they found her and if she hadn what they would like to do with her. She felt they would want to give her the distributorship e just to try " to get into her knickers."

When I asked her would she "put out" to get the agency she smiled and said, "Only if you wa

When I asked "Really?"

She said "No -- I don't think so. While I really want this agency, my boobs and pussy are you mind showing them off and letting the guys think they might get lucky!"

When I asked her would she have "put out" for the agency if she hadn't been married she sm a shot!"

"Which with one?"

" Mel, obviously he's younger and fitter, I think he's gorgeous, and I've often wondered what with a black guy."

" Is it because he's well endowed?"

"Mmmm, that too but Alan's a big guy and I'm sure he's just as big."

" What if they had wanted to 'double team" you as they did the air hostess?"

"Mmmm, that might be doubly good."

By this stage I had a throbbing erection the size and turgidity of which I had not had with Eile years and I suggested we go upstairs. I noticed the barman grinning at us as Eileen struggle seat and probably gave him another flash of the bald pussy.

As I followed her out of the bar I couldn't help taking a new look at what I had been rather ov years -- her ripe and very desirable rear and her superb and shapely thighs and legs. She su the couple of short flights of stairs up to our room level and as she walked up the stairs in fro had a most fantastic view as the tight skirt rode up her thighs so I could see the ripe creamin flesh above the hold ups and a flash of the bottom of her big ass cheeks. As we reached the the entrance to the conference room I quickly moved up beside her and grabbing a handful against her it.

She very seductively moved her ass to meet my thrusts and murmured "Can't you wait?"

Pushing her skirt up to expose the big protruding rear I said "No!" and propelled her into the conference room, which was obviously set up for a meeting the next day. Bottles of water ar pushed everywhere as I pushed her over the green baize covered table, parted the cool che mounted her rear.

Obviously the events of the evening had turned her on as she was as hot for it as me and m my thrusts in a way that she hadn't done for many years. As I thrust into her she moaned " C really big tonight -- give it to me."

I didn't need any encouragement and soon our combined thrusts had me past the point of n off with a climax such as I hadn't had for several years, as I seemed to pump a massive loa her. And I still hadn't had enough as I still wanted to feel my cock entering that bald pussy. T kissed her and lifted her on to the table so I could go between her thighs. The fact that she l wantonly on the table with her legs open , the unaccustomed sight of the bald strangely vuln pussy plus the fact that she had been showing it off to strangers all night really turned me or once again became fully erect.

She moaned and thrust her pelvis forward to meet my thrusts and we were soon locked toge frenzy. This time I was able to wait until she moaned "I'm coming" and locked her legs and p round me to pump me dry as I once again spunked in her.

We lay against each other kissing and cuddling like newly fangled lovers until she said "Tom made a mess of this table." When I eased away from her, she looked completely decadent w her waist and a huge pool of semen seeping out of her well used cunt. I am sure some deleg the following morning!

When we went up to our room we continued our lovemaking, but less frenetically for anothe us. The last thing she said before she went to sleep

"Mmmm, three times in one night -- I think this new business is going to be good for us!"

Next morning I felt the effects of my exertions the night before and even Eileen kissing the ti couldn't raise it to anything more than a semi erection but I really did feel brilliant and much than I had for many years.

A good breakfast or perhaps it was the sight of Eileen , braless in a tight white tee shirt and cream trousers with her over the knee boots, that made me feel that I might like a morning i had her mind on business and pushed me into going over the figures again before we met th

We decided that we really did want Alan's company's agency and I said I would see if we co until the following evening and make a real attempt to tie down the guys that night. While Eil the guys I visited Stine's stand and was disappointed to find she could not change our arran

I found Eileen deep in conversation with Mel and he didn't seem too concerned when I told h dinner that evening but Eileen would. When I discussed it later over lunch Eileen said it migh better all round -- I could charm Patricia and so long as we had agreed our top figures she fe might do better with the guys on her own. When I said "like the air hostess?"

She patted my thigh "I'm quite happy with what I got last night and I'm looking forward to son tonight!"

She very nearly had more of it before she went out that night as I saw her dressing in new d suspender belt with eight suspenders --it really did show her thighs off well -- lace top black black g string and another tight short black skirt. On top she wore a cross over white blouse transparent and showed off her heavy breasts and thick nipples to perfection. She wore a lo jacket for travelling which gave the overall impression once again of sexy smart business.

When I helped her cab, I kissed her and said "Be good"

"You too, I hope we both can clinch the deal tonight."

Eileen

I had hoped my decision to go to Crufts to get a couple of agencies for canine products wou revitalise our marriage but I never really thought it would have such an important impact on life.

I had always been the junior partner in our antiques and fine art business and I thought Tom indulging me when we sold it and I said I wanted to start something myself. I decided that ou would be a totally new start in business and I would give Tom a bit of a treat by splashing ou wardrobe including some of the sexier type of gear he has always tried to get me to wear.

Over the years our once quite active sex life had dwindled to once or twice a month and Tom from making love to me and trying to pleasure both of us, to "riding" me whenever he felt the release. I know he had a couple of minor affairs and once or twice I too was tempted when y to me at the golf club or at dog shows. But although I was flattered I didn't because I didn't th cope.

I was delighted with Tom's reaction when I showed him one of the rather sheer tops I had bo before we went to Crufts and he was more like the guy I married that night in bed.

I was also delighted at his reaction when changed into my new boots and tight jeans and we first visit to Crufts to meet our proposed principals.

I was impressed at the professionalism of one company in particular in their stand design inc very smartly colour co-ordinated staff who I learned to be Rob and Mel. Both were very attra thought I saw a slight glimmer of interest in the eyes of Mel, a black guy, when he looked at breasts I assumed from his dress and Rob's demeanour that they were gay.

When we met Alan, the owner of the company and a rather huge ex US marine, there was r rather more than a glimmer of interest in my breasts and indeed I felt he mentally undressed the international bar. I noticed that when he kissed me good-bye one of his large hands stra buttock.

When we were going back to the hotel I think we were both a little deflated as he had made larger company was also interested in the agency and we would have to "up our game" if we felt this agency was the key to my new business and I knew that it might take more than Tom figures and projections to get it against stiff competition -- it might take me to exploit Alan's v interest in me.

Assuming Mel was gay meant that I had to concentrate my efforts on Alan and from my limit he was a ladies man and probably quite used to having fun with younger women. I knew I w something special to attract him to my own more mature charms. I felt dangerously excited a the success or failure of our new business venture this time might be down to something as this guy want to do business with us in the hope of doing some "business" with me.

I didn't honestly consider how far I would go to get this agency but I knew I had to get this gu interested. I suppose I really had subconsciously thought of making "the ultimate " sacrifice thought that I would have to do rather more than flash my breasts at him. I know Tom thinks braless but with so many younger girls with pert breasts going braless I didn't think that alon trick. I know guys love to see a bit of stocking top so I decided on a pair of lace top hold-ups
g-string. When I tried my new g-string on I was a bit bushy so I decided to trim a little and th give Tom, at least, a treat by shaving fully.

Eventually I thought bugger the g-string if I have to get that desperate to get Alan's attention what he might think he could get!

I selected a black suit that could be looked on as business-like, albeit the skirt was little shor It had a fitted jacket that I could wear open or closed. Beneath it I chose a lace basque, whic myself made my breasts look pretty good. When the jacket was closed it showed a bit of cle lace and when opened the "cups" gave support to my 40c/ds and held them up. In short, I co as little as I wanted.

Certainly when we met the two guys in the bar I could see that the short skirt and cleavage h effect on Alan and when he suggested we say down I noticed he steered Tom and I to a tab seats while he deputised Mel to get us some drinks. When I sat down pulling my skirt as far noticed his eyes automatically went to my stocking tops. I caught his glance and we shared got up to go into dinner I noticed that both guys had looked up my skirt and I wondered had I had gone "commando".

We had booked a corner table where we could talk fairly privately and I was pleased that the quite dark so that if I wanted I could take my jacket off without appearing " over the top." Ala getting the wine and I was quite impressed when he ordered quite a few bottles of the best c We were all quite merry and while Tom and Alan talked business I chatted to Mel. At this sta was gay and had thought to myself "what a waste" as he was not only very attractive but a g conversationalist.

I was surprised when he went to the loo that Alan made it clear that he was not only not gay hound" and that he and Alan had "double teamed" a stewardess. I was fascinated by his fra assertion that Mel was very well endowed but I think Tom was a bit shocked when I sought f found out that Mel had actually expressed an interest in me.

Alan embarrassed me when Mel came back buy telling him I had thought he was gay -- he l pecking me on the cheek murmured " If you weren't married I'd really love to show you I'm n

I felt like saying "and if wasn't I'd love to let you!"

Whether it was the drinks, or the obvious interest that both guys were showing in me but I re dangerously exciting and thought I would take my jacket off. Mel quickly moved to help me c could see from all three guys expressions that my top definitely had the "wow" factor that I th have.

When Tom went to the loo Mel complimented me on my top and Alan on "what was in it" an a raft of compliments including Alan saying there was nothing sexier than a mature woman breasts, ass and legs -- if she had them to show off! That sparked off a conversation about women to wear and what turned guys on. Both guys expressed a preference for women goi and stockings. Both expressed a preference that I noted, for stockings and suspenders rath

I think Tom was rather taken back, when he returned, to hear me discussing whether I prefe hold-ups or suspenders and when I told the guys I was wearing hold-ups and they said "we

We moved through to bar for a "nightcap" while Tom settled the bill. Once again I noticed th steered me to the low seating again and when they both sat opposite me I realised that they the view. So I crossed my legs and this time I didn't bother pulling my skirt down as I though them see a bit of thigh and stocking top.

When Tom joined us and pushed Alan for a decision -- he demurred and suggested that Me
it "without the distraction of Eileen's short skirt"

I was really disappointed by this and thought I had better pull out all the stops -- so when I le to put some more tonic in my drink I rather "carelessly" didn't pull my skirt down when I uncr and gave the guys the opportunity of a pussy flash. I don't know whether both of them got a I caught Alan looking and we shared a smile.

When the guys went and Tom went to the bar to get us a final nightcap I repeated the mano from his startled glance and the barman's smile that the two guys could have seen "the lot" earlier.

I kept my legs slightly open when he came back to the table and he obviously found it very e into a conversation about what I would or wouldn't do to get the agency and it was obvious t excited by the idea that I might actually "put out" to get the agency.

He was so excited that we didn't even get back to our room before we had sex. He pushed room and took me rather roughly over the table. As he mounted me from behind I was surpr hard he was -- certainly more erect than he had been for some time. When he came off he a warm sperm into me for an age and yet he was still firm when he turned me round, put me u went between my thighs. This time he was a bit slower and with us both really up for it we ha climax. I really did feel very decadent with his semen spread over the table and tricking dow walked back to the room.

Back in the room we went to bed where once again he made passionate although much slo remember thinking as I drifted off to sleep in his arms -- this really was the next and most ex of our lives.

Next morning he was shattered from his exertions and it was only after breakfast that his de but I pushed him into getting ready to push the guys for a decision the next day.

Tom went to see Stine while I went to see the guys to confirm arrangements for dinner that joined us to say he couldn't re-arrange I noticed Mel didn't seem too concerned when I said Stine and I would see the guys on my own.

We had a busy day seeing and tying down some of the more minor distributorships and we whacked when we got back to the hotel. Tom went to work on a final proposal for Alan while again I decided to dress smart sexy in black and white and in deference to the guys preferen deep cut suspender belt, which I had bought to hide the stretch marks on my tummy. I thoug give the wrong signals if I went knickerless so I put on a black matching g-string.

The two guys were staying at a rather plush hotel near the airport and I was pleased to see for me in the lobby. He took me into the bar to wait for Alan -- who was 'phoning home. Onc complimented me on my appearance but wouldn't be drawn on their thinking on the contract dark suit with open necked white shirt and looked absolutely gorgeous. I have to admit that cross my mind as to how big he was.

Alan joined us within a few minutes and after giving me a perfunctory peck on the cheek ush restaurant. I didn't like to open on the agency so we chatted about various things over the m appear to be drinking much so the conversation was a little bit more stilted than the night be initially there was none of the sexual innuendo of the night before. I felt that I was going to g

However when I returned from the loo, Mel asked me to settle and argument -- whether I wa or hold-ups. When I asked why he said Alan had a $50 bet with him that I was wearing susp Alan why he thought that he claimed that women always walked differently in suspenders wi their hips. He smiled when I told him that he had won his bet. Mel said he couldn't win until I leaned back and lifted my skirt a little to show that I was.

This and a round of brandies seemed to loose up the conversation and emboldened I asked decision. He smiled and said "not quite, to be blunt we like you guys and think we could wor and I know Mel, here, would love to play with you! But the other company has guaranteed u of $250,000 while you are only offering us about $75,000. Is there any way you can sweeter

I said we could go another 20% in guaranteed turnover and that both Tom and I would give project. He smiled ruefully and said " I really do like you guys and Mel and I think you would to the company in more ways than one, but I have to take a commercial decision and at the you're in runner up spot."

I felt totally deflated and said " What more can I say, I really do want this but we cannot reall greater guarantees than what we have offered."

He smiled and said " how much do you want it?"

" As much as I have really wanted anything?"

" What would you do to get it?"

I wasn't sure where this was going but I went for broke and said "Whatever it takes other tha can afford to guarantee?"

Then came the "put up or shut up" question that I suppose I had subconsciously thought I m address. "Would you sleep with Mel and me to get it?"

"I'd have to think about it but probably, yes"

"Does it really mean that much to you?"

"Probably yes."

"Wouldn't Tom mind?"

"He doesn't have to know."

Both guys smiled as Mel said "He's only teasing you the way you teased us last night. Yeah love to sleep with you but we don't mix business with pleasure."

Alan butted in "Yeah we really would love to have what's on offer but I really only wanted to really wanted the agency. We are going to take a chance with you and let you have it."

I was so excited I kissed both of them, there and then and Alan smiled and said "Whoa hone change our mind."

He suggested we go up to his suite to sign the agreement and ordered a couple of bottles o the deal. I phoned Tom to tell him the good news and he was delighted. He jokingly said "I h you'd had to put out to get it."

In Alan's very luxurious suite, I have to say the combination of excitement at having clinched the champagne on top of wine and brandies meant that after we had signed the agreement spontaneously and kissed Alan. I thought he would give me a peck back but instead he rath against him in a bear like grip and bending down kissed me properly. Initially I tried to pull av but then his tongue entered my mouth and I responded slightly. When he released me he he with one arm and said "Sorry about that but I think you have the prettiest little mouth and I h wanting to do that since I met you."

Then turning round to Mel, at the same time as his other hand cupped and took the weight o he said "What do you think? Should we make an exception and mix a little pleasure with bus

I realised that it was getting into dangerous territory but could do little as Alan once again pu up to be kissed while at the same time quite firmly groping my breast. Any chance I had to s when Mel came up behind me and I felt his erection thrust against my rear.

Although I am 5'7" and quite substantially built I was like a toy between these two powerful g propelled into the bedroom and tumbled on to the bed with Mel kissing and fondle my breast huge hand go up my skirt and close on my pussy mound and I realised that I had no alterna with whatever they wanted. Pushing Mel away I said "Hey guys, at least let me get my jacke to rip it."

Alan smiled and said "Honey, lose the top and skirt too."

As I took off my clothes, the guys were getting undressed and from the size of the huge erec obviously liked what they saw. Its funny what one thinks about at a time like this but I though wearing this suspender belt so they can't see my tummy.

Both guys closed on me and their hands were everywhere on my breasts, pussy and rear. A pulled my string aside and shoved two or three fat fingers hard into me before pushing me d spreading my thighs replaced his fingers with a huge fat cock. As I lay back and tried to take unaccustomed thickness of his cock Mel pulled my head to the side and fed me his longer th no finesse about Alan's thrusting into my pussy. Grabbing me by the buttocks he ground it in him unload in me. As he dismounted from me, Mel was thrusting his long cock deep into my was making me gag so to get some control I turned over on to my tummy so that I could bet thrusts. I was concentrating on taking him off when I got a huge slap on the rear from Alan a grunt " Honey I really wanted that bald cunt of yours since you flashed it at us but that ass is fucking material."

He pulled me into a kneeling position and I felt his fingers exploring between my hips. I brok sucking Mel to cry out when I felt him try to put a large digit into my anus and tried to protest wasn't up for that. But Mel grabbed me by the hair and pulling me down on to his cock really mouth with some force.

In spite of the grip Mel had on me I broke free of his grip when Alan pushed a deep probing rear. "Please guys, don't take me like that I'll do anything else but that."

"Honey, you really are tight there -- does old Tom not ride that big ass?"

"No, it hurts too much?"

"Don't worry honey, he doesn't know what he's missing, I'll use some cream."

As he lumbered off to the bathroom Mel really got to work on my mouth and his frantic thrust he was depositing loads of sweet salty semen in my throat as Alan came out of the bathroom kiss me and murmured "That was really good you really have a great little mouth for fucking

As Alan approached me with the cream I turned round and said "Please Alan, I don't want a Tom and it really hurt and you guys are bigger than him."

"Don't be silly honey, don't you realise what you do to guys when you show that big rear off i little skirts? You have a real asset there and we're just going to help you bring it into play."

I reluctantly let him turn me over and I relaxed a bit when he rather gently parted my hips an cooling cream down the crack between my hips. It wasn't unpleasant even when I felt him sl covered finger into my anus.

He leaned over and kissed my neck saying "There babe, that isn't too bad is it?"

When I murmured that it was OK. I felt him insert another finger and start to really probe my wasn't so pleasant and I tried to wriggle free. I was rather shocked when he muttered "Hone bugger that big ass so it will be better for you to lie back and enjoy it rather than fight it."

I tried to relax as I felt him try to enter the head of his thick cock in my anal ring but the stret feeling became one of unbearable pain as my rear refused to stretch to accommodate him.
break away and for my efforts received a hard slap on the rear as he ordered Mel to hold me hurt if I struggled.

I tried to relax as he eased his heavy weight down on me and his cock into my protesting as one big thrust, I felt a tearing feeling and excruciating pain and I cried out as my rear ripped deep into my bowels.

"Christ you really were tight honey, but relax now as the worst is over." With that he grabbed roughly and he started a fast rhythmical pounding of his cock into my bowels. It wasn't quite the first entrance but I was really relieved when I felt him climax and his warm ejaculate acte my bruised insides. For a few minutes he lay spent on top of me his cock embedded in my r once again felt excruciating pain and when I turned round and looked at the bed I saw that h ripped me as I was bleeding.

He leaned down and kissed me and said "Honey, that really was fantastic you really do have

I went in and tried to repair the damage to my rear and wash and when I returned Alan went to clean himself. When I came out Mel gave me another glass of champagne and started to spite of being in some discomfort from my damaged rear I was quite turned on by his excitin gently groping my breasts and teasing my clit and to my shame that and his black well musc exciting long and very erect looking penis made me soon wanting to have him between my t

He very gently mounted me and as he was a gentle and considerate lover as well as being t forgot about my rear as I responded to his gentle deep thrusts into me and the very erotic m groin against my clitoris. I was soon writhing in unison to his thrusts and wasn't even put off Alan exhorting him to "Fuck she really does love it. Fuck the cunt off her."

As I responded Mel quickened the tempo of his thrusts and I was soon writing and crying ou brought me off to a climax. As I writhed I was so overtaken by the intense orgasm brought o reaching areas that had never been touched before that I was quite oblivious to the fact that only embedded on his cock in front but on a couple of fingers he had inserted in my rear.

As we both lay together totally spent I felt him take one of my hands and place it between hi and I realised that he wanted me to fondle his anus. As I gingerly inserted a finger in his tigh his cock stiffening in me and him start to move his fingers in my ass. Whether it was the crea on my rear or the fact that he had totally relaxed me it felt Ok and when he murmured "Eilee like to have your ass -- do you think you're up for it?"

I said "Mmmm , Alan really hurt me but if you're gentle I'll try."

As I started to turn over Alan butted in " Hey honey, I'm the senior partner here I want a bit m want to take that sweet little mouth." And with that he pulled me over to suck his semi flaccid him going I licked his balls and his cock started to thicken. When nearly erect was extremely trouble getting my lips round it. As I worked on it I felt Mel gently part the cheeks of my uptur poor some cooling salve between my hips. As he gently worked a finger into my anus his oth my clit and the two together with Alan's by now urgent thrusting made me wriggle my ass.

That really seemed to bring out the animal in Mel and I felt him rather roughly part my cheek
I felt excruciating pain as he pushed the head of his cock passed my torn anal sphincter. I cr protest, but Alan's thick cock being pushed deep into my throat muffled this. And I was preve physical movement by Alan's tight grip on my hair and Mel's equally tight grip on my buttock rather like a toy or a plaything skewered between these two guys large cocks as they used m wished.

Mel's cocking off my ass was if anything more painful than Alan's because while the girth of torn my sphincter, Mel's cock had to pass this and being much longer hurt me rather more in his rather rampant thrusting and probably my squirming with pain soon brought him to climax deposit his soothing ejaculate deep inside me.

As he withdrew Alan wasn't showing much sign of coming off so I really went to work on him hands on his cock and balls and with my newfound expertise explored his anus with my fing quickly brought him towards climax and I tried to deep throat him as I felt him go but he pulle sprayed my face and hair with his spunk.

This plus their rather crude comments about "What a fuck I'd been"; "What a great tight ass went to the loo to clean up made me feel rather used but I thought at least I have the consol contract.

I felt a lot better when I came out of the bathroom after washing and repairing my make up a

And they were really pleasant even down to making me a couple of coffee when I refused m both hugged me and thanked me for one of the best nights o their life. They both said it was back because they would love to have had some more fun with me. In short they treated me and said they were really looking forward to working with me.

As I left Alan, patted me on the rear and said he hoped they hadn't hurt my ass too much bu was that they "had opened me up for Tom" and I would learn to enjoy anal.

They called a taxi and as I left the hotel I was stunned to find it was only 2.00 am. I thought it for several more hours.

On the way back in the taxi I had had sobered up a great deal and had mixed emotions. Wit of my pussy and rear, my stockings laddered and my garter belt covered in spunk it was obv Tom what had happened. I was really concerned that he might not view the grant of a contra worth me "putting out".

Tom

When Eileen 'phoned about 11.00 to say that she had sealed the deal I was really delighted with Stine had gone really well and in different circumstances I would have loved the challen her slim body and girlish curves, I was a little concerned about what the guys might want in contract -- especially since Eileen had rather teased them the night before.

When she hadn't returned by midnight I was a bit more worried but didn't want to 'phone her as if I didn't trust her.

I watched a movie and went to bed at c 1.00 but didn't sleep and I was relieved to hear her about 2.30. When I put on the light I could see she was a bit upset and her hair looked as if out of the shower. When I asked her "What's up -- you should be delighted?" She started to story tumbled out.

To be frank I had really mixed emotions -- I was angry at the guys for taking advantage and them and not a little excited at the thought of my wife having been "roasted." I felt my cock g when I heard about the two guys taking her big ripe rear anally -- something I had wanted to never forced the issue when she said no. When I suggested she get undressed and come to even more turned on when I saw her laddered stockings and cum covered suspender belt, a home to me that my wife had been extremely well used my the two guys. It somehow made exciting and desirable and I had absolutely no problem in telling her it didn't matter.

I found it even more exciting when I got her into bed and found that her pussy was still cum especially when I saw her damaged butt still seeping with semen. Needless to say I reclaim taking both. In spite of her obvious anal discomfort (I am ashamed to say another turn on) s anal ride really enjoyable by pushing up her ass to meet my cock and I couldn't help feeling to the guys for breaking her in for me.

Since then I and they have buggered her ass on many occasions and she now is quite happ quite willingly in all her holes. And of course the business has been a huge success.

|| namo tassa bhagavato arahato sammÄ• sambuddhassa ||

cÅ«á¸·aganthavaá¹ƒsapÄ• á¸·i

1. piá¹-akattayaparicchedo

namassetvÄ• na sambuddhaá¹ƒ, aggavaá¹ƒsavaraá¹ƒvaraá¹ƒ.

natvÄ• na dhammaá¹ƒ buddhajaá¹ƒ, saá¹…ghaÃ±cÄ• piniraá¹…gaá¹‡aá¹ƒ ||

ganthavaá¹ƒsampi nissÄ• ya, ganthavaá¹ƒsaá¹ƒ pakathissaá¹ƒ.

tipeá¹-akasamÄ• hÄ• raá¹ƒ, sÄ• dhunaá¹ƒ jaá¹…ghadÄ• sakaá¹ƒ ||

vimatinodanamÄ• rambhaá¹ƒ, taá¹ƒ me suá¹‡Ä• tha sÄ• dhavo.

sabbampi buddhavacanaá¹ƒ, vimutti ca sahetukaá¹ƒ ||

hoti ekavidhaá¹ƒyeva, tividhaá¹ƒ piá¹-akena ca.

taÃ±ca sabbampi kevalaá¹ƒ, paÃ±cavidhaá¹ƒ nikÄ• yato ||

aá¹…gato ca navavidhaá¹ƒ, dhammakkhandhagaá¹‡anato.

á¹• 22caturÄ• sÄ«ti sahassa, dhammakkhandhapabhedananti ||

kathaá¹ƒ piá¹-akato piá¹-akaÃ±hi tividhaá¹ƒ hoti?

vinayapiá¹-akaá¹ƒ, abhidhammapiá¹-akaá¹ƒ suttantapiá¹-akanti. tattha katamaá¹ƒ vinaya pi pÄ• rÄ• jikakaá¹‡á¸• aá¹ƒ, pÄ• cittiyakaá¹‡á¸• aá¹ƒ, mahÄ• vaggakaá¹‡á¸• aá¹ƒ, cullavagga parivÄ• rakaá¹‡á¸• anti. imÄ• ni kaá¹‡á¸• Ä• ni vinayapiá¹-akaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma.

katamaá¹ƒ abhidhammapiá¹-akaá¹ƒ? dhammasaá¹…gaá¹‡Ä«-pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, vibhaá¹…gadhÄ• tukathÄ• -pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, puggalapaÃ±Ã±atti-pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, kathÄ• vatthu-pakaraá¹‡ paá¹-á¹-hÄ• na-pakaraá¹‡anti. imÄ• ni satta pakaraá¹‡Ä• ni abhidhammapiá¹-akaá¹ƒ nÄ• m suttantapiá¹-akaá¹ƒ? sÄ«lakkhandhavaggÄ• dikaá¹ƒ, avasesaá¹ƒ buddhavacanaá¹ƒ suttant kathaá¹ƒ nikÄ• yato? nikÄ• yÄ• paÃ±ca vidhÄ• honti. dÄ«ghanikÄ• yo, majjhimanikÄ• yo, aá¹…guttaranikÄ• yo, khuddakanikÄ• yoti.

tattha katamo dÄ«gha-nikÄ• yo? sÄ«lakkhandhavaggo, mahÄ• vaggo, pÄ• thikavaggoti, im nÄ• ma. imesu tÄ«su vaggesu, catutiá¹ƒsa vaggÄ• ni ca honti. [catutiá¹ƒseva suttantÄ• , sÄ yassa bhavanti so yeva dÄ«ghanikÄ• ya nÄ• ma hoti.]

katamo majjhimanikÄ• yo? mÅ«lapaá¹‡á¹‡Ä• so, majjhimapaá¹‡á¹‡Ä• so, uparipaá¹‡á¹‡Ä• majjhimanikÄ• yo nÄ• ma. imesu tÄ«su paá¹‡á¹‡Ä• sesu dvepaÃ±Ã±Ä• sÄ• dhika-sutta-sat [diyaá¸• á¸• hasatasuttantÄ• , dvi suttaá¹ƒ yassa santiso, majjhimanikÄ• yo nÄ• mo mÅ«lap

katamo saá¹ƒyuttanikÄ• yo? sagÄ• thÄ• vaggo, nidÄ• navaggo, khandhakavaggo, saá¸·Ä• paÃ±ca vaggÄ• saá¹ƒyuttanikÄ• yo nÄ• ma. imesu paÃ±casu vaggesu dvÄ• saá¹-á¹-hisuttasattasatÄ• dhikasatta-suttasahassÄ• ni honti. [dvÄ• saá¹-á¹-hi-satta-sat sattasahassakÄ• ni ca.] suttÄ• ni yassa honti so, sagÄ• thÄ• dikavaggako, saá¹ƒyuttanikÄ• viÃ±Ã±Å«nÄ• ti.

katamo aá¹…guttaranikÄ• yo? ekkanipÄ• to, dukkanipÄ• to, tikkanipÄ• to, catukkanipÄ• to, chakkanipÄ• to, sattakanipÄ• to, aá¹-á¹-hakanipÄ• to, navakanipÄ• to, dasakanipÄ• to, ekÄ ekÄ• dasa nipÄ• tÄ• aá¹…guttaranikÄ• yo nÄ• ma. imesu ekÄ• dasa nipÄ• tesu satta-paÃ±Ã±Ä• sa-paÃ±ca-satÄ• dhikanava-sutta-sahassÄ• ni honti. [navasuttasahassÄ• n sattapaÃ±Ã±Ä• sÄ• dhikÄ• ni, suttÄ• ni yassa honti so, aá¹…guttaranikÄ• yoti, ekkanipÄ• ta katamo khuddakanikÄ• yo? khuddakapÄ• á¹-ho, dhammapadaá¹ƒ, udÄ• naá¹ƒ, itivuttakaá¹ vimÄ• navatthu, petavatthu, therakathÄ• , therÄ«kathÄ• , jÄ• takaá¹ƒ, mahÄ• niddeso, paá¹ apadÄ• naá¹ƒ, buddhavaá¹ƒso, cariyÄ• piá¹-akaá¹ƒ, vinayapiá¹-akaá¹ƒ, abhidhammapiá¹-ak ganthesu anekÄ• ni sutta-sahassÄ• ni honti. [anekÄ• ni sutta-sahassÄ• ni, niddiá¹-á¹-hÄ• ni paÃ±came ime, khuddake iti visuteti.]

kathaá¹ƒ aá¹…gato aá¹…gahi nava vidhaá¹ƒ hoti? suttaá¹ƒ, geyyaá¹ƒ, veyyÄ• karaá¹‡aá¹ƒ itivuttakaá¹ƒ, jÄ• takaá¹ƒ, abbhutadhammaá¹ƒ, vedallanti, navappabhedaá¹ƒ hoti. tattha ubh vibhaá¹…ganiddesakhandhakaparivÄ• rÄ• , suttanipÄ• te, maá¹…galasutta, ratanasutta, tuv aÃ±Ã±ampi suttanÄ• makaá¹ƒ tathÄ• gatavacanaá¹ƒ, suttanti veditabbaá¹ƒ. sabbaá¹ƒ sagÄ veditabbaá¹ƒ. visesanasaá¹ƒyuttake sakalopi sagÄ• thakavaggo, sakalaá¹ƒ abhidhammapiá suttayaÃ±ca aÃ±Ã±ampi aá¹-á¹-hahi aá¹…gehi asaá¹…gahitaá¹ƒ buddhavacanaá¹ƒ taá¹ƒ ve veditabbaá¹ƒ. dhammapadaá¹ƒ, therakathÄ• , therÄ«kathÄ• , suttanipÄ• te, no suttanÄ• mik gÄ• thÄ• ti veditabbÄ• . somanassa Ã±Ä• á¹‡amayikagÄ• thÄ• paá¹-ika-saá¹ƒyuttÄ• dve a veditabbÄ• . vuttaÃ±hetaá¹ƒ bhagavatÄ• tiÄ• dinayappavattÄ• dasuttarasatasuttantÄ• , itiv apaá¹‡á¹‡akajÄ• takÄ• dÄ«ni paÃ±Ã±Ä• sÄ• dikÄ• ni. paÃ±cajÄ• takasatÄ• ni, jÄ• takanti v bhikkhave acchariyÄ• abhÅ«tadhammÄ• , Ä• nandetiÄ• dinayappavattÄ• sabbepi acchariy abhÅ«tadhammapaá¹-isaá¹ƒyuttÄ• suttantÄ• abhÅ«tadhammanti veditabbÄ• . cullavedalla sammÄ• diá¹-á¹-hi, sakkapaÃ±ha, saá¹…khÄ• rabhÄ• janiya, mahÄ• puá¹‡á¹‡amasuttantÄ• tuá¹-á¹-hiÃ±ca laddhÄ• [puccha] laddhÄ• pucchitasuttantÄ• , vedallanti veditabbÄ• . katam dhammakkhandhasahassÄ• ni dujÄ• nÄ• ni, caturÄ• sÄ«ti dhammakkhandhasahassÄ• ni s atipapaÃ±co bhavissati. tasmÄ• naya vasena kathissÄ• mi. ekaá¹ƒ vatthu, eko dhammakkh eko dhammakkhandho, ekaá¹ƒ paÃ±hÄ• pucchantaá¹ƒ eko dhammakkhandho, ekaá¹ƒ paÃ dhammakkhandho, caturÄ• sÄ«ti dhammakkhandhasahassÄ• ni kena bhÄ• sitÄ• ni, kattha kamÄ• rabbha bhÄ• sitÄ• ni, kimatthaá¹ƒ bhÄ• sitÄ• ni, kena dhÄ• ritÄ• ni, kenÄ• bhatÄ• ni pariyÄ• puá¹‡itabbÄ• ni. tatrÄ• yaá¹ƒ visajjanÄ• , kena bhÄ• sitÄ• nÄ«ti? buddhÄ• nu buddh bhÄ• sitÄ• nÄ«ti? devesu ca mÄ• nussesu ca, bhÄ• sitÄ• ni. kadÄ• bhÄ• sitÄ• nÄ«ti? bhag pacchimakÄ• le ca bhÄ• sitÄ• ni. katamÄ• rabbha bhÄ• sitÄ• nÄ«ti? paÃ±cavaggiyÄ• dike v bhÄ• sitÄ• nÄ«ti. kimatthaá¹ƒ bhÄ• sitÄ• nÄ«ti? tivajjaÃ±ca avajjaÃ±ca Ã±atvÄ• vajjaá¹ƒ pa paá¹-ipattitvÄ• nibbÄ• napariyante. diá¹-á¹-ha-dhammikasamparÄ• yikatthe sampÄ• puá¹‡it

kena dhÄ• ritÄ• nÄ«ti? anubuddhehi ceva sissÄ• nusissehi ca dhÄ• ritÄ• ni. kenÄ• bhatÄ• paraá¹ƒparehi Ä• bhatÄ• ni. kimatthaá¹ƒ pariyÄ• puá¹‡itabbÄ• nÄ«ti? vajjaÃ±ca avajjaÃ±ca avajje paá¹-ipattitvÄ• nibbÄ• napariyante diá¹-á¹-hadhammikasamparÄ• yikatthe, saá¹ƒpÄ• tÄ• ya nibbÄ• napariyante diá¹-á¹-hadhammikasamparÄ• yikatthe sÄ• dhikÄ• ni honti. teva t pariyÄ• puá¹‡itabbÄ• ni dhÄ• retabbÄ• ni dhÄ• retabbÄ• ni vÄ• cetabbÄ• ni sajjhÄ• yaá¹ƒ k cullaganthavaá¹ƒse piá¹-akattaya dÄ«pako nÄ• ma paá¹-hamo paricchedo.]

2. ganthakÄ• rakÄ• cariya-paricchedo

Ä• cariyo pana atthi. porÄ• á¹‡Ä• cariyÄ• atthi, aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• cariyÄ• atthi, ganthakÄ• r tividhanÄ• mikÄ• cariyÄ• . katame porÄ• á¹‡Ä• cariyÄ• ? paá¹-hamasaá¹…gÄ• yanÄ• yaá¹ƒ paÃ±cannaá¹ƒ nikÄ• yÄ• naá¹ƒ nÄ• maÃ±ca atthaÃ±ca adhippÄ• yaÃ±ca yadaÃ±ca byaÃ± kiccaá¹ƒ kariá¹ƒsu. dutiyasaá¹…gÄ• yanÄ• yaá¹ƒ sattasatÄ• khÄ«á¹‡Ä• savÄ• tesaá¹ƒyev puna kariá¹ƒsu. tatiyasaá¹…gÄ• yanÄ• yaá¹ƒ sahassamattÄ• khÄ«á¹‡Ä• savÄ• tesaá¹ƒye puna kariá¹ƒsu. iccevaá¹ƒ dvesatÄ• dhikÄ• dvesahassa khÄ«á¹‡Ä• savÄ• mahÄ• kaccÄ• porÄ• á¹‡Ä• cariyÄ• nÄ• ma. ye porÄ• á¹‡Ä• cariyÄ• teyeva aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• cariyÄ• nÄ• ganthakÄ• rakÄ• cariyÄ• ? mahÄ• aá¹-á¹-hakathikÄ• pebhadaanekÄ• cariyÄ• ganthakÄ• ra nÄ• mÄ• cariyÄ• mahÄ• kaccÄ• yano tividhanÄ• maá¹ƒ. katame ganthÄ• mahÄ• kaccÄ• y mahÄ• niruttigantho, cullaniruttigantho, yamakagantho, nettigantho, peá¹-akopadesagantho mahÄ• kaccÄ• yanena katÄ• . katame anekÄ• cariyena katÄ• ganthÄ• ? mahÄ• paccarikÄ• ganthaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. mahÄ• kurundikÄ• cariyo kurundi nÄ• ma ganthaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. aÃ±Ã±atar ganthassa aá¹-á¹-hakathaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. aÃ±Ã±ataro Ä• cariyo kurundi ganthassa aá¹-á¹-haka mahÄ• buddhaghosÄ• nÄ• macariyo visuddhimaggo dÄ«ghanikÄ• yassa sumaá¹…galavilÄ• majjhimanikÄ• yassa papaÃ±casÅ«danÄ« nÄ• ma aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , saá¹ƒyuttanikÄ• yassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , aá¹…guttaranikÄ• yassa manorathapÅ«raá¹‡Ä« nÄ• ma aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• samantapÄ• sÄ• dikÄ• nÄ• ma aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , sattannaá¹ƒ abhidhammaganthÄ• naá¹ƒ aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , pÄ• timokkha saá¹ƒkhÄ• tÄ• ya mÄ• tikÄ• ya kaá¹…khÄ• vitaraá¹‡Ä«ti vis dhammapadassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , jÄ• takassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , khuddakapÄ• á¹-hassa aa suttanipÄ• tassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , apadÄ• nassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ti, ime terasa ganthe akÄ buddhadattonÄ• mÄ• cariyo vinaya vinicchayo, uttaravinicchayo, abhidhammÄ• vatÄ• ro, bu madhuratthavilÄ• sinÄ« nÄ• ma aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ti, ime cattÄ• ro ganthe akÄ• si. Ä• nandor sattÄ• bhidhammaganthaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya mÅ«á¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma á¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. dh nettippakaraá¹‡aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , itivuttakaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , udÄ• naá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , cariyÄ• therakathaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , therÄ«kathaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , vimÄ• navatthussa vimalavilÄ• sini petavatthussa vimalavilÄ• sini nÄ• ma aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , visuddhimaggassa paramatthamaÃ dÄ«ghanikÄ• yassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• dÄ«naá¹ƒ catunnaá¹ƒ aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• naá¹ƒ lÄ«nattha jÄ• takaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya lÄ«natthappakÄ• sani nÄ• ma á¹-Ä«kÄ• , nettipakaraá¹‡aá¹-á¹-ha buddhavaá¹ƒsaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya paramatthadÄ«panÄ« nÄ• ma á¹-Ä«kÄ• , abhidhammaá¹-lÄ«natthavaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• nÄ• ma anuá¹-Ä«kÄ• ti ime cuddasa matte ganthe akÄ• si.

dve pubbÄ• cariyÄ• nÄ• mÄ• cariyÄ• nirutti maÃ±jÅ«saá¹ƒ nÄ• ma cullanirutti á¹-Ä«kaÃ±c saá¹…khepaÃ±ca akaá¹ƒsu. mahÄ• vajirabuddhinÄ• mÄ• cariyo vinayagaá¹‡á¹-hinÄ• ma p dÄ«paá¹…karasaá¹…khÄ• to vimalabuddhi nÄ• mÄ• cariyo mukhamattadÄ«panÄ« nÄ• mal cullavajirabuddhi nÄ• mÄ• cariyo atthabyÄ• khyÄ• naá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si.

dÄ«paá¹…karo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo rÅ«pasiddhi pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, rÅ«pasiddhi á¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ, samp tividhaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. Ä• nandÄ• cariyassa jeá¹-á¹-hasisso dhammapÄ• lo nÄ• nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. kassapo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo mohavicchedanÄ«, vimaticchedan anÄ• gatavaá¹ƒsoti, catuvidhaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si.

mahÄ• nÄ• mo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo, saddhammapakÄ• sanÄ« nÄ• ma paá¹-isambhidÄ• magga dÄ«pavaá¹ƒso, thÅ«pavaá¹ƒso, bodhivaá¹ƒso, cÅ«lavaá¹ƒso, mahÄ• vaá¹ƒso, paá¹-isambh gaá¹‡á¹-hi ceti ime cha ganthÄ• mahÄ• nÄ• mÄ• cari visuá¹ƒ visuá¹ƒ katÄ• .

navo mahÄ• nÄ• mo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo navaá¹ƒ mahÄ• vaá¹ƒsa nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• saddhammapajjotikaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma mahÄ• niddesassa aá¹-á¹-hakathaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. moggalÄ• n moggalÄ• nabyÄ• karaá¹‡aá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. saá¹…gharakkhito nÄ• mÄ• nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. vuttodayakÄ• ro nÄ• mÄ• cariyo vuttodayaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma paka nÄ• mÄ• cariyo khuddakasikkhaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. purÄ• á¹‡akhuddasikkh ceti, ime dve ganthÄ• dvehÄ• cariyehi visuá¹ƒ visuá¹ƒ katÄ• .

anuruddho nÄ• mÄ• cariyo paramatthavinicchayaá¹ƒ, nÄ• marÅ«paparicchedaá¹ƒ, abhidha tividhaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. khemo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo khemaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ nÄ• mÄ• cariyo vinayaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya sÄ• ratthadÄ«panÄ« nÄ• ma á¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ; vinayasa vinayasaá¹…gahassaá¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ; aá¹…guttaraá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya sÄ• ratthamaÃ±jÅ«saá¹ƒ r paÃ±cikÄ• á¹-Ä«kaÃ±ceti, ime paÃ±ca ganthe akÄ• si. buddhanÄ• go nÄ• mÄ• cariyo vina kaá¹…khÄ• vitaraá¹‡Ä«yÄ• á¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. navo moggalÄ• no nÄ• mÄ• cariyo abhidh pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. vÄ• cissaro nÄ• mÄ• cariyo mahÄ• sÄ• mi nÄ• ma subodhÄ• laá¹…
vivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, sumaá¹…galappasÄ• dani nÄ• ma khuddasikkhÄ• ya á¹-Ä«kÄ• ; sambandha á¹-Ä«kÄ• ; bÄ• lÄ• vatÄ• ro, moggalÄ• nabyÄ• karaá¹‡assa paÃ±cikÄ• ya á¹-Ä«kÄ• ; yogav á¹-Ä«kÄ• , uttaravinicchayassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• , nÄ• marÅ«pa-paricchedassa vibhÄ• go, saddatth padarÅ«pavibhÄ• vanaá¹ƒ; khemassa pakaraá¹‡assa á¹-Ä«kÄ• , sÄ«mÄ• laá¹…kÄ• ro, mÅ rÅ«pavibhÄ• go, paccayasaá¹…gaho, saccasaá¹…khepassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• ceti, ime aá¹-á¹-hÄ• sumaá¹…galo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo abhidhammÄ• vatÄ• rassaá¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ, abhidhammatthasaá¹ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. buddhapiyo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo sÄ• ratthasaá¹…gahaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakar nÄ• mÄ• cariyo dantadhÄ• tu pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. medhaá¹…karo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo jinaca akÄ• si. buddharakkhito nÄ• mÄ• cariyo jinalaá¹…kÄ• raá¹ƒ, jinalaá¹…kÄ• rassa á¹-Ä«kaÃ± pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. upatisso nÄ• mÄ• cariyo anÄ• gatavaá¹ƒsassa aá¹-á¹-hakathaá¹ƒ a kaá¹…khÄ• vitaraá¹‡Ä«yÄ• lÄ«natthappakÄ• sini, nisandeho, dhammÄ• nusÄ• raá¹‡Ä«, Ã Ã±eyyÄ• santatiyÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• , sumatÄ• dÄ• vatÄ• ro, lokapaÃ±Ã±atti pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, tath nalÄ• á¹-adhÄ• tu vaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , sÄ«haá¸·avatthu, dhammadÄ«pako, paá¹-ipattisaá¹…gah abhidhammagaá¹‡á¹-hi, nettipakaraá¹‡agaá¹‡á¹-hi, visuddhimaggacullanavaá¹-Ä«kÄ• , sota pasÄ• dajananÄ«, okÄ• saloko, subodhÄ• laá¹…kÄ• rassa nava á¹-Ä«kÄ• ceti, ime vÄ«sat visuá¹ƒ visuá¹ƒ katÄ• .

saddhammasiri nÄ• mÄ• cariyo saddatthabhedacintÄ• nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. dev kÅ«á¹-avaá¹‡á¹‡anaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. cullabuddhaghoso nÄ• mÄ• cariyo pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. raá¹-á¹-hapÄ• lo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo madhurasaá¹…gÄ• haá¹‡Ä«kitti nÄ subhÅ«tacando nÄ• mÄ• cariyo liá¹…gatthavivaraá¹‡a-pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. aggavaá¹ƒso pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ nÄ• ma akÄ• si. vajirabuddhi nÄ• mÄ• cariyo mahÄ• á¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma nyÄ guá¹‡asÄ• garo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo mukhamattasÄ• raá¹ƒ, mukhamattasÄ• rassa á¹-Ä«kaÃ±ca abhayo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo saddatthabhedacintÄ• ya mahÄ• á¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. Ã±Ä• á¹‡asÄ• liá¹…gatthavivaraá¹‡appakÄ• sanaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. aÃ±Ã±ataro Ä• cariy bÄ• lappabodhanaÃ±ca duvidhaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. aÃ±Ã±ataro Ä• cariyo saddatth majjhimaá¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. uttamo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo bÄ• lÄ• vatÄ• raá¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ, liá¹…gatt duvidhaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. aÃ±Ã±ataro Ä• cariyo saddatthabhedacintÄ• ya nava-á¹ abhidhÄ• nappadÄ«pikÄ• yaá¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ, gaá¹‡á¹-hipakaraá¹‡assa daá¹‡á¸• Ä«ppakaraá¹‡a á¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ, koladdhajanassa sakaá¹-abhÄ• sÄ• ya kataá¹-Ä«kaÃ±ca tividhaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡a nÄ• mÄ• cariyo kÄ• rikaá¹ƒ, etimÄ• sapidÄ«panÄ«, manohÄ• raÃ±ca tividhaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡a Ä• cariyo kÄ• rikÄ• ya á¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. aÃ±Ã±ataro Ä• cariyo etimÄ• sapidÄ«pikÄ• ya á aÃ±Ã±ataro Ä• cariyo saddabindu nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. saddhammaguru nÄ• m nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. sÄ• riputto nÄ• mÄ• cariyo saddavuttippakÄ• sakassa á¹-Ä« Ä• cariyo kaccÄ• yanasÄ• raá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ kaccÄ• yanasÄ• rassa á¹-Ä«kaÃ±c akÄ• si. navo medhaá¹…karo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo lokadÄ«pakasÄ• raá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ nÄ• mÄ• cariyo lokuppatti nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. cÄ«varo nÄ• mÄ• cariyo jaá¹…gh mÄ• tikatthadÄ«panÄ«, abhidhammatthasaá¹…gahavaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , sÄ«mÄ• laá¹…kÄ• rass vinayasamuá¹-á¹-hÄ• nadÄ«panÄ« á¹-Ä«kÄ• , gaá¹‡á¹-hi sÄ• ro, paá¹-á¹-hÄ• nagaá¹‡anÄ• pÄ• timokkho, ceti, ime aá¹-á¹-ha ganthe saddhammajotipÄ• lÄ• cariyo akÄ• si. vimalabudd abhidhamma-pannarasaá¹-á¹-hÄ• naá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ akÄ• si. navo vimalabuddhi saddasÄ• ratthajÄ• linÄ«, saddasÄ• ratthajÄ• liniyÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• , vuttodaya á¹-Ä«kÄ• , para abhidhammasaá¹…gahaá¹-Ä«kÄ• ya anuá¹-Ä«kÄ• dasagaá¹‡á¹-hivaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , mÄ• gadhabhÅ«tÄ• vidaggamukhamaá¹‡á¸• anaá¹-Ä«kÄ• ceti ime cha ganthe akÄ• si. aÃ±

paÃ±capakaraá¹‡aá¹-Ä«kÄ• ya navÄ• nuá¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. ariyavaá¹ƒso nÄ• mÄ• cariyo [paramattha] maá¹‡isÄ• ramaÃ±jÅ«saá¹ƒ nÄ• ma navÄ• nuá¹-Ä«kaá¹ƒ akÄ• si. abhidhamm peá¹-akopadesassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• , catubhÄ• á¹‡avÄ• rassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , mahÄ• sÄ• rapak sÄ• ratthadÄ«panÄ« gati pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, hatthasÄ• ro, bhummasaá¹…gaho, bhummanidde dasavatthukÄ• yaviratiá¹-Ä«kÄ• , jotanÄ• nirutti, vibhattikathÄ• , kaccÄ• yanavivaraá¹‡Ä• , paÃ±cagati vaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , bÄ• lacittapabodhanaá¹ƒ, dhammacakkasuttassa navaá¹-á¹-hak pakaraá¹‡assa á¹-Ä«kÄ• ceti, ime vÄ«sati ganthÄ• nÄ• nÄ• cariyehi katÄ• , aÃ±Ã±Ä• ni pa katamÄ• ni saddhammo pÄ• yano, bÄ• lappabodhanapakaraá¹‡assa á¹-Ä«kÄ• ca, jinÄ• la navaá¹-Ä«kÄ• ca, liá¹…gatthavivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, liá¹…gavinicchayo; pÄ• timokkhavivaraá¹‡aá¹ paramatthakathÄ• vivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, samantapÄ• sÄ• dikÄ• vivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, catubhÄ• á¹‡avÄ• vivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, abhidhammatthasaá¹…gahavivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, saccasaá¹…khepavivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, saddatthabhedacintÄ• vivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, saddavuttivivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, kaccÄ• yanasÄ• ravivaraá¹‡ abhidhammatthasaá¹…gahassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• vivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, mahÄ• vessantarÄ• jÄ• takassa v mahÄ• vessantarajÄ• takassa navaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , paá¹-hama saá¹ƒbodhi, lokanetti ca, bu milindapaÃ±hÄ• vaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , caturÄ• rakkhÄ• , caturakkhÄ• ya aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , sadda navaá¹-Ä«kÄ• , iccevaá¹ƒ paÃ±cavÄ«sati pamÄ• á¹‡Ä• ni pakaraá¹‡Ä• ni laá¹…ko dÄ«pÄ• paá¹‡á¸• itehi katÄ• ni ahesuá¹ƒ, sambuddhegÄ• thÄ• ca, naradeva nÄ• ma gÄ• thÄ• ca, vÄ«sati ovÄ• dagÄ• thÄ• ca, dÄ• nasattari, sÄ«lasattari, sappÄ• dÄ• navaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , ana aá¹-á¹-havÄ«sati buddhavandanagÄ• thÄ• ca, atÄ«tÄ• nÄ• gatapaccuppannavandanagÄ• asÄ«timahÄ• sÄ• vakavandanagÄ• thÄ• ca, navahÄ• raguá¹‡avaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• cÄ• ti, ime b gÄ• thÄ• yo paá¹‡á¸• itehi laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«pÄ• disuá¹-á¹-hÄ• nesu katÄ• ahesuá¹ƒ [iti cullag

ganthakÄ• rakÄ• cariya dÄ«pako nÄ• ma dutiyo paricchedo]

3. Ä• cariyÄ• naá¹ƒ saÃ±jÄ• taá¹-á¹-hÄ• naparicchedo

Ä• cariyesu ca atthi jambudÄ«pikÄ• cariyÄ• atthi, laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«pikÄ• cariyÄ• . katame jan laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«pikÄ• cariyÄ• ? mahÄ• kaccÄ• yano jambudÄ«pikÄ• cariyo so hi avantiraá¹-á candapajjotassa nÄ• ma raÃ±Ã±o purohito hutvÄ• kÄ• mÄ• naá¹ƒ Ä• dÄ«navaá¹ƒ disvÄ• , satthusÄ• sane pabbajjitvÄ• heá¹-á¹-hÄ• vuttappakÄ• re ganthe akÄ• si. mahÄ• aá¹-á¹-hak mahÄ• paccarikÄ• cariyo, mahÄ• kurundikÄ• cariyo, aÃ±Ã±ataro Ä• cariyÄ• dveti ime ca b laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«pikÄ• cariyÄ• nÄ• ma te kira buddhaghosÄ• cariyassa pÅ«re bhÅ«tÄ• cariye mahÄ• buddhaghosÄ• cariyo jambudÄ«piko. so kira magadharaá¹-á¹-he ghosakagÄ• me ra brÄ• hmaá¹‡assa putto, satthusÄ• sane pabbajjitvÄ• laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«paá¹ƒ gato heá¹-á¹-hÄ• akÄ• si.

buddhadattÄ• cariyo, Ä• nandÄ• cariyo, dhammapÄ• lÄ• cariyo, dve bubbÄ• cariyo, mahÄ• cullavajira-buddhÄ• cariyo, vimalabuddhasaá¹…khÄ• to dÄ«paá¹…karÄ• cariyo, culladÄ«pa culladhammapÄ• lÄ• cariyo, kassapÄ• cariyoti ime ekÄ• dasacariyÄ• jambudÄ«pikÄ• heá¹ akaá¹ƒsu. mahÄ• nÄ• mÄ• cariyo, aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• cariyÄ• , cullamahÄ• nÄ• mÄ• cariyo, upas saá¹…gharakkhitÄ• cariyo, vuttodayakÄ• rÄ• cariyo, dhammasirÄ• cariyo, aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• dv khemÄ• cariyo, sÄ• riputtÄ• cariyo, buddhanÄ• gÄ• cariyo, cullamoggalÄ• nÄ• cariyo, vÄ• c sumaá¹…galÄ• cariyo, buddhapiyÄ• cariyo, dhammakitti Ä• cariyo medhaá¹…karÄ• cariyo, upatissÄ• cariyo, aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• vÄ«satÄ• cariyÄ• , saddhammasirÄ• cariyo, devÄ• cariyo, sÄ• riputtÄ• cariyo, raá¹-á¹-hapÄ• lÄ• cariyoti ime dve paÃ±Ã±Ä• sÄ• cariyÄ• laá¹…kÄ• dÄ
subhÅ«tacandÄ• cariyo, aggavaá¹ƒsÄ• cariyo, navo vajirabuddhÄ• cariyo, guá¹‡asÄ• garÄ• Ã±Ä• á¹‡asÄ• garÄ• cariyo, aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• dvÄ• cariyÄ• , uttamÄ• cariyo, aÃ±Ã±ataro Ä• ca dhammasenÄ• patÄ• cariyo, aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• tayo Ä• cariyÄ• , saddhammaguru Ä• cariyo, sÄ Ä• cariyo, medhaá¹…karÄ• cariyo, aggapaá¹‡á¸• itÄ• cariyo, cÄ«varÄ• cariyo, saddhamma vimalabuddhÄ• cariyoti ime tevÄ«sati Ä• cariyÄ• jambudÄ«pikÄ• heá¹-á¹-hÄ• vuttappakÄ• saá¹…khÄ• te arimaddana nagare akaá¹ƒsu.

navovimalabuddhÄ• cariyo jambudÄ«piko heá¹-á¹-hÄ• vuttappakÄ• re ganthe paá¹ƒyanag ariyavaá¹ƒsÄ• cariyoti ime dvÄ• cariyÄ• jambudÄ«pikÄ• heá¹-á¹-hÄ• vuttappakÄ• re gant aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• vÄ«satÄ• cariyÄ• jambudÄ«pikÄ• heá¹-á¹-hÄ• vuttappakÄ• re ganthe kiÃ±c

[iti cullaganthavaá¹ƒse Ä• cariyÄ• naá¹ƒ saÃ±jÄ• taá¹-á¹-hÄ• na dÄ«pako nÄ• ma tatiyo pa

4. Ä• yÄ• yakÄ• cariya-paricchedo

ganthÄ• pana siyÄ• Ä• yÄ• canena Ä• cariyehi katÄ• , siyÄ• anÄ• yÄ• canena Ä• cariyeh Ä• yÄ• canena, katame anÄ• yÄ• canena katÄ• ? mahÄ• kaccÄ• yana gantho, mahÄ• aá¹-á gantho, mahÄ• kurundi gantho, mahÄ• paccariyaganthassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho, mahÄ aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ganthoti. imehi cha ganthehi attano matiyÄ• sÄ• sanuggahanatthÄ• ya sa

ka. buddhaghosÄ• cariya-ganthadÄ«panÄ• buddhaghosÄ• cariya ganthesu pana visuddhimaggo, saá¹…ghapÄ• lena nÄ• ma saá¹…gh buddhaghosÄ• cariyena kato. dÄ«ghanikÄ• yassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho dÄ• á¹-hÄ• nÄ•

Ä• yÄ• citena buddhaghosÄ• cariyena kato. majjhimanikÄ• yassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho
Ä• yÄ• citena buddhaghosÄ• cariyena kato. saá¹ƒyuttanikÄ• yassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho Ä• yÄ• citena buddhaghosÄ• cariyena kato. aá¹…guttaranikÄ• yassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gant sahaÄ• jÄ«vakena upÄ• sakena ca Ä• yÄ• citena buddhaghosÄ• cariyena kato. samantapÄ gantho buddhasiri nÄ• mena therena Ä• yÄ• citena buddhaghosÄ• cariyena kato. sattannaá aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho cullabuddhaghosena bhikkhunÄ• Ä• yÄ• citena buddhaghosÄ• ca dhammapadassaaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho kumÄ• rakassapanÄ• mena therena Ä• yÄ• citen jÄ• takassaaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho atthadassÄ«, buddhamitta, buddhapiyadeva saá¹…khÄ Ä• yÄ• citena buddhaghosÄ• cariyena kato. khuddakapÄ• á¹-hassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho attano matiyÄ• buddhaghosÄ• cariyena kato. apadÄ• nassa aá¹-á paÃ±canikÄ• ya viÃ±Ã±Å«hi paÃ±cahi therehi Ä• yÄ• citena buddhaghosÄ• cariyena kato.

buddhaghosÄ• cariya-ganthadÄ«panÄ• niá¹-á¹-hitÄ• .

kha. buddhadattÄ• cariya-ganthadÄ«panÄ•

buddhattÄ• cariya ganthesu pana vinaya-vinicchayagantho attano sissena buddhasÄ«hena buddhattÄ• cariyÄ• kato. uttara-vinicchayagantho saá¹…ghapÄ• lena nÄ• mena therena Ä• buddhadattÄ• cariyena kato. abhidhammÄ• vatÄ• ro nÄ• ma gantho attano sissena sumati buddhadattÄ• cariyena kato. buddhavaá¹ƒsassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho teneva buddhasÄ buddhadattÄ• cariyena kato.

buddhadattÄ• cariya-ganthadÄ«panÄ• niá¹-á¹-hitÄ• .

abhidhammakathÄ• ya mÅ«laá¹-Ä«kÄ• nÄ• ma á¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho buddhamittÄ• nÄ• ma th Ä• nandÄ• cariyena kato.

ga. dhammapÄ• lÄ• cariyena-ganthadÄ«panÄ•

nettipakaraá¹‡assa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho dhammarakkhita nÄ• ma therena Ä• yÄ• citen itivuttakaaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho, udÄ• naaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho, cariyÄ• piá¹-akaaá¹-á¹-therakathÄ• aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho, therikathÄ• aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho, vimÄ• navatthua petavatthuaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho, ime satta ganthÄ• attano matiyÄ• dhammapÄ• lÄ• car visuddhimaggaá¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho dÄ• á¹-hÄ• nÄ• mena nÄ• ma therena Ä• yÄ• citena dhar dÄ«ghanikÄ• ya-aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• dÄ«naá¹ƒ catunnaá¹ƒ aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• naá¹ƒ á¹-Ä«kÄ• ga abhidhammaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya anuá¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho, nettipakaraá¹‡aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya á¹-buddhavaá¹ƒsaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya á¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho, jÄ• takaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya á¹-Ä«kÄ• ga attano matiyÄ• dhammapÄ• lÄ• cariyena kato.

dhammapÄ• lÄ• cariya-ganthadÄ«panÄ• niá¹-á¹-hitÄ• .

niruttimaÃ±jÅ«sÄ• nÄ• ma cullaniruttiá¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho, mahÄ• niruttisaá¹…khepo nÄ• ma pubbÄ• cariyehi viá¹ƒsu kato.

paÃ±ca vinayapakaraá¹‡Ä• naá¹ƒ vinayagaá¹‡á¹-hi nÄ• ma gantho attano matiyÄ• mahÄ•
nyÄ• sasaá¹…khÄ• to mukhamattadÄ«panÄ« nÄ• ma gantho attano matiyÄ• vimalabuddhi atthabyakkhyÄ• no nÄ• ma gantho attano matiyÄ• cullavajirabuddhÄ• cariyena kato. rÅ«pa á¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho sabba paÃ±casuttaÃ±ca attano matiyÄ• dÄ«paá¹…karÄ• cariyena kato. s attano matiyÄ• culladhammapÄ• lÄ• cariyena kato. mohacchedanÄ« gantho, vimaticcheda buddhavaá¹ƒso, anÄ• gatavaá¹ƒso ca. attano matiyÄ• kassapÄ• cariyena kato. paá¹-isamb aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho mahÄ• nÄ• mena upÄ• sakena Ä• yÄ• citena mahÄ• nÄ• mÄ• cari thÅ«pavaá¹ƒso, bodhivaá¹ƒso, cullavaá¹ƒso, porÄ• á¹‡avaá¹ƒso, mahÄ• vaá¹ƒso cÄ• ti ime mahÄ• nÄ• mÄ• cariyehi visuá¹ƒ katÄ• . navo mahÄ• vaá¹ƒsagantho attano matiyÄ• cullan saddhammapajjotikÄ• nÄ• ma mahÄ• niddesassa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• gantho devena therena kato. moggalÄ• nabyÄ• karaá¹‡aganthe attano matiyÄ• moggalÄ• nÄ• cariyena kato. subo attano matiyÄ• saá¹…gharakkhitÄ• cariyena kato. vuttodaya gantho attano matiyÄ• vuttod khuddasikkhÄ• nÄ• ma gantho attano matiyÄ• dhammasirÄ• cariyena kato. porÄ• á¹‡akhu mÅ«lasikkhÄ• cÄ• ti, ime dve ganthe attano matiyÄ• aÃ±Ã±atarehi dvihÄ• cariyehi viá¹ƒsu paramatthavinicchayaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma gantho saá¹…gharakkhitena therena Ä• yÄ• citena anuru nÄ• marÅ«pa-paricchedo nÄ• ma gantho attano matiyÄ• anuruddhÄ• cariyena kato. abhidh gantho namma nÄ• mena upÄ• sakena Ä• yÄ• citena anuruddhÄ• cariyena kato. khemo nÄ khemÄ• cariyena kato. sÄ• ratthadÄ«panÄ« nÄ• ma vinayaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya á¹-Ä«kÄ• gan vinayasaá¹…gahassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho, aá¹…guttaraá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• ya navo á¹-Ä«kÄ• gan parakkamabÄ• hu nÄ• mena laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«pissarena raÃ±Ã±Ä• Ä• yÄ• citena sÄ• riputtÄ• sakaá¹-asaddasatthassa paÃ±cikÄ• ya á¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho attano matiyÄ• sÄ• riputtÄ• cariye kaá¹…khÄ• vitaraá¹‡iyÄ• vinayatthamaÃ±jÅ«sÄ• nÄ• ma á¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho sumedhÄ• nÄ

buddhanÄ• gÄ• cariyena kato. abhidhÄ• nappadÄ«piko nÄ• ma gantho attano matiyÄ• cÅ« subodhÄ• laá¹…kÄ• rassa mahÄ• sÄ• mi nÄ• ma á¹-Ä«kÄ• , vuttodaya vivaraá¹‡aÃ±cÄ• ti i vÄ• cissarena katÄ• . khuddasikkhÄ• ya sumaá¹…galappasÄ• dani nÄ• ma navo á¹-Ä«kÄ• navÄ• cissarena kato. sambandhacintÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• bÄ• lÄ• vatÄ• ro, moggalÄ• nabyÄ• kara ganthÄ• , sumaá¹…gala, buddhamitta, mahÄ• kassapa saá¹…khÄ• tehi tÄ«hi therehi ca, dh vÄ• nijjÄ• bhÄ• tu upÄ• sakena ca Ä• yÄ• citena vÄ• cissarena kato. nÄ• marÅ«paricche padarÅ«pa-vibhÄ• vanaá¹ƒ, khemapakaraá¹‡assa á¹-Ä«kÄ• , sÄ«mÄ• laá¹…kÄ• ro, mÅ«las rÅ«pavibhÄ• go, paccayasaá¹…gaho cÄ• ti ime satta ganthÄ• attano matiyÄ• vÄ• cissaren á¹-Ä«kÄ• gantho sÄ• riputta-nÄ• mena therena Ä• yÄ• citena vÄ• cissarena kato. abhidhan abhidhammatthasaá¹…gahassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• cÄ• ti ime dve ganthÄ• attano matiyÄ• sumaá¹.
sÄ• ratthasaá¹…gahaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma gantho attano matiyÄ• buddhappiyena kato dantadhÄ• tu pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ

laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«pissarassa raÃ±Ã±o senÄ• patinÄ• Ä• yÄ• citena dhammakittinÄ• mÄ• cariy pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• medhaá¹…karÄ• cariyena kataá¹ƒ. jinÄ• laá¹…kÄ• ro, jinÄ• attano matiyÄ• buddharakkhitÄ• cariyena kato. amatadharassa nÄ• ma anÄ• gatavaá¹ƒsas aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• upatissÄ• cariyena katÄ• . kaá¹…khÄ• vitaraá¹‡Ä«yÄ• lÄ«natthapakÄ• sin dhammÄ• nusÄ• raá¹‡Ä«, Ã±eyyÄ• -santati, Ã±eyyÄ• -santatiyÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• , sumatÄ• vatÄ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, tathÄ• gatuppatti pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, nalÄ• á¹-adhÄ• tuvaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , sÄ«haá¸ paá¹-ipatti saá¹…gaho, visuddhimaggassa gaá¹‡á¹-hi, abhidhammagaá¹‡á¹-hi, nettipakaraá visuddhimaggacÅ«la-navaá¹-Ä«kÄ• , sotabbamÄ• linÄ«, pasÄ• dajananÄ«, okassaloko, sub á¹-Ä«kÄ• ceti, ime vÄ«sati ganthÄ• attano matiyÄ• vÄ«satÄ• cariyehi viá¹ƒsu viá¹ƒsu katÄ

saddattha bhedacintÄ• nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• saddhammasirinÄ• mÄ• ca sumana-kÅ«á¹-avaá¹‡á¹‡anaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, rÄ• hulÄ• nÄ• ma therena Ä• yÄ• kataá¹ƒ. sotattha kiá¹ƒ mahÄ• nidÄ• naá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• cullabud madhurasaá¹…gÄ• hani nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• raá¹-á¹-hapÄ• lÄ• cariyena liá¹…gatthavivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• subhÅ«tacandÄ• cariyena saddanÄ«tipakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• aggavaá¹ƒsÄ• cariyena kataá¹ƒ. nyÄ• sapakaraá á¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• vajirabuddhÄ• cariyena katÄ• . mukhamattasÄ• ro attano matiyÄ kato. mukhamattasÄ• rassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• sutasampanna nÄ• mena dhammarÄ• jino gurunÄ• guá¹‡asÄ• garÄ• cariyena katÄ• . saddatthabhedacintÄ• ya mahÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ liá¹…gatthavivaraá¹‡appakÄ• sakaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• Ã±Ä• á¹‡asÄ guá¸·hatthassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• bÄ• lappabodhanaÃ±ca duvidhaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ kataá¹ƒ. saddatthabhedacintÄ• ya majjhimaá¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• cariyen á¹-Ä«kÄ• , liá¹…gatthavivaraá¹‡Ä• á¹-Ä«kÄ• ca attano matiyÄ• uttamÄ• cariyena katÄ• . s á¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• cariyena katÄ• . abhidhÄ• nappadÄ«pikÄ• ya á¹-Ä« magagha-bhÅ«tÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• cÄ• ti duvidhÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• yo attano mati, sÄ«hasÅ«ra nÄ• m koladdhajanassaá¹-Ä«kÄ• pÄ• sÄ• dikena nÄ• ma therena Ä• yÄ• citena teneva mahÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ Ã±Ä• á¹‡agambhÄ«ranÄ• mena bhikkhunÄ• Ä• yÄ• citena dhammasenÄ• p etimÄ• samidÄ«panÄ« [vÄ• etimÄ• samidÄ«pikÄ•] nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ manohÄ• raÃ±c dhammasenÄ• patÄ• cariyena kataá¹ƒ. kÄ• rikÄ• ya á¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• aÃ±Ã±atarÄ etimÄ• samidÄ«pikÄ• ya á¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• cariyena katÄ• .

saddabindupakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• dhammarÄ• jassa gurunÄ• aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• cariye saddavuttippakÄ• sakaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ aÃ±Ã±atarena bhikkhunÄ• Ä• yÄ• citena kataá¹ƒ. saddavuttippakÄ• sakassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• sÄ• riputtÄ• cariyena katÄ• .

kaccÄ• yana sÄ• ro ca kaccÄ• yanasÄ• rassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• cÄ• ti duvidhaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ a aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• cariyena kataá¹ƒ. lokadÄ«pakasÄ• raá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ navenamedhaá¹…karÄ• cariyena kataá¹ƒ. lokuppattipakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• aggapa jaá¹…ghadÄ• sakassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• bhÅ«tÄ• magadhaá¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• cÄ«varÄ• ca
mÄ• tikatthadÄ«panÄ«, abhidhammatthasaá¹…gahavaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , sÄ«mÄ• laá¹…kÄ• rass paá¹-á¹-hÄ• nagaá¹‡anÄ• nayo cÄ• ti ime paÃ±ca pakaraá¹‡Ä• ni attano matiyÄ• saddham saá¹…khepavaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• parakkamabÄ• hu-nÄ• mena jambudÄ«pissarena raÃ±Ã±o Ä• y saddhammajotipÄ• lÄ• cariyena katÄ• . kaccÄ• yanassa suttaniddeso attano sissena dham Ä• yÄ• citena saddhammajotipÄ• lÄ• cariyena kato. vinayasamuá¹-á¹-hÄ• nadÄ«panÄ« nÄ• gurunÄ• saá¹…ghatherena Ä• yÄ• citena saddhamma-jotipÄ• lÄ• cariyena kataá¹ƒ.

sattapakaraá¹‡Ä• ni pana tena pukkÄ• managare katÄ• ni. saá¹…khepavaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• va la abhidhamma-pannarasaá¹-á¹-hÄ• navaá¹‡á¹‡Ä• naá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ katÄ• . saddasÄ• ratthajÄ• linÄ« nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ attano matiyÄ• navena-vimalabudd saddasÄ• rattha-jÄ• liniyÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• , paá¹ƒyanagare raÃ±Ã±o gurunÄ• saá¹…gharÄ• jen vimalabuddhÄ• cariyena katÄ• . vuttodayassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• , abhidhammasaá¹…gahassa á¹-Ä« nÄ• ma anuá¹-Ä«kÄ• , dasagaá¹‡á¹-hivaá¹‡á¹‡anaá¹ƒ nÄ• ma pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, magadhabhÅ«tavidaggamukhamaá¹‡á¸• aniyÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• cÄ• ti imÄ• ni cattÄ• ri pakaraá¹‡ navena vimalabuddhÄ• cariyena katÄ• ni.

paÃ±capakaraá¹‡aá¹-Ä«kÄ• ya navÄ• nuá¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• aÃ±Ã±ataro cariyena ka navaá¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• aÃ±Ã±atarÄ• cariyena katÄ• . abhidhammatthasaá¹…gahaá [maá¹‡isÄ• ramaÃ±jÅ«sÄ•] nÄ• ma navÄ• nuá¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• ariyavaá¹ƒsÄ• cari

peá¹-akopadesassa á¹-Ä«kÄ• attano matiyÄ• udumbarinÄ• mÄ• cariyena pukkÄ• managa aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , mahÄ• sÄ• rapakÄ• sini, mahÄ• dÄ«panÄ«, sÄ• ratthadÄ«panÄ«, gatipak bhummasaá¹…gaho, bhummaniddeso, dasavatthukÄ• yaviratiá¹-Ä«kÄ• , codanÄ• nirutti, vib saddhammamÄ• lini, paÃ±cagativaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , bÄ• lacitta-pabodhanaá¹ƒ, dhammacakkas dantadhÄ• tu-pakaraá¹‡assa á¹-Ä«kÄ• ca saddhammopÄ• yano bÄ• lappabodhanaá¹-Ä«kÄ navaá¹-Ä«kÄ• ca, liá¹…gattha-vivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, liá¹…gattha-vinicchayo, pÄ• timokkhavivaraá¹ paramatthakathÄ• vivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, samantapÄ• sÄ• dikavivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, catubhÄ• á¹‡avÄ• ra abhidhammasaá¹…gahavivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, saccasaá¹…khepavivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, saddatthabhedaci saddavuttivivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, kaccÄ• yanasÄ• ravivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, kaccÄ• yanavivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, abhidhammasaá¹…gahassaá¹-Ä«kÄ• vivaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ, mahÄ• vessantarajÄ• takassa vivaraá¹ mahÄ• vessantarajÄ• takassa navaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , paá¹-hama-sambodhi ca lokanetti, budd milinda-paÃ±ho vaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• , caturÄ• rakkhÄ• , caturÄ• rakkhÄ• yaaá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• , sad navaá¹-Ä«kÄ• cÄ• ti imÄ• ni, ticattÄ• lÄ«sa pakaraá¹‡Ä• ni attano matiyÄ• sÄ• sanassa jÄ á¹-hitiyÄ• ca laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«pÄ• dÄ«su viá¹ƒsu viá¹ƒsu katÄ• ni.

sambuddhe gÄ• thÄ• ca ... pe ... navahÄ• raguá¹‡avaá¹‡á¹‡anÄ• cÄ• ti ime buddhapaá¹‡ attano buddhaguá¹‡apakÄ• sanatthÄ• ya attano ca pare ca anantapaÃ±Ã±Ä• pavattanatthÄ laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«pÄ• dÄ«su viá¹ƒsu viá¹ƒsu katÄ• .

[iti culla-ganthavaá¹ƒse Ä• yÄ• cakÄ• cariyadÄ«pako nÄ• ma catuttho paricchedo.]

5. pakiá¹‡á¹‡aka-paricchedo

nÄ• maá¹ƒ Ä• ropanaá¹ƒ potthakaá¹ƒ ganthakÄ• rassa ca. lekhaá¹ƒlekhÄ• panaÃ±ceva, va caturÄ• sÄ«tiyÄ• dhammakkhandhasahassÄ• ni piá¹-aka, nikÄ• yaá¹…ga, vagga, nipÄ• tÄ kenÄ• ropitaá¹ƒ, kattha Ä• ropitaá¹ƒ, kadÄ• Ä• ropitaá¹ƒ, kimatthaá¹ƒ Ä• ropitanti? tatrÄ• ya Ä• ropitanti paÃ±casatakhÄ«á¹‡Ä• savehi Ä• ropitaá¹ƒ. tehi sabbabuddhavacanaá¹ƒ saá¹…
piá¹-akaá¹ƒ, ayaá¹ƒ nikÄ• yo, idaá¹ƒ aá¹…gaá¹ƒ, ayaá¹ƒ vaggo, ayaá¹ƒ nipÄ• toti. evamÄ• d Ä• ropenti. kattha Ä• ropitanti? rÄ• jagahe vebhÄ• rapabbatassa pÄ• de dhammamaá¹‡á¸• Ä• ropitanti? bhagavato parinibbute paá¹-hamasaá¹…gÄ• yanakÄ• le Ä• ropitaá¹ƒ. kimattha dhammakkhandhÄ• naá¹ƒ vohÄ• rasukhatthÄ• ya sukhadhÄ• raá¹‡atthÄ• ya ca Ä• ropitaá¹ khÄ«á¹‡Ä• savÄ• tesaÃ±ca dhammakkhandhÄ• naá¹ƒ nÄ• ma vagganipÄ• tato. imassa dh imassa ca pakaraá¹‡assa ayaá¹ƒ nÄ• moti, abravuá¹ƒ sabbaá¹ƒ nÄ• mÄ• dikaá¹ƒ kiccaá¹ƒ yadi nÄ• mÄ• dikaá¹ƒ kiccaá¹ƒ akataá¹ƒ na supÄ• kataá¹ƒ tasmÄ• vohÄ• rasukhatthÄ• yan anÄ• gate panatthÄ• ya nÄ• mÄ• dikaá¹ƒ pavattitaá¹ƒ asaÃ±jÄ• tanÄ• mo na suá¹-á¹-hu pÄ dhammakkhandhÄ• naá¹ƒ nÄ• ma dÄ«panÄ• niá¹-á¹-hitÄ• .

caturÄ• sÄ«ti dhammakkhandhasahassÄ• ni kena potthake Ä• ropitÄ• ni, kadÄ• Ä• ropitÄ• Ä• ropitÄ• nÄ«ti. tatrÄ• yaá¹ƒ visajjanÄ• kenÄ• ropitÄ• niti? khÄ«á¹‡Ä• savamahÄ• nÄ• ge Ä• ropitÄ• nÄ«ti? laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«pe Ä• ropitÄ• ni. kadÄ• Ä• ropitÄ• nÄ«ti? saddhÄ• tissassa vaá¹-á¹-agÄ• mani rÄ• jassa kÄ• le Ä• ropitÄ• ni. kimatthaá¹ƒ Ä• ropitÄ• nÄ«ti? dhammakkh avidhaá¹ƒsanatthÄ• ya saddhammaá¹-á¹-hitiyÄ• ca Ä• ropitÄ• ni.

dharamÄ• no hi bhagavÄ• , amhÄ• kaá¹ƒ sugatodhÄ«ro.

nikÄ• ye paÃ±cadeseti, yÄ• va nibbÄ• nagamanÄ• ||

sabbepi te bhikkhu Ä• di, manasÄ• vacasÄ• hÄ• ro.

sabbe ca vÄ• cuggatÄ• honti, mahÄ• paÃ±Ã±Ä• sativarÄ• ||

nibbÅ«te lokanÄ• thamhi, tato vassasataá¹ƒ bhave.

ariyÄ• nariyÄ• cÄ• pi ca, sabbe vÄ• cuggatÄ• dhuvaá¹ƒ ||

tato paraá¹ƒ aá¹-á¹-harasaá¹ƒ, dvisataá¹ƒvassa gaá¹‡anaá¹ƒ.

sabbe puthujjanÄ• ceva, ariyÄ• ca sabbepite ||

manasÄ• vacasÄ• yeva, vÄ• cuggatÄ• va sabbadÄ• .

duá¹-á¹-hagÄ• maá¹‡iraÃ±Ã±o ca, kÄ• le vÄ• cuggatÄ• dhuvaá¹ƒ ||

ariyÄ• nariyÄ• pi ca, nikÄ• ye dhÄ• raá¹‡Ä• sadÄ• .

tato paramhi rÄ• jÄ• ca, tato cuto ca tusite ||

uppajji deva loke so, devehi parivÄ• rito.

saddhÄ• tissoti nÄ• mena, tassa kaniá¹-á¹-hako hito ||

tato laddharaá¹-á¹-ho hoti, buddhasÄ• sanapÄ• lako ||

tadÄ• kÄ• le bhikkhÅ« Ä• suá¹ƒ, sabbe vÄ• cuggatÄ• sadÄ• .

nikÄ• ye paÃ±cavedheva, yÄ• va raÃ±Ã±o ca dhÄ• raá¹‡Ä• .

tato cuto so rÄ• jÄ• ca, tussÄ«te upapajjati.

devalokeá¹-á¹-hito santo, tadÄ• vÄ• cuggatÄ• tato ||

tassa puttÄ• pi ahesuá¹ƒ, anekÄ• varajjaá¹ƒ gatÄ• .

anukkamena cutate, devalokaá¹ƒ gatÄ• dhuvaá¹ƒ.

tadÄ• pite sabbe bhikkhÅ«, vÄ• cuggatÄ• va sabbadÄ• .

á¹• 22nikÄ• ye paÃ±cavidheva, dhÄ• raá¹‡Ä• vasatimatÄ• ||

tato paraá¹ƒ potthakesu, nikÄ• yÄ• paÃ±ca piá¹-á¹-hitÄ• .

tadÄ• aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• , sabbe ganthÄ• potthake gatÄ• .

sabbe potthesu ye ganthÄ• , pÄ• á¸·i aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• .

saá¹ƒá¹-á¹-hitÄ• saá¹ƒ á¹-hitÄ• honti, sabbepi no na santite ||

tadÄ• te potthakeyeva, nikÄ• yÄ• piá¹-hitÄ• khilÄ• .

tadÄ• aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• dÄ«ni, bhavantÄ«ti vadanti ca ||

parihÄ• ro paá¹‡á¸• itehi vattabbova.

laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«passa raÃ±Ã±ova, saddhÄ• tissassa rÄ• jino ||

puttako laá¹…kÄ• dÄ«passa, issaro dhammiko varo.

tadÄ• khÄ«á¹‡Ä• savÄ• sabbe, olokenti anagate ||

khÄ«á¹‡Ä• savÄ• passanti te, dupaÃ±Ã±eva puthujjane.

sabbepi te bhikkhÅ« Ä• suá¹ƒ, bahuá¹ƒtarÄ• puthujjanÄ• .

na sakkhissanti te paÃ±ca, nikÄ• ye vÄ• cuggataá¹ƒ iti.

potthakesu sabbe paÃ±ca, Ä• ropenti khÄ«á¹‡Ä• savÄ• ||

saddhammaá¹-á¹-hiti cirattÄ• ya, janÄ• naá¹ƒ puÃ±Ã±atthÄ• ya ca.

tato paá¹-á¹-hÄ• yate sabbe, nikÄ• yÄ• honti potthake.

aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• á¹-Ä«kÄ• sabbe, te honti potthakeá¹-á¹-hitÄ• ||

tato paá¹-á¹-hÄ• yate sabbe, bhikkhu Ä• di mahÄ• gaá¹‡Ä• .

potthakesu á¹-hiteyeva, sabbe passanti sabbadÄ• ||

[potthake Ä• ropana dÄ«pakÄ• niá¹-á¹-hitÄ• .]

yo koci paá¹‡á¸• ito dhÄ«ro, aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• dikaá¹ƒ ganthaá¹ƒ karoti vÄ• kÄ• rÄ• peti vÄ• puÃ±Ã±asaá¹ƒcayo, anantako hoti puÃ±Ã±Ä• nisaá¹ƒso. caturÄ• sÄ«ti cetiyasahassa karaá buddharÅ«pasahassa karaá¹‡asadiso, caturÄ• sÄ«ti bodhirukkhasahassaropanasadiso, cat karaá¹‡asadiso, yo ca buddhavacanamaÃ±jÅ«saá¹ƒ karoti vÄ• kÄ• rÄ• peti vÄ• , yo ca buc karoti vÄ• kÄ• rÄ• peti vÄ• , yo ca buddhavacanaá¹ƒ lekhaá¹ƒ karoti vÄ• kÄ• rÄ• peti vÄ•
ca potthakamÅ«laá¹ƒ vÄ• , deti vÄ• dÄ• peti vÄ• , yo ca telaá¹ƒ vÄ• cuá¹‡á¹‡aá¹ƒ vÄ• , dh potthakabhaÃ±janatthÄ• ya yaá¹ƒ kiÃ±ci nitthaá¹ƒ vÄ• potthakachidde Ä• vunatthÄ• ya, ya kaá¹-á¹-haphalakadvayaá¹ƒ vÄ• potthakaá¹ƒ puá¹-anatthÄ• ya yaá¹ƒ kiÃ±ci vatthaá¹ƒ vÄ• , potthaka-bandhanatthÄ• ya, yaá¹ƒ kiÃ±ci yottaá¹ƒ vÄ• potthakalÄ• pa pÅ«á¹-anatthÄ• ya y deti vÄ• dÄ• peti vÄ• .

yo ca haritÄ• lena vÄ• manosilÄ• ya vÄ• , suvaá¹‡á¹‡ena vÄ• rajatena vÄ• potthakamaá kaá¹-á¹-haphalakamaá¹‡á¸• anaá¹ƒ vÄ• karoti vÄ• kÄ• rÄ• peti vÄ• , tassa anantako hoti p hoti puÃ±Ã±Ä• nisaá¹ƒso. caturÄ• sÄ«ti cetiyasahassa karaá¹‡asadiso, caturÄ• sÄ«ti vihÄ• bhave nibbattamÄ• no so, sÄ«laguá¹‡amupÄ• gatÄ• .

mahÄ• tejo sadÄ• hoti, sÄ«hanÄ• do visÄ• rado ||

Ä• yuvaá¹‡á¹‡abaluppeto, dhammakÄ• mo bhave saddÄ• .

devamanussalokesu, mahesakkho anÄ• mayo ||

bhave nibbattamÄ• no so, paÃ±Ã±avÄ• susamÄ• hito.

adhipacca parivÄ• ro, sabbasukhÄ• dhi gacchati ||

saddohÄ«rimÄ• vadaÃ±Ã±Å«, saá¹ƒvigga mÄ• naso bhave.

aá¹…gapaccaá¹…ga sampanno, Ä• roha pariá¹‡Ä• havÄ• ||

sabbe sattÄ• pi yo loke, sabbattha pÅ«jitÄ• bhave.

devamanussa saÃ±caro, mittasahÄ• ya pÄ• lito ||

devamanussa sampattiá¹ƒ, anubhoti punappunaá¹ƒ.

arahatta phalaá¹ƒ patto, nibbÄ• naá¹ƒ pÄ• puá¹‡issati ||

paá¹-isambhidÄ• catasso, abhiÃ±Ã±Ä• chabbidhe vare.

vimokkhe aá¹-á¹-hake seá¹-á¹-he, gamissati anÄ• gate ||

tasmÄ• hi paá¹‡á¸• ito poso, saá¹ƒpassaá¹ƒ hita mattano.

kÄ• reyya sÄ• ma ganthe ca, aÃ±Ã±e cÄ• pi kÄ• rÄ• paye ||

potthake ca á¹-hite ganthe, pÄ• á¸·i aá¹-á¹-hakathÄ• dike.

dhammamaÃ±jÅ«sÄ• ganthe ca, lekhaá¹ƒ kare kÄ• rÄ• paye ||

potthakaá¹ƒ potthakamÅ«laÃ±ca, tesaá¹ƒ cullathÅ«sampi ca.

pilotikÄ• dikaá¹ƒ suttaá¹ƒ, kaá¹-á¹-haphaladvayamhi ca ||

dhammabandhanatthÄ• ya ca, yaá¹ƒ kiÃ±ci mahagghaá¹ƒ vatthaá¹ƒ.

dhammabandhanayottaÃ±ca, yaá¹ƒ kiÃ±ci thavikampi ca ||

dadeyya dhammakhettamhi, vippassannena cetasÄ• .

aÃ±Ã±o cÄ• pi dajjÄ• peyya, mittasahÄ• yabandhaveti ||

ganthÄ• karalekhalekhÄ• panÄ• nisaá¹ƒsa dÄ«panÄ• niá¹-á¹-hitÄ• .

[iti cÅ«laganthavaá¹ƒse pakiá¹‡á¹‡akadÄ«pako nÄ• ma paÃ±camo paricchedo.]

sohaá¹ƒ haá¹ƒsÄ• raá¹-á¹-ha jÄ• to, nantapaÃ±Ã±oti vissuto

saddhÄ• sÄ«la vÄ«rappeto, dhammarasaá¹ƒ gavesano ||

sohaá¹ƒ tato gantvÄ• cimaá¹ƒ, jina navaá¹ƒ yaá¹ƒ pÅ«raá¹ƒ.

sabba dhammaá¹ƒ vicinanto, vÄ«sati vassamÄ• gato ||

sabba dhammaá¹ƒ vissejjento, kikÄ• re neva bhikkhuno.

cha vassÄ• naá¹ƒ gaá¹‡aá¹ƒ bhitvÄ• , kÄ• mÄ• naá¹ƒ abhimaddanaá¹ƒ || santi sabhÄ• ca nibbÄ• naá¹ƒ, gavesiÃ±ca punappunaá¹ƒ.

vasantohaá¹ƒ, vanÄ• rammaá¹ƒ, piá¹-akattaya saá¹…gahaá¹ƒ.

ganthavaá¹ƒsaá¹ƒ imaá¹ƒ khuddaá¹ƒ, ariyasaá¹…ghadÄ• sakanti ||

iti pÄ• mojjatthÄ• ya araÃ±Ã±avÄ• sinÄ• , nandapaÃ±Ã±Ä• cariyena kato cÅ«á¸·aganthava dhammavaá¹-aá¹ƒsakanÄ• mena visuto thero, yaá¹ƒ pakaraá¹‡aá¹ƒ likkhitaá¹ƒ taá¹ƒ paripu puÃ±Ã±ena taá¹ƒ piá¹-akaá¹ƒ parisippaá¹ƒ pariniá¹-á¹-hitaá¹ƒ.

mameva sissasamÅ«hÄ• naÃ±ca parisippaá¹ƒ pariniá¹-á¹-hitaá¹ƒ. tave sissÄ• nÅ« sissÄ• n pariniá¹-á¹-hitaá¹ƒ.

cÅ«á¸·aganthavaá¹ƒso niá¹-á¹-hito.

ÕÕ ÎÎÄ
K7Äc/o Songserm Service„
Ä
K:Ä88©89 Phosi Road,„
Ä
K:ÄUdorn thani 41000„
Ä
KCÄTHAILAND„

Ä
K?ÄJuly 8, 1990„

Dear Mr Haines,

You have no doubt heard a lot about the Arama Fund and the proposal to transfer this fund to the English Sangha Trust.

Since Mr Beardsley, who was secretary to the Arama Fund, died, the fund has virtually been without a secretary, and there has been some disagreement between members of the Fund's comittee. Therefore, the affairs of the fund are at present in some disorder.

The comittee of the Arama Fund are now in agreement to transfer the fund to the English Sangha Trust, and I believe that you will be closely concerned with the legal side of this transfer. Now I would like to ask if you would also act as a temporary secretary to the Arama Fund so that it may be brought into an orderly state before it is transferred. I have the complete agreement to the comittee members of the Arama Fund in asking this, and the deeds of the Arama Fund do not require that the secretary shall be a member of the comittee.

There are four members of the comittee of the Arama Fund. They are: Mr P.M.Badley, Mr and Mrs Douglas Jones, and myself. I must comment that in talking of the agreement of the comittee in the above resolutions, I have received a letter from the two Joneses confirming their agreement. But in respect of Mr

Badley, he has sent me a letter in which he says: "So yes I consider Arama should remain for the time being as we originally said for 15 years I think it was. After that perhaps you will have a clearer idea of what you want to do in the future .....
BUT IF YOU THINK IT SHOULD BE GIVEN TO EST. then you can rely on my support and I give you that most willingly so please let me know what your decision is." The capitals were in the original.

I have since written to Mr Badley to tell him that I still consider that the Arama Fund should go to the EST and that you should be asked if you would be willing to act as temporary secretary. I also said that I took the above statement as his agreement to this course of action and if he has any comments to make, would he let me know.

As you probably know, Mr Badley had a severe stroke about two years ago and he finds movement difficult. I also think that, as often happens in such cases, it has somewhat altered his outlook on the world. I do'nt think you will find much difficulty in getting his co©operation in matters concerning the Arama Fund, but if by any chance, you do, please would youÜjÜ
Ä
K7Äc\o Songserm Service„
Ä
K;Ä88©89 Phosi Road„
Ä
K:ÄUdorn thani 41000„

Ä
K>ÄJuly 14, 1990„

Dear Dr Jatsri,

It was very kind of you and your daughter to send cheques for me to go to Bangkok. Although I decided not to go to Bangkok just yet, because the illness I had about a month ago cleared up quite quickly and I rather doubted whether the doctors could give much help. What I had was almost certainly haemorrhagic fever which lasted about a week and then cleared up. They tested blood for bacteria and found nothing except low white count. As there was a mild epidemic of haemorrhagic fever in Udorn (and in the Wat), this diagnosis was probably right.

However, I shall have to go to Bangkok sometime after the Pansa to have eyes checked, so I will use the cheques you sent when I go to Bangkok.

Would you also please thank your daughter for the copy of the instructions on the CU Writer software. I have got a fair idea of how it works now, although I still have plenty to learn about it.

I am getting more familiar with this computer and I feel I have got all the liturature I need now, to use it. But I'm afraid my memory is not so good as it used to be and a lot of the instructions which I need to know do not stick easily.

Thank you for your help, and I hope you are all well.
Starting Wordperfect.

From the C:\> prompt typeË

Ë WPË

Ë and press the ENTER key.

To Exit Wordperfect

Press F7 (function key 7)

Wordperfect will ask you if you wish to save your document press "Y" if yes you do want to save "N" if you do not.

Wordperfect will then ask if you wish to exit. Press "Y" to return to the MS©DOS command line prompt C:\>

Other Keys
ÜjÜŒItalics On Alt+I Italics Off Alt+O

Printing is done with SHIFT+F7

Saving files is done with F10

To find a file press F5ÕÕlet me know and I will write to him and ask him to help where he can. I have known him a long time and I think he will follow what I say.

I fully expect that it will take quite a long time for this transfer to be completed, and there are a few things in connection with the transferred Arama Fund which I would like to put forward for your consideration. But I shall deal with these things at a later date when the fund is in a more orderly state.

Yours sincerely

”Concerning the Rewind Spool Motor Bearings
in the Graff High Speed Recorder(Diamond)•

In regard to Mr A.Leonard's letter to you sent by FAX on 18.10.90. In fact, it was the small graphite bearings that I was referring to in my enquiry for spares.

The reason why I asked for spare bearings for the rewind motor is that on the oldest of our machines, which have seen quite heavy usage, the top bearing appears to have worn and enlarged, causing the rotor to go into a "half speed whirl". I do'nt know whether you are familiar with this term, but when it occurs, the shaft vibrates around the bearing, with a lot of noise, loss of speed and power. In bronze bearings this can often be cured by lubrication, but in graphite bearings, no extra lubrication should normally be used.

I appreciate that these bearings are fitted in the factory, and therefore, I suppose, no spares are available. As to the requirement of a special tool for fitting them, my own method would be to secure them in place with Epoxy adhesive.

As the motor unit is not manufactured by GEM, I am rather doubtful whether they will be able to help us very much on this account.

As to the end bearings for the capstan motor, we have sufficient of these for our present needs.

Bhikkhu Paá¤áá¤áavaddhoÄ
K7Äc/o Songserm Service„
Ä
K:Ä88©89 Phosi Road,„
Ä
K:ÄUdorn thani 41000„ÜjÜŒÄ
KCÄTHAILAND„

Ä
K>ÄJuly 17, 1990„

Dear Freda,
I have alreafdy written to Mr Haines about the Arama Fund, asking him if he would firstly act as temporary secretary, and secondly, telling him that the Arama Fund is in agreement to hand over to the EST, which will probably make a lot more work for him. Probably he got my letter after you sent yours of 8th July. Anyway, it was registered, so he should have it by now. The haemorraghic fever which I had would hardly warrent the gruesome description in your medical book. Medical books tend to describe the worst cases with the most outstanding symptoms. In fact I got a slight rash on my left hand and arm and slight swelling of the fingers (which could have been an allergy due to Ampicyllin, I am not sure). Temperature goes up very high (104 deg) and white blood count goes down. Typhoid also does this, but the bacteria are easily detected in blood. The book I have says that it is mainly dangerous to children and it is rarely very serious in adults. I was'nt very badly effected, but I do'nt bounce back as quickly as I used to a few years ago. ”ÎÎ•Ä

K7Äc/o Songserm Service„
Ä
K:Ä88©89 Phosi Road,„
Ä
K:ÄUdorn thani 41000„
Ä
KCÄTHAILAND„

Ä
K?ÄJuly 2, 1990„

Dear Freda,
About four weeks ago I had a kind of fever which I now think was haemorragic (spelling ?) fever. There has since been quite an epedemic in Thailand. Fortunately it cleared up in about six days, but left me a bit ennervated. Because of this I delayed answering letters to Philip and the Joneses and the Arama Fund had to wait for the virus. Anyway, the necessary letters have now been sent (more than a week ago) and the wheels should be turning in the direction of transferring the AF to the EST.
Philip sent ne a long and very involved letter saying that he did'nt think the AF should go to the EST. But, that he would agree to do whatever I wanted with it © in capital letters too.
So I told him that I still wanted it to go to the EST and that I took his statement as agreement with me. I also said that I want Mr Haines brought in to act as temporary secretary, if he will do it, for the purpose of sorting the AF out and getting everything straight, so that It can be handed over to the EST.

I also wrote to the Joneses to tell them that the AF is in agreement to hand itself over to the EST and that I wanted their agreement for Haines to act as temporary secretary. Once I hear from them and assuming that they agree, I shall contact Haines. I shall also contact Philip an ask him please to help Mr Haines in whatever way is necessary.

I think that Philip sent this long letter to me in the hope of persuading me to continue with the AF, but at the same time, knowing that it was inevitably going to the EST. So he acceptedÜjÜ by agreeing to do whatever I wanted. He could'nt after all follow the Joneses !

Actually, I think that Philip is genuinely getting rather tired of the whole thing and wants a valid excuse to withdraw. So I have given him one, and although he may talk and criticise some, I do'nt think he will be really sorry. After all, he is not fundamentally a stupid person and it must be obvious to him that something has to be done with the AF fairly soon and that if he goes on acting difficult, the whole thing will be taken out of his hands, and he will suffer a loss of face, which he is of course, afraid of.

From what you say in your letter of 24th June, it looks rather as if Betty is feeling the strain a bit and would be glad to see the end of the AF. The kilesas make people most irrational, and when they are forced to act rationally, they clothe themselves in a fantasy which makes out that they were right all along.

I noted your erudite comments on the two Majjhima translations. I'm afraid my Pali is not good enough to make much in the way of comments. I decided when I came out to Thailand the second time that I would concentrate on the Thai language rather than Pali, because it is more practically useful to me than Pali. Also, I felt that there is a wealth of valuable material in the Thai language which could do with translation and few people to do it.

Tan Acharn Mun was remarkable in his ability to translate Pali. He never formally learnt it, yet he would take a Pali passage and translate it's meaning rather than the language. Tan Acharn Maha Boowa got quite a high degree in Pali, but he tends to follow the way of Tan Acharn Mun. He says that when he does this he knows that the scholars dare'nt say anything because of the level that he attained in Pali. But I think they sometimes feel put out because they find it hard to understand the practical way that Tan Acharn talks.

Hope you are well, and I expect I will be hearing from you before long.

Yours

P.S. I think it may be a good idea if you were to contact Haines privately, to let him know how things are going with the AF, and to find out what his views are.

Wat Pa barn tard
c\o 88©89 Phosi Road, 3rd February 1990 Udorn thani 41000
Thailand.

Dear Freda,

Thank you so much for offering me an air fare back to England for a visit, but I'm afraid that I must refuse your kind offer. In many ways, I agree that it would be very good to visit England for a few months or so and I would quite like it also, but I'm afraid it would be very disruptive to my own practice, and I have also checked with Tan Acharn who said that he did notÜjÜ think that it would be of very much value; and also that I should consider my age. I thought about this and it made me realise that at my age I cannot afford to waste time. Although it would not,of course be a complete waste of time © but there is so much to do.

I received your two letters (yes, the onewith a stamp on it arrived too, but it would not be wise to assume that this would always be the case). Actually the Thai post office is really quite good, things rarely go astray, and there is often a good reason if they do.

I was glad to hear that the Joneses had received my letter. I also had a tape from Philip recently. He really has it in for the Joneses, and now he has found a letter in the Arama fund files, signed by the Joneses and dated when they first came on to the Arama trust. This letter confirms that they understand that the Arama share in the Cottage is no more than an investment and that the Arama fund can call back this cash at any time. This is in fact how I had understood the arrangement to be, but now Philip,on the strength of this wants to force the sale of the cottage. Whether this document is legally enough to get the agreement of the Charity commissioners, I do'nt know, but it would seem that it is hardly the right time to try and do this, nor is it the right way to try and force it through. I am going to write to Philip telling him to desist, that it is enough to display the position of the Arama fund in this, and that is all for the moment. Whether he will listen to me I do'nt know, but if he does'nt, I may resign.

I also have it in mind to hand the Arama over to the E.S.T, but I want to find out if the Joneses are in agreement with this before going ahead with any active proposition.

I shall be glad when this Arama business is fully settled, it is quite a pain in the neck.

I saw some articles in a few editions of the Middle Way by a certain "John Frederick". Jane told me who wrote them, and I may say that they provided a bright spot in an otherwise rather tawdry lot of articles.

One point interested me. In one of your letters you say how Betty feels quite sure that there is a bit of string linking her to her past life (and perhaps future as well). She is obviously talking in her own terms and concepts, but it is not incorrect. This "string" is probably the stream of Bhavanga which is the continuous link throughout life, never maintaining any fixed identity,but maintaining a continuity. This is the dwelling place of Avijja, and as such is the root of "Self". By attachment to this "string" one continues in Samsara; by getting down to it in Samadhi and using wisdom in that deep level of the Citta, the "string" can be destroyed and freedom attained. Then there is no more birth. But I'm afraid that Betty may be far too attached to her string to do much about it at present.

I have a new typing machine and so am using it to write to you. I find that if I write by hand my writing deteriorates and I get cramps in the hand. This is also good practice because I still do'nt know how to use this machine properly. Actually, the main purpose is to aid in translation of Tan Acharn's talks.ÜjÜŒAll for now.

With Metta ‰‰‰‰‰‰‰‰‰‰‰
‰††,Î ÎÃ* Ã• ”Lone Pine National Parkœ•ƒ

Ä
K>ÄMarch 6, 1990„

Frank D.Edwards
2345 N.Quail Road
Birdseye, Utah 84666

Dear Mr.Edwards,

This letter is a confirmation of your request for a traditional log cabin.

The Mary Todd Lincoln Cabin has been reserved in your name for the week of June 10©17, 1984. The cabin includes three bedrooms, a full kitchen, large parlour, and a hot tub.

Limousine Service from the airport to your cabin is available at no extra charge.

Warmest regards

Ranger David Harris
Park Reservations

”See enclosure•Ä
K7Äc\o Songserm Service„
Ä

K;Ä88©89 Phosi Road„
Ä
K:ÄUdorn thani 41000„
British Embassy
Bangkok

Ä
K9ÄSeptember 26, 1990„

For the Attention of Ann Scarlett Consular Section

Dear Madam,
I am replying to two letters which you sent me dated 15th August (your Ref: CON 011/1) and 17th August 1990 (your Ref: CON 221/1). I am sorry for the delay in replying to your letters, but in the country time goes fast without being noticed.

I am rather doubtful whether I am eligible to vote in the next UK general election, because I entered Thailand in November 1961, and since then the only visit I have made to the UK was from 8th to 22th June 1974, a period of two weeks.

If this will qualify me for voting, please would youÜjÜ send me the necessary forms.

With regard to your Record of British residents in Thailand, yes the information that you already have should remain unchanged, with the possible exception of the address of nearest next of kin which should be:

É»
º º
º * BuddhaNet BBS * Buddha Dhamma Meditation Assoc. º º The Buddhist Bulletin Board PO Box K1020 Haymarket NSW 2000 º
º +612 212-3061 Online: 24hrs Telephone: +612 212-3071 º
º º
È¼

HAPPINESS - as seen in Buddhist perspective

Dictionaries are generally agreed in referring to happiness as being characterised by or showing pleasure or contentment. Buddhism as a world religion has an unbeatable record of having lived through more than twentyfive centuries, living very illustriously, winning over more or less the whole of Asia from the Caspian Sea up to the Japanese Archipelago. The cultural enrichment of the people of the lands over which Buddhism spread, Afghanistan, Iran and Persia in western Asia and China, Korea and Japan in the east is eloquent evidence of the more than divine elegance of Buddhism as a religion which serves mankind. Ancient historians like Al Biruni who lived more than a thousand years ago have left behind for our benefit astonishing records of these. Hence we make bold to attempt to view and examine the concept of happiness from the Buddhist perspective.

Let it be first declared that in this study it is the Pali word sukha (= happiness) which gives us our sense of direction. We do not wish to drift away from scriptural authority and speculate with unlimited freedom. We would deem supersonic flights in the area of religion, whether it relates to the study of its teachings or to their practice, to be both unhealthy and disruptive. Buddhist thinking looks upon happiness which primarily connotes a state of mind as operating in or having its genesis in both the physical and mental planes: sukhan'ti dve sukhƒni kƒyika¤ ca sukham cetasika¤ ca sukham (Ps.I.188). This same text, the Patisambhidƒmagga offers us some very insightful comments about both these categories of happiness or sukha. In both cases, happiness results from getting what one wishes for or seeks after. The Pali word which connotes this is sƒta which means `wished for' or `gained' (Cp. Monier Williams Sanskrit English Dictionary p. 1196 coloumn 3).This word is often used as equivalent to and paired with piya (=dear or pleasant) as in yam loke piyarupam satarupam (D.II.p.304). Note here the beautiful comment on this in the Atthakatha:

attanƒ patiladdhƒni catusamutthƒnikagandhƒrammanƒdŒni kassa a¤¤assa evarupƒni atthŒti ma¤¤anti. Tesam evam ma¤¤amƒnƒnam tƒni cakhhƒdŒni piyarupƒdŒni ceva sƒtar–pƒni ca honti (DA.III.f.800).

A further keen observation is made in differentiating two stages or two states of happiness in both categories of physical and mental happiness. One is at the production level of happiness, in the very process when it is referred to as sukhƒ vedanƒ i.e. sensing or experiencing happiness (both physical and mental: kƒyasamphassajƒ cetosamphassajƒ sƒtƒ sukhƒ vedanƒ). The other is at the product level, i.e. on the completion of the process when it is referred to as sukham vedayitam i.e. sensed or experienced happiness (kƒyasamphassajam sƒtam sukham vedayitam (Ps.I.p.188). At the mundane level of worldly existence, herein lies the joy of living or the happiness which the senses provide in their communication with the out side world. This happiness (sukham somanassam) is indicated as the gratification through the senses or kƒmƒnam assado (yam kho bhikkhave ime pa¤cakƒmagune paticca upajjati sukham somanassam kƒmƒnam assƒdo. M.I.p. 85). This position is philosophically viewed as being very restricted or circumscribed in the production of genuine states of happiness (appassƒdƒ kƒmƒ vuttƒ bhagavatƒ... M.I.p.132). Such forms of happiness are relatively so because they bring in their wake considerable stress and strain and untold bitterness and dissatisfaction (ƒdinavo ettha bhiyyo. See further M.I.p.132) Buddhism never denies the existence and the experiencing by man of different forms and levels of happiness but at the same time stresses the importance of making a realistic and relative estimation of such happiness in relation to the price that a man of the world has to pay for its purchase.

Granting the possibility of enjoying happiness at the down to earth mundane level in terms of material considerations, Buddhism envisages a very pragmatic and at the same time an ethically exalted plane of happiness for the man of the world. The Anguttara Nikƒya (A.III,p.67) provides us with a beautiful analysis and examination of this situation. Fulfilment of material needs, starting from food and raiment (ghƒsacchƒdanaparamatƒ) man must have these things of daily need up to a satisfactory degree to prevent him suffer from want or he must have the means whereby to acquire them. This first situation is referred to as the happiness of possession or atthisukha. It is a reminder to the world of today that the Buddha who appeared in the world two and a half millennia ago was fully alive to the problem of the haves and the have-nots.

Thus while possession implied one form of happiness or atthisukha, non-possession or poverty spells unhappiness. The Pƒli word used for this lack or deficiency of basic needs of existence, which is the state of poverty, is dƒliddiya. The unhappiness resulting from poverty or non-possession is dukkha and as its opposite the word sukha is used to refer to the happiness resulting from possession (i.e. atthisukha). This is the rule with regard to the man of the world that he must have the means to supply himself with the needs in order not to be plunged in a state of unhappiness.

Buddhist thinking refers to this very positively and specifically, saying `To the pleasure seeker of the world, poverty indeed is painful'- Dƒliddiyam bhikkhave dukkham lokasmim kƒmabhogino (A.III, p. 351 f.) On the other hand, it in no secret that the true aspirant to the goal of Nibbƒna in Buddhism finds that for him it is the rule to renounce (nekkhamma, patinissagga, apacaya etc.), and that total non-possession is his primary source of happiness. But as a man of the world he finds that it is possessions (bhoga) which provide him with his physical and mental happiness and satisfaction (idha gahapati ariyasƒvako utthƒnaviriyƒdhigatehi bhogehi bƒhƒbalaparicitehi sedƒvakkhittehi dhammikehi dhammaladdhehi attƒnam sukheti pŒneti sammƒ sukham pariharati: A.III,p.45). This means that happiness has to be acquired, whether it be for one's own sake or for the sake of others, righteously and correctly and with injury to none. The means must be justifiable on its own grounds (dhammikehi dhammaladdhehi).

Whichever way one looks at happiness, whether with a philosophical sobriety and a meaningful level-headedness as indicated above or not, the human mind is attracted towards happiness (sukha) and is repelled by its opposite (dukkha). Associated with the desire to live and to avoid death is the desire to be happy and avoid unhappiness (... jŒvitukƒmƒ amarituk ƒmƒ sukhakƒmƒ dukkhapatikk–lƒ D.II. p.330). But herein comes the Buddhist standpoint towards happiness which is precise and totally uncompromising. The Buddha very clearly states in the Mahƒsaccaka Sutta that happiness, to be acceptable and premissible, has to be free from lustful stains and sinful blemishes (Na kho aham tassa sukhassa bhƒyƒmi yam tam sukham a¤¤atreva kƒmehi a¤¤atra akusalehi dhammehi: M.I.p.247). This immediately implies the existence in terms of Buddhist thinking, of unacceptable grades of happiness which share of the nature of lust (kƒma) and evil (akusala dhamma).

There is also a reckoning of grades of happiness as superior or inferior, of higher and lower quality even within the same permissible area. While at a mundane, down to earth level a comparably lower level of happiness satisfies an average worldling, the religio-intellectual maturity which accompanies spiritual development of man in Buddhism makes him opt for the higher grades of happiness which are both permitted and recommended within the framework of transcendental (lokuttara) growth in Buddhism. The Buddha in the Mahƒsaccaka Sutta as quoted above, indicates the permissible areas within which a Buddhist may legitimately seek his quota of happiness (... yam tam sukham a¤¤atra kƒmehi a¤¤atra akusalehi dhammehi M.I.p.247), and this, a man of the world is presumed to be doing all the time, with legitimacy or otherwise (attano sukham esƒno: Dhp.v.132).

Buddhism also envisages spiritually higher grades of happiness which relatively reduce, without the batting of an eyelid, the worth of worldly happiness to a mere zero. This is the implication of the venerable Mahƒ Kassapa's observations about the joy and happiness he gets from a true comprehension of the Truth or dhamma as against his reaction to the melodies of super grade orchestral music:

Na pa¤cangikena turiyena rati me hoti tƒdisŒ yathƒ ekaggacittassa sammƒ dhammam vipassato (Thag.v.1071)

`I do not derive so much joy and delight from the strains of music of the fivefold orchestra as much as I do when I grasp with a unified mind the truths of the teaching' (dhamma).

The life of man in the world is a reality which Buddhism reckons with. But the exalted character of the sensory reactions to the stimuli of the world as reflected here in the character of Mahƒ Kassapa Thera does not necessarily imply a total ban on them to the man of the world. The Buddhist stress is on the fact that life in the world and all else associated with it i.e. everything besides and below Nibbƒna are conditioned or in other words are sankhata, having the characteristic of anicca, dukkha and anatta, of being transient, unsatisfactory and essenceless.

Both a realization of this position and acting in accordance with it are insisted on and beautifully reflectd in the story of young Dighavu in the Samyutta Nikƒya (S.V.p.344 f). The Buddha himself is seen personally giving him this new vision of life in the world and pointing out to him the way to release therefrom. The vitality and vibrancy of this exposition as a totally effective religious way compels us to produce it herein the original Pali. We consider it to be one of the finest examples of experiential religious culture, effected and recorded almost in the company of the Buddha.

Tasmƒtiha tvam DŒghƒvu imesu catusu sotƒpattiangesu patitthƒya cha vijjƒbhƒgiyadhamme uttarim bhƒveyyasi. Idha tvam DŒghƒvu sabbssankhƒresu aniccƒnupassŒ viharƒhi anicce dukkhasa¤¤Œ dukkhe anattasa¤¤Œ pahƒnasa¤¤Œ virƒgasa¤¤Œ nirodhasa¤¤Œ ti. Evam hi te DŒghƒvu sikkhitabban ti (S.V.p.345).

To the Buddhist, the state which is the opposite of this samsƒric state,i.e the unconditioned state of Nibbƒna which is asankhata is equally a reality. That is the logical opposite of samsƒra and for that very reason it is no more than the reality of the non-existence of a state of painful processes: upƒdƒnapaccayƒ bhavo bhavapaccyƒ jƒti jƒtipaccayƒ jarƒmaranam. One is doubtful wheter the oft-quoted passage at Udƒna (Ud.p.80) implies a factual existence of such a state beyond death. The total and tremendous reality of Nibbƒna from the time of one's release to the point of material and consequent psychic break up in death with a down to earth fullness, precludes us from stretching anything relating to Nibbƒna in any form beyond this. The Alagadd–pama Sutta sees very clearly the liberatedness of the liberated being (vimuttacitto bhikkhu) in this form.

Evam vimuttacittam kho hikkhave bhikkhum saindƒ devƒ sa-brahmakƒ sa-pajƒpatikƒ anvesam nƒdhigacchanti idam nissitam tathƒgatassa vi¤¤ƒnam ti. Tam kissa hetu. Ditthe' vƒham bhikkhave dhamme tathƒgatam ananuvejjo ti vadƒmi.(M.I.p.140)

The Kevaddha Sutta speaks of this final termination of the samsaric being in Nibbƒna as follows:

Vi¤¤ƒnam anidassanam anantam sabbato pabham ettha ƒpo ca pathavi tejo vƒyo na gadhƒti ettha dŒgha¤ ca rassa¤ ca anum th–lam subhƒsubham ettha nƒma¤ ca rupa¤ ca asesam uparujjhati vi¤¤ƒnassa nirodhena etth'etam uparujjhati. (D.I.p.223)

This declaration by the Buddha to Kevaddha, the householder's son, implies an unquestionable totality of cessation in Nibbƒna.

Therefore, Buddhism sees no contradiction in prescribing within its specific dimensions, for what would be deemed happiness for the man of the world. Nevertheless, the Buddhist has to learn to look upon Nibbƒna as the highest happiness: Nibbƒnam paramam sukham. It is so because it is the highest point of total dispossession, dispossession of those which stand in the way of true happiness, and the Dhammapada (v.200) sums it up in no uncertain terms when it says:

Happily indeed do we live, we who have nothing, nothing by way of impediments to spiritual progress and final release and liberation from all things of the world.

Susukham vata jŒvƒma yesam no natthi ki¤canam.

Bhikkhu Dhammavihƒrœ Dharmƒyatanaya
Maharagama
Sri Lanka

HEALING : A TIBETAN BUDDHIST PERSPECTIVE

Compiled by:

Ven. Pende Hawter
The Karuna Hospice Service
P.O. Box 2020
Windsor 4030
Queensland, Australia
Tel. (07) 857 8555

What is healing?

What do we mean by healing? Do we mean healing of the physical body, healing of the psyche/soul/mind, or both of these. What is the connection between body and mind? Many modern healing techniques regard successful healing as the cure of the presenting physical problem, whether this be symptoms of cancer, AIDS, chronic fatigue syndrome, or some other illness. If the person does not recover from the presenting physical problem, or if that problem recurs or another develops at a later time, this may be regarded as failure. It is not uncommon in these situations for the therapist or organisation that has been helping the "sick" person to infer or state that the person must have done something wrong, that they haven't stuck strictly enough to the diet or meditated enough or done whatever else it was that they were supposed to do. In these situations the person can become very guilty, depressed or angry. In many cases, they just give up hope. To avoid these problems, it is necessary to consider a more comprehensive view of healing that incorporates not only physical healing but mental healing.

Mind is the creator

To understand healing from the Buddhist perspective, a useful starting point is to consider the Buddhist concept of mind. The mind is non-physical. It is formless, shapeless, colourless, genderless and has the ability to cognize or know. The basic nature of mind is pure, limitless and pervasive, like the sun shining unobstructedly in a clear sky. The problems or sickness we experience are like clouds in the sky obscuring the sun. Just as the clouds temporarily block the sun but are not of the same nature as the sun, our problems or sickness are temporary and the causes of them can be removed from the mind. From the Buddhist perspective, the mind is the creator of sickness and health. In fact, the mind is believed to be the creator of all of our problems. That is, the cause of disease is internal, not external.

Unlimited potential

You are probably familiar with the concept of karma, which literally means action. All of our actions lay down imprints on our mindstream which have the potential to ripen at some time in the future. These actions can be positive, negative or neutral. These karmic seeds are never lost. The negative ones can ripen at any time in the form of problems or sickness; the positive ones in the form of happiness, health or success. To heal present sickness, we have to engage in positive actions now. To prevent sickness occurring again in the future, we have to purify, or clear, the negative karmic imprints that remain on our mindstream. Karma is the creator of all happiness and suffering. If we don't have negative karma we will not get sick or receive harm from others. Buddhism asserts that everything that happens to us now is the result of our previous actions, not only in this lifetime but in other lifetimes. What we do now determines what will happen to us in the future.

In terms of present and future healing, the main objective is to guard our own actions, or karma. This requires constant mindfulness and awareness of all the actions of our body, speech and mind. We should avoid carrying out any actions that are harmful to ourselves and to others. Buddhism is therefore a philosophy of total personal responsibility. We have the ability to control our destiny, including the state of our body and mind. Each one of us has unlimited potential - what we have to do is develop that potential.

Healthy mind, healthy body

Why do some people get ill while others remain in the best of health? Consider skin cancer. Of all the people who spend many hours out in the sun, some will develop skin cancer and others will not. The external situation is the same for all of them, but only some will be affected. The secondary cause of the skin cancer - the sun - is external, but the primary cause - the imprints laid down on the mindstream by previous actions - is internal.

Also, people with similar types of cancer will often respond quite differently to the same treatment, whether this be orthodox or alternative. Some will make a complete recovery. Some will recover temporarily and then develop a recurrence. Others will rapidly become worse and die. Logically one has to look to the mind for the cause of these differences.

Buddhism asserts that for lasting healing to occur, it is necessary to heal not only the current disease with medicines and other forms of treatment, but also the cause of the disease, which originates from the mind. If we do not heal or purify the mind, the sickness and problems will recur again and again.

This introduces the notion of "ultimate healing". By ridding the mind of all its accumulated "garbage", all of the previously committed negative actions and thoughts, and their imprints, we can be free of problems and sickness permanently. We can achieve ultimate healing - a state of permanent health and happiness. In order to heal the mind and hence the body, we have to eliminate negative thoughts and their imprints, and replace them with positive thoughts and imprints.

The inner enemy

The basic root of our problems and sickness is selfishness, what we can call the inner enemy. Selfishness causes us to engage in negative actions, which place negative imprints on the mindstream. These negative actions can be of body, speech or mind, such as thoughts of jealousy, anger and greed. Selfish thoughts also increase pride, which results in feelings of jealousy towards those higher than us, superiority towards those lower than us and competitiveness towards equals. These feelings in turn result in an unhappy mind, a mind that is without peace. On the other hand, thoughts and actions directed to the well-being of others bring happiness and peace to the mind.

Conscious living, conscious dying

It is important to consider what happens to us when we die. The Buddhist view is that at the time of death the subtle consciousness, which carries with it all the karmic imprints from previous lives, separates from the body. After spending up to forty-nine days in an intermediate state between lives, the consciousness enters the fertilised egg of its future mother at or near the moment of conception. New life then begins. We bring into our new life a long history of previous actions with the potential to ripen at any time or in any of a myriad ways. The state of mind at the time of death is vitally important and can have a considerable effect on the situation into which we are reborn. Hence the need to prepare well for death and to be able to approach our death with a peaceful, calm and controlled mind. Death itself can be natural, due to exhaustion of the lifespan, or untimely, due to certain obstacles. These obstacles arise from the mind and can be counteracted in different ways. One method commonly employed in Tibetan Buddhism to remove life obstacles is to save the lives of animals that would otherwise have been killed. For example, animals can be rescued from being slaughtered or live bait can be purchased and released. For those with a life threatening illness, it is important to understand that being free of that illness doesn't mean that you will have a long life. There are many causes of death and death can happen to anybody at any time.

Not just pills and potions

Tibetan medicine is popular and effective. It is mostly herbal medicine, but its uniqueness lies in the fact that in the course of its preparation it is blessed extensively with prayers and mantras, giving it more power. It is said that taking such medicine will either result in recovery, or, if the person is close to death, they will die quickly and painlessly. (Another theory, based on personal experience, is that it tastes so bad you want to recover quickly so that you can stop taking the medicine!)

Blessed pills and blessed water are also used extensively. The more spiritually developed the person carrying out the blessings or the healing practices, the more powerful is the healing result or potential. These pills often contain the relics of previous great meditators and saints, bestowing much power on the pills.

Many Tibetan lamas actually blow on the affected part of the body to effect healing or pain relief. I have seen a person with AIDS with intense leg pain have his pain disappear after a lama meditated intensely and blew on his leg for twenty minutes. Compassion is the power that heals.

Visualisation can also be very powerful healing. One method is to visualise a ball of white light above your head, with the light spreading in all directions. Imagine the light spreading through your body, completely dissolving away all sickness and problems. Concentrate on the image of your body as completely healed and in the nature of light.

This type of meditation is even more powerful when combined with visualising holy images and reciting mantras. I often tell my Christian patients to visualise the light as Jesus, with the light emanating from him.

In the Tibetan tradition, there are many Buddha figures (deities) which can be visualised while reciting their mantra. The Medicine Buddha; Chenrezig, or Avalokiteshvara (the Buddha of Compassion); or one of the long-life deities such as Amitabha are commonly used. Deities can be in peaceful or wrathful aspects. The wrathful ones are often used to cure heavy disease such as AIDS.

If you are not comfortable with these images, you can use other objects such as crystals, or simply visualise all the universal healing energy absorbing into you, transforming your body into light, and imagine yourself as totally healed.

Over the centuries many people have used these methods and have recovered from their illnesses, even from conditions such as leprosy, paralysis and cancer. The aim of these practises is to heal the mind as well as the body, so that the diseases or problems will not recur in the future.
Also, many diseases are associated with spirit harm. Lamas and other practitioners will often recite certain prayers and mantras or engage in ceremonies to stop the spirit harm and allow the person to recover.

A seven year old girl I knew had petit-mal epilepsy as the result of spirit harm; the epilepsy disappeared after various rituals and prayers had been performed. Whenever she had an epileptic attack, the girl would see a frightening apparition coming towards her. After the initial prayers had been performed, however, her attacks lessened and she would see a brick wall between her and the frightening figure. This wall was the colour of a monk's robes. Eventually the attacks and visions disappeared altogether.

In summary, we can say that the essential ingredients in the healing process, for both the person doing the healing and the person being healed, are compassion, faith, and pure morality.

Changing our minds

Another powerful method of healing in Tibetan Buddhism is to meditate on the teachings known as thought transformation. These methods allow a person to see the problem or sickness as something positive rather than negative. A problem is only a problem if we label it a problem. If we look at a problem differently, we can see it as an opportunity to grow or to practice, and regard it as something positive. We can think that having this problem now ripens our previous karma, which does not then have to be experienced in the future.

If someone gets angry at us, we can choose to be angry in return or to be thankful to them for giving us the chance to practice patience and purify this particular karma. It takes a lot of practice to master these methods, but it can be done.

It is our concepts which often bring the greatest suffering and fear. For example, due to a set of signs and symptoms, the doctor gives the label 'AIDS' or 'cancer'. This can cause great distress in a person's mind, because they forget that it is only a label, that there is no truly existent, permanent AIDS or cancer. 'Death' is another label that can generate a lot of fear. But in reality 'death' is only a label for what happens when the consciousness separates from the body, and there is no real death from its own side. This also relates to our concept of 'I' and of all other phenomena. They are all just labels and have no true, independent existence.

Lama Zopa Rinpoche, a highly realised Tibetan Lama, says that the most powerful healing methods of all are those based on compassion, the wish to free other beings from their suffering. The compassionate mind - calm, peaceful, joyful and stress-free - is the ideal mental environment for healing. A mind of compassion stops our being totally wrapped up in our own suffering situations. By reaching out to others we become aware of not just my pain but the pain (that is, the pain of all beings).

Many people find the following technique powerful and effective: think "By me experiencing this disease or pain or problem, may all the other beings in the world be free of this disease, pain or problem" or "I am experiencing this pain/sickness/problem on behalf of all living beings."

One voluntarily takes on suffering in order for others to be free of it. This is similar to the Christian concept of regarding one's suffering as sharing the suffering of Jesus on the cross. Even death can be used in this way: "By me experiencing death, may all other beings be freed from the fears and difficulties of the death process."

We have to ask ourselves "What is the purpose of my life? Why do I want to have good health and a long life?". The ultimate purpose of our life is to be of benefit to others. If we live longer and just create more negative karma, it is a waste of time.

Giving and taking is another powerful meditation. As you breathe in, visualise taking the suffering and the causes of suffering from all living beings, in the form of black smoke. When breathing in the black smoke, visualise smashing the black rock of selfishness at your heart, allowing compassion to manifest freely. As you breathe out, visualise breathing out white light that brings them happiness, enjoyment and wisdom.

Developing compassion is more important than having friends, wealth, education. Why? Because it is only compassion that guarantees a happy and peaceful mind, and it is the best thing to help us at the time of death

We can use our sickness and problems in a very powerful way for spiritual growth, resulting in the development of compassion and wisdom. The highest development of these qualities is the full realisation of our potential, the state of full enlightenment. Enlightenment brings great benefit to ourselves and allows us to work extensively for others. This is the state of ultimate healing.

I have outlined some of the concepts that are the basis of the Buddhist philosophy on healing. Many of these methods were taught by Lama Zopa Rinpoche at Tara Institute in Melbourne in August 1991 during the first course given by Lama Zopa specifically for people with life-threatening illnesses.

Some of these ideas may appear unusual at first, but please keep an open mind about them. If some of the ideas appear useful to you, please use them; if not, leave them aside.

May you achieve health and happiness.

(revised January 1995)

REFERENCES

Levine, Steven Healing Into Life and Death, Anchor Press/Doubleday, New York, 1987

Geshe Rabten and Geshe Dhargyey Advice From a Spiritual Friend, Wisdom Publications, Boston, 1986

Sogyal Rinpoche The Tibetan Book of Living and Dying, Rider, London, 1992

Lama Zopa Rinpoche Transforming Problems Into Happiness, Wisdom Publications, Boston 1993

Lama Thubten Zopa Rinpoche The Door to Satisfaction, Wisdom Publications, Boston, 1994

[This document can be acquired from a sub-directory coombspapers viaanonymous FTP an
on the node COOMBS.ANU.EDU.AU]The document's ftp filename and the full directory path
coombspapers top level INDEX file][This version: 23 November 1993]----------This file was copied from an archive of Zen Buddhist texts establishedat Sam Huston Univ, Texas, US on a Gopher Host oac3.hsc.uth.tmc.eduPath=1/computers/oac_staff/S_Newton/zenThe original document was Newton,<snewton@oac.hsc.uth.tmc.edu> of the Southwest Chogye International ZenAcade
Houston, TX 77055 English (713) 467-0998Korean (713) 467-0997 Fax (713)
467-0998----------THE HEART OF THE PRAJI
PARAMITA SUTRAThe free seeing Bodhisattva of compassion, while in profoundcontempla Paramita, beheld five skandhas as empty in theirbeing and thus crossed over all sufferings.
what is seen does not differ from what is empty, nordoes what is empty differ from what is se is empty, whatis empty is seen.It is the same for sense perception, imagination, mental func andjudgement.O-oh Sariputra, all the empty forms of these dharmas neither come to benor not created or annihilated, not impure or pure,and cannot be increased or decreased.Since i nothing can be seen, there is no perception,imagination, mental function or judgement.There nose, tongue, body or consciousness.Nor are there sights, sounds, odors, tastes, objects or no visu-al world, world of consciousness or other world.There is no ignorance or extinction o so forthdown to no aging and death and also no extinction of aging and death.there is neithe causation, annihilation nor path.There is no knowing or unknowing. Since nothing can be kn rely upon Prajna Paramita and so their minds areunhindered.Because there is no hindrance and they are far frominverted and illusory thought and thereby attain nirvana.All the Buddhas per-i-ods of time fully accomplish thean-nut-ta-ra-sam-yak sambod-hi by relying upon Prajna Paramita.Therefore, Prajna Paramita is known as the most divine mantra,the great enlighten utmost mantra,the in-com-pa-ra-ble mantra,destroyer of all suffering!since what is true is not vain,listen to the mantra of the Prajna Paramita--it goes like this:GATE GATE PA-RA GATE
BOD-HI SVA-HA!(3 times)Southwest Chogye International Zen
Academeia----------end of record

This document originally appeared as a post in the Usenet newsgroup, soc.religion.eastern. This version has been slightly edited by Barry Kapke and is being distributed, with permission, via the DharmaNet Buddhist File Distribution Network.

[Last updated: 25 September 1993]
==========

From: <MORIARTY@VM1.NoDak.EDU>
Newsgroups: soc.religion.eastern Date: 19 Sep 1993 15:57:28 -0700

Part One: A Brief Comment

The title of "The Heart Sutra" appears to refer to the use of perfect wisdom (prajnaparamita) to cleanse error from the heart (hridaya). There are numerous variations of the sutra in Sanskrit and many other classical, Asian languages. Edward Conze did extensive work in this field, although his methods are now challenged by contemporary scientific philologists. The search for an ur-text is probably always going to be inconclusive, although some evidence points to the existence of a single, original version. This is of no consequence for people whose interest in the Sanskrit text is based on a desire to inspect the Sanskrit vocabulary of the concepts in "The Heart Sutra" or to draw spiritual nourishment from the elegantly poetic repetitions of the Sanskrit text that follows.
A spiritual friend provided me with the materials I have used to prepare this version of the text in Buddhist Sanskrit.

This text is modified from:

Hurvitz, Leon. "Hsuan-tsang (602-664) and the _Heart Scripture_" in _Prajnaparamita and Related Systems: Studies in Honor of Edward Conze_ (University of California at Berkeley Press). 103-113.

Hurvitz describes this text as "brahmanical" and reports that Hsuan-tsang transcribed it in Chinese characters from a wall of a cave at Ta hsing-shan-ssu in Lo-yang, China, apparently on the Silk Road, during the 7th century A.D. The context in which the Chinese scholar presentedthe _Hridaya Sutra_ makes it clear that he considered it a magical text. Although this text is not precisely identical with existing English translations of "The Heart Sutra," it is obviously consistent with the Hridaya textual tradition. The Sanskrit scans metrically and by sense into mostly four line verses, a classical verse form that suggests a strong literary value in the text. Repetitions and thematic emphasis on the pervasiveness of emptiness (sunyata) characterize the text. I found that in order to preserve the sense of the verses it was necessary to shorten one verse to three lines, to lengthen another verse to five lines.

I modified the Hurvitz text by eliminating all Sanskrit diacritical marks, regularizing the spacing of the Sanskrit words and their spelling, and adjusting the lines of the text according to sense and (in some cases) meter. I used Hurvitz's interlinear vocabulary as a base and added to it. The difficulties in this text are partly due to the obscurities of Buddhist Sanskrit, partly to the ackwardness of the transcription into Roman letters from Chinese phonological equivalents by Hurvitz, and mostly to my radically imperfect knowledge of Sanskrit. I accept full responsibility for the errors experts in the Sanskrit language will find here.

May the merit of this effort benefit all sentient beings.

[CORRECTION: Hsuan-tsung found the text on the stone wall of the Great Monestary of the Furtherance of Good, not on a cave wall. -MM]

Part Two: The Buddhist Sanskirt Text with Interlinear Vocabulary

prajnaparamita hridaya sutra (perfect wisdom heart sutra)

aryavalokitesvaro bodhisattvo (Avalokateshvara bodhisattva) gambhiram prajnaparamita caryam caramano vyavalokayati (deep perfect wisdom action perform luminously)

sma panca skandhas tams ca sva bhava sunyam (saw five bundles them own nature empty) pasyati sma iha sariputra (? saw oh Sariputra)

rupam sunyata va rupam rupan na prithak (form emptiness evidently form form not different) sunyata sunyataya na prithag rupam (emptiness emptiness not different form) yad rupam sa sunyata ya sunyata sa rupam (this form that emptiness this emptiness that form) evam eva vedana samjna samskara vijnanam (like this feeling thought choice consiousness)

iha sariputra sarva dharma sunyata (oh Sariputra all dharmas emptiness) laksana anutpanna anruddha avmala anuna aparpurna (mark not born not pure not increase not decrease ?) ta sariputra sunyatayam (therefore Sariputra in the middle of emptiness)

na rupam na vedana na samjna na samskara na vijnana (no form no feeling no thought no choice no consciousness) na caksuh srotam na ghrana jihva kaya manah (no eye ear no nose tongue body mind)
na rupa sabda gandha rasa spistavya dharmah (no form sound smell taste touch dharmas) na caksur dhatur ya van na mano vijnanam dhatur (no eye-area up to no mind-consciousness area)

na vidya na vidya na vidya ksayo va vidya ksayo (no clarity no clarity no clarity exhaustion no clarity exhaustion)
ya van jaramaranam na jaramarana ksayo (up to old age no old age exhaustion)
na duhkha samudaya nirdoha margajna (no suffering end of suffering path)
na jnanam na prapti na bhismaya tasmai na prapti
(no knowledge no ownership no witnessing no thing to own)

tvad bodhisattva prajnaparamita asritya (therefore bodhisattva perfect wisdom dwells)
viha ratya citta varano vidya ksayo na vidya ksayo (in dwell thought no obstacle clarity exhaustion not clairty exhaustion)
ya van jaramaranam na jaramarana ksayo
(up to old age no old age exhaustion)
na duhkha samudaya nirodha margajna
(no suffering end of suffering path)
na jnanam na prapti na bhismaya tasmai na prapti
(no knowledge no property no witnessing no thing to own)

tvad bodhisattvanam prajnaparamita asritya (therefore bodhisattva perfect wisdom dwells)
viha ratya citta varano citta varano (in dwell thought no obstacle thought no obstacle) na siddhitvad atrasto vipa ryasa ti kranto (no existence fear fright inverse reverse ? separate) ni stha nirvana tya dha vyava sthitah (perfectly stands nirvana three worlds thing experiences)

sarva buddhah prajnaparamitam asritya
(all buddhas perfect wisdom dwell)
(a?)nuttaram samyaksambodhim abdhisambuddhah (unexcelled ultimate perfect insight together ? buddhas) ta smai jnata vyam (therefore should know ?)
prajnaparamitamahamantram mahavidyamantram (perfect wisdom great charm great clear charm)

anuttaramantram asamasama mantram (unexcelled charm unequalled equal charm)
sarva duhkha prasa manam sa tyam ami thyatvat (all suffering stop terminate genuine real not vain) prajnaparamitayam ukto mantrah tadyatha (perfect wisdom declaired charm saying)
GATE GATE PARAGATE PARASAMGATE BODHI SVAHA (gone gone totally gone totally completely gone enlightened so be it) prepared by:

Dr. Michael E. Moriarty
Communication Arts Department
Valley City State University
Valley City, North Dakota 58072

Redistribution permitted.

==========
[end of file]

--
Barry Kapke, director | "All that we are | INTERNET: dharma@netcom.com
DharmaNet International | is the result of | FIDONET: 1:125/33.0
P.O. Box 4951 | what we have thought." | BBS: (510) 836-4717
Berkeley, CA 94704-4951 | (BUDDHA) | VOICEMAIL: (510) 465-7403

ÉÍÍÍ

Listening, we do not hear it; we call it inaudible.
Groping, we do not grasp it; we call it intangible.
These three properties do not allow ultimate scrutiny, for indeed, merging they become One.
Lao Tsu, Tao Te Ching

Inscribed on the Mind-Heart

When we return to the root, we gain the meaning;
When we pursue external objects, we lose the reason.
The moment we are enlightened within,
We go beyond the voidness of a world confronting us.

Tao-hsin, first patriarch of Zen in China, AD 606

Introduction

In the academic sense, the ideal function of an essay in comparative philosophy is that by examining both for similarities and differences, there is the possibility of a richer and deeper understanding of each.

In terms of Australia's present desire to have greater trade and cultural interaction with Asia, an exploration of aspects of Western and Eastern thought, and an understanding, and acceptance of the resonances and dissonances, could be most helpful.

For this writer, there is a private or personal agenda; that of seeking in Heidegger a Western philosophical rationale for her own partially Buddhist artwork.

When research for this paper first began, this writer felt, as a beginner, inadequate to the task, that all that was possible was to cobble together a patchwork of relevant quotes from other scholars' writings on the subject. As study progressed, frustration arose with what seemed to be a lack on the part of some scholars in getting down to fundamental concepts on the Eastern side, particularly a tendency to quote sayings as though they were dogmas to be believed. The famous sayings of Buddhist and Taoist masters were never intended as dictums or articles of faith to be believed. They were intended as triggers to point the inquirer in the right direction towards a realisation of the truth concerning the nature of being. Interestingly enough, Heidegger also sees his speculations as merely points of departure, and hopes his readers will pursue the subject independently. Therefore, although the first half of the essay, dealing with Heidegger and Eastern thought in general, uses quotes from academic scholarship to show the evidence and authenticity of the relationship between the two, in the second half I have sought to compare what I am able to understand of Heidegger with what I know of Buddhism. Some of the Buddhist understandings come from discourses given by Sayadaw U Janaka, a renowned scholar of Pali manuscripts in the Buddhist world and the Head Meditation Teacher at Rangoon Monastery in Burma. He teaches with strict authenticity, holding without deviation to the unbroken lineage of transmission since the Buddha's time. His authority to teach is given him by his teacher on the basis of success in meditation, and his scholarship of Pali texts. This writer is also using of translations of Buddhist texts, and books on Buddhism by both Asian and Western writers.

Heidegger and Eastern Thought

Heidegger's primary area of research is ontology. Whether he is exploring the Greek, the Medieval, the linguistic or the Asian approaches, his entire life's work has been an attempt to penetrate into the truth of the nature of being. His methods attempted to escape from the traditions of logical dialectic, and in so doing seemed to invent a poetic, though still logical and analytical mode of thought, relying frequently on pun and often inventing new words or new ways of using current and ancient words to arrive at what he conceives as exact nuances and meanings. Sometimes he pauses within his text to observe that after much examination of the aspects of his Dasein, its understanding may now seem more obscure and elusive than ever. Translations into English, are therefore very clumsy, for they must deal with language that is difficult to understand even in German, and in English there is frequently a lack of a word which would correspond accurately to the German meaning.1

Eastern mysticism also deals primarily with the nature of being. The Indian strand, taken from the Brahman traditions of the Vedas at a religious level, and the Upanishad's at the esoteric level, deal with the essence of being as a positive Self, immortal, re-incarnating until enlightenment which is then union with the ultimate Self or God-nature of the whole of existence. The Buddhist strand, especially in its earliest and purest form (Theravadin or Hinayana), is essentially atheist in that there is no self, existence is an illusion created by the constantly changing amalgam of atoms of physical energy in space and the energy of consciousness which arises from sensations in sentient beings. Enlightenment to the Buddhist is the actual direct experience of this reality. Later forms of Buddhism as religious practice re-integrated many Hindu practices and beliefs, but even these in their upper reaches of meditative practice and study, return to the first premises of the Buddha through the results of experience and in lineages of direct transmission of teacher to student. The Taoist, though much closer to the Buddhist position, seeks not so much enlightenment, as the gradual capacity to be at one with the world, at one within the dualities of opposites, and one with the flow of constantly changing phenomena.

Otto Poggeler, reputed as Heidegger's foremost student, writes of his mentor's connection to Taoism in his essay on "East-West Dialogue". According to this paper, there are two senses in which Martin Heidegger can be seen to have a leaning towards Eastern thought. The first is that even before he encountered it, his own thinking, in questioning the basis of the Western concept of Being, was leading him in a direction sympathetic to Far Eastern philosophy. The second is that, as soon as he became aware of the nature of Taoist and Zen thought, he developed a very strong and long lasting interest in it, both through reading and direct contact with Asian scholars. In summarising a few basic points from "East-West Dialogue" the direction, characteristics and evolution of Heidegger's thought begins to become a little clearer.

In his youth, Heidegger had tremendous enthusiasm for the mysticism of Meister Ekhart, particularly the latter's concepts of detachment, the death of the Godhead (from God to the absolute nothingness of the Godhead)2 , and that being is finite and therefore not part of God3 This notion of nothingness and detachment, something beyond a linguistically determined conceptual reality laid seeds, coming out of the Western tradition, for a possible questioning of metaphysics. The beginnings of Heidegger's questioning arose by rethinking the work of previous German philosophers who had studied and been influenced by Indian and specifically Vedantist thought.4 German philosophy had long had an interest in notions of enlightenment or transcendence of the human condition. Scholars such as Garbe, Deussen, Hegel, Schelling, Schopenhauer and Neitzche were excited when it was discovered that Sanskrit, being the base of most Indo-European languages, had a grammatical structure which gives rise to and is embedded in metaphysical thinking, therefore making it linguistically accessible to Western thinkers. It was partially the capacity to read translations of Sanskrit texts which opened up the possibilities that a metaphysics descended from Greek philosophy was not the only possible ground of exploration. What was left unsaid in Neitzche opened a door for Heidegger to explore the nature of Being. Yet Heidegger himself had no interest in the philosophies of the Vedas or the Upanishads. Sanskrit has notions of Being embedded in it both grammatically and conceptually. "It is metaphysical in being representational, concept-gathering, and in being productive of ontological speculation about Being as the ground of all that is, and so giving the appearance of setting up a reality other and higher than this world."5 . Greek language carries within its structure a paradigm that lends itself to thinking about Being as Logos Heidegger wanted to formulate a new language that would lead away from metaphysics, to clear away the obscuring masks of language, to find a way of thinking that which was previously unthought, and to reveal a hidden reality of Being. It was this aim which lead him away from Indian metaphysics, and towards the thoughts and experiences of the Far East

The earliest Buddhist writings are written in Pali, which is extremely close to Sankrit. It has the same script and the same grammatical structure. It was the commonly spoken language in Northen India in the time and place of the Buddha's life.6 As such it could be taken by Europeans to have linguistic roots suitable for ontological speculation, and sutras capable of philosophical analysis. The historical Buddha was called Gautama, born of the Sakya clan or tribe, and one of his epithets in Buddhist writings is the "Great Analyser," because he was able to analyse his experiences from the memory of them (this would be impossible during the experience itself), and to show the path by which these experiences were attained. Subsequently, over the last 2,600 years, other meditators have followed the path and described their experiences, written in the Pali Sutras and the Ahidharma. Thus Buddhism does have a tradition of recording as exactly as possible the experiences that have been successfully repeated over many generations. Buddhist analysis concerns experience, and while it is extremely logical, it is not he logic of tautological or linguistic speculation. The experience of Being itself is acknowledged by Buddhists to be beyond language, therefore, no matter how different the language is, the different meanings of words are not going to reveal the ultimate nature of Being. What is necessary is a return to the common ground of human experience in pure and bare awareness, without the intervening distractions of culturally conditioned mentations. The Buddha states clearly that this is accessible to all humans regardless of gender or race.

We know that as early as 1938, Heidegger invited his Japanese student, Nishitani, to his home to discuss their reading of D.T.Suzuki's book "Essays on Zen Buddhism." Professor Poggeler describes how, from early in his career, Heidegger became familiar with Taoist thought through his contacts with scholars from Asia.7

The fact that Heidegger rarely refers to Eastern thought in his writings, is, according to Professor Gadamer, "because a scholar of his generation would be very reluctant to say anything in print about a philosophy if he were himself unable to read and understand the relevant texts in the original language."8

Heidegger himself gave his blessing to a comparative inquiry when he wrote "Again and again it has seemed urgent to me that a dialogue take place with what is to us the thinkers of the Eastern world".9

Otto Poggeler tells us, in his paper on Heidegger and Lao-tzu, that Heidegger had suffered an emotional collapse during the 1945 trials of Nazis and was hospitalised for three weeks. He apparently suffered tremendous shock and guilt at the realisation of the enormity of Nazi crimes and subsequently went into a forest mountain retreat for recovery. During this time he made contact with the psychiatrist Medard Boss seeking to "break through the narrowness of academic philosophy and reach much broader circles, for the benefit of a large number of people who are suffering." Heidegger wrote "From the Experience of Thinking" in which he sought to heal himself and his thinking through direct experience of passing days and seasons and re-evaluating the work of thought. He subsequently lived a hermit's life, close to nature.10 He embarked, with a Chinese scholar and colleague, on a translation of Lao-tzu's "Tao Te Ching" into the German, but only succeeded in completing eight of the eighty-one chapters, working painstakingly and consistently everyday over many months. He was seeking an absolute rigour in the translation, and dealing with the difficulties of a language with totally different syntactical structure, and one which uses poetic allegory and synonym as a norm in imparting meaning. The "Tao Te Ching" clearly states at its very beginning that the truth of the Way, or the Tao, cannot be explained by words, but only experienced after long and careful practice of the path. It the proceeds to attempt to point sideways at the truth by means of paradoxes in thought, simile and the duality of inter-related phenomena. It becomes evident in Heidegger's subsequent writings, as he becomes more and more concerned with poetry and art as means of saving the world, that he sees ordinary language as inadequate to express the exact meaning of Being.

Heidegger's purpose in translating and studying this most classic of Chinese texts was not to become a Taoist, but rather to return to the historical roots of a system of thought that was more than two thousand years old and exactly contemporary with the roots of Greek, and therefore Western, thought. He wanted to examine and compare how thought paths evolved. To trace the trajectory of Western thought and where it went wrong in how it arrived at its twentieth century conception of being, he needed to step outside the expected norms of the West, to explore the totally different ways of dealing with the same issues in a totally foreign culture. He felt that this study would engender an objectivity that would help uncover the unspoken suppositions or roots of the Greek concept of Logos. In the midst of all this he was acutely aware of the difficulties of language, the uncertainties of never being sure whether the perceived meaning of a text has been understood in the way intended by the original writer, the probability that due to cultural differences the task might actually be impossible. Despite these difficulties, Heidegger persevered in his Eastern studies, and in later years we find some surprising correspondences between his thoughts and the examples he uses and those of Taoist thought.

One such correspondence is found in the metaphor of the jug as a thing and a being. In his 1949 Bremen lecture series entitled 'Insight into that which Is," in the first lecture on the Thing, (Poggeler relates) Heidegger shows that what is important in a jug is not its "form" but rather its "emptiness" which enables it to hold liquids, to pour, to be the kind of object it is, and to be useful. For Heidegger this empty space and thingness brings together his "Fourfold" of earth and heaven, divinities and mortals. The "Tao Te Ching" in chapter 11 observes that the usefulness of a jug is precisely in its emptiness. Here the comparison of Taoism deals with the opposites of duality such as light and dark, positive and negative, apparent solidity of form and its emptiness, the manner in which these paired opposites are necessary to one another, could not exist without each other, and are thus one, ceaselessly changing within a whole. Thus Heidegger is not using the Chinese sense of emptiness in its whole context. Rather he is borrowing the idea of emptiness to undermine the root of the Western conception of form in Being, and to show that its underlying truth is an emptiness conceived in a Western way through Western modes of thought. In discussing Being in this manner his words begin to sound very much like Eastern mysticism, and indeed the influence is really there, but the results of his thinking do not add up to meaning the same as would be intended by a Taoist. In fact this would be impossible because the Tao can only be experienced, then pointed, alluded and hinted at in words that remain inadequate. Heidegger's path was academic, and despite his own desire to overcome the limitations of academic tradition, he was bound into it in a way which would preclude him from ever experiencing being in its Taoist sense. Poggeler expands the correspondences between Heidegger's and Taoist thought enough to show considerable influence on Heidegger's post-war thinking. Taoism is close to Buddhism in many ways and is therefore a relevant tangent to this writer's main aim of exploring Heidegger's parallels with Buddhism.

Heidegger and Buddhism

Another source of comparisons of Heidegger with Eastern thought comes from Japan.

From the early Twentieth Century up to the Second World War, numerous Japanese scholars came to Germany to study Western knowledge and disciplines of study. Some became very interested in existentialist and nihilist thought, and in particular, Heidegger, who's thinking they found very close to Zen. This study was taken back to Japan, and established in the Kyoto School which is still very active today. According to Tesuaki Kotoh, the main difference between the West and East is that in the West the perception of no reason or goal for existence plunges the Western mind into negativity and despair, while in the East, due to Zen (and Taoism), this groundlessness is accepted as it is and thus becomes a source of salvation.

Buddhism posits what it takes to be the four fundamental truths of life. 1. That all sentient beings suffer, that it is in the nature of living to experience suffering. Suffering arises when that which is pleasant or desired ceases or when that which is unpleasant arises or threatens to arise. 2. That the ultimate cause of all suffering is attachment; ie the attachment to or concern for life, security, comfort, and attachments to ideas, identities, things and people, and its opposite of aversion in the forms of fear, negative emotions, dislike of sickness, discomfort, loss of a loved one etc. 3. That it is possible to transcend suffering by achieving enlightenment, seeing reality as it is, the nature of being and of suffering, developing a total cessation of craving for all things, a non-attachment and letting go. This might be sudden after many years of developmental practice, or it might be gradual, accumulating with practice. At this point physical pain might still be experienced, but it is not increased by the emotional affect of aversion to pain. From this point on all emotional suffering ceases completely. 4. That the way to attain enlightenment is by the practice of the Path or the Middle Way. This path has eight factors which should be practiced and gradually developed in daily life; right understanding, right directed thought, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness and right concentration.11 "Right" in this instance means the mode most conducive to developing a high level of pure awareness as consistently as possible, reducing attachments, and seeking to live harmlessly. In Buddhism there is no actual word for meditation. What is translated into English as "meditation" is the word "Bhavana" meaning development. So the practice of meditation is seen as one of developing or training the mind in awareness, looking inwards at the level of pure perception. It is understood that a primary obstacle is the conditioned state of our minds, by which we ordinarily perceive everything around us through the veil of our desires, aversions, interpretations, and distracted mentations. The Bhavana incorporates methods of overcoming mental obstacles.

Heidegger seems to agree with the first truth of Buddhism (that it is in the nature of living to suffer), when he says that one of the ontological characteristics of Dasein is to suffer the burden of life. In his words, "a mood of elation can alleviate the manifest burden of Being; that such a mood is possible also discloses the burdensome character of Dasein, even while it alleviates the burden."12 He also seems to acknowledge that a characteristic of Dasein is "care" or "concern" for its continued existence, and for all ideas, activities, things and others which contribute to that continued being. In so far as Dasein can split itself into different modes of being; "attending to, making use of , producing, looking after, giving up or letting go, interrogating, discussing..."Dasein does so out of concern for its existence. He goes on to state that Dasein, through its awareness of possibility, may experience fear, and that this fear in all its different forms is both a mood by which it knows itself to be and an aspect of concern for its continued existence.13 This is exactly what Buddhism constitutes as attachment. Thus we can see that Heidegger also agrees with the second fundamental truth of Buddhism, that suffering is caused by attachment.

Where he discusses "The Existential Constitution of the 'There'," he shows that Dasein is not merely a being that knows itself to be dwelling in the world, but one which is sentient, which knows its existence through its most familiar and everyday states of mind or moods.14 Buddhism in this instance, says that consciousness arises and knows itself to be as a result of sentient perception, and feelings15 , (whether they are neutral, pleasant or unpleasant, although it places perception itself of all the senses16 as happening prior to feeling.) Kocklemans explains "that care is the unifying factor which integrates into a unity the multiple elements of the Being of that being whose Being is precisely such that it is concerned about its own Being."17 Yet Heidegger also describes Daseign as generally and/or frequently blind to its own condition through being lost in the cares of its world and distracted by mentations, by delusion and language that separates mind from direct knowing. He says "Even though states of mind are disclosive (of Dasein's being), everyday circumspection goes wrong and to a large extent succumbs to delusion because of them, when measured against the idea of knowing the world absolutely."18

Heidegger's Dasein is a da (there) sein (being), a literal being-there or there-being. This Dasein has the faculty of being aware of its own existence: it knows itself to be there. A Being with Heidegger may be anything in existence, for instance, a clod of earth or a bridge. It is being, is existing, but it does not know itself to be there. Only Dasein knows its own thereness.

In brief summary of Heidegger's discussion of in "Being and Time", we can list Dasein's characteristics as the following;

Its very Being comports itself understandingly towards that Being.19 (G53,E79)
It is an entity which I myself am.
Mineness belongs to any existent Dasien, and belongs to it as the condition which makes authenticity and inauthenticity possible.
Being-in-the-world is a state of Dasein a priori.(G54,E79)
Beings are in the world as a jug is in a room, a room in university, university in a city, city in the world, etc.
Beings or entities may be in the world in this way, and their ontological category may be one of present-at-hand, side-by-sideness, but Dasein is not "In-the world" in the same manner as objects without self-awareness. Rather, Dasein "dwells" in or in-habits the world. Thus the Being-in-the-world of Dasein means to dwell. Dasein can never be "alongside" or beside the world. (G54-55,E80-81)

It is possible for Dasein to be merely present-at-hand if it does not see or disregards its own existential state of Being-in (ie delusion, sleep, coma)(G55,E82)

Dasein understands its own inmost being in the sense of a certain factual being-present-at-hand.(G56,E82)
Whenever Dasein is, it is a fact; and the factuality of such a fact is what we shall call Dasein;s "facticity".
Dasein can understand itself as bound up in its "destiny" with the Being of entities (and other Daseins) which it encounters within its own world.

Dasein can split itself into different ways of being - having to do with something in actions of thought, speech or body.
All these ways of Being have concern as their kind of Being. (G56. E83)(Only a Dasein is capable of concern for its continued existence, concern for the things, actitivities and relationships which aid in this, and fear for that which threatens this.) Being is familiar in and for Dasein.(G58-59,E85)
Addressing oneself to the world is a primary function of being in it. Dasein conceives its being in the world via its relationship to others, but it also knows its own existence prior to such relationships.(G59,E85)

We might be tempted to substitute the word "person" for Dasein to make the reading easier, but "person" can denote an individual with personality or an individual with specific characteristics, while the sense that Heidegger intends refers to a person's pure being, and those characteristics which all people have regardless of personal conditioning. Both in English and German there is a lack of a word to describe Heidegger's meaning, so in English we retain the Da-sein or there-Being to retain awareness of his sense.

Heidegger sees Dasein as the only Being capable of being either authentic or inauthentic, and sees authenticity as a necessary condition for transcendence. There is a general feeling in Buddhism that a human birth (as opposed to, say, animal) is particularly fortunate because it allows for the possibility of self awareness, insight, and transcendence. This transcendence has one part of its meaning in common with Heidegger it that both agree that the reality of being, existence and experienced can only occur through direct and conscious perception, without language. interpretation and inauthentic modes of being getting in the way, making the perceiver blind. We can thus say that Heidegger seems almost to agree with the third truth of Buddhism, that the way out of suffering is through transcendence, through awareness, but in this instance it is more that there is an overlap or partial agreement in certain senses, for Buddhism's notion of enlightenment goes a lot further and deeper it its meaning than Heidegger's does.

In the instance of the fourth truth of Buddhism, the two modes of thought part company. Buddhism's construction of the path to enlightenment is seen always as something undertaken by an individual, a moderate and yet extremely difficult path in that most people will be too caught in struggles and desires for pleasure to devote enough time to the Path, hence only a few individuals at any time or era will ever achieve full enlightenment.20 While Heidegger seems to see salvation as something possible not only for an individual in becoming authentic, but for a whole society or whole era through the possibility for it to change it ontological conception of itself within the world. Also he seems to think that authenticity through direct awareness is somehow much easier than Buddhism would have it. This is the point at which this writer has doubts about whether transcendence, salvation or enlightenment actually mean a the same thing in the two modes of thought. The question possibly needs to remain open for further investigation. Some reputable Japanese Zen scholars, especially those of the Kyoto School, believe that Heidegger's concept of salvation is the same as that in Buddhism.21

Heidegger, first in his original conception of time in 1927 and later in his lectures "On Time and Being", in 1962,22 sees a Being,

(ie. any entity which has existence,) as a Being-in Time. The horizon of a being is the boundary of its existence in time. Unless something is eternal, for which the only example we have is the idea of God, a Thing is bounded by a past in which it did not exist, and a future in which it will no longer exist. This may also be said of objects which once were or are yet to be. Thus temporality is an essential pre-requisite of Being. Joseph Kockleman writes that no one before Heidegger had "ever asked the question of how time can have this distinctive ontological function."23

Buddhism agrees that the nature of the whole of existence is conditioned by temporality, but it differs in seeing the being not as a whole which arises and passes away, but rather the sum total of countless arisings and passings away in infinitesimally tiny moments. Buddhist "Abidharma" (Psychology) posits 84,000 moments of consciousness occurring in the mind in the time it takes to observe one sensory perception. Much like the television shows 18 images per second to create a convincing illusion of movement, the human mind is normally involved in an extraordinarily high speed of cognitive function at the level of pure or bare awareness, pure consciousness. A moment's reflection shows that this is necessary in order that autonomic and unconscious processes can continue while the conscious mind of daily experience carries out its functions. At the level of meditation where these mind moments are actually witnessed arising and passing away, the Buddhist perception of the nature of being and change is perceived. Thus the Buddhist view of Being is one which arises from the ground of being in the experience of being without language intervening to name or interpret. This is particularly so of and Zen Buddhism, less so of Pure Land, or Tibetan sects.

The Dasein of Heidegger is also seen, due to its temporality, to possess historicity. Existence is co-determined by a "thrown-ness," that is, the present being is thrown into existence by that which was before it. Kockleman explains "Dasein is as it already was and is what it already was. It is its past, in the sense that its past is, as it were, pushing itself along behind it, and which Dasein thus possesses as a kind of property which is still present at hand: Dasein is its past in the way of its own being."

In Buddhism this concept is expressed as the Law of Cause and Effect, otherwise called Karma.24 All phenomena of existence are seen to arise as the result of the changes in past phenomena; thus coal arises from petrified wood or a chair is crafted by human action upon a tree, a thought arises in response to a previous thought, feeling or sense impression, a human mind is conditioned by the circumstances of its world, a star falls in response to gravity, a death occurs when consciousness ceases to arise, or when the body of a sentient being stops generating from food and air the physical energy that gives rise to consciousness.

Heidegger, according to Kockleman's exposition, differentiates between the unauthentic and the authentic Dasein. ..." if it (Dasein) takes itself as a temporal thing which finds itself in a temporal horizon, it is in an unauthentic manner.....When man turns toward historicity, he is able to ek-sist authentically: however, if he turns to his own 'inner-temporality' he forgets himself in his concern for what is ready-to-hand or in his presentation of what is present-at-hand."25 Heidegger requires three elements for Dasein's authentic awareness through temporality; 1. awareness of historicity or causal arising out of past being, 2.awareness of a present existence which is limited in time, a capacity for "making present" through awareness of presence, and letting that which has environmental presence be encountered, and 3. awareness of Death as a finite and future limit of existence. When Dasein is aware of all this, its existence in the ground of being becomes authentic. " In other words, man can ek-sist authentically only if in his historicity he expressly endures his destiny of having to temporalise time as finite, that is as a mortal being."26

In the Theravadin practice of insight meditation one of the first goals is to know the truth that all things change, including that which is identified as self. Within the early stages of Insight (Vipassana) meditation it is seen that all present perception is conditioned by past. It is seen that the only way to be aware of anything is in the present moment, that sensory perception (hearing, seeing, thinking, remembering, feeling, etc) of whatever is can only be in the present. There is also a specific form of Concentration (Samadha) meditation which contemplates Death as inevitable, used to bring the practitioner into awareness of the urgency to achieve self transcendence in this lifetime. Yet these three aspects of awareness are not used to define authentic or inauthentic Being, rather they are taken as fundamentals for development towards greater mental sanity and happiness, and eventually salvation from existential suffering, or enlightenment. But then if Heidegger were to agree that an authentic Dasein is saner and happier by virtue of being less deluded, then perhaps he and Buddhism agree more on this point than at first appears.

Heidegger claims that an authentic Dasein in the ground of being, having a capacity to let be, to be as one with the world, rather than seeing the world as an Other for exploitation and use, is essential for human kind's salvation from the Modern Age and technology, and as salvation from the sense of homelessness that comes of forgetting one's Being. Both Heidegger and Buddhism are concerned with salvation from suffering, and both see salvation as contingent upon awareness of temporality. But for Heidegger this salvation does not seem to be synonymous with enlightenment in the Buddhist sense, and for Buddhists there is considerably more to salvation than just the single factor of knowing temporality.

Keiji Nishitani disagrees with this writer's opinion that the meaning of Salvation is conceived differently. In his reflection on Heidegger's 1961 speech "Ansprache zum Heimatabend," he observes that in Zen Buddhism "this awakening, this attainment of repose in the midst of transitoriness, can mean a way of discovering home in the immediate midst of homelessness, as is also pointed out by Heidegger."27

Conclusion

The Western tradition of studying the nature of being may have been started by Greek speculation, but it was fuelled by the Christian need to prove, a priori, Church dicta on the nature and origins of existence, dicta which were articles of faith that could not be known a posteriori. This meant that ontology was capable of becoming no more than an analytical playing with words and their meanings. Heidegger saw the despair the nihilist position, and wanted to find a view of Being that went beyond traditional academic form, that would lead to a healing or salvation for the modern age. He also eventually saw that to experience Dasein in the ground of being authentically, such experience had to be between Being and language; language could not be used as a route to Being, for it stands as an obstacle to pure experience.

This agrees with the Buddhist and Taoist positions, except that these positions are obtained a posteriori or empirically. The East does not speculate. It builds on its knowledge only through the experiences of those who have obtained enlightenment over the centuries. It sees language and art as merely pointing the Way to an understanding which is directly perceived. While it counts intellectual acumen as a great blessing, it also sees truth as incapable of realisation through intellectual speculation.

We have explored some of the references and evidence compiled by scholars which proves that Heidegger was interested in and influenced by Eastern, specifically Taoist and Zeb Buddhist, thought. We have arrived at an understanding and comparison of some of the main aspects in the thinking of Heidegger and Buddhism, in particular that there is close agreement between them on the first two truths of Buddhism, and definite overlaps of agreement in the second two. Further to this we have found several other significant correspondances in the basic premises of each.

Bibliography

Davids, T.W. Rhys. Buddhist India. 1st ed 1903. Motilal Banasidass, India

Harvey, Peter. An Introduction to Buddhism. 1990, Cambridge University Press

Heidegger, Martin. Basic Writings. Routledge & Kegan Paul, London & Henley, '77

Heidegger, Martin. Being and Time. Basil Blackwell, Oxford, UK, 1985 translated by John Macquarie and Edward Robinson

Heidegger, Martin. What is Called Thinking? Harper and Row, New York, 1968

Heidegger, Martin. The Age of the World Picture. trans and details?
Kocklemans, Joseph. Heidegger on Time and Being, Pennsylvania State University
Miller, Alice. Breaking Down the Walls of Silence; to Join the Waiting Child Virago Press, London, 1992. !st pub in German in 1990
Ni,Hua-Ching The complete Works of Lao Tzu; Tao Te Ching and Hua Hu Ching pub byThe Shrine of the Eternal Breath of Tao, Malibu, California, and College of Tao and Traditional Chinese Healing, L.A. California, 1989
Parkes,Graham. ed., Heidegger and Eastern Thought, 1987. Uni. of Hawaii Press
Radice, Betty. ed. Buddhist Scriptures, 1959, Penguine Classics, England
Richardson, William J. Heidegger; Through Phenomenology to Thought.
Martinus Nijhoff, The Hague, 1963
Suzuki, D T. Essays in Zeb Buddhism. Grove Weidenfeld, New York, 1st pub 1927

Ms Amanda Hart,
Mon, 1st May, 1994
21 Queen St,
Glebe, 2037, Australia
(612) 9660-1749

1 From the translator's preface, Being and Time, p13
2 Author's note. In Buddhism one of the three fundamental truths attained through enlightenment is "Anata" which means the non-existence of the self. There is no self, soul, or spirit. The ego, or sense of existing I with a specifif identity and identification, is an illusion created by an apparent continuity of consciousness, memory, attachments and aversions, and the illusion of a fixed and continuing conditioned reality. Part of enlightenment involves the "death of the I," which does not mean the death of the person, nor of experience and sentience.

Rather it means that in the meditative state there is no difference between the self and the world, and in the non-meditative state this experience is remembered and affects one's being in the world in a manner which greatly reduces suffering.

It is, however, unlikely that Ekhardt's nothingness of the Godhead, attained through detachment is actually the same thing. Rather it might be postulated that Ekhardt's detachment is equivilent to certain stage in the development of the practice of Buddhist meditation, still far from its goal.

3 Otto Poggeler, East-West Dialogue, p48 "Heidegger and Asian Thought"

4 J.L. Mehta, Heidegger and Vedanta: Reflections on a Questionable Theme" p. 22,. "Heidegger and Easter Thought"

5 From a speciallist in Vedantic and Brahmanic philosophy, J.L. Mehta, in "Heidegger and Vedanta; Reflections on a Questionable Theme".

6 T.W. Rhys Davids, "Buddhist India" p.18

7 Otto Poggeler, "East-West Dialogue; Heidegger and Lao-tsu.", p79, Heidegger anad Asian Thought."

8 Graham Parkes, from a personal conversation with Gadamer, recorded in Parkes' introduction to the anthology "Heidegger and Asian Thought", p.7.

9 Letter by Heidegger to the organisers of a symposium for Heidegger's 80th birthday in 1969 at the University of Hawaii.

10 Author's note. In Taoist, Buddhist and Hindu practices, a retreat from the world to quiet forest and mountainous places in nature is regarded as necessary, especially in early stages of meditation, because the mind must be trained to completely quiet its verbal chatter in order to get closer to the actual experience of being. The mental and sensory stimulations of urban life are seen as potential obstacles to this process and to mental health in general.

11 Peter Harvey, An Introduction to Buddhism. pp 47-68 The eightfold path should be accompanied in daily life by the development of unconditional compassion for all living beings, and the development of generousity (which reduces one's own attachment and lessons the suffering of others). The eight precepts include within them five ethical precepts of noble speech (communicating the truth without intent to deceive), not taking that which is not freely given, right livelihood (not selling drugs or armaments, or dealing in warfare), not committing sexual misconduct (meaning any behaviour which would cause suffering to another), and not consuming mind intoxicating drugs.

12 Being and Time German p134, English p173
13 Being and Time German p142, English p182
14 Being and Time .German p134, English p172
15 The specific text dealing with this is the Abhidarma, a treatise of Buddhist psychology arising from the collective observations of monks in meditations. The texts have been collected and croos checked against experience over twenty-five centuries.

Here feeling is niether a physical sentation, nor an emotion. Rather it is a reponse of enjoyment or discomfort arising as a result of either a physical or mental perception. If left unobserved by Dasein, the feeling will subsequently develop into an emotion or mood.
16 In Buddhism, the mind is regarded as a sixth sense, one which percieves ideas, memories, plans, fantasies, visual, auditory and other sense hallucinations, in the same way that sight percieves objects reflected by light, or hearing perceives vibrations of sound.
17 Kocklemans, "heidegger on Being and Time"' p.58. Ibid pp.228-241.
18 Being and Time .German p138, English p180
19 Numbers refer to page references of Heidegger's Being and Time. Numbers with a G refer to the *th German edition, numbers with an E refer to the English edition translated byJohn Macquarie and Edward Robinson in1962. Where page numbers are not marked the statement may be found on the same page as that of the last statement so marked.
20 Buddhism recognises thirteen stages of enlightenment, of which the first three are easy to obtain, but also unstable and easy to lose if development ceases. The latter stages are seen as permanent for the life of the individual.
21 Keiji Nishitani in Reflections on Two Addresses by Martin Heidegger p145, and Tetsuaki Kotoh in Languge and Silence: Self-Inquiry in Heidegger and Zen, p201 in Graham Parkes' anthology on Heidegger and Eastern Thought
22 Heidegger, "Being and Time," 1927
23 Josehp Kocklemans, :"Heidegger on Being and Time", Pemmsylvania State University
24 Not to be mistaken for the popular conception in the West that Karma refers to a moral "just deserts" for actions in this or something inherited as 'punishment' or 'reward' from a previous incarnation. This is a predominantly Hindu notion, also common to Mahayanist Buddhism at the popular level. In the doctrines taught by the Buddha, Karma is purely the law of cuse and effeect, or cause and cosequence, otherwise also called the Law of Dependant Causation. An action will certainly have results, and these may often be unseen or not immediate, but the past life is merely a past belonging to this lifetime for this being. I might inherit a karm which is the result of actions of other, possibly dead beings, but I do not inherit it in the sense of re-incarnation because there is no self that can re-incarnate.

25 Kocklemans, Heidegger on Being and Time, p.60 cited Ibid., pp.383-401

26 Kocklemans, Heidegger on Being and Time, p.60 cited Ibid., p375

27 Keiji Nishitani, "Reflections on Two Addresse," p.149 "Heidegger and Eastern Thought."

End of file

HOUSEHOLDER SERIES

by Jack Kornfield

9. Hindrances of the Householder (I)

~~~~~~

I've asked old students, people who have sat in meditation for quite awhile, what kinds of things they were working with after five or ten or fifteen years of practice. They say, "I'm working with fear" or "I'm working with habit and desires that arise over and over" or "I'm working with laziness" or "I'm working with irritation" or anger; common kinds of energies. What I hear even from people who have sat in meditation for a long time is the same list of the five basic hindrances that are discussed in the second day of every retreat. It seems that they stay around for awhile. So I'd like to look at them in the context of people who have been practicing for awhile and living their lives, and see how we can continue to work with them since they seem to be part of our family life, so to speak, or inner family life anyway.

How can we understand the hindrances or the traditional difficulties in meditation in our daily life? First of all, it is important to understand, as you go on in the path of spiritual practice, that often the weaknesses or difficulties that we encounter are the places that most wake us up. The places where we seem most successful and the best of things are often also the places that are the strongest part of our self image or our "ego" in some kind of Eastern sense of that word. And it's the places that are our very difficulties and our vulnerabilities that often allow us to grow in a more genuine way when we look at them, when we work with them.

There was a wonderful paper that was written a few years ago by
~~~~~~

Seymour and Sylvia Boorstein for the Journal of Transpersonal Psychology, and it was called "The Five Hindrances of Marriage." It talked about the difficulties that the Buddha described in meditation -- desire, anger, restlessness, laziness or sleepiness, doubt -- and it describes the process of marriage as encountering these exact same forces. Desire for something else or better. Irritation and anger, especially when you discover that that person really isn't behaving in the way that you expected and hoped and planned for them, and all the irritation and frustration that comes from that. The third hindrance of sleepiness or laziness, discovering after awhile that one can get complacent in relationships. Or the opposite -- restlessness, the traditional Seven Year Itch; after a certain cycle in a relationship, one gets restless for something new or something different. And doubt. "Is this the right person?" or "Is this the right way to be living?" and the same forces which arise when one sits in meditation and tries to open one's eyes inwardly, and one's heart and mind seem to arise in relation to the people we're closest to, and all the other people at distances from us.

Can you recognize that? Can you see that there are parallels between the sitting and other things around? There are all kinds of stories that we make up about these states. "He did," and "she did," and "I will," and "she should," and so forth. It's useful to see that those stories are based on kind of myths that we build about ourselves and the world, identities that are created mostly by thought, and, in fact, things are a lot simpler than that.

This is from Achaan Chaa:

> Traditionally the Eightfold Path is taught with eight steps such as Right Understanding, Right Speech, Right Concentration, and so forth. But the true Eightfold Path is within us: two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, a tongue and a body. These eight doors are our entire Path and the mind is the one that walks on the Path. If you know just these things, and the states that arise with them, all of the dharma is in front of you.

We all have these stories about experiences, but actually our experiences, if we want to live more in the moment, are much simpler than that, much simpler than our stories.

Let's talk about the five hindrances a little bit and maybe reflect in some ways how they arise, not just while sitting, but all the rest of the time, which is what practice is for. You sit and practice in order then to live it. That's why it's called "Practice."

Desire is the juiciest one of them. As Oscar Wilde said, "I can resist anything but temptation." It's the one that we get caught up in in different ways. It's amazing, wanting is a very powerful habit. We can want anything, and it changes from one thing to another. We desire one thing and then we desire another. In the retreats, as you know, there's the phenomena of things like The Vipassana Romance where people are silent and not looking at anyone and just paying attention, and they notice some interesting shape or something out there, and then they just sit, and all of a sudden the whole idea comes, what it would be like to maybe meet that person, and talk with them, perhaps after the retreat to go out and meditate together, or some other activity like that. And that goes on, you know -- marriage, children. In California it usually includes divorce as well, if you really play it all the way out. And without making eye contact with that person, the mind spins out this fantasy of things that will fulfill it better than whatever experience is here, with the breath, or the body, or whatever is actually here.

That same movement can be observed, if you look, all the time in our life. It's called the "If-Only Mind." It's the mind that arises in the moment of experience and says, "If only I had something else," "If only I had a different partner," or "If only they behaved in a different way," or "If only I had a different job," or "If only I had more free time," or more money, or a house more in the country, or a house more in the city, or "If only I were younger," or "If only I were older," or whatever. It's always the same state. I watched it when I was a monk and all I had were a few books and a robe and bowl. Possessions were really minimal. Even so, I found myself thinking, "If only I had a little nicer robe." It has nothing to do with what's around us. It's this movement inside of feeling like what's here is not enough. Do you know what I'm talking about?

Nasrudin says:

> Never give people anything they ask for > until at least a day has passed.
> Someone said, "Why not?"
> "Experience shows they only appreciate something > when they have the opportunity of doubting > whether they will get it or not."

One of the interesting things when you start to look at and work with the hindrance of desire is to see that what relieves it, what makes one finally happy about it, is not so much the thing that you get, or the person, or the experience that you get at the end - this is important, so listen to this - it's actually the fact that the state of desiring has ended. I'll give you a simple example. Suppose you have a craving for some food that you really want to have. It can be pizza or ice cream or cannelloni, you name it, whatever it happens to be. You go and you get it. You do all the things. You get in your car, you go, you finally get it, you have it in your hand, and you take the first bite of whatever it is. And usually the moment that you taste it, there's this great sense of delight and release, and so forth, and part of it may be because it tastes good and it's pleasurable, if it's part of your fantasy -- but the main piece is, in that moment, finally the wanting stops. Do you understand that? And that a good deal of the joy of fulfilling desires is not so much of the getting of the thing, because you have it for a little while and then you want the next thing -- it's endless -- but rather that there's a moment where the wanting itself stops. If you look closely in yourself, if you let yourself look, you find that the very process of wanting is painful; that the very state of not being complete or content or present with what's here is what the pain is about.

That's a familiar hindrance. Let's talk about some of the others, and then talk about ways one could work with them in one's life. Of course, the first piece is just beginning to understand how these operate in ourselves.

The next four are quite interesting. Anger, sleep, restlessness and doubt -- even desire to a certain extent is included -- I tend to see them all as states of avoidance. They're really states which arise so that we can avoid something, some aspect of what's true in our experience. Maybe I can explain that as we go along.

Anger, which includes irritation and judgment and boredom, not liking what's present, fear -- all of those are the movement of anger. It's a very painful state, for the most part, if you look at it. The body has a lot of tension, there's heat, there's burning if you're angry. Even irritation has a lot of tension in it. Yet in some way we do it again partly out of habit. Another reason that we do it is because it makes us feel right in some way. You know what I mean about being right. That's the favorite feeling of many people because it's the feeling that most authenticates the sense of yourself.

Two weeks ago when we talked about Forgiveness somebody stood up or raised their hand and said something that was really powerful. They said, "Here we are, stewing and raging and angry about something that someone has done, and very often they're off going about their own business enjoying themselves. And who's suffering? It's us because it wasn't that way, and we're so angry, and it should have been, and so forth. And who is doing the holding on at that point? I'm not saying that you shouldn't be angry -- you can be angry or hold grudges; you're welcome to do anything. -- We're just looking at the laws of how it operates.

I remember I was sitting at this one monastery for a long time meditating, and I had a bout of anger about something, which I have regularly, and I went to the teacher and told him how angry I was about something. It was in the hot season and he was wearing those little flip-flop sandals. He got up and went over to the table where we were sitting and he kicked the table leg. It looked like it hurt him. Then he held his foot and he hopped around for awhile. Then he sat back down and kind of massaged his foot. Then he looked at me and he shook his head. That was his response to my being angry. He just kind of acted out what we do. Just like desire, where we can desire anything, and it doesn't matter what it is, the force is there, and we get our food, or our relationship, or our car, or our vacation, or our time off, whatever it is, and then we look for the next thing because it's so powerful. The same with anger. We can get angry at anything, including things that are already past and nothing can be done about them. And even more, we can imagine something which somebody is going to do, and sit there and get really angry at what they might do. Have you ever seen yourself do that?

We project our righteousness on other people in some way. We project our pain, is really what it's about; that we're in some kind of pain, and we make it somebody else's fault. Also there's as much suffering in the world as we experience at certain times, and we don't want to take it in because it's so hard for our hearts, and our culture is one that doesn't train the human heart very well to deal with the measure of pain that's part of life.

I got quite angry today. In fact, I was really yelling at somebody. I won't talk about the specifics so much. I felt so indignant and I felt so right that it was very hard not to do it. It's interesting to observe. It's not like anger is some terrible thing, or that it won't arise, or that all these other states won't arise, or that there might not even be an occasion where it was appropriate. There are some occasions for that, especially if you're able to let it move through you instead of storing it as resentment and all kinds of other things, or if you use it in a way that isn't really intended to hurt other people. That's a whole other talk about anger.

But here we are, living in a pretty busy and complicated world, and we see this state of being angry, or being irritated, or judgmental, arise very often, and yet we are the victims of it. It's we who suffer from it. The question, when it comes, is: How can we relate to it? It's really the pain in us that we're talking about. If we can look at that, then we can touch the world and heal it a little bit. It's very difficult to do without healing our own pain.

Let's talk about laziness, and so forth. I said all of these are avoidances. Very often anger is really a way of not feeling the pain of someone else or what our own experience is. Judgment and fear are the same things. Sleepiness is the same. Sleepiness, the habit of going unconscious. When is it that sleepiness arises? There are three basic causes for it. It comes when we're tired. That's the first one. And that's a good signal. You sit in meditation or you find yourself at other times having sleepiness. arise for you; then take a look and see what are the causes. Now, if it's just that you've been working kind of hard and you're tired, that's one thing. Then you just respect your body and maybe take a rest.

But because we're in 80's in California, in a Western culture, how many people when they get sleepy or tired are living in such a way that it's really a signal? How are you living your life, how busy is it, how full is it; where are we going that we fill it up so much? Does that make sense to any of you? So that's a signal. It's a signal even if it is just tiredness. Let's look at what pace we live at, or let's look of how we fill up our lives, and what we might be avoiding in some way in doing that.

One part of sleepiness is just that we're tired. The second is that we are unaccustomed to stillness, that our culture moves so fast and we get into that rhythm. Then when it's time to stop, and you sit to meditate or you walk outside, or you go home you kick your shoes off, you start to think, "Maybe I could meditate. No, I'm too tired to do it." The way I put it in retreats is: When we start to get quiet, there's some little voice in there that says, "Oh, it's quiet; it must be bedtime," because it's one of the few times we stop. It's a response in us, when we start to get still or concentrated or quiet. And sometimes the fear comes, "Oh, this is too quiet, what will I do with this? It's too empty, there isn't enough activity for me to know who I am," because we define ourselves by our activities.

The third reason that sleepiness arises is that it is a kind of resistance. You will notice yourself becoming lazy or sleepy at certain times in your spiritual life not because you're overtired or not because it's too quiet. And that's an unfamiliar state that you need to work with, to learn to open again like a child; but because there's some pain or sorrow or grief or difficulty or conflict that's kind of hard to feel, it's easier just to be sleepy about it. Has anybody noticed that happening in their lives, or how often it can happen?

Our culture is amazing. Not just our culture, it's worldwide. There are ten million drug addicts, and 20 million alcoholics, and 50 million people who are close to those drug addicts and alcoholics -- and their families or family-systems, who are really painfully touched by that; deeply so. And more than half of all the car accidents where people are killed and 80 or 90 percent of child abuse and the great majority of fires at home, and all of those things, are involved with alcohol and drugs. And the level of pain, if you start to work with people around the family systems of alcohol and drugs, and so forth -- it's extraordinary. Yet, the purpose of all of that, for the most part, is to cover pain. A friend of mine who worked in a drug program for many years said that generally speaking the amount of drugs and alcohol used is equal to the amount of pain in the person, not to be too simplistic about it. So that's what I mean by avoidance; that there are states that arise for us that keep us from feeling.

Restlessness is a different one. The vibration, the movement, the habit of our culture is to be speedy. TV, shopping, eating, traveling, the telephone, all of these things, where we keep ourselves busy because we don't know what to do. We're not taught as we grow up how to nurture ourselves in stillness, how to listen more to the breeze, or the clouds, or the trees, or the children, or the people around us, or how to just sit on our porch and rock in our chairs a little bit and watch stuff go by, as people used to do, instead of constantly being busy with it. I have to confess I'm one of us in that one. Somebody from Europe who heard my dharma talks wanted to sit a long retreat and came to a three-month retreat. They said they were so disappointed in me because I tend to move pretty quickly, and they said I seemed more like an Italian shoe salesman than a calm meditation teacher. And it's true.

Someone who has done a lot of vipassana practice and has worked with eating disorders, has titled one of her books feeding the hungry heart. A lot of our busyness is because we're looking for something to fulfill us. So we eat or go shopping or travel, or pick up the phone, or turn on the TV really compulsively at times, because there's something we want -- and it doesn't quite do it. That's the kind of restlessness. The ability to just stop and be, like when you're in a traffic jam where you say, "Here, I am on the Golden Gate Bridge; I might as well feel the bridge vibrate and kind of look at what the shipping is doing, instead of thinking of where I could be or being frustrated." It's to be with what is.

There have been a number of movies from Australia. I remember one called the last wave, with pictures of the aborigines. One of the things that most struck me about them was that when the aborigines sat down, they sat. It was like they sat and they could have been on a rock, Ayers Rock or something, and they just sat there, and they could have sat all day and all night and all week. But you don't see that in our culture; you see this sense of movement almost to the extent where people can't sit still, can't pause, can't stop because of what would they feel.

Someone asked Nijinsky about his dancing, how he could dance in such a marvelous way, and he said that there had to be some stillness in it. He said:

> It's really quite simple. I merely leap and pause.

What a description, "I merely leap and pause." Can we learn to stop a little bit? Maybe that's all that meditation is about, just to stop.

Then the last hindrance is doubt, confusion, tension, kind of wondering, "What should my work be, how should my spiritual life go, am I in the right relationship, am I in the right workplace, am I in the right part of the country." We Americans have the curse of choice. That's not a trivial thing. It enlivens and it enriches the culture and our lives, but it's a very difficult thing and it's not so for most cultures. And usually when doubt arises strongly it does so because our heads, our thinking apparatus is not connected with our heart. If you look in the moment where there's a lot of confusion or doubt, it's there because there's much thought and not much connection to the heart, to what we might do based on our deeper values.

Another way to put it is: when there's a lot of doubt, often connected with it is a lack of love for ourselves or a lack of love for the other, for the world around us. If we're in touch with that love, our path becomes pretty clear. Do you remember the question I asked the night of the talk on Forgiveness that came from Gandhi's tomb along the Ganges in Delhi where the question was inscribed in stone:

> Think of the poorest person you have ever met, and then before acting ask if or how this act will be of benefit to that person.

Confusion generally comes when we're not in touch with what we really value in life. And again, it requires a stopping, an opening, a listening inside.

These are the hindrances. Are they familiar? Certainly they are. They are our companions in the journey. We see them over and over in sitting, we see them over and over in the world outside, in the cause for war. When I was angry there was a very strong impulse in me to call and register a complaint and try to solve something. And then being met by aggression, it was very easy to see if someone chooses to be your adversary how easy it is to take up the banner and say, "Alright, I'll do it. I'm a man. Why not?" or whatever it is. That's one of the problems, yes. But it's worldwide -- prejudice, greed, fear and desire; these same forces that create war or that create grain elevators full of food in one place and hungry people in another.

The question is: Are they workable? Can one work with these forces? Lama Yeshe in that excerpt that I've read about his time being in the hospital and going through all the great difficulty with his heart attack, said:

> Can you learn the basic precept of transforming your unwanted sufferings into the path of practice?

If you can learn that precept, it will serve you in any circumstances. Can you learn to do that? Can any of us do that? What does it take? A key thing that it requires is faith. It is so important -- faith in the human heart, faith in the power of awareness. The Dalai Lama was asked what was the most important thing one can do as a teacher of dharma, what's the most important thing you can communicate, and he said "Faith." Not faith in the Buddha or faith in something from India or some ancient system, but really faith in our own true nature. Rock bottom understanding of that, not just with words but because you know that it's true that human beings have this capacity to deal with the sorrows of the world and with adversity, and that the heart is greater than all of that, and that the power of awareness is such that we can grow from any of it. That's what we have to discover -- in ourselves, in our sitting, in our families, in our lives. Faith, not so much in doing but in stopping, in listening, in not doing so much, and letting ourselves stop avoiding things that are difficult, not getting so caught by the stories of what we want or what we don't want. That's all the mind. Minds do that, it's sort of their job -- you pay them a little bit and they just think all the time.

Rilke talks about it quite beautifully in a poem which he calls, "I Have Faith in Nights."

> You darkness that I come from,
> out of which all things come,
> I love you more than all the fires
> that fence in the world, > for the fire makes a circle of light for everyone,
> and then no one outside learns of you.
> But the darkness pulls in everything, > shapes and fires, animals and myself.

How easily it gathers them,
powers and people.
It is possible a great energy is moving near us.
I have faith in night.

Amazing poem, darkness out of which everything comes.

Can we stop -- in our practice, in our lives with our families -- and start to listen, and let ourselves be a little emptier, a little more silent, more in touch with the spaces between words or between desires or between frustrations? There is something really mysterious that reveals itself as soon as we stop. It doesn't take very long, and maybe there's a certain pain that one has to go through in putting on the brakes, if you know what I mean -- each time, again and again, too -- but when you do it, then things become mysterious again like it is for any child.

Walt Whitman said:

As to me I know of nothing else but miracles
when you're still enough.

The source of our happiness is not through our doing, it's really much more through stopping. How can we work with our hindrances very specifically? First of all, if you identify the most popular ones in your own personal repertoire, it helps a lot. If you're going to go to the theater, you might as well know what play is on. I've talked on some nights about Buddhist personality typology, which is based on our responses that come out of the sense of separateness itself; and the three roots in Buddhist psychology are the greed type, the aversion type, and the deluded type.

Just to remind you in a simple way, we all have all of it in us. I'm a great example of the greedy type. The general response of the greedy type is to go into a new situation and see what we like about it, and see how we might get more of it, what's lovely about it or what we appreciate. Forget the rest. Now, the aversion type -- my wife is more in that category -- is somebody who goes into a situation and sees what's wrong with it, which is a very different response, painted wrong, the colors are wrong, and people are behaving wrong, and so forth. And then the deluded type whose tendency is to go into a new situation and not know what to make of it, not know what their place is.

Does this make sense to you? Do you understand these types of either wanting or being critical or not knowing your place in it? There's a lot more. -- There's the Buddhist families, Ratna, Padma, Vajra, all these styles which I might talk about a little bit more. What's interesting is that each of these also has a positive side, which we'll get to later, things that can be transformed in us. The point about this is that it begins to become useful if we want to work with the hindrances in our daily life to start to see what our own patterns are. Is it our tendency to get irritated all the time, or is it our tendency to go to sleep all the time, or is it our tendency to eat to avoid, to use desire in that way, or is there some other tendency?

My teacher Achaan Chah used to be very forthright about it. It was part of his teaching style. He would kind of give nicknames to a number of his monks and people around. It was a little bit like The Seven Dwarfs _ Sleepy and Dopey and stuff like that. "This is a monk that's always into eating. Oh, here's my monk, why don't you meet him? This is Sleepy. Whenever I visit, go to his cottage, he's always sleeping," and so forth. He did it with a lot of humor.

You've got to start to look at what is your particular way of not being present. The thing is that they're not bad. You don't have to say, "Well, I'm a bad person," because this is just the nature of being born with a self-structure or having it develop in early childhood. What's important is to see that it's actually very alive, and that if you can begin to work with it, it's interesting. Aren't you interested in yourself? Fess up! Come on! Why not look at the patterns that we use in relating to things? It's really juicy and it can be transformed.

The first thing is to see what are the popular patterns in oneself. So I ask you that for yourself -- which are the ones that you use? Then the second, after you recognize that, which helps you to kind of keep on the lookout for them, is to begin to identify mindfully the state or the experience as it arises in the moment, or as close to the moment as you can -- the wanting or the fear or the desire or the doubt. And a little while later you say, "Oh, here I am in it," and to identify it by acknowledging it. It's very useful to use a label, "fear, fear" or "desire" or "wanting" - just give it its name in a neutral way. You really see the force as an opportunity to learn. "Alright, I've had 29 years or 48 years of this mostly being my pattern. Let me really look at it. How soon does it come? What situations cause it to arise? What does it feel like in the body? What's going on with me in that moment? What's the experience like?"

So the second thing is to identify it, the best you can, without judgment. It's hard because we tend to say these are bad -- it's bad to be irritated or to be fearful or to be angry, or it's bad to be desiring or wanting. If we want to learn about them, the key is to be mindful, which is to say, to see and observe them as if you were studying a different person. Say, "Gee, this is an interesting force. How is this operating?" It's also important to see that they're workable. When you identify or label it, it changes from being overwhelming to, "Oh, this is just the dark night of the soul." It's difficult, but you know what to call it. Or in your relationship, instead of saying, "Oh, this is not going right, I should look for another partner," it might be, "Oh, this is just a state of doubt or restlessness. Let me see if I can look at that in myself."

Then the third piece is to make friends with it, to really receive it with your heart as well as your attention, because if you dislike it, even in a subtle way in your heart, when you say, "desire, desire, desire" or "aversion" or whatever, it's not going to go away or change. You won't even learn much about it because you're still in struggle with it. The more that you struggle with pains or experiences, actually the more real they become inside.

The fourth is to observe how it changes -- the more carefully, the better. Maybe you should study one a week. Pick one and observe what does it feel like in the body. How long does it last when you label it? How many labels long? What triggers it to arise? What state usually follows it? What is it like if you're working with desire and you note "desire, desire, desire," or whatever it happens to be? What's the moment like when it stops? I keep thinking of this cartoon that was in mad magazine: Alfred E. Newman was at the blackboard, and he was writing, he was down to about his hundredth time, and it said, "Cessation of desire, cessation of desire, cessation of desire," It was his assignment for that day. Look at and see if you're examining desire or fear or whatever, see what it feels like, and see if you can notice the moment when it changes. Very interesting moment, because at that moment you begin to realize not only its impermanence, but also that it's very impersonal, it comes according to a certain story or forces. It doesn't last very long unless we keep telling the story over and over.

You can practice with little ones. You can practice with annoyance with your partner or your spouse. Practice watching when you feel yourself to be right. Just practice watching for that little impulse that says, "I'm right." It's a very interesting one. Or practice carefully with certain desires that arise that you know, those are the ones you'd like to learn about, and see what it's like as it arises.

First is to look at key patterns and sort of recognize the territory for yourself. The second is to identify the experience in the moment. The third is to touch it with your heart as well as seeing and labeling it, to really let it in and not condemn it so much. The fourth is to notice how it changes, notice it's process, beginning and end, what comes before and afterward. Take little things to work with; practice easy ones.

The next -- and this is really a key -- is see if you can discover or observe what it hides you from, what it distracts you from, what it covers up, what's the fear. When I said these are all forms of avoidance, if you let yourself feel desire, or fear, or boredom, or doubt, or restlessness, and you observe it, see if you can listen inside yourself a little more deeply, or even on a cellular level somehow, and see what it is that you're moving away from, that you run from. Some of it is moving away from being "just this much," as Achaan Chaa says. We're always at war trying to make life more than it is, make it bigger, or grander, or happier, or sadder, or longer, or shorter, or lighter, or darker.

We move away from hunger, we move away from loneliness, we move away from grief, or unfinished business, or pain in our heart, or the fact that we haven't really been intimate in our relations at times, and that's difficult to acknowledge, so we distract ourselves, or we move away from pains that are unfinished in the past where we haven't forgiven, or meaninglessness, or we move away from fear that things are out of control. They are! Or we move away from space; it gets quiet and the whole sense of oneself which is built on busyness starts to go away, and that's scary, so we distract ourselves.

It's not only to observe the hindrance or the state, but also to listen more deeply and see what you would experience if you let yourself just get here. What might you be avoiding? It's a little bit like going through a layer of ice that's a little painful, if you want to go into the water and explore the depths of it. There's all kinds of amazing things. But you have to stop skating, and then there's a moment where you say, "Whoops, I think I'm going to break through the ice," and you do. It's okay to stop and feel what's actually present. This is a big part of practice, to open your body, to use your breath, your attention, and your heart, and feel what's here, and stop moving; to come to rest in the moment. This is where it gets very delicate. It's called, Watching the Movement of Mind.

I'll close again with something from Achaan Chah. He talks about the Middle Way:

> On one side it's like you're being kicked on one side with desire, and the other is aversion, left and right. One who follows the Middle Way says, "I will not get caught by the pleasure or pain. I will let go of each as they arise, accepting one moment after another. But it's hard. It's as though we're being kicked on both sides, like a cow bell or a > pendulum knocked back and forth. We're always besieged by pleasure and pain, and then we follow by a response, "I don't like it, I do like it."

>
> If you observe this, use your heart for guidance. You'll see that when the heart is in its natural state, it's unattached, it's accepting. When it stirs from the normal it's because of various thoughts and ideas, the process of construction, of images. This is the illusion.
>
> Learn to see this process clearly. When the mind is stirred from its normal state it leads away from this moment into past, into future, into right and wrong, into indulgence and aversion, creating more illusion, more of movement.
>
> Good and bad arise only in the mind. If you keep watch on this, studying this one topic your whole life, I guarantee you'll never be bored.

He says in another place:

> Just take one seat in the middle of the room and don't get up, and see the things as they come and go.

So working with these states in one's sitting practice, in driving in a traffic jam, in the supermarket, in one's marriage, or one's intimate relations, in the workplace -- they're the same forces. Begin to work by identifying them, start to see what your common patterns are, maybe take a look and see what you're avoiding by having them there, and see if you can bring your heart into them as well, because for the most part they arise out of some place of pain. If we can open and soften to that, to kind of melt to it, there's a much deeper place of well-being that is our Buddha-nature, that is our birthright, and it's there for anybody who stops.

This is Emily Dickinson:

When much in the woods as a little girl,
I was told that the snake would bite me, that I might pick a poisonous flower or mushroom, or the goblins would kidnap me.
But I went along and met none but angels.

I guess the second half will wait until another night. We have a few moments for thoughts, comments, questions. And in the second half we'll take more time because I'd like to hear from you about common hindrances that you discover in your daily life and how you've learned to look at them or work with them.

THE AUDIENCE: A question about depression. I've read that depression can be stated as anger turning inward. Any comments about that, regarding anger being one of the hindrances?

JACK: Is this for yourself particularly?

THE AUDIENCE: Yes.

JACK: So at times you experience depression and you wonder how it relates to anger? Is that it?

THE AUDIENCE: What's going on?

JACK: It is often the case, although not always, that depression is a cover for anger; that one has had some circumstance in life that first brought a lot of pain, and then the response to that pain is anger. If that's unexpressed in people, the energy to keep that anger down is as strong as the anger itself, and it bottles up a great deal of energy, and then one can feel fearful, depressed, lacking any sense of personal empowerment. So often, although not always, in working with depression, you might look to see where you've really cut yourself off from your true feelings or your true inner relationship to things around. That's not the only cause for depression, and it's important to see that it's a very personal process that we're discussing; that there isn't some rote formula. For someone else it might be loss and there might be a bit of anger but there could be some other sense of grief or loss, possibly other reasons as well. So it's more an inquiry. What you might do is look at what time of day it gets the strongest or in what circumstances, and then stop and sit. Say, "Alright, I'm going to feel this," and see what images come, where you feel it in your body, what images might arise.

Do you feel it in your body when you're depressed?

THE AUDIENCE: Yes. Then it becomes sleepiness.

JACK: So you get sleepy. So that's one function. Do you feel it in any particular place?

THE AUDIENCE: All over.

JACK: So then you might sit with that and feel the sleepiness and see what's under that, what would come up if you weren't sleepy. Just pay careful attention. If you really want to go further, see if you can feel the strongest sensation in your body, and then let an image arise, whatever image wants to come out of it that may show you a picture of what that inner conflict really is.

It's a good question.

THE AUDIENCE: What would be an interesting discussion one night is talk about when we're happy. It seems to seduce us away from the inner work. I mean, me.

JACK: What seduces us away?

THE AUDIENCE: Happiness. When I'm feeling really happy and things are going right, some things are going right, it's like, "Well, I might not have time to go to meditation."

JACK: I'd love to talk about happiness some night. I see it much broader than that. That's a very good point, that at times happiness can lead to a kind of complacency. However, there are other kinds of happiness that are very genuine and really nurturing of spiritual life, that touching them actually gives us the strength to deal with difficulties. So it's a whole range, and there can be great joys that come out of spiritual practice as well. Seeing the layer of things that we've avoided, there's a very deep level of joy that can come. It's a good topic to talk about.

THE AUDIENCE: One of the things that hurts me, you naming them, I know all of them, is that it's like I'm paying attention.

JACK: People do have all of them. They're all common human forces that operate in each of us. There may be ones that we tend to have more than another, but they're all the elements of the make-up of the normal human mind. So it's not so much a question of which we have or don't have. Some people have them all at once, what's called, A Multiple Hindrance Attack. What's important in meditation is not what the experience is, but what is our relationship to it as it arises. So as we get to see what are our top ten tunes, and the popular ones for us, then we can also begin to look at whether we can develop a mindful or a skillful or a passionate relationship that leads us to freedom in relation to that. It may be that we all have to work down the list or up the list, depending on where you want to start. I think that's true.

* * * * * * * *

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
TITLE OF WORK: The Eightfold Path for the Householder: Ten Talks
(Transcribed from audio tape)
FILENAME: JKHOLDER.ZIP
AUTHOR: Jack Kornfield
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: Spirit Rock Meditation Center
PO Box 909
Woodacre, CA 94973
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: N/A
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: Jack Kornfield (1995)
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1995
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: February, 1995
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

[end]

HOUSEHOLDER SERIES

by
Jack Kornfield

10. Hindrances of the Householder (II)

~~~~~~

We have begun to look at what the Buddhists traditionally call "hindrances" or difficult energies which arise in the mind and in one's life as a part of meditation practice, particularly as householders, and how we might look at them, deal with them, and work with them.

I want to read a passage from an article by a woman named Portia Nelson. It's called //Autobiography in Five Chapters//.

Chapter One:

I walk down the street. There is a deep hole in the sidewalk. I fall in. I'm lost. I'm helpless. It isn't my fault. It takes forever to find a way out.

Chapter Two:

I walk down the same street. There is a deep hole in the sidewalk. I pretend I don't see it. I fall in again. I can't believe I'm in the same place, but it isn't my fault. It still takes a long time to get out.

Chapter Three:

I walk down the same street. There is a deep hole in the sidewalk. I see it is there. I fall in. It's a habit. But my eyes are open. I know where I am. It is my fault and I get out immediately.
~~~~~~

Chapter Four:

I walk down the same street. There's a deep hole in the sidewalk. I walk around it.

Chapter Five:

I try walking down a different street.

It somehow speaks very directly to our human experience which is not that one sees and immediately learns, but that in some sense our spiritual practice and our life of growing in general is a process of making mistakes and confronting our demons, and oftentimes looking at the same patterns and difficulties. They are the forces that the great Christian Desert Father Teacher Evagrius described attacking those people who went out to meditate in the desert in Egypt in the second century A.D. There they talked about them in terms of demons. They would be assailed by the demons of desire, wanting to go back to Alexandria and have a pizza, or whatever they served in Alexandria at that time, or wanting a soft bed, or the demons of aversion and frustration because it was too hot or too cold or what we call the Noonday Demon, which is the demon of sleepiness that would creep up in the middle of the day to want to take them into unconsciousness. Or if you got rid of all those, the demon of pride who would come only after you were successful in routing the other demons, to say, "See how good I am? I got rid of desire, frustration and anger, and I'm really a good meditator."

Of course, what one discovers is that what was available and in fact a part of meditation in Egypt in the 2nd Century A.D., or in ancient India, or in China, are exactly the same forces, the same demons one encounters here, in our lives, in our work, in our families. As I mentioned, there was an article that articulated this very well that describes the traditional hindrances of desire, anger, judgment, restlessness, sleepiness, laziness and doubt in terms of marriage. In fact, in relating to anything, whether it's our meditation, our work, our financial life, the same states of mind will have the tendency to arise.

What's important to understand is that these very states are the place of practice. The doubt, the fear, the difficulty, the anger, that arise in our life are what make practice juicy. If you could just sit and be peaceful and get up, your meditation wouldn't take you very far in terms of opening a heart of very deep compassion, or in terms of some inner centeredness, a capacity to relate to birth and death -- and all of the changes that are inevitable in life -- with wisdom, with deep understanding.

In the Buddhist tradition there are a number of different strategies for dealing with these hindrances or difficulties. An image that's used is of these hindrances or difficulties being the same as a poisoned tree. One strategy is that you go and find the poisoned tree and you cut it down; you chop it down and try to get rid of it. We'll talk about working with that strategy. A second strategy is to simply put up a sign near the tree that says, "This is a poisoned tree. Don't eat the berries, don't eat the leaves," and instead of killing it, to take shade in it, and to enjoy it for what there is of value in it, to have some friendly relationship to it rather than one based on fear. The third and the most interesting strategy is the person who comes along and says, "Oh, a poisoned tree of this kind, just what I've been looking for. These berries make the best medicine for curing a number of illnesses, including the illness of greed, fear, desire, anger and doubt

It's the person that takes the very energies that are difficult and learns to work with them or distills them in their own body and heart until something more valuable comes to them. The phrase that Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche used was, " These difficulties are manure for //bodhi//, manure for awakening or enlightenment." The most famous biographer of Sigmund Freud, Lou Andre Salome, at one point in the introduction wrote a statement -- This is a paraphrase. I didn't have it to look up but I basically remember it -- When we look at the life of a great person, rather than condemn their faults and weaknesses, should we not be grateful and awestruck that such light could shine through in spite of them.

It's a very different spirit of relating to difficulties, when seeing them as who we are, to see that there is some light of our being, of our wisdom, of our heart, that can shine through even in the midst of these, even in spite of them.

As we talked about hindrances and difficulties before we found that mostly as they arise they're based on stories we tell ourselves -- he did, she did, they did, I wish, if only -- and as we begin to look at the nature of mind, we can see what storytellers we are. I mean, I'm a storyteller by profession. In part, that's what I do. But I don't think I'm the only storyteller in the room. It goes on and on inside there.

The stories do a couple of things. They make us right, they make us feel better, they justify, they make us feel more comfortable, and they also help us to avoid feeling things that we don't want to feel, or facing things that are just here in front of us. These hindrances, in a sense, are an avoidance of what is present in the reality of the moment.

One philosopher wrote:

> Millions of people long for immortality who do not know what to do with themselves on a rainy Sunday afternoon.

It's nice to have visions of eternal peace or whatever one's spiritual ends might be, but in fact, it's really more about facing our life each day, each hour, and each moment.

How can we relate when these different forces arise during the day? Here are a number of strategies one can work with in meditation and in one's daily life. The first and the major way to relate in terms of skillfulness is to identify with the present and to become mindful of it, whether it's fear, judgment, anger or desire. If you want to, you can work with mental notes or labels, "fear, fear, judging, judging, anger, anger, irritated, irritated," not just when you're sitting on a cushion, but try it if you're in an argument with somebody, or if you're feeling frustrated over something, or if you feel very confused one morning, note, "Okay, I'll look at this and label it, 'confused, confused,'" and see what that experience is like. To pay attention to it means to let yourself experience what arises in the body, in the feelings, and in the mind, all of them. Confusion might arise and there will be a physical sense with it. It will arise and there will be a certain feeling, a state of being confused. There will be a quality of pleasant or unpleasant. In most cases it will probably be unpleasant. There also might be an aversion or judgment, "I shouldn't be confused. I wish it would go away." If you try to make it go away, what happens? Anybody ever try it? It generally gets worse, plus which you add more judgment, "I shouldn't be judging, I shouldn't be confused, I'm really not doing it right, if only this would go away," and all of a sudden you have four more judgments on top of the first one.

There was a person at a retreat who came to me because she noticed in her mind that in most everything she did there was a voice of judgment. So I asked her in a simple way, a 15-second psychotherapy, what were the first names of her parents. It turns out to be this person and that. Did that voice in her mind remind her of either of those? It could have been someone else, but in this case it happened to be her mother. She grew up in an Italian family. I said, "Alright, every time you hear that voice saying you're not doing it right or you should do more, or whatever, first of all, count the judgments for awhile just to see them." She tried that and she was still fighting with them. I said, "Alright, say 'Thank you, Mom.' Whenever that voice comes, you should do a little bit more, you should get that better, 'Thank you, Mom.'" She said, "That's not really right because I called her 'Mama' and I would have spoken to her in Italian. It's more like 'grazie, Mama.'"

She wrote this note after a couple of days of trying it.

Dear Jack:

The judging process and saying, "Grazie, Mama," was very useful and even became amusing. At one point the judging process of mind seemed to be a giant web of interconnected judgments. Once I started counting them, there were so many. I counted during two sittings all told about 220. Many of them were repeats. But it got to be fun after awhile.

She also had difficulty in walking meditation. She would get bored or frustrated. So I said, "Instead of walking a little bit, do a long walk. Take an hour and a half or two hours and just walk back and forth and die. Whatever arises, you just keep walking."

I also did the hour and a half walking this morning. It was proceeded by an hour sitting in dread anticipation, frustration, anger at you, and irritation at the upcoming walk. The walk itself was like all things, good and awful. The first 15 or 20 minutes I really got into it and thought, "This isn't too bad." Then a lot of aversion came out, mostly impatience, then rage, then calmness, then sort of psychedelic nature stuff, then pride, lots and lots and lots of pride, over and over again, theN planning on what I'd write you in this note, then more pride, I did it so well, then back to my feet and legs and sensations, then irritation, then "Grazie, Mama," again. Then it all started all over.

I noticed that most of my unawareness occurred during the time between sitting and walking, so I realized that's the place for me to focus on next in my practice.

Anyway, after ten years of sporadic vipassana, I touch for a moment into beginner's mind.

Grazie.

The first spirit of it, whatever it is that you're dealing with, whether it's fear, whether it's judgment, whether it's anger, whether it's doubt or confusion, is just to begin to name it and identify it.

You might find that it fits your habitual tendency like some people's tendency to move out of the present through desire all the time; others have a tendency through judgment or aversion or disliking; for others it might be through confusion. It's useful just to begin to be aware of what your habit is, what your strategy is. Basically, it's a strategy to deal with what's uncomfortable. For certain people when it's uncomfortable there will come desire, for others there will be aversion, for some there will be spacing out and confusion. Begin to be aware of that and notice just what's there.

As you start to look, like our friend here, you see how amazingly frequent it is, how many mind moments we spend desiring, judging, irritated, sleepiness or doubting. It's really quite a lot. Has anybody ever noticed that? Then you say, "Oh, my God, this is an impossible task. A little mindfulness to overcome all of that?" But it's really universal. It was true in Egypt 2,000 years ago, and it was true in India 2,500 years ago with the Buddha, and it's true in the monasteries on Mt. Athos, it's true in the Zen temples of Japan, and it's true in Fairfax, San Raphael, Sausalito, Berkeley. It's the same thing. It's really universal and it's just part of what the mind does.

There's a book that I've been reading on three-year olds and it's entitled, //Three-Year Old, Friend or Enemy//. It is written by a well-known psychologist writing on this particular stage. Three-year-olds have a lot of aggression and a lot of testing of limits and a lot of periods where they regress and get very needy and they go through all these things. I see myself in her, it's not just that she does that, but there she is acting out all this stuff that I find in myself. There are times when I just get completely frustrated with her and want to just throw her out the window.

I remember teaching at Esalen and there was a whole group of us in one large room. There was some conversation about spiritual life. One of the people there had their child. It was a young two- or three-year-old who was crying and making a lot of noise, being very difficult at that particular time, and finally just started to wail and cry. The mother picked it up and carried him out of the room, and there was this kind of, "Ahh," a relief of everybody in the room. One woman among the many who had children, just said exactly that. She said, "Do you remember the time when you really just wanted to pick them up and throw them out the window, and you didn't care how far down it was to the street?" Everybody in the room who had children laughed because they all remembered that moment. It's not that you do it, mind you, but that it just comes along with everything else that arises.

What you need to do is to see that it's human and begin to look at it directly anyway, to label it, to acknowledge, "Well, there it is, there's aversion, there's irritation, there's judgment, there's confusion" or "there's fear." Actually, when we see it truly, the moment that we can name it, it's like we turn around and face it rather than being caught or running away. We say, "Oh, I know you." Maybe it's the dark night instead of psychosis, or maybe it's just boredom after being with a person for some years. Instead of saying, "Oh, I've got the wrong relationship" or the wrong marriage, when you don't face it, it seems much bigger and worse, but when you turn around and actually look at it, it's not as bad as it seemed.

That's the first step. Things become workable when you simply acknowledge what that energy is that has arisen in that time in your life, in your practice. To work with these forces, in addition to naming them and being aware of them, you really have to let yourself touch them with your heart. It's not just to name it, but somehow it's to let it in, to let yourself connect with it from a place of tenderness or caring, somehow to make friends with it or at least not to be upset or judgmental of it, whatever it is.

If you find that there's anger, or fear, or desire, maybe it's your food craving, and you eat over and over again, and you say, "Oh, I wish I didn't do it," or maybe it's the way you treat your body in some other fashion, maybe it's the relationship with some person in your life, you look at it and say, "Ugh, I hate that." See if you can acknowledge what that state is. Is it judgment, is it aversion, is it dislike, is it fear, and then in acknowledging it, send some loving kindness, send some //metta// to it or embrace it. Let your heart connect with it as if it were a poor down-trodden dog or something like that, that generally whenever it came you kicked it, and instead you are going to be nice to it today and touch it in some way with more tenderness. If we can't let things into our heart, we don't really let ourselves grow and there is still some sense of aversion or trying to get over them or rid of them.

See it and identify it, let yourself be touched by it without pushing it away, and as you open to it, notice its nature and then study it as if you were a botanist or a biologist. It's a part of the nature of mind. It's what every mind does. Every mind doubts, every mind gets restless, every mind gets confused, every mind judges. Anybody who doesn't have all of those things? Not a single person back there.

So you look at its nature. When does it begin? What's the middle of it? How intense does it get? What's its end like? Is there something you want to learn about? What's the most powerful point of it? What are the body sensations like, if you want to learn to deal with this particular energy? What triggers it, what's the thought or the image that generally comes right before it? What's the story line that goes along with it? There you are driving and you're annoyed by some driver for doing something for the umpteenth time. What's the story that goes through your mind? "California drivers are this . . ." or "People who drive on the road should . . ." or what is it? Just look at not only what the event is but what's that inner thing that triggers it. See what the story is. Just look at it, and then ask yourself one other question. Who is making up the story? Very useful question at that moment. It's really beginning to observe the movement or the dance of the mind.

This is called, "The Cosmic Dance" or in other traditions, "The Dance of Shiva," or "The Dance of Maya."

The restless waters of the lake appear to make the moon dance.

It's our own storytelling that makes things move. You pay attention and you watch its beginning, its end, its nature, what it feels like in the body, if it is painful, if it is pleasant. If you want to learn, if you have some hindrance or difficulty in your life that you want to learn about, particularly study the moment when it just ends. Suppose it's desire. We'll take a simple one. You have a desire for something you want to eat. Maybe you have a chocolate craving, and you decide to go out and get an extraordinary triple fudge Swiss chocolate cake, or whatever it is, and you fantasize and you imagine, and finally you get to that place that specializes in catering to people just like you. They know you're coming and they put all the extras on, and there it is. Instead of just going for the cake, this time you're going to watch. You feel the desire in the body, you watch the salivation in the mouth, you imagine the pictures and the satisfaction. You really let yourself look at it and you feel it. It's tense. In that very craving, there's a certain amount of tension and pain. That's alright, you're going to get it satisfied. You get in your car, you go to the ultimate bakery and you get that thing. You don't even take it to your car. You sit down at the table, you take your first bite, and then all of a sudden there's this whole shift that happens in your body. From this place of tension, it all just softens and relaxes. That chocolate touches your tongue and it melts some in your mouth, it tastes delicious, it's really good. At that point, it almost doesn't matter whether you have any more than that. That's probably just about enough. If you watch, the desire moves at that moment and the desire ends. Why is that? Anybody have an answer? Because the great happiness of it is not just the pleasure, although there's pleasure and that comes from sense delight, a certain happiness, but the great happiness comes because the desire ends.

If you want to learn something really powerful about the mind or about particular energies that are arising in your life, whether it's in relation to food, people, love, work, look at it and discover what happens at the moment in your mind when that anger, that confusion, that doubt at a certain moment ends -- it is a very, very interesting place to study. There is where you learn a lot about its nature.

It doesn't happen easily. Whatever this is, it requires practice. How many times have these states arisen in our lives? Countless, unbelievable number of times. So you practice. Maybe you start with little ones. Remember that quote of William Blake?

> If one is to do good,
> it must be done in the minute particulars.
> General good is the plea of the hypocrite,
> the scoundrel and the flatterer.

To do anything well, it has to be done here immediately, in this moment, rather than with some ideal -- "I'll get rid of this," or "I'll change the world." How do we actually relate to our family, to the people nearest to us, to our coworkers, to the people that we encounter in the day, or to the immediate circumstances of our life? I regret to say this about Mr. Blake, but I also have a quote from Catherine, his wife, who was asked about William, particularly about the quality of his company. She replied:

> I regret to say I have very little of Mr. Blake's company. He's always busy in paradise

Some person who I know whom I will not name said:

> If you really want to know about a master, a Zen master or otherwise, talk to their spouse.

Actually, this was a woman. She said, "Talk to their wife," but there are a number of female Zen masters. That's really where you learn about yourself, and that's also where you learn about what it means to be free. It's not in the theory but in the nitty-gritty, in the little things. In traffic, as I said, when somebody cuts you off or does some idiotic thing which only a human being could do, and they do it, that's the place that you learn. You have that argument with your lover or your husband. Maybe you come home and you know you want to argue. Have you ever seen that one? If you look at it, there is a desire to make contact, but not too close. It's sort of a safe way to make a connection and still keep some distance at the same time, or maybe to discharge something because you're grumpy at someone else, or some other reason. These are very interesting places to learn about our minds, to learn about how things operate.

The desire to be right, you might just listen for that voice. I don't know if any of you have that. I just love to be right, it feels so good to be right. Do you know what I mean? You notice that voice that comes, and you feel its quality, what's it like in the body, what does it do in that moment to the relationship, and what is the sense of self that is built around that story that I'm right and therefore somebody else is not. You look at it.

This isn't anything new, is it? There's nothing new in tonight's talk. It's really old stuff. Here it is again. It's the nature of mind, and we're learning to relate to mind in a friendly, compassionate and wise way, not to stomp it out or get rid of it. You need it for certain things, like planning a few things here and there, writing once in awhile. It has its place.

What is interesting is watching as you begin to allow yourself to look at these energies and not just act them out habitually. You might just pick one for the next week or two. Pick one hindrance or difficulty in your life and study it. Maybe we can have a little botany lab work here. At the end of a couple of weeks we could have a meeting and we'll share. We'll have a little time and people can share which particular hindrance they picked and what they learned about it as they observed it.

As you look you also discover that each has a beautiful side. Isn't that interesting, that each has some creative energy locked up in it? For example, the Tibetans talk about those forces of greed, hatred and delusion, in terms of Buddha families or types of personality energies -- if you will, archetypes. The //padma// energy, which is that of greed and seduction, when one learns to work with it and doesn't get quite so personally caught up in it, turns instead to incredible creativity and a beautiful sense of esthetics and beauty that's not oriented toward manipulation or grasping but can be part of something creative and skillful. Or the //vajra// type of mind which is in its negative or its difficult aspect portrayed as cold, hard, judgmental, and seeing what's wrong with everything, when one learns to work with that energy and open it and not be so afraid and learns how to use it skillfully, it becomes transformed into what's called "discriminating wisdom." Instead of being something that's undermining, it's the clarity of mind to see exactly what is going on and to know how to relate to it wisely. It is depicted as the sword which cuts through all illusion and all nonsense. Similarly, the Buddha family type which is associated with delusion and being spaced out, not being so present, avoiding things, when one learns to work with that energy and allows it without getting caught in the story, it moves to a place of great peacefulness, of spaciousness, of a kind of mirror-like quality which can receive everything in the world without doing battle with it.

What if these things are strong, what if desire, fear, anger, judgment and so forth, are very strong, and it's really too hard to pay attention, how can you work with them? There are five traditional strategies that are also listed as ways to work with them.

The first strategy is called, "Letting it go." It arises, you see it, and you just let it go. Terrific if you can do it. The thing is it is not so easy to do. There's also a danger in it that letting go of the judgment, or the desire, or the fear, or whatever, often gets twisted in our minds a little bit until it becomes, "I can't wait to let go of this," which is to say, "I can't wait to get rid of it." It becomes an aversion, "I don't like that." A better phrase for it is to "let it be," better than "letting go," more the quality of "letting be." To be mindful and just see it, see that "it's mine," and let it into the heart rather than resisting it.

What is interesting if you let things be is first of all they come and go on their own. It's quite terrific if you really watch them. They do that all by themselves. Secondly, if you pay attention and you really let them be and let them in, what you see is not so much greed, hatred, delusion, desire or restlessness. Even those, deep though they are, are something more superficial or on some medium level, and underneath what you touch when those arise is pain, emptiness, loneliness, fear, some grief or sorrow, or some kind of contraction. All those things arise as a strategy to not feel something.

When you let them be, it's not only to let that state be, but to really open yourself to feel what is present, and to soften your heart enough so that you can get just to the bottom of it, whatever that particular energy is, and that's what begins to heal you. That's what begins to allow you to work with it in a different way. That's the first strategy. Suppose that doesn't work, what other ones can you use?

There's a second one. That first strategy is like turning the poison into something valuable, into insight. That's the strategy of making it into a useful medicine. A second strategy is one of balance. For example, if there is a great deal of desire, you can reflect on the brevity of life, on death and impermanence, and think, "Is this something I really want?" or "What really matters to me? If I only had another month or another six months to live, what would I be wanting to do with my body, heart and mind? How would I want to live?" Very often it puts desires into perspective. The balance for doubt is faith, to seek out some inspiration. If there's confusion and doubt, to read something or to speak with someone -- it just reminds you of another part of yourself that's a counter to that ,so then you come into enough balance to watch it.

The balance for anger and judgment -- and it's a difficult one -- is forgiveness. You can't do it too soon, but some time when you're ready. At first you can extend maybe a little, and then maybe a little more, with forgiveness to yourself or to another person. You can work with forgiveness when the anger is too strong to just observe.

The balance to sleepiness or laziness is to do those things which raise energy.

This set of strategies, if it's too strong, you can kind of cool it out a little by raising energy when you feel yourself being too sleepy or dull, or by working with forgiveness when the anger is too strong to just observe.

The third strategy is suppression. Very interesting that this should be listed in here. It is generally talked about as a bad thing. You don't want to suppress things because it makes you sick and it just comes out some other way anyway. This is like the old adage of counting to ten when something is difficult. You just stop and you count to ten.

I'll give you a better example. Suppose you are a surgeon and you're in the middle of having an argument with your husband. You're on call that day and your beeper goes off. He did something, and you're quite upset. It's time to go the hospital. You get in your car and drive right over. Someone is lying on the table and they need open heart surgery. You get scrubbed, you get your gloves on, and you're about to do surgery. That's not a very good place to ruminate and think about that argument and try and finish it up. That's a very good place to put it aside and just complete your task of surgery and wait until there is a skillful place, a place that's the right container, where it feels safe, where there's the support or the time to let yourself solve it. Sometimes it is a skillful strategy, when something is very strong, to put it aside, especially if you're willing to say, "I will come back to it when a better or a safer opportunity arises after this circumstance is over." It requires patience.

There's letting things be and being aware of them, that's the first one. Bringing some balance is the second. The third strategy is suppress them if necessary or put them aside for awhile. The fourth is sublimation, taking the energy and transforming it into something else.

The traditional example, if you're very angry, is to take that and do something useful with it, to go and chop the firewood that you need for the woodstove for the winter and get some of it out of your system, let go of it and also do something useful. That's externally. Internally, you can work with it in the same way. For example, if there is a lot of lust and sexual desire that's really compulsive, just as you can move it outwardly, you can also through some practice move the energy in your body and take it from being just sexual up into your chest and heart in some way that the desire is still there but it is transformed more into the desire to be loved or to love or to connect in some way. It is to find some other outlet for it that is skillful.

The last of these categories is the most interesting and dangerous one They actually get more dangerous as you go down the list because suppression is dangerous if you don't work it out later, and sublimation is dangerous also or can be because it can be an avoidance. The most dangerous, but also the most interesting, is the category where you exaggerate it. If you haven't learned, it is, "Alright, let's do it; let's look at it." I don't mean particularly if it is going to be harmful to someone. There are two ways to do this. First is just put in your mind Part A, where you take that desire or anger, whatever it is, and you imagine taking it to its extreme. What would you do? How far can you imagine taking it? Instead of resisting it, you play it out to the umpteenth degree. The only way that this is a spiritual practice is if you do it and you pay attention. If you do it and you're not very mindful, then it is reinforcing it and pretty soon you'll go after that unconsciously. It can be done very skillfully. If you have that desire or that anger, imagine what you would do to that person. If you have a desire and imagine getting it a hundred times as elaborate as can be -- see what it's like. There, you've ended the 100th time, and how do you feel? There you are in the same place. Does it arise again? Can you really see that it's endless if you just try to fulfill it?

The second part, Part B, is to actually act it out, which we do all the time anyway. It's nothing terrible to say that most of the time we act on our desires, and that's fine. Even for these difficult ones, go out and indulge that thing, whatever it is, see, but just do it by paying attention as well, and learn from it -- not just automatically.

The story I usually tell with this is one of Munindra, Joseph Goldstein's teacher in India, who had this incredible craving for Indian sweets, particularly for gulabjaman. Gulabjaman are so sweet, they're in this sugar water and they make baklava seem like dry toast. He loved them. After each meal he would want to go and have his gulabjaman. Finally, he was tired of this craving, so he went into town, brought some money with him, and he ordered something like 20 or 30 rupees of gulabjaman, this enormous plate full of it. He sat down. I don't know how far he got into it, but I don't think he could eat very much before he started getting really sick, and certainly sick of gulabjaman. After that he said he could take it or leave it, as one would say.

If you're going to do it, okay, pay attention. At least learn from it. As one Zen master said:

> This life is a series of mistakes. True practice is one continuous mistake, one after another anyway.

The only difference is that you pay attention so you learn from it.

I hope you can hear in going through these strategies of letting it be, of observing it, feeling it in the body, of noticing what the loneliness or pain or fear or contraction is out of which it comes, of sublimating it or transforming it in some way, or even acting it out and observing it, that if you're willing to do it with the experience or particular hindrance in your life, it starts to make the practice quite alive. That is where it becomes juicy, where you learn from it. It frees a tremendous energy. Instead of running away or acting habitually, you start to evoke and allow this inner energy that's been bound up in these patterns to be understood and to become more a part of your conscious being.

In all of these, in all of them, what's important is to learn to watch the movement of mind, the mind that wants to close or is afraid, that wants to defend itself or to avoid opening to the fact of whatever is actually here, to the "just this much" of the moment, to the spaciousness of it or the meaningless of it in certain moments, or the emptiness of it, or the birth and death of it, the loss, and the next thing that comes.

The whole process of working with these states of mind and these energies, is to finally learn to come to rest, to open to this moment, one after another, as it is, and find a kind of stillness that allows for all the coming and going of the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows, and it brings an ease and humanness and compassion.

I close by reading a letter. This is from one of Munindra's students, a woman who was in a prisoner of war camp in Europe during World War II, and involved at that time in very painful and horrible things that were happening in the war camps in Europe. She finally escaped as a teenager at the end of the war and moved to Australia. She wrote him this letter after doing some years of meditation practice. She said:

> A few weeks ago I was sorting out old files with notes and stories and thoughts which I had written down over the years. Reading through them before destroying them, I was more amazed than I have ever been in my life of so much misery and unhappiness. How is it possible that a human being could live for 55 years through so much fear, despair, unhappiness, morbidity, depression, pain, suffering, and not be utterly destroyed by it? I must have been stronger than I thought. And when I look back over the past four years, since the first time I came to practice in India, life has become simple and so serene that it's unbelievable.

She's a very fine yogi. She is one of Munindra's greatest students.

> After reaching the first deep stages in my mental development, I lost my depression. My headaches, fears and nightmares went away, and after doing deep practice for another year, during my second visit to you, I don't even understand anymore what all the fuss was about, those first 55 years of my life.
>
> I just live life as it is and as it comes in a calm wholeness with some equanimity and I find myself content with whatever arises. Sometimes I meditate, sometimes I don't meditate at all, but you see my life has become more of a meditation because I try to live each minute of the day in mindfulness and openness, and somehow nothing seems to be able to touch me in the same way anymore. It's like living on two levels. The outer level to make conversation with people and say the right things at the right time, but under that is a second level where there is a core of untouched and untouchable stillness, of quiet attention and peace, because somehow life is so simple, uncomplicated, and all those old upheavals were after all really just of my own making, weren't they. You only get upheaval through the ways you react to things, and once you react the right way, the direct and simple way, there aren't problems left, and somehow the right way of reacting is most of the time not reacting at all.

I hope this makes some sense to you. I'll tell you a little story to show you what an enormous success you are as a teacher.

I think her success was that she had suffered so deeply in some way that she brought that strength and that genuineness that had gotten her through that to her spiritual life. She said:

A few months ago the man who I love more than any in the world, and who was for the past 17 years as close to me as any man and woman could be, died rather suddenly. If that had happened before you started to teach me, I'm sure it would have completely destroyed me. I would have committed a quick suicide and ended it all. But now of course I felt sorrow about losing this man's close love for me and I missed his company, but for the rest, a stone thrown in the water would have caused more ripples than his death.

I accepted his death with an amazing serenity and detachment. He's just finished this life trip of his and they have already started another one. I don't know that, but apart from this personal loss and his companionship, there isn't the kind of upset and conflict in me about death. I am not afraid as I used to be.

Apparently I've always been able to see and understand other people's problems and help them somehow, but in the old days other people's miseries tore out my heart and gave me stomach ulcers in my pity and concern for them. But now when people come to see me with their miseries, I can listen to them, sometimes help them, and have a much deeper compassion, but when they leave, it's over and done with, and they haven't torn my guts out in the process.

I've been working with an alcoholic this past month or so, and for some odd reason my willingness to listen seems to help him in his struggle to stay away from alcohol and find his true spirit again.

I think you can be proud of yourself as a teacher and content with me as your pupil.

There is something really wonderful and joyful about working even with the pains and difficulties in one's life and mind, for that moment when you realize, "For that little thing, I don't have to take it so seriously. I really can be free to touch that." It makes practice wonderful.

* * * * * * * *

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TITLE OF WORK: The Eightfold Path for the Householder: Ten Talks
(Transcribed from audio tape)
FILENAME: JKHOLDER.ZIP
AUTHOR: Jack Kornfield
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: Spirit Rock Meditation Center
PO Box 909
Woodacre, CA 94973
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: N/A
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: Jack Kornfield (1995)
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1995
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: February, 1995
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

[end]

ÚÄÄÄ

Bald, bespectacled and smiling and wearing a heavy orange robe, Narada Maha Thera said "I am here to explain Buddha's teachings to those interested."---- The priest is in Sydney at the invitation of the Buddhist Society of N.S.W. which plans to build a temple.

Venerable Narada was a kindly monk who was well versed in the Dhamma. He was an eloquent exponent of the Buddha's message and had captivated audiences everywhere he went. He passed away, after a long period of illness, on October the 2nd, 1983 aged 86 years.

.PA

In February 1956 two monks arrived from Thailand. One was an abbot of a monastery in Thailand, Phra Dhammadiraja Muni, who spoke little English and his companion was an American, Phra Sumangalo. Phra Sumangalo, who was on his first visit to Australia, was the author of many articles and his activities were regularly reported in the Buddhist magazines at that time. Several years later, he visited Malasia where he founded the Young Buddhist Association of Malasia. He passed away in 1962.

In November, 1960, a lineage holder in the Chinese Cha'an tradition arrived in Sydney, where he stayed until the end of 1961. He was the famous master Hsuan Hua. He gained the impression that there were no Buddhists among the local Chinese community as he was largely ignored and, was, at one stage on the verge of starvation due to lack of support. At the end of 1961, he left for California, where, with the support of many followers he established a monastic centre known as the 'City of Ten Thousand Buddhas'.

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

ÚÄÄÄ

This document can be acquired from a sub-directory coombspapers via anonymousFTP and the node COOMBS.ANU.EDU.AUThe document's ftp filename and the full directory path are thecoombspapers top level INDEX file.Date of the document's last update/modification 03/09/93----------HISTORICAL ROOTS OF ZENoriginal fil zenisnot.txt----------This file is the work of Stan Rosenthal. It has been placed here, with his kindpermission, by Bill Fear. The author has as copies, ie. papercopies, are made.Stan Rosenthal may be contacted at 44 High street, St. D Pembrokeshire,Dyfed, Wales, UK. Bill Fear may be contacted at 29 Blackweir Terrace, Cath Glamorgan, Wales, UK. Tel (0222) 228858 email fear@thor.cf.ac.uk.Please use email as firs if possible. Messages can be sentto Stan Rosenthal via the above email address - they will inperson by myself - B.F.NOTE:You may find and odd sentence or missing information eve in thefiles. Hopefully not to frequently. This is because the files were originallywritten on a m using CP/M and had to be converted to dos format. Many ofthe 5.25 disks were very old and thus missing info.....Beginning of file.....Much has already been written of Zen from within a Buddhist context, but Zenitself is not the prerogativ specific religious group, even though inits modern form, a large proportion of its practitioners fromfollowers of the Buddha, Guatarma Siddhartha. Historically of course, Zenprobably owe to its Buddhist practitioners for theirsystemization of its concepts, and even more than this, i rememberedthat the founder, or first codefier of Zen, The Boddhidharma, was also thetwent patriarch in direct teaching descent from the Buddhahimself.However, in any serious discuss must also recall that somethingrelating to the development of Zen did occur during the four h priorto 526 CE, when the Boddhidharma arrived in the Shao-lin Temple in the HohanProvinc to codefy Zen practice during his prolongedmeditation, now know as 'the nine years before t occurred duringthe four hundred year period preceding the arrival of the Boddhidharma in C following the establishment of Shao-lin as a major, and possibly thefirst, Buddhist Temple in CE, there was a considerable dialoguebetween the Buddhist monks who inhabited the temp people whowere indiginous to the area, and who called themselves Taoists; a fact which ish considering that the temple was previously a Taoist retreat.At this point, it will probably help a number of issues if weunderstand that even by 100 CE there has developed two forms of Tao-chia, being philosophical Taoism based upon Yin Yang theory asexplained in the esote
'changes' ('I Ching') and in the later work,'the Way of Virtue' ('Tao Te Ching') by the philosop who livedtowards the end of the Period of the Warring States (c 600 BCE). The later formof Tao-chiao, although based upon its philosophical precedessor,was practiced as a religion ra philosophy, and made considerable useof both shamanistic and mystical religious practices, occult,and by 100 CE the followers of religious Taoism far outnumbered thephilosophical Ta probable that by the beginning of the Christian era in the West, thephilosophical Taoists had influence, and continued their work only inremote regions, far from the large cities and seats
We know withcertainty that by this time religious Taoism held considerable influence in wha

the Chinese kingdom or empire. It was to the remote provinces thatthe remaining followers Taoism had travelled, and so itprobably was that it was in such areas as these that the dislo betweenMahayana Buddhism and Taoist Philospphy began. It was the Buddhist monks,pra for which many Buddhist sects are stil reknowned, whogave succour to the 'exiled' Taoist ph turn shared theirknowledge with their Buddhist benefactors.So it is that it is now believed tha arrival at Shao-lin, theBoddhidharma found something quite foreign to the Indian practice of Buddhism,strange but not alien. It was to prove to be the Boddhidharma's undertaking toco synergized practices he discovered, but even scant knowledge of thelife of the Buddha hims as to why the philosophy of Taoismwould not have been completely foreign to the Boddhidh certainlynot have been unknown to the Buddha himself.It is well documented that the Prince Siddhartha, spent many years asa peripatetic seeker prior to his enlightenment, and many o conversationswith 'wise men' are described in detail. Since trade had taken place betweenC for many hundreds of years before the birth of the Buddha, traderoutes were of course well it is more than likely that youngseeker would have used such routes, not only as a means of inorder to meet with strangers to his own land. As it the case even today, muchcan be learn ideas, philosophies and customs through trading inartifacts, and many goods are decorated indiginous to theirplace of origin. With such a brilliant intellect as we know Guttama Siddhar it is indeed unlikely that he would not have learned of 'Yin Yang'theory, upon which Taoist p based. Zen Buddhist scholars themselvesacknowledge many instances in which Buddhist i with thoseof Taoist philosophy, but there will probably always be an element ofdisagreemen school of thought borrowed most from the other.All this is not to deny the Buddhist element i Zen, but only toillustrate that Zen is not wholly Buddhist, nor wholly Taoist. For many Zenpr there is indeed no dichotomy, nor any need for distinction. Butit is only fair to all concerned that to many non-Zen Buddhistseven Zen Buddhism is a heresy and to state that many Bud nonZen sects, time and energy spent in Zen practice is considered to be of littleor no signific their own part, many Zen practitioners consider theirorthodox Buddhist bretheren to be 'brot but are disapprovingtowards the hierarchical rigor with which their more orthodox brothers c Buddhist deities, and with which the orthodox Buddhist institutions areorganized.I am fully a have not described what Zen is, but have hopefullyillustrated that whatever it is, it is not orth essentially a religion,and not specifically Indian. It is possibly necessary to provide one mor and this is that contrary to much public opinion in the Europe and theUSA, Zen is most certa in origin.....End of file.....

A TASTE OF THE HOLY LIFE:
An account of an International Ordination in Myanmar

by Susan Elbaum Jootla

Bodhi Leaves No. 133

Copyright 1994 Susan Elbaum Jootla

BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
KANDY SRI LANKA

* * *

DharmaNet Edition 1995

Transcribed directly from BPS Pagemaker files
Formatting: John Bullitt

This electronic edition is offered for free distribution
via DharmaNet by arrangement with the publisher.

DharmaNet International
P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley CA 94704-4951

* * * * * * * *

A TASTE OF THE HOLY LIFE

"//Ehi bhikkhu!//" "Come, monk!" With these simple but portentous words, the Buddha founded the Sangha, the Order of bhikkhus, which has preserved and practised his doctrine from that day to this.

With that "//Ehi bhikkhu!//" the Buddha conferred ordination upon the first monk, the Venerable Kondanna, at Isipatana near Benares. At the conclusion of the Buddha's first discourse Kondanna had asked to be ordained, and the Buddha, simply by calling him a bhikkhu, transformed him into one. The Buddha went on to say: "The Dhamma has been well expounded. Practise the holy life rightly to make an end of suffering." That was the ultimate, the highest aim of becoming a monk then as it is now: liberation from all //dukkha//, the suffering of repeated becoming in the cycle of rebirth, //samsara//.

During the Buddha's life, and since, the procedure to become a Buddhist monk evolved into a series of steps often involving large numbers of bhikkhus and lay people. Modern ordination ceremonies clearly express the interdependent relationship of monks and lay people supporting each other in their efforts to put an end to suffering. The bhikkhus, by their conduct, must inspire faith in the lay people. The householders in turn show deep respect for the Order by honouring the individual bhikkhus who in turn determine to make themselves worthy of the respect and support they receive from the laity.

The Buddha could only ordain a few bhikkhus with the phrase "//Ehi bhikkhu//." Such instantaneous ordination required that the man had cultivated certain //paramis// (perfections, good qualities) in the past. Chief amongst the good kammas needed for the Buddha to accept someone as a monk in this way, tradition says, was having been a bhikkhu in previous lives and/or having helped others to ordain. This is one of the reasons why laymen in Myanmar ordain temporarily, and why they obtain such lavish help from lay people, notably their families, when they undertake temporary ordination.

Because they are closely based on the Vinaya Pitaka, the ordination ceremonies in the different Theravada countries are almost identical. Whether the bhikkhus expect to remain in robes for the remainder of their lives or are "temporary" monks (a common practice in Myanmar and Thailand) makes no difference to the procedure. But national variations, especially in the lay aspects of the events, do lend colour and specific points of interest to the solemn ceremony.

* * *

In January 1994 a mass ordination of foreign men was held in Yangon, Myanmar (the former Rangoon, Burma) under the combined auspices of the Myanmar Department of Religious Affairs and the International Meditation Centre, Yangon. This event, unusual in its location, scale, and international scope, will be described below along with a summary of the week these men were in robes.

All the detailed arrangements of place, transport, requisites, and the like had been made by the hosts beforehand for seven boys aged 9-14 to become samaneras or novices and forty-nine foreign men and one Myanmar to take the full //upasampada// ordination. They would remain in robes for about a week, in accordance with the Myanmar custom of temporary ordination. In that land it is considered essential for every Buddhist male to become a samanera as a boy and a bhikkhu as a man at least for some short period of his life, for the reason explained above and to earn a very high kind of merit, //punna//. All those in this group who were to be ordained were meditation students of Mother Sayamagyi and Sayagyi U Chit Tin, direct disciples of the late Sayagyi U Ba Khin, renowned lay teacher of Vipassana meditation in Myanmar. They were associated with the International Meditation Centres in that tradition around the world, and the small original IMC, atop a low hill in suburban Yangon's diplomatic area, was the focus for most of the activities.

The shaving of heads, preliminary to every ordination, was set up just outside the wall surrounding the Light of the Dhamma Pagoda at the Centre. About six life-long bhikkhus from the preceptor's monastery came to help shave the heads of the ordinands. Shaded from the hot afternoon sun by a permanent awning, the men doused their heads with water from plastic buckets, then the brown-haired Europeans, blond Americans, black- and grey-haired Asians and Australians sat on low stools. Two people, including the man's wife if she was available, held a piece of white cloth beneath the candidate's chin to catch the locks of hair as they fell from the blade. The bhikkhus swiftly used the straight razors the foreigners had imported, while guiding the movements of their assistants through gesture when they did not share a common language.

The men were meditating, on the parts of the body or the breath or the significance of ordaining. Well aware that this was the start of an important ceremony, everyone quietly reflected on its value. It took perhaps an hour before all were shorn. As a man's head was finished, he took a shower and changed into fresh clothes in preparation for the //pabbajja// ("going forth," the preliminary ordination) ceremony which was to take place that evening in the Centre's Dhamma Hall. The organizers knew that the men would be hungry so they were given an early evening meal since they would not be able to eat again that day after they had taken the novice's Ten Precepts, the sixth of which requires abstaining from food after midday.

* * *

It had already been a long day of celebration and religious activity. Early in the morning the children in the group, four girls and seven boys, had been dressed as princesses and princes in gilt and silk costumes that included fanciful high crowns, sequinned //lungis// with long trains for the girls, makeup and decorations imitating precious jewelry. The princes were going to become samaneras, novices, in the evening and the dressing up was part of the build up, so they would enjoy themselves and keep happy memories of the day. The royal attire also symbolized the renunciation of the princely life by the Bodhisatta Siddhattha -- the future Buddha -- when he went forth from the palace to find the way to liberation.

Before 8 am, the children were lifted up into the backs of small open pickup trucks and seated on upholstered chairs by the individuals from the Centre who had been assigned to be their foster parents for the day. The real parents, perhaps a bit nervous about how their children would behave, carried the bundle of their sons' robes along with some small white orchids. It was a landmark event in the lives of these Western Buddhist families. The boys' trucks were adorned with tall golden umbrellas proclaiming the ordination procession to passers by. The rest of the group followed in cars and coaches. They moved at a stately pace through Yangon to the Shwe Dagon Pagoda, where several hairs of the Buddha are enshrined. At the head of the motorcade a uniformed Myanmar band standing in a truck played the typical raucous music of the land and sang about the Great Renunciation. A dancer performed in the jerky bent knee and elbow style of Southeast Asia. This too was part of the traditional way to celebrate the boys' going forth.

The 130-strong group found the route up to Shwe Dagon, Myanmar's most revered Buddhist site, clear of other devotees. Single file, barefoot, contented and chatting a little, each carrying a purple orchid spray offering, they proceeded up the series of long escalators to the level of the walkway. This is situated perhaps halfway between ground level and the peak of the spire with the golden umbrella. The wide band is paved in marble and much of it is covered with pagodas, cetiyas, and sculptures, notably of the stylized lions who seem to be guardians of the sacred shrine. There were many bhikkhus and lay families at the pagoda although it was not crowded. They showed mild curiosity about the large group of outsiders. The international contingent was dressed for the occasion in proper Myanmar attire, the men in plaid //lungis// and short white jackets, the women in heavy woven cotton //lungis// all of one pattern in various dark colours. The group was led by their teachers and the princes and princesses as it respectfully and mindfully circumambulated the golden dome. The atmosphere was informal and comfortable, the meditators appreciating the beauty and peace of the scene.

After a short meditation session in a side chamber, they left Shwe Dagon and drove to an audience with the fifteen leading sayadaws, renowned senior bhikkhus, who were in office by turns from among the country's State Sangha Maha Nayakas, the Central Executive Body of the Sangha. The group had been allotted a narrow window in the busy schedules of the sayadaws, the Central Executive Body of the Sangha, to pay respects. The theras sat on chairs in the front of the room with an ornate shrine behind them, and were formally introduced in English to the meditators. The foreigners, the teachers and Myanmar hosts accompanying them all paid respects to the sayadaws by bowing with their foreheads to the floor. They then repeated "Namo Tassa Bhagavato" and other devotional verses after the chief sayadaw.

* * *

The focus of events shifted to the meditation centre for the rest of the day. In the early afternoon there was an ear-boring ceremony for the four girls aged 5-13. Since the Order of bhikkhunis (nuns) has died out and, according to Theravada orthodoxy, cannot be revived for lack of bhikkhunis to ordain others, girls in Myanmar undergo this simple ritual, generally when a brother is becoming a samanera. At IMC's Dhamma Hall, there was some chanting as the girls sat proudly before the assembly in their slightly rumpled princess outfits. A Myanmar woman doctor put earrings in each girl's ears and they were free to change out of the fancy but inconvenient clothes. For the girls this was the conclusion of their ceremony.

The head shaving of boys and men followed as already described. After their supper, the men came into the Dhamma Hall, their skulls shining, where they were seated on the rugs in rows in age order, facing a line of senior sayadaws. They received a bundle of brown robes neatly rolled together and tied with the red cloth belt worn by Myanmar bhikkhus. Everyone else sat at the back of the hall meditating and observing the proceedings. The ceremony, which had been explained in advance, went on in a combination of Pali, Myanmar and English. Small groups of the samaneras-to-be offered their robes to their preceptor, who accepted them; then they requested the robes back from him so they could go forth, and he returned the robes. Now they all changed out of their lay clothes into the robes. (The shirts and //lungis// were put in labeled bags to be washed and ironed by wives or female volunteers and returned at the time of disrobing.)

Most of these men (and one of the boys) had ordained previously, and many had done so several times. But they were all anxious to have another opportunity to practise the strict purity of a member of the Sangha in Myanmar, the land they cherished as the home of the pure Buddha Dhamma which they had been practising, some for over twenty years. They each formally requested to be ordained as novices and then took the Ten Precepts from U Pandicca, their preceptor, and underwent a few other short formalities. They were given their bhikkhu names from a list considered appropriate for the day of the week of their birth. There was a short discourse of advice for the samaneras and the sayadaws chanted several //paritta suttas// (discourses of protection), for the well being of all. With that, the novitiation was complete.

Later in the evening there was the usual group meditation in the Dhamma Hall, with the new samaneras seated at the front, in order of seniority, which in almost all cases was age. The boys formed the last row and behind them were laymen, two or three from abroad, the rest from Myanmar. Next came the foreign women who had also come for the two weeks at the Centre, about forty-five of them. Filling the back to capacity were Myanmar ladies. This formal meditation hour was repeated three times a day for the two weeks the foreigners were in Yangon.

The mens' full ordination (//upasampada//), their entry into the life of bhikkhus, took place on Sunday the 9th of January. The //upasampada// had to be in a monastery, so with the sponsorship and help of the Myanmar Department of Religious Affairs, the ordinations took place at Kaba Aye. This complex had originally been constructed to accommodate thousands of members of the Buddhist Sangha who gathered in Myanmar from all over the world in the mid-1950s to recite and purify the Pali Canon at the Sixth Great Buddhist Council.

Because of the large number of people to undergo full ordination at the Kaba Aye ordination hall (//sima//), they were divided into morning and afternoon batches. The motorcade left IMC right after breakfast. The men and boys had been offered their first meal as samaneras in their dining room at the Centre. After the food had been placed on the low round tables and the samaneras had all sat on mats on the floor, upasakas, while bowing, gently lifted each laden table up several inches, symbolically offering the food to the novices in Myanmar fashion.

When they reached the Kaba Aye //sima//, shoes were left in the buses and the samaneras, followed by the laypeople, formed a procession from the gateway. The //sima// is a large circular structure surmounted by a small golden pagoda. The line was led by five Burmese men dressed in fantastic gilt deva costumes holding ten foot tall white cloth sunshades dangling with small metallic Bodhi leaves. The sayadaws, samaneras and lay meditators walked slowly up a red carpet runner on the broad flight of stairs, into the //sima//.

The interior is 150 feet in diameter with a truly colossal golden Buddha statue on a nearly fifteen foot high throne at the front. It is flanked slightly below by statues of the two Chief Disciples, the Elders Sariputta and Maha-moggallana, paying respects among various devotional objects: a tasteful grand scale shrine. The ceiling must be thirty feet high, supported on six massive columns decorated with bands of mirror inlay. A frieze goes around the perimeter, level with the Buddha's throne, composed of some hundred bhikkhu statues, perhaps half life-size, seated in meditation. Screened doors open outside at equal intervals; thick carpets cover the floor for the comfort of all; low, movable, decorative section dividers separate the Sangha from householders and men from women. The foreign women sat behind Mother Sayamagyi at the left and watched the proceedings while the samaneras were seated in the central section of the //sima// several meters away from and facing their preceptor and other sayadaws participating in the ordination ceremony. Laymen occupied another back section.

When everyone had settled in the proper place, the ceremony began. In groups of three, starting with the eldest samaneras, the foreigners approached the elder monks to seek full ordination. From the remote viewpoint of the lay people, it was difficult to understand everything that was going on, but following details was not essential as they were there to witness the event and share in the making of good kamma.

The samaneras could understand as they had been trained beforehand. They were being asked the questions put to prospective bhikkhus ever since the Sangha became fully organized in the Buddha's lifetime: about their health, their sex, whether they were free and not in debt, if they were really human beings, etc. They replied appropriately. When they had all completed the answers, the groups again went up to the theras to request full ordination. When they had been accepted into the Order, each trio moved to join the Myanmar lifetime bhikkhus seated just to the side of the sayadaws conducting the proceedings. At times permanent bhikkhus had to bodily manipulate the foreigners into their proper places because they could not communicate through the language barrier.

The afternoon proceedings were similar except that a large number of outsiders also came to the //sima// to participate in the meritorious actions of supporting an ordination and of giving alms to the new monks afterwards. The atmosphere was quite special, generated by the commitment the men were making to the pure Buddha Dhamma and by the intention of everyone in the crowd to create //kusala//, good deeds, by participating in the proceedings.

The Deputy Minister for Religious Affairs spent several hours observing the ordinations and the Minister himself came to lead off the offering of //dana// to the newly ordained monks outside the //sima// in the late afternoon. The general public too was welcome to participate in these activities. Many who had just read about it in the newspaper came, having bought some small item to donate, or put some cash into an envelope to give (the standard way around the fact that monks are not supposed to touch gold or silver, i.e. money). All the International Meditation Centres (Yangon, U.K., U.S.A., Austria, and Western and Eastern Australia) had their own tables loaded with a particular item to be given to the monks. These had been purchased in Myanmar out of funds donated by members of the centres. Also various associations of the city participated in this //dana//, Yangon University lecturers, for example, came together. In all, many hundred laypeople lined the path from the ordination hall to the street, standing and waiting in the hot sunshine, or patches of shade.

Inside the building, the bhikkhus were grouped by nationality behind labeled placards carried by young men. Each monk had a Myanmar layman bearing a tall white sunshade behind him and two of them on each side. These pairs of upasakas carried large white sacks. As //dana// items piled up on the monks' bowls, they carefully placed them in the bags, making sure they did not touch the ground. All these male workers wore badges for identification.

The senior sayadaws emerged first and slowly filed through the crowd, looking neither right nor left but just before them, not acknowledging the laypeople making their donations into the big black laquer almsbowls. The feeling in the area switched from anticipation to reverence for the Sangha, respect for this institution which protects and follows the Buddha's teachings to the full. As the newly ordained bhikkhus passed through the line of donors, they responded to this awe for the robes they were now honoured to wear, keenly aware of their obligation to conduct themselves as proper monks. Only in this way would they be worthy of the respect they were being shown, not let down their teachers and hosts, and not disillusion the laity, who were so sincere in their honour.

The laypeople slipped off their shoes, picked up a packet from the table behind them, and with both hands, carefully placed it in the bowl of the monk as he passed in front of them. (The women took extra care not to touch or brush against any bhikkhu or his robes in the crowd.) The giving was done systematically, rotating through each small cluster so that every lay person had equal chance to earn merit. The almsround right after monks have been ordained is considered sure to bring donors extra merit. The new bhikkhus looked radiantly pure, with their shaven heads, lowered eyes, and restrained demeanour.

The final event of this day was held from five to six in the evening in Moguk Hall nearby in the same Kaba Aye complex. Here about a thousand lay devotees, mostly local, sat on the floor while the sayadaws and the junior monks sat on chairs at the front of the room facing them. The golden shrine was behind the bhikkhus. They recited Namo Tassa Bhagavato, the Refuges and the Precepts after the head sayadaw of the Kaba Aye monastery, and then a libation ceremony of pouring out water was held to symbolize sharing the merits made that day. This was invisible to most of the lay people but was held in the front of the hall using several sets of silver vessels.

A tired, happy serenity was felt at IMC afterwards, born of the knowledge that so much //kusala// had been generated by so many people that day.

* * *

For the remainder of the week of the ordination course, the new bhikkhus stayed at the meditation centre. They lived in their own dormitories at one end of the grounds, under the watchful eye of their assistant preceptor, the Venerable U Chanda Siri, who had also helped in all the earlier ordinations organized by the IMCs. They made good use of their time in robes free of worldly affairs by meditating many hours a day -- observing the breath to develop sharp //samadhi// and then applying the concentrated mind to the sensations rising and vanishing in their bodies to penetrate the //anicca// (impermanent) -- and so //dukkha// (unsatisfactory) and //anatta// (impersonal) -- nature of mind and body as deeply as they could. All was done as taught in the tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin, in strict accordance with the teachings of the Buddha.

Every evening there was a confession also in the hall. As there were so many bhikkhus, U Chanda Siri heard the confessions of half of the men and one of the older of the foreigners heard the confessions of the remainder. The bhikkhus got up from their seats on the floor, straightened their robes and worked their way to the front of the hall in pairs to recite the short Pali catechism admitting to miscellaneous errors and accepting admonition to try to do better in the future. In this orderly way it took about twenty minutes to finish all of the monks each evening. Sometimes the confession was followed by a short discourse by U Chanda Siri or one of the meditation teachers. One talk was about the "//dullabhas//," or states difficult to obtain, the most rare of which is being a bhikkhu. Another was an explanation of the origins of the questions the samaneras had to answer before being ordained as full bhikkhus. Those had been instituted by the Buddha in response to specific situations which arose, just as all the rules for the Sangha had been.

Following the bhikkhus' confession, the young samaneras came forward to recite the Refuges, Ten Precepts, etc., after U Chanda Siri. He was very particular that they pronounce each syllable in exactly the correct way, and they would repeat difficult words over and over until the result was as perfect as the preceptor wanted. The samaneras had their own bedroom and activities which included daily visits to the Shwe Dagon Pagoda.

The bhikkhus were fed in a separate upstairs dining hall on choice Myanmar and Chinese vegetarian food. Often some special dish -- such as ice cream -- had been donated by someone. People were always looking for more ways to earn merit by helping the bhikkhus, and other meditators, at the Centre. The Myanmar Buddhists exhibit great generosity, cultivating the //dana parami//.

The offerings the bhikkhus had received at the //sima// were sorted out by lay people one evening. The cash was totalled up and donated to certain pagodas and monasteries in Yangon, and the monks could take whatever they wanted of the remainder. Most of the things actually went out to viharas (monasteries) where lifetime bhikkhus would have more use for them than foreigners returning to lay life in their own countries in a few days.

The week as bhikkhus was interspersed with several events. One morning a //pindapata// (almsround) was held at IMC itself. Monks from U Pandicca's monastery had come to wrap the temporary monks' robes in the complex way, modestly covering the neck and both shoulders, appropriate for "going among the houses." The line of donors wound around the pagoda and Dhamma Hall. This time most of the items were food, since it was before noon. The atmosphere was more like a community event since the Centre was "home" to all the participants. The lay people again were dressed in fine Myanmar clothes to honour the bhikkhus.

One afternoon, Myanmar TV conducted interviews with six of the bhikkhus, and two of the foreign laywomen, in the Dhamma Hall. (Actually, TV crews, local and Japanese, had been covering most of the events of the ordination week and everyone was familiar with bright lights -- from external sources -- while they were meditating in the Dhamma Hall.) The questionnaire which had been given to the interviewees was quite serious and the bhikkhus especially had a good opportunity to express their views on the situation of Buddha Dhamma in the West and in Myanmar and about what they had personally gained from practising this meditation. If the interviews were shown in full, some profound Buddha Dhamma would have come over that most unlikely of media.

The boys took off their robes on Saturday the 15th; the bhikkhus did so precisely a week after the ordination. On that Sunday afternoon the confession was held early, at four, and immediately afterwards they agreed aloud that they were prepared to return to lay life. They then requested to be regarded as samaneras. They removed the robes and changed back into their lay clothes and then asked to be recognized as laymen again -- in both Pali and English. Finally U Chanda Siri gave them a discourse as laymen, urging them to cooperate in spreading the Buddha Dhamma in their own countries and always to follow the advice of Mother Sayamagyi and their other teachers.

* * *

The temporary bhikkhus returned to lay life with satisfaction at having done what is so hard to do: to be a good Buddhist monk. They were glad to have had even that short chance to know life without the entanglements, the "dust" as the Buddha called it, of household affairs. Some of them were a bit sorry at its ending. Most will probably try to take ordination again in this lifetime to earn still more merit. Their families were joyous to see how they had matured from the experience. Everyone had the assurance that comes from the performance of meritorious deeds dedicated towards purification of mind and the attainment of Nibbana, the cessation of all suffering.

* * * * * * * *

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Susan Elbaum Jootla was born in New York City in 1945 and obtained B.A. and M.A. degrees in Library Science from the University of Michigan. She lives in the West Himalayan hill station of Dalhousie with her husband, Balbir S. Jootla. Both are long-term practitioners of vipassana meditation in the tradition of the late Sayagyi U Ba Khin of Burma. Ms. Jootla's previous BPS publications include //Investigation for Insight //(Wheel No. 301/302), //Inspiration from Enlightened Nuns// (Wheel No. 349/350), //The Scale of Good Deeds// (Wheel No. 372), and //On Pilgrimage //(Bodhi Leaves No. 118).

* * * * * * * *

THE BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY

The BPS is an approved charity dedicated to making known the Teaching of the Buddha, which has a vital message for people of all creeds. Founded in 1958, the BPS has published a wide variety of books and booklets covering a great range of topics. Its publications include accurate annotated translations of the Buddha's discourses, standard reference works, as well as original contemporary expositions of Buddhist thought and practice. These works present Buddhism as it truly is -- a dynamic force which has influenced receptive minds for the past 2500 years and is still as relevant today as it was when it first arose. A full list of our publications will be sent upon request with an enclosure of U.S. $1.00 or its equivalent to cover air mail postage.

Write to:

The Hony. Secretary
BUDDHIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy Sri Lanka

or

The Barre Center for Buddhist Studies
Lockwood Road
Barre, MA 01005 USA
Tel: (508) 355-2347

* * * * * * * *

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TITLE OF WORK: A Taste of the Holy Life (Bodhi Leaves #133)
FILENAME: BODHI133.ZIP
AUTHOR: Susan Elbaum Jootla
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: c/o Buddhist Publication Society
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: Buddhist Publication Society
P.O. Box 61
54, Sangharaja Mawatha
Kandy, Sri Lanka
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: Susan Elbaum Jootla & Buddhist Publication Society (1994)
DATE OF PUBLICATION: 1994
RIGHTS AND RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: September 1995
ORIGIN SITE: Access to Insight BBS, Pepperell MA * (508) 433-5847 (96:903/1)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It is the spirit of dana, freely offered generosity, which has kept the entire Buddhist tradition alive for more than 2,500 years. If you find this work of value, please consider sending a donation to the author or publisher, so that these works may continue to be made available. May your generosity contribute to the happiness of all beings everywhere.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

[end]

INEVITABLE SUFFERING AND THE HOPE OF NIBBANA

by Sayagyi U Chit Tin

1. People With a Fixed Destiny

The Buddha taught that there are two types of people with a fixed destiny (niyata-pubbala). Those who attain at least the first stage of Awakening are assured of eventually attaining release from all suffering. They are called Noble Persons, Ariyas. The second catagory of people with a fixed destiny includes those who will be unable to attain release during their present life or during their next life. This second catagory is for those who have either committed one or more of the five actions which have an immediate result [in the next life] (anantarika-kamma), and for those who hold a fixed wrong view (niyata-miccha-ditthi).

Let us examine this second catagory in more detail, because a correct understanding of the dangers in wrong beliefs and wrong actions can serve to inspire us to work for the goal of release from all suffering. We shall also see that, even though people in the second catagory cannot avoid great suffering, they are not in a hopeless situation.

The five actions which inevitably result in great suffering in the next life are: 1) killing one's father, 2) killing one's mother, 3) killing an Arahat, that is to say, a person who has reached the highest stage of Awakening and who will have no future rebirths, 4) spilling the blood of a Buddha through an evil motive, and 5) causing a division in the Sangha, the Order of Bhikkhus which keeps alive the Teachings of the Buddha.[1]

It is very unlikely that any of us have committed one of these actions in this life. People who kill their parents are very rare. We are not very likely to know an Arahat. The Buddha has attained Pari-nibbana.

And the Buddha explained to the Venerable Upali that only a fully ordained Bhikkhu can cause a schism in the Sangha.[2] The Buddha said that even in the case of such a Bhikkhu, he must consciously work against the Teachings, knowing that he is maintaining what is not the Buddha's Teachings -- or at least have some doubts about whether creating a schism in the Sangha is against the Teachings. If a Bhikkhu is sincerely mistaken concerning the Teachings, he is not certain of rebirth in the lower realms, nor is he incurable.

Fixed wrong views may seem less terrible than these five crimes. We may look on them as merely ideas. But in Buddhism, ideas are given their correct value. It is ideas and beliefs that lead to actions. A deep-seated belief will lead to many wrong actions. Some wrong beliefs are less serious than others, for they contain a grain of truth. The beliefs which make it impossible to obtain birth in the higher planes in the next life and thereby cut off the possibility of obtaining release from suffering are very serious indeed.

We can sum up the worst types of wrong belief with the phrase, "There is not." "The wrong view that there is not" is the direct translation of the Pali term //natthika-ditthi//. This term is usually translated into English by "nihilism." The Buddha explained this type of wrong belief to the laymen of Sala. It includes the following beliefs:[3] that no good can come from giving or from making sacrifices; that good and evil actions have no future results; that this world and the next world are an illusion; that serving one's mother and father gives no good results; that no beings are born spontaneously; that no one in thisworld is living correctly and that none are able to teach others about this world and the next world having understood them through their own higher wisdom.[4] Finally, this wrong belief holds that when a person dies, he is annihilated; both wise men and fools are destroyed by death and after death they no longer exist.

The Buddha then explained to the laymen of Sala that some people hold the wrong view that [good or bad] actions do not exist (akiriya-ditthi). They maintain that no matter what a person does or encourages others to do, there is neither evil nor merit. A person can kill, mutilate, threaten and torture; they can have others do all this. They can cause grief and torment by stealing, committing adultery, and lying. In this wrong view, no evil is done. And this wrong view believes no merit comes from giving, encouraging others to give, from taming and restraining oneself or from speaking the truth.

The third type of wrong belief explained by the Buddha is the wrong view of no cause (ahetu-ditthi). Those who hold wrong view say that beings are defiled or purified without cause or reason. They say that creatures experience pleasure and pain in an arbitrary way. They do not believe that making right or wrong efforts cause future pleasure or pain.

The Buddha emphasizes for each of these three wrong views that they are dangerous because they lead to immoral living. Those who are convinced of these wrong beliefs will commit wrong actions of body, speech, and thought. They lead to being condemned by intelligent people here and now and in the future, and they lead to rebirth in the lower realms of suffering including the lowest of the hells, the Niraya Hell.

The commentaries[5] point out that the destiny of a person who holds one or more of these three wrong beliefs is only fixed for one rebirth. But due to habit, he will tend to approve of the same beliefs in future lives. This makes it almost impossible for him to transcend continued rebirths.

An important point is made concerning fixed destiny. Unwholesome mental states are weak compared to wholesome ones. This can be seen from the fact that for Ariyas, it is impossible to fall back into the lower realms of suffering. Those who are Stream-winners will have at the most only seven new lives in the higher realms before they attain complete liberation. No matter how bad unwholesome mental states or actions are, there is always the possibility of eventually obtaining release. The results of evil deeds are never final.

2. The Story of Devadatta and Ajatasattu

The fact that these types of wrong belief are more serious than the five crimes can be illustrated by the stories of two persons who committed one or more of these crimes during the time of the Buddha. They are Devadatta and Ajatasattu.

Devadatta was the cousin and brother-in-law of the Buddha. He was one of a group of six Khattiyans who went forth together with their barber, Upali. This group included several of the foremost disciples: Bhaddiya, Anuruddha, Bhagu, Kimbila and Ananda. Ananda attained Stream-entry and the others all became Arahats. But Devadatta only attained the mental powers (iddhi) which can be achieved through concentration.[6]

As a result of their attainments, Devadatta's companions received many offerings from the laypeople. Devadatta became jealous, thinking that since he came from the same clan and had ordained with the others, he should be as highly honoured as they were.[7] He decided he would win favour with a layman in order to win gain and honour. He realized that King Bimbisara was a Stream-winner whose confidence in the Buddha could not be shaken. King Kosala was also a firm believer. So Devadatta decided to try Prince Ajatasattu, Bimbisara's son.

Devadatta went to Ajatasattu, and through his powers, assumed the form of a boy with snakes coiled around him. This frightened the prince and impressed him. After that, he made many offerings to Devadatta. This made Devadatta proud. He became obsessed with gains, honour and fame and thought to himself, "I will lead the Sangha." As soon as he thought this, he lost his mental powers.

Venerable Maha-Moggallana's attendant, Kakudha, had died and been reborn as a Deva. He told Maha-Moggallana about Devadatta's idea that he would lead the Sangha. When Maha-Moggallana informed the Buddha, the Buddha told him to be careful in his speech; that Devadatta would betray himself on his own. The Buddha pointed out that a teacher does not need to be protected by his disciples if he is pure in morality, in livelihood, in teaching the Dhamma, in exposition and in knowledge and vision. The Buddha himself was such a teacher. Only teachers who are impure in any of these aspects need and expect protection.

A group of Bhikkhus told the Buddha of the great offerings

Ajatasattu made to Devadatta. The Buddha warned them not to envy Devadatta, for gains, honour and fame would bring about Devadatta's downfall.

As the Buddha said, Devadatta betrayed himself. He was so deluded, he went to the Buddha when he was teaching a great number of people including the king and three times requested to lead the Sangha. The Buddha replied, "I would not hand the Sangha over to Sariputta and Moggallana. How could I hand it over to you, a wretched person to be vomited like spittle?"

This firm refusal upset Devadatta, who, for the first time, felt malice towards the Buddha.

The Buddha had the Sangha carry out a formal Act of Information against Devadatta, informing the laypeople of Rajagaha that Devadatta's nature had been of one kind in the past, but that now it was of another kind. From that time on, whatever he did by gesture and vocally had nothing to do with the Buddha, the Dhamma, or the Sangha. The Buddha had the Sangha charge Venerable Sariputta with the task of informing the people of Rajagaha. Sariputta pointed out that he had spoken in the past in praise of Devadatta in that very city. The Buddha asked Sariputta if what he had said in the past had been true. When the chief disciple said yes, the Buddha said that what he was to say now would be equally true.

Next, Devadatta decided to try to kill the Buddha. He went to Ajatasattu and proposed that the prince kill his father in order to become king. He said he would kill the Buddha and become a Buddha himself. We can see how little Devadatta understood.

Ajatasattu was taken prisoner in the act of trying to kill King Bimbisara. When his father discovered his son wanted the throne, he stepped down and handed over the kingdom. Devadatta was not satisfied with this, however.[8] He urged the prince to kill his father. But no weapon could injure Bimbisara. So the prince decided to starve his father. He was put in prison and only the mother of Ajatasattu was allowed to visit him. She took food which she hid in her clothes. This was discovered, so she hid food in her hair. But this was discovered as well and she took what she could hide in her shoes. Her last resort was to smear her body with sweets for the king to lick. Finally, she was forbidden access to the king. But the king continued to live by walking around his cell meditating. The prince then had barbers cut open the king's feet, fill the wounds with salt and vinegar and burn them with hot coals. The king showed no resentment even at this.

A son was born to Ajatasattu and he felt great joy. He realized his father may have felt the same way when he was born. His mother confirmed that this was so, and he sent to have his father released from prison. But it was too late. His father had died that very day.

Devadatta asked for Ajatasattu's aid in killing the Buddha and the prince gave orders to his men to do whatever Devadatta asked. But the man sent to kill the Buddha went rigid and stood still, afraid, anxious, and alarmed when he saw the Buddha. He realized his error and confessed his fault to the Buddha, asking for the Buddha to acknowledge his transgression so that he might restrain himself in the future. The Buddha taught this man the Dhamma. Devadatta had set up a series of men, each group to kill the next in order to cover up his deed. But each group went to look for the others, came to the Buddha and heard the Dhamma.

Devadatta decided he would have to kill the Buddha himself. He threw a big rock down from the Vulture's Peak. But two mountain peaks came together and crushed the rock and only a fragment of it reached the Buddha, wounding his foot.

The Buddha told Devadatta that he had made great demerit by spilling his blood. And he told the Bhikkhus that this was the first action of Devadatta's that would have an immediate result in the next life. So we can see that all the bad things Devadatta had done up to this point could have been overcome if he had mended his ways.

The Bhikkhus were very agitated when they learned of this attempt on the Buddha's life. But the Buddha assured them, as he had Maha-Moggallana, that a Buddha cannot be killed and does not need to be protected by his disciples.

Devadatta tried again to kill the Buddha. He had a fierce elephant named Nalagiri set loose against the Buddha. But the Buddha overcame the elephant with loving kindness. With this event, the laymen learned about Devadatta's attempts on the Buddha's life and their indignation was so great, Prince Ajatasattu was constrained to withdraw his support.

Devadatta then asked for food from the laymen. The Buddha pointed out that it was wrong for the Bhikkhus to solicit food and laid down a rule to prevent such practices. This seems to have been the motivation for Devadatta to create a schism in the Sangha. He approached several other Bhikkhus and proposed a plan. They would ask the Buddha to lay down five ascetic rules which they knew in advance he would refuse. In this way, they would appear to be better, for people without a proper understanding of the Dhamma are impressed by strict rules. Even the group of five who accompanied the Buddha before his Awakening had been of the opinion that the more painful the practice the better it is. So Devadatta requested that the Buddha require all bhikkhus to live in the forest, refuse invitations to meals, wear only robes made of rags, live under trees rather than in buildings and refuse all meat. The Buddha replied that bhikkhus were free to live in the forest if they wished, to eat only food obtained on their alms rounds, and to wear only robes made from rags. But it was a choice to be made. If they preferred, they could live near a village, accept invitations to meals, and accept robes from laymen. Living under a tree was permitted for eight months of the year and fish and meat were pure as long as it was not seen, heard or suspected that the animal had been killed on purpose in order to feed the bhikkhu.

Devadatta was overjoyed at the Buddha's refusal. When he told the people of Rajagaha about the rules, those who were of little faith, not believing in the Buddha, and who were unintelligent were impressed. But those who had the opposite qualities were critical, saying, "How can this Devadatta promote a schism in the Sangha?"

The Buddha confronted Devadatta with his actions and asked him if what he heard was true, that Devadatta was promoting a schism in the Sangha. Devadatta admitted that he was.

"Enough, Devadatta," the Buddha said, "do not let there be a schism in the Sangha, for a schism in the Sangha is a serious matter, Devadatta. Whoever, splits a Sangha that is united sets up demerit that endures for an aeon; he is boiled in hell for an aeon. But whoever, Devadatta, unites a Sangha that is split, he sets up sublime merit, he rejoices in heaven for an aeon."

But Devadatta would not listen. When he saw Venerable Ananda on his alms round in Rajagaha, he told him that from that time on he would observe the reciting of the rules, the Patimokkha, and the carrying out of formal acts of the Sangha on his own.

Devadatta was able to win over five hundred newly ordained Bhikkhus who did not understand what they were doing. Sariputta and Maha-Moggallana informed the Buddha of what had happened and he asked them, "Do you not have compassion for these newly ordained bhikkhus?" And he sent them after the bhikkhus. The two chief disciples went to where Devadatta had set himself up in imitation of the Buddha. He was seated, teaching the Dhamma to a large group, and when he saw the chief disciples coming, Devadatta said, "You see, bhikkhus, the Dhamma is well taught by me. Even the chief disciples of the recluse Gotama are coming to me approving of my teachings." But one of his followers, Kokalika, warned Devadatta not to trust the chief disciples. Devadatta was so deluded, however, he seems to have sincerely believed in what he was doing, and he welcomed Sariputta and Maha-Moggallana.

After teaching far into the night, Devadatta invited Venerable Sariputta to take over, again in imitation of the Buddha. And Devadatta laid down to rest. He was tired, forgetful and inattentive, so he immediately fell asleep. Both Sariputta and Maha-Moggallana instructed the bhikkhus and opened their eyes to the true Dhamma. And they led the Bhikkhus back to the Buddha. Kokalika woke up Devadatta and told him of what had happened. Devadatta was so upset, he spit up blood.

The Buddha told the Sangha that Devadatta was overcome by eight conditions which controlled his mind and which meant he would be reborn in Niraya Hell, staying there for an aeon without any hope for a cure. These eight conditions were gain, lack of gain, fame, lack of fame, honours, lack of honours, evil desire and evil friendship. All of these conditions should be overcome if a person is to reach the end of suffering. The Buddha also spoke of three conditions in the same context, two of them from the above list: evil desire, evil friendship, and stopping midway along the path after gaining special attainments that are of little value. So we can see how dangerous the mental powers can be for someone who has not gained control over his cravings, and how important it is not to overestimate our attainments at any time.

Devadatta became very ill and repented of all he had done. He asked to be led to the Buddha. But his disciples refused at first. Devadatta said, "Do not destroy me. I did bear hatred towards the Buddha, but he has not entertained hatred towards me, not even so much as the tip of a hair." The Buddha was told of his approach, but said that Devadatta would not succeed in seeing him again. It is said that from the time he requested the Buddha to lay down the five rules, hoping to divide the Sangha, Devadatta could no longer come into the Buddha's presence. Devadatta was being carried on a litter by his disciples, and when he arrived at the monastery where the Buddha was staying, he asked to be let down so that he could bathe. But he sank down into the earth, little by little. Just before his head was swallowed up, he took refuge in the Buddha.[9]

Ajatasattu was also filled with remorse.[10] He feared that the same thing that had happened to Devadatta would happen to him. He was unable to discharge his duties as the king. He could not sleep at night and wandered around trembling. He thought he could see the earth opening before him and the flames of hell coming out. He imagined himself fastened to a bed of burning metal with iron lances thrust into his body. He wanted to go to the Buddha to be reconciled to him and to ask his guidance, but his actions had been so serious he was afraid to approach the Buddha.

Ajatasattu's physician was Jivaka, who was the Buddha's physician as well. So the king decided to use a stratagem to get Jivaka to take him to the Buddha. One night he exclaimed that it was a beautiful night, a perfect evening for going to see a teacher. He knew that his ministers would encourage him to go see their different teachers. Each minister spoke in praise of different teachers, but Jivaka, who understood what the king wanted, remained silent as he wanted to be sure that the king desired to see the Buddha. Finally, Ajatasattu asked Jivaka why he had said nothing. Jivaka then praised the Buddha, and the king suggested they go to see him.

Jivaka had said that the Buddha was residing with twelve hundred and fifty bhikkhus, so when they approached his lodgings and not a sound was to be heard, Ajatasattu became nervous, fearful that there was a plot against him. "You are not playing a trick on me, are you Jivaka? You are not deceiving me and betraying me to my foes, are you?" he said to Jivaka. "How can there be no sound at all? How can there not be a sneeze or a cough in such a large assembly of bhikkhus?" Jivaka reassured the king and told him to continue on to the Buddha.

Ajatasattu went to the Buddha and exclaimed that he wished his son Udayi could be as calm as the assembly of Bhikkhus. Venerable Buddhaghosa comments that the king feared his son might kill him, just as he had killed his father, and therefore wished that Udayi would become a bhikkhu.[11] This would explain why he then asked the Buddha about the fruits of the life of a bhikkhu.

In his discourse to Ajatasattu, the Buddha questions the king about what he has heard from other teachers, and Ajatasattu describes the many wrong beliefs he has heard and has not been satisfied with. These include the most dangerous kinds of wrong beliefs which we explained at the beginning of our talk. Then the Buddha points out the fruits that can be expected from leading a life based on right view. At the end of the discourse, Ajatasattu took refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha, and confessed his fault in killing his father. He asked for the Buddha to acknowledge his wrong action in order that he might restrain himself in the future.

After the king left, the Buddha told the bhikkhus that if he had not killed his father, Ajatasattu would have attained Stream-entry through the discourse he had just heard. Ajatasattu missed his chance to become an Ariya, but he associated with the Buddha from then on, listened to other discourses, and through associating with such a virtuous friend his fears were calmed and his feelings of horror disappeared. He became a great supporter of the Dhamma. From this we can see that even though a person may have a fixed destiny in the next life, it does not mean that he cannot grow in the Dhamma. We are told[12] that the Buddha allowed Devadatta to ordain even though he knew what he would do. This was because even if he had remained a layman he would have committed serious crimes, but he would have been unable to accumulate enough merit to obtain release in a future life. As a Bhikkhu, he acquired the necessary merit before his craving got the upper hand. He will suffer for the remainder of this aeon in hell, but after a hundred thousand world cycles, he will become a Pacceka Buddha -- that is to say, a Buddha that does not teach others the Path to Nibbana -- and his name will be Atthissara. Ajatasattu will suffer in the Lohakumbhiya Hell for sixty thousand years, but thanks to the good deeds he did after hearing the Buddha's discourse, he will afterwards become the Pacceka Buddha Viditavisesa.

3. The Importance of Practising the Dhamma

It is not only those who hold the worst kinds of wrong beliefs or who commit the five worst crimes who are reborn in the realms of suffering. A person is never sure that he has escaped the lower worlds until he becomes an Ariya. The only way to do this is to take advantage of the Teachings of a Buddha whenever this is possible. Being generous and leading a moral life are necessary, but they are not enough. We can never be sure where we will be reborn next as long as we are ordinary beings. And we have seen in the case of Devadatta that even developing our concentration to a very high degree will not release us from suffering. We must in addition develop our insight. If we follow the Path in all its fullness, then we can aspire to release in this life or in the next.

But even those who are Ariyas must continue to follow the Path if they are to avoid unnecessary suffering. In his discourse to Ajatasattu, the Buddha pointed out that one of the fruits of the life of a recluse was developing the divine eye and seeing for oneself that the lower realms of suffering are the destiny of those who are ill-conducted in body, speech and mind, who are revilers of the Ariyas, who hold wrong views and acquire the results of the sort of Kamma that comes from holding wrong views.[13] In illustrating the term "revilers of the Ariyas", Venerable Buddhaghosa gives an interesting example.[14] An elder bhikkhu went on his alms rounds in a village with a young bhikkhu. At the first house they received a spoonful of hot gruel. The elder felt ill and knowing that if he drank the gruel before it grew cold it would help, he did not wait to drink it later. The young bhikkhu was disgusted and remarked, "The old man has let his hunger get the better of him and has done what he should be ashamed to do." When they returned to the monastery, the Elder asked the bhikkhu if he had any footing in the Dispensation. "Yes, venerable sir," the bhikkhu answered, "I am a Stream-winner." "Then friend," the Elder advised him, "do not try for the higher paths. One whose taints are destroyed has been reviled by you." The bhikkhu asked for the Elder's forgiveness and was in this way restored to his former status.

So we see that even an Ariya must be careful of his actions. Insulting an Ariya is very serious, as Buddhaghosa points out. Even if we are not aware of another person's attainment, if they are an Ariya, we will suffer the consequences. Insulting an Ariya will be an obstacle both to heaven and to the Path. But it is different from the bad deeds or beliefs with fixed destiny as it can be cured, as in the case of the bhikkhu who insulted the Elder. Buddhaghosa says that if one is guilty of insulting an Ariya, even if one is an Ariya oneself, one should go to the Ariya and ask forgiveness. If the Ariya has gone away, one should go to him or send someone to obtain forgiveness. If this is not possible, he should go to his companions and confess his fault and ask that the person insulted forgive him. If one does not know where the person insulted is, one should extend his hands with palms together in the direction the Ariya took when he left and say, "Forgive me." If the Ariya has died, he should go to the bed where he attained final Nibbana or to where he was cremated and ask forgiveness.

It is necessary to be constantly vigilant as we walk along the Path to Nibbana. Even those who have already reached the stage of an Ariya can avoid unnecessary suffering if they are careful in all their deeds, words and thoughts. How much more important this is for those who have not yet had a taste of Nibbana! The Path to Nibbana is hard work -- but even if it were ten times more difficult, it would be worth making the effort.

4. The Lesson To Be Learned

In conclusion, let us give some verses which help us understand the question of inevitable suffering.[14]

He who is not free from impurity, who is lacking in self control and truthfulness, and who puts on the yellow robe -- he is not worthy of it.

He who is free from impurity, who is well-established in morals and with self-control and truthfulness -- he is indeed worthy of the yellow robe.

Dhammapada vv. 9-10

He who does evil burns here (in this world); he burns after death; he burns in both places. Thinking, "I did evil," he burns. He burns even more when he goes to a painful existence.

He who does good is joyful here (in this world); he is joyful after death; he is joyful in both places. Thinking, "I did good," he is joyful. He is even more joyful when he goes to a happy existence.

Dhammapada vv. 17-18

Deeds that are unprofitable and harmful to oneself are easy. But whatever is truly beneficial and profitable, that, indeed, is the hardest thing of all.

Dhammapada v. 165

It is easy for a good man to do good. But it is difficult for an evil man to do good.

It is easy for an evil man to do evil. But it is difficult for a noble man to do evil.

Udana v. 8

Even if one should give the whole earth to an ungrateful person who is always looking for a loophole, one can never satisfy him.

Jataka n 72

Whoever is exceedingly immoral is like the maluva vine that covers a sal tree. He does to himself exactly what his enemy wants.

Dhammapada v. 162

Devadatta spoke the following stanza as the earth swallowed him:

With these bones, with my life, I take refuge in the Buddha --
The best of men, the God of gods, the guide of men fit to be trained, the All-seeing One, He who is endowed with many auspicious marks.

Dhammapada Commentary I 147

Devadatta's deeds were much worse than Ajatasattu's. He created a schism in the Sangha, made attempts on the life of the Buddha and shed the Buddha's blood. That is why he was swallowed up by the earth and will suffer in the lowest of the hells -- the Avici hell -- and it will only be after a hundred thousand world cycles that he will become a Pacceka Buddha. Ajatasattu, who killed his father, was reborn in the Lohakumbhi hell after his death and will suffer there for sixty thousand years.
Later, he will reach Nibbana as a Pacceka Buddha. May we take the stories of Devadatta and Ajatasattu as a warning, and the example of the continued effort of the Ariyas as our inspiration.

FOOTNOTES:

[1] See, for example, A III 146f. (GS III 112).

[2] Vin II 204-206 (BD V 286-289)

[3] The following details are a paraphrase of M I 401f. (MLS II 70f.)

[4] These details are added to the above in Ven. Ananda's discourse to the ascetic Sandata (M I 515 [MLS II 194])

[5] See the translation of the commentary and sub-commentaries to a similar passage in the Digha-nikaya in //The Wheel//, nr.98/99, pp. 24-28.

[6] See Dhp-a I 38 (BL I 234)

[7] For Devadatta's story down to the schism in the Sangha, see Vin II 184-206 (BD V 259-289). Some details are added from Dhp-a I 38-143 (BL I 234-238).

[8] The story of the death of Bimbisara is found in Sv I 135ff. See DPPN, "Bimbisara" (II 286f.).

[9] For the rest of Devadatta's story see Dhp-a I 146-149 (BL I 239-242) and the introduction to the Samudda-vanija Jataka (nr466).

[10] See the introductions to the Sanjiva Jataka (nr 150), the Samkicca Jataka (nr530), and the Samannaphala Sutta (D I 47-85[DB I 65-95]).

[11] See Sv I 153.

[12] For Devadatta see Dhp I 147 (BL I 240); cf. Mil 107-113 (QKM I 162-170). For Ajatasattu see Sv I 237f.

[13] D I 82 (DB I 91f.). Quoted in Vism, ch. XIII,para 72.

[14] Vism, Ch XIII,para 84-90.

[15] Verse 17 of the Dhammapada is associated with the story of Devadatta in Dhp-a. The verses from the Udana and the verse from Jataka story n 72 are also mentioned in the commentary as spoken by the Buddha in connection with him.

Worldwide Contact Addresses
in the Tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin
~~~~~~

AUSTRIA: International Meditation Centre, A-9064 St. Michael/Gurk 6, Austria;Tel: +43 4224 2820, Fax: +43 4224 28204
Email: CIS, IMC-Austria, 100425,3423

EASTERN AUSTRALIA: International Meditation Centre, Lot 2 Cessnock Road, Sunshine NSW 2264, Australia;
Tel: +61 49 705 433, Fax: +61 49 705 749

UNITED KINGDOM: International Meditation Centre, Splatts House, Heddington, Calne, Wiltshire SN11 OPE, England;
Tel: +44 380 850 238, Fax: +44 380 850 833,
Email: CIS, IMC-UK,100330,3304

USA (East Coast): International Meditation Centre, 438 Bankard Road, Westminster MD 21158, USA;
Tel: +1 410 346 7889, Fax: +1 410 346 7133;
Email: CIS, IMC-USA, 74163,2452

WESTERN AUSTRALIA: International Meditation Centre, Lot 78 Jacoby Street, Mahogany Creek WA 6072, Australia;
Tel: +61 9 295 2644, Fax: +61 9 295 3435
~~~~~~

CANADA: IMC-Canada, 336 Sandowne Drive, Waterloo, Ontario, N2K 1V8, Canada; Tel: +1 519 747 4762, Fax: +1 519 725 2781

GERMANY: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Gesellschaft, Christaweg 16, 79114 Freiburg, Germany, Tel: +49 761 465 42, Fax: +49 761 465 92

JAPAN: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, Komatsuri-Cho 923, Kishiwada-Shi, Osaka-Fu, 596 Japan, Tel: +81 724 45 0057

THE NETHERLANDS: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Stichting, Oudegracht 124, 3511 AW Utrecht, The Netherlands,
Tel: +31 30 311 445, Fax: +31 30 340 612

SINGAPORE: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Association, 9 Penang Road #07-12, Park Mall, Singapore 0923
Tel: +65 338 6911, Fax: +65 336 7211

SWITZERLAND: Sayagyi U Ba Khin Gesellschaft, Greyerzstrasse 35, 3013 Bern, Switzerland;Tel: +41 31 415 233, Fax: +41 61 271 4184;
Email: CIS, 100256,3576

USA (West Coast): Contact Address: IMC-USA c/o Joe McCormack, 77 Kensington Rd., San Anselmo, CA 94960,U.S.A.
Tel: +1 415 459 3117, Fax: +1 415 459 4837

BELGIUM: Address as for the Netherlands, Tel: +32 2 414 1756

DENMARK: Contact Address: Mr. Peter Drost-Nissen, Strandboulevarden 117, 3th, 2100 Kopenhagen, Denmark. Tel: 031 425 636

ITALY: Contact address: Mr. Renzo Fedele, Via Euganea 94, 35033 Bresseo PD, Italy. Tel: +39 49 9900 752

Published by the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, United Kingdom
Address as above, registered charity no. 280134

DISTRIBUTION AGREEMENT
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TITLE OF WORK: Inevitable Suffering and the Hope of Nibbana
FILENAME: HOPE_OF.ZIP
AUTHOR: Sayagyi U Chit Tin
AUTHOR'S ADDRESS: n/a
PUBLISHER'S ADDRESS: International Meditation Centre, Splatts House,
Heddington, Calne, Wiltshire SN11 OPE, England
COPYRIGHT HOLDER: The Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust, U.K.
DATE OF PUBLICATION:
RIGHTS & RESTRICTIONS: See paragraph below.
DATE OF DHARMANET DISTRIBUTION: 18 February 1995
ORIGIN SITE: BODY DHARMA * Berkeley CA 510/836-4717 DharmaNet (96:101/33)

The copyright holder retains all rights to this work and hereby grants electronic distribution rights to DharmaNet International. This work may be freely copied and redistributed electronically, provided that the file contents (including this Agreement) are not altered in any way and that it is distributed at no cost to the recipient. You may make printed copies of this work for your personal use; further distribution of printed copies requires permission from the copyright holder. If this work is used by a teacher in a class, or is quoted in a review, the publisher shall be notified of such use. See the title page of this work for any additional rights and restrictions that may apply.

DharmaNet International, P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley, CA 94704-4951

[end of file]
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

HYMN OF PRAISE

I hold aloft the scepter of compassion, the diamond thunderbolt of love. Its' five prongs showing the five wisdoms, conquering the five passions. I must be worthy to uphold it.

I hold aloft its' companion, the bell of wisdom, ringing freedom throughout the universes. I resolve never to separate from the perfect wisdom, to realize I cannot be separate. I will ring the bell throughout all worlds, throughout all lives.

I hold them together to show the non-duality of wisdom and compassion, with every fiber of my being, throughout all worlds.

I receive the bow and arrow, the bow of wisdom of selflessness, the arrow of communication, precise teaching, sending out the messages of wisdom to all beings. I shoot the arrow of freedom everywhere, in all directions, to slay the enemy of ignorance, and cynicism, and despair.

I receive the wheel of majesty and truth. I vow to turn the wheel, to liberate all beings, to preserve their freedoms.

I hold the gesture of sophisticated understanding, fine distinction between good and evil, beauty and ugliness.

I uphold the book, the teaching of the Buddha Yamantaka, conqueror of death. I accept responsibility for the teaching.

I remind all beings of the ground of freedom and the void.

I hold in reverence the ornaments of our teacher, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, always with us in our hearts.

The gesture of non-duality, the gesture of offering.

I receive the radiant wish-fulfilling jewel, to uphold the teachings of the jewel clan of the Buddhas.

I receive the vajra of the vajra clan.

My hands are dancing gods and goddesses of worship.

I receive the lotus of the lotus clan.

I touch the earth.

I uphold my vajra scepter and bell.

I uphold the sword of the sword clan, turning envy into all accomplishing wisdom and its' teachings.

HEART SUTRA

Thus have I heard at one time.

The Lord was dwelling at Rajagriha, on Vulture-peak mountain, together with a great host of monks and a great host of Bodhisattvas.

At that time the Lord was composed in the concentration on the course of dharmas called 'Profound Illumination.'

At that time also the noble Lord Avalokita, the Bodhisattva and Mahasattva, in the practice of the profound Perfection of Wisdom, looked down; he beheld but five skandhas and that in their own-being they were empty.

Then, through the inspiration of the Buddha, the Venerable Sariputra said to the noble Lord Avalokita, the Bodhisattva and Mahasattva: "How should any child of good family train, who wishes to engage in the practice of the profound Perfection of Wisdom?"

And the noble Lord Avalokita, the Bodhisattva and Mahasattva, spoke to the venerable Sariputra as follows.

"Sariputra, any son or daughter of good family who wishes to engage in the practice of the profound Perfection of Wisdom should look upon it thus: he or she beholds but five skandhas and that in their own-being they are empty.

Form is Emptiness, Emptiness is form.

Emptiness does not differ from form, and form does not differ from Emptiness.

Likewise feelings, recognitions, volitions and consciousnesses are empty.

So, Sariputra, all dharmas are Emptyness, without differentiating marks; they are not produced or stopped, not defiled and not immaculate, not deficient and not complete.

Therefore, Sariputra, in Emptyness there is no form, no feeling, no recognition, no volitions, no consciousness; no eye, no ear, no nose, no tongue, no body, no mind; no visible form, no sound, no smell, no taste, no tangible, no mental object; no eye-element, and so forth, up to no mind-element and no mental-consciousness-element; no ignorance and no extinction of ignorance, and so forth, up to no aging and death and no extinction of aging and death; likewise there is no Suffering, Origin, Cessation or Path, no wisdom-knowledge, no attainment and non-attainment.

Therefore Sariputra, because there is no attainment, Bodhisattvas abide relying on the Perfection of Wisdom, without obscurations of thought, and so are unafraid.

Transcending perverted views, they attain the end, Nirvana.

All Buddhas existing in the three times, relying on the Perfection of Wisdom, fully awaken to the highest, perfect Enlightenment.

Therefore one should know that the mantra of the Perfection of Wisdom is the mantra of great knowledge, the highest mantra, the unequalled mantra, the mantra that allays all suffering, the Truth, since it has nothing wrong.

The mantra of the Perfection of Wisdom is proclaimed:

TAD-YATHA; GATE GATE PARAGATE PARASAMGATE BODHI SVAHA!

In this way, Sariputra, should a Bodhisattva and Mahasattva train in the profound Perfection of Wisdom."

Then the Lord rose from that concentration and commended the noble Lord Avalokita, the Bodhisattva and Mahasattva, saying: "Well said, well said, O son of good family!

So it is, O son of good family, so it is.

Just as you have taught should the profound Perfection of Wisdom be practiced, and the Tathagatas will rejoice.

Thus spake the Lord.

The Venerable Sariputra, the noble Lord Avalokita, the Bodhisattva and Mahasattva, and the whole world, that assembly with devas, human beings, asuras and gandharvas, were delighted and applauded the Lord's speech.

The Heart Sutra

Commentary by Master Sheng-yen

This is the fourth article in a lecture series spoken by Shih-fu to students attending a special class at the Ch'an Center.

In the first two lines of the Heart Sutra are two more words I wish to explain, namely "coursing" and the very first word, "when." "Coursing" may also be understood as "using," "functioning," or "applying." Therefore, the sentence, "When the Bodhisattva Avalokitesvara was coursing in the deep prajnaparamita" can be interpreted as, "When the Bodhisattva Avalokitesvara was using his wisdom."

When wisdom manifests, or is being used, a bodhisattva seems no different from an ordinary sentient being. The bodhisattva, however, perceives both wisdom and its use as root wisdom, or that which manifests when vexations terminate; whereas others perceive only subsequent wisdom, or that which is used by a bodhisattva in helping to deliver sentient beings.

As we have said before, there is fundamental (root) wisdom and subsequent (acquired) wisdom. Fundamental wisdom is that which is present when there are no vexations. Subsequent wisdom is that which manifests in response to sentient beings. There is a paradox here, a chicken-and- egg problem. There is wisdom and there is the termination of vexations. Which comes first? Which leads to which? Some say you cannot have wisdom until vexations are terminated. Others say you cannot terminate vexations without wisdom. Where does this wisdom come from?

Prajna (wisdom) has four prerequisites: hearing, practice or cultivation, contemplation, and realization. According to Ch'an teachings, this is the path to experience wisdom. Other traditions may approach wisdom by a different path, but if you choose to follow Ch'an methods, then first you must listen to the teachings of the Dharma. Next, you must practice a method and use the precepts as a guide for behavior. With right understanding and proper practice, your mind will settle and become more concentrated. In this clarity and stillness, you can then contemplate, or be more keenly and directly aware of your method, your actions, and your mind. Contemplation is not to be confused with ordinary reasoning and analyzing. Contemplation does not involve thinking or discriminating. It is purely awareness. Fourth and last comes realization.

So, the bodhisattva's wisdom comes from this process of hearing, practice, contemplation and realization. With realization comes wisdom. And what is this realization? The next line of the sutra tells us: "He [Bodhisattva Avalokitesvara] perceived that all five skandhas are empty."

It is obvious, then, what "when" means. When bodhisattvas succesfully complete their cultivation of the six paramitas, prajna will spontaneously arise. When prajna arises, all five skandhas are perceived as empty and vexations are terminated. This is profound enlightenment. It is not the flash of enlightenment (kensho) experienced by ordinary sentient beings, nor is it the complete enlightenment of the Buddha. Although great bodhisattvas have terminated all vexation, they still have what are called habitual tendencies, aspects (but not vexations) of their beings or personalities which they have not yet liberated themselves from. The Buddha, on the other hand, is free from all vexations and habitual tendencies. Here is an analogy. The ignorance of sentient beings is like the clouds blocking the sun and sky. The enlightenment of bodhisattvas is the sky devoid of clouds, but still retaining a slight haze. They see the sky and sun and they think their view is clear, but it it is not absolutely clear. The Buddha's sky is clear, and he also perceives the haze the great bodhisattvas do not see.

After wisdom arises there is still an issue, namely that sometimes the wisdom is functioning and sometimes it is not. When wisdom is not functioning, then the question of whether or not a bodhisattva perceives that all five skandhas are empty is meaningless. When fundamental (non- functioning) wisdom arises in a bodhisattva, the five skandhas do not exist, and neither do sentient beings nor bodhisattvas. However, when a bodhisattva's wisdom is functioning, then the five skandhas do exist, but they are perceived as being empty.

This question of functioning versus non-functioning wisdom comes from the perspective of ordinary sentient beings. Since there are innumerable sentient beings forever interacting with and needing help from bodhisattvas, there is never a moment when their wisdom is not functioning.

Summarizing, fundamental wisdom arises when, after going through the process of hearing, practicing and contemplating, one finally realizes that the five skandhas are empty. Fundamental wisdom is the culmination of this process. But since the Bodhisattva Path is one of helping all sentient beings, there is never a time when wisdom is not being used; so, in a sense, fundamental and subsequent wisdom arise simultaneously.

I now wish to dissect the line, "He perceived that all five skandhas are empty." The manifestation of fundamental wisdom and the perception that the five skandhas are empty occur simultaneously. With the perception of emptiness of the five skandhas, fundamental wisdom manifests. When fundamental wisdom manifests, the five skandhas are empty.

Buddhadharma speaks of different levels of emptiness. First is the emptiness viewed by ordinary sentient beings, which is illusory, or false, emptiness. Second is the emptiness perceived by Hinayana practitioners, or emptiness derived from analysis. Third is the emptiness of Mahayana practitioners, who see emptiness as reality.

People who believe in an illusory, or false, emptiness may say that life is an illusion and therefore feel they can do anything they want. It sounds like Buddhism, but these people speak from their intellect and imagination. These people do not understand through direct experience the principles of causes and conditions and cause and consequence (karma).

Buddhadharma states that there are causes and conditions, and cause and consequence, but there is no self-nature -- something that is unchanging, independent and eternal. It is in this sense that Buddhism uses the word emptiness. One can only understand this through direct experience, but even this truth is not ultimate emptiness. If one stops at this point, it is considered emptiness derived from analysis. Ultimate emptiness, or emptiness as reality, is where one realizes that all dharmas, whether they be mental or physical -- are empty AND existent. In other words, existence is identical to emptiness. If one has no attachments and makes no discriminations based on a self-center, then one recognizes that every dharma exists and is empty. One recognizes that existence and emptiness are really the same thing. One further recognizes that there really is no such thing as existence or emptiness. This is the emptiness of the Mahayana tradition.

I would like to elaborate further on the distinction between the Hinayana "emptiness derived from analysis" and the Mahayana "emptiness as reality." By analysis, I mean looking at any object and saying that it exists only because of the coming together of causes and conditions. In other words, if causes and conditions break apart, there is no object. Since this can be done with everything, nothing is eternal, unchanging or independently existent. Nothing has self-nature. This is emptiness derived from analysis. Do not be mislead by the term "analysis." It is not purely an intellectual endeavor. If it were, then the result would not generate wisdom. You must come to this undersatnding through direct experience. That is not to say one does not use the intellect at all. In fact, intellect must be involved. One first hears the analytical exposition of how things are inherently empty. One then contemplates on these concepts and through direct experience realizes their truth. Another, much rarer possibility bypasses contemplation altogether and is illustrated by stories describing the Buddha speaking such words to disciples, who, without practicing, immediately experienced enlightenment.

Practitioners of the Mahayana tradition who experience enlightenment perceive that all phenomena, in every moment, are simultaneously existent and empty. From another standpoint, one can say that Hinayana practitioners who have attained arhatship have realized the emptiness of the self and phenomena, but they have not realized the emptiness of the Dharma. They are still attached to the Dharma and use it to analyze phenomena. Mahayana practitioners let go even of the Dharma and so do not apply it to analyze things. The Heart Sutra speaks of the highest level of emptiness.

Let's move on to the next line. The five skandhas are form, sensation, perception, volition and consciousness. The Hinayana tradition places emphasis on the emptiness of the five skandhas and, since sentient beings are an aggregation of the five skandhas, the emptiness of the self. In other words, since sentient beings are composed of the five skandhas, they themselves have no self-nature. This leads Hinayana practitioners to have an aversion to the world and their practice is directed toward attaining arhatship in order to leave samsara and enter nirana. Mahayana bodhisattvas, however, perceive that the five skandhas, as well as sentient beings, are simultaneously empty and existent. Therefore, bodhisattvas neither attach to the self and phenomena nor do they avoid them. Therefore, bodhisattvas do not seek to enter nirvana; rather, they remain in samsara in ordder to help sentient beings.

Of the five skandhas, only form is part of the physical realm. The remaining four make up the mental realm. Together, the five skandhas compose all universes, all beings who inhabit them, and all phenomena. Form, the physical skandha, is sometimes divided into four elements: earth, water, wind and fire. These four elements are the components of our human body as well as the environment in which we live.

The other skandhas refer to mental activities. Here, we are limiting our discussion to human beings. Sensation is what occurs when we come into contact with the environment. Perception is the judgment or awareness of what we have interacted with. Volition is the decision or will to respond to the interaction, whether it be by thought, speech, or action.

The fifth skandha is consciousness. The consciousness skandha is much more than what we usually refer to as consciousness. In fact, the combination of sensation, perception and volition make up what we ordinarily call consciousness, that being our thought process. The fifth skandha is that which results when form, sensation, perception and volition interact. It includes the consciousness we normally refer to as cognition, but it is much more. The consciousness that is the fifth skandha is that which we define as the self. It is the "I" that holds the other four skandhas together. It is the fifth skandha which is the recipient and creator of karma. It is the fifth skandha which continues from life to life. We can say that the fifth skandha is the consequence of previous karma; and karma is that which results from the interaction of the first four skandhas. Therefore, the fifth skandha, or "I" consciousness, is self-perpetuating.

The Mind Only (Yogacara) school speaks of the sixth, seventh and eighth consciousnesses, with the eighth consciousness being the karmic storehouse for sentient beings. The sixth consciousness corresponds to sensation, perception and volition, and that ordinary part of consciousness which reasons. The eighth consciousness would correspond with the deeper levels of consciousness. The Heart Sutra, however, came before the teachings of the Mind Only school, so it makes no mention of these different levels of consciousness. It should be mentioned that consciousness without the other four skandhas cannot produce karma. In fact, if any one of the five skandhas is absent, then the entire reaction breaks down. All five skandhas are necessary for interaction.

The five skandhas are the essence of our being, and whether we intellectually grasp the concept or not, we must become disattached from them. To attain liberation, we must hear the Dharma, practice methods and contemplate the five skandhas until we directly realize their true nature.

Mahayana bodhisattvas such as Avalokitesvara perceive the five skandhas from the standpoint of emptiness as reality, that is they perceive that emptiness and existence are one and the same. Hinayana arhats focus on the aspect of emptiness. Ordinary sentient beings can only speak of emptiness from an intellectual standpoint, which is a false emptiness. They may say the five skandhas are empty, but they still have vexations and attachments.

We must practice until we develop wisdom. Hinayana arhats have developed the Eye of Wisdom, which liberates them from the self, but not from the Dharma. Mahayana bodhisattvas have the Eye of Dharma, which liberates them from all attachments. As ordinary sentient beings, we can use one of the five methods of stilling the mind, such as the contemplation of causes and conditions. Or we can use a method described in the Surangama Sutra, which is to look at any one of the five skandhas as being empty at any given moment. If you can recognize one of these five skandhas as being empty, you will perceive that the other four are also empty.

The literal meaning of the word I have translated as "perceived" is, "looking or viewing with illumination." Again, looking or viewing has many levels, depending on whether you are an ordinary sentient being, an arhat, or a bodhisattva. Illumination is wisdom, therefore the perception the sutra speaks of is limited to arhats and bodhisattvas. Ordinary sentient beings can look and may even have the proper view, but they do not have the wisdom to go along with it.

The most difficult part of the Heart Sutra to understand is now over.

The Heart Sutra

Commentary by Master Sheng-yen

This is the fifth article in a lecture series spoken by Shih-fu to students attending a special class at the Ch'an Center.

The next line of the sutra reads, "thereby transcending all sufferings." "Suffering" is actually a composite of two Chinese characters. The meanings are somewhat different, so I wish to elaborate on them.

The first Chinese term roughly translates as suffering, but the second term translates as a kind of harmful danger or calamity. We might think that in every case where there is suffering there need not be calamity, and where there is calamity there need not be suffering. For ordinary sentient beings, however, calamity always causes suffering. Where sages are concerned, this is not the case.

What is this danger, both in our daily lives and in our practice? Danger in practice refers to the obstructions that arise in your body and mind. Physically, your energy could get blocked or flow in the wrong direction. Mentally, there are all kinds of obstructions practitioners conjure. The belly of one of my students began to grow bigger while she was practicing. At first she thought that, somehow, she had gotten pregnant. She went to the hospital and they found nothing inside. It turned out to be a manifestation of her chi (energy). Actually, it was gas, not in her belly but in her skin and muscles. As a result, her belly got bigger. Eventually, she decided to get an operation to release the air, like a balloon being deflated. If she had sought my advice instead, we could have solved the problems with methods and massage.

A man practicing with a different teacher saw a gigantic spider every time he meditated. He was a frightened and angry man. This spider was a mental manifestation of his extreme emotions, but he thought it was a demon coming to torment him. When he could no longer put up with the situation, he decided to hide a large, sharp knife by his side so he could stab the spider when it came to him. His teacher told him such an action would not be compassionate. Instead, he told him to use a calligraphy brush to put a mark on the spider. When the spider came, the man marked it and it instantly disappeared. Afterward, his teacher told him to look at his own body and the man found a calligraphy mark on his belly. The man understood how close he had come to killing himself. This is an extreme story to show how the mind, in practice, can sometimes bring danger.

I need not elaborate on the dangers in our daily lives. They are everywhere. Some we call to us, others seem to come of their own accord. I'm sure all of us can relate life-threatening situations we've been in.

Now let's talk about suffering. Suffering need not be pains or aches, and pains and aches don't always cause suffering. Take pain in the legs, for instance. If it bothers you, or you try to avoid or resist it, then that is suffering. Suffering is how one reacts psychologically to life situations. Physical pain or danger often leads to suffering, but it doesn't have to. Pain is always pain, but it is not always suffering. It depends on your state of mind.

Many people suffer because they are poor (or think they are poor) and feel they don't have enough to be satisfied or happy. On the other hand, Sangha members have taken vows of poverty for centuries and they do not suffer. You can say that Sangha members choose to be poor, whereas poor people have no choice. The point is that poverty in and of itself does not automatically cause suffering. Suffering can come from many causes, but it always depends on one's mental state. If you are not at ease or your mind is unstable, there will be suffering. Conversely, if you are calm and clear, there usually will be no suffering.

There is a story in one sutra of wealthy parents who were separated from their baby boy. The boy grew under adverse conditions as a homeless, frightened beggar. When he was a young man he was reunited with his family. They took him in, loved him, fed and clothed and cared for him. Yet he never felt secure or happy. He didn't trust the turn of fortune in his life. He thought it must be a horrible trick, that they would treat him like a king for a while and then when he became comfortable with his new life, they would turn him out again or sacrifice him in some barbaric ritual. So, although he lived in lavish conditions, he suffered.

If your mind is filled with fear and doubt, then you will suffer no matter what you have or do. It isn't the environment, it's your state of mind. For some, New York City is paradise, for others it's hell. Yes, it depends on your karma whether you'll be in good conditions or not, but it's your mind that chooses to suffer.

Suffering can arise from two sources, namely, the physical and psychological. As far as the body is concerned, there are four sources of suffering: birth, aging, sickness and death. Almost no one remembers the trauma of birth, but it was a source of suffering. From the warm, comforting, floating existence of the womb we enter a world of bright lights, harsh sounds, sudden movements, where we have to feel hunger and thirst and are separated from our mothers. It's cause for suffering. However, the Buddhist concept of birth extends beyond the physical body. Every moment of existence comes into being and then vanishes. We experience birth and death all the time. Our bodies go through the process of birth and death every second we are alive.

Whether you care to admit it or not, aging begins immediately after birth. In fact, we are aging the moment after we are conceived. The birth and death of all dharmas is a fundamental principle of the universe. Our bodies and lives are not exempt from this law. The moment we come into physical being, we are already approaching death. That is clear. Aging, therefore, is not relegated to old people. It encompasses everything.

The second category is suffering of the mind. Not getting what you want, being forced to be with people and things you don't like, being separated from people and things you do like. These three situations cover just about every kind of mental suffering.

One can speak of a third source of suffering, but in actuality the other two types of suffering arise from it. This is the suffering of the five skandhas. The five skandhas forever come together, life after life.

So, it's simple. If you can recognize that all five skandhas are empty, there is no such thing as suffering. Wisdom will make clear that there is no such thing as suffering of the mind or body, because the five skandhas are empty.

When suffering is transcended, can we say that danger still exists? A person who feels no sense of suffering experiences no sense of danger. To an outsider, it may look like danger and suffering, but to the enlightened being it is not. There are numerous stories of Sakyamuni Buddha when he was still a bodhisattva. He often sacrificed his life for the sake of other beings or to learn the Dharma. In none of these stories did he consider such actions to be dangerous or a cause of suffering.

For one who sees the emptiness of the five skandhas, there is no danger or suffering. It does not mean that there is no body, no environment and no pain. That is why I tell practitioners to forget about their bodies when they meditate. If you can forget your body's problems, you will have fewer vexations. If you can forget about the problems in your mind, it would even be better. But it's a step-by-step process. The body comes first because it is easier to deal with. Next comes the mind. It is good practice when you can see your problems as illusions. You may not get enlightened, but you will certainly experience dhyana joy and Dharma happiness.

The next line begins with the name of Sariputra, the person that the Buddha is talking to. Remember, the Heart Sutra is part of the much larger Mahaprajnaparamita Sutra, which for the most part addresses the nature of emptiness. In most sutras, the Buddha addresses the questions of one or more bodhisattvas, disciples, or arhats. In the Mahaprajnaparamita Sutra, it is Subhuti, one of the Buddha's greatest disciples, who is most often addressed. The Heart Sutra is a unique part of the larger sutra, and is addressed, instead, to Sariputra. Among the Buddha's disciples, Sariputra was considered preeminent in the understanding of wisdom, whereas Subhuti was considered foremost in the understanding of emptiness. Obviously, to understand wisdom, one must also have a thorough understanding of emptiness.

The next section repeats that the five skandhas are empty in a more detailed manner. This is so because, if the Buddha were to stop after his first few sentences, people might misunderstand the meaning of emptiness. With further clarification, they would understand that the Buddha is speaking about ultimate emptiness - - emptiness as reality -- and not illusory emptiness or emptiness derived from analysis.

Editor's note: I would like to apologize for and correct a major error in last issue's (Fall 1994) article on the Heart Sutra. On page 6, second column, last paragraph, the section currently reads:

"... one can say that Hinayana practitioners who have attained arhatship have realized the emptiness of the self and phenomena, but they have not realized the emptiness of the Dharma. They are still attached to the Dharma and use it to analyze phenomena. Mahayana practitioners let go even of the Dharma and so do not apply it to analyze things."

The problem is with the term, "Dharma." Dharma with an upper case "D" refers to the teachings of Buddhism. Dharma with a lower case "d" refers to any and all phenomena, whether they be physical or mental. Furthermore, there are various gradations of dharmas, from gross to subtle. In the paragraph above, "dharma" (in the sense of subtle, constituent dharmas) should have been used instead of "Dharma." The section should read:

"... one can say that Hinayana practitioners who have attained arhatship have realized the emptiness of the self and phenomena, but they have not realized the emptiness of the subtle, constituent dharmas which, when they come toghether, form the body, mind, and other phenomena. Arhats are still attached to these elemental dharmas and use them to analyze and see into the emptiness of phenomena. Mahayana practitioners let go even of attachment to these dharmas."

Again, sorry for the gross error and I hope the new reading will offer clearer insight.

C.M.

ÉÍÍÍ

In ancient times, both in East and West, little was known of human physiology. The principal human organs were known, but not how they functioned. Quite early organs such as the liver, spleen or heart came to be identified as the physical base of the mind. When literary records begin the choice fell on the heart. This is first seen in Ancient Egypt where the heart the was seen as the centre of physical, emotional, and spiritual life and the locus of personality. As we shall see this is also the case in ancient India and the Middle East. The Buddha departed from this view. As Ven Nyanatiloka puts it: "In the canonical texts ... no [physical] base is ever localised" (Budd. Dict.). However in some places in the later Abhidhamma and in the Commentaries there was some reversion to earlier views. To understand this we have to consider first the place of the heart in the various religious traditions.

The heart was given a central place in the ancient Indian religious tradition by the Upanisadic seers. In one of the earliest Upanisads the B.rhadaara.nyaka Upanisad the seer Yaaj~navalkya sums it thus: "The heart is the world (h.rdaya.m loka.h)". He then goes on to identify the heart as the basis on which rests truth (h.rdaye hi eva satya.m), faith (h.rdaye hi eva sraddhaa), form (h.4daye hi eva ruupaa.ni), speech (vaaci), even biological existence (reta.h) [III.19.20-24]. Liberation to this seer comes when all desire that dwells in the heart is cast away (sarve pramucyante kaama ye'sya h.rdi srita.h) [IV.4.7]. The Chaandogya Upani.sad also expresses a similar idea: "... so far as the world extends so far extends the space within the heart" (yaavan vaa ayam aakaasa.h, taavaan eso'ntarh.rdayaa aakaasa.h) i.e. everything that is of significance is contained in the heart [VIII.1.3]. Similar ideas could be quoted from other Upanisads as well.

The Buddha repudiated this line of argument developed in the Upanishads. He correctly saw that emphasis on the heart as the most important base of sentient existence led to a false metaphysics and ultimately belief in the divine and of an eternal soul (atman). In fact the Chaandogya Upanisad clearly establishes this nexus between the heart and the "soul":

"Verily does the Self abide in the heart. Thus can it be explained: This one is in the heart, thereof it is the heart. He who knows this goes day by day into the heavenly world." (sa vaa esa aatmaa h.rdi, tasyitad eva niruktam h.rdi ayam iti, tasmaadd h.rdatam, ahar ahar vaa eva.m-vit savrga.m lokam eti). [VIII.3.3]

Since the Buddha emphasises the negation of atman it would follow that the heart must be emptied of its supposed content. In post-Buddhist times the Hindu tradition elaborated even more extensively the notion of heart as a seat of the soul and of the divine essence, combining it with intense devotion and faith (bhakti) in the Godhead. One of the best known of these cults was that established by Chaitanya, but it is common to most Hindu schools except perhaps the strict monist (advaitya) school. The Western world is familiar with Hindu devotionalism of the Chaitanya tradition in the Hare Krishna movement. This is an even more vulgarised development than that which we encounter in the early Upanishads.

The modern-day Bhikkhus, and others, who want to revive the heart-cult and combine it with "faith" could be considered as abandoning the Buddha's enlightening teaching and either regressing to the Upanisadic doctrine or importing the more vulgar forms of Hindu devotionalism into Buddhism. The latter is more likely as many of them are ignorant of the Upanisadic usage.

But the immediate inspiration may not be Hindu at all but Christian. It is to this tradition that we must now turn.

It is said that in the Old Testament the word heart (lev) occurs 1024 times. This prominence given to the heart was due to a fundamental ignorance of human biology. In periods of emotional stress the heart beats faster and this was taken to mean that the heart was the organ which reacted to sense stimuli and worked out the appropriate bodily response. Today we know that the heart merely reacts to electrical and chemical signals sent from the brain. But this was not known before the eighteenth century. This is seen in Yahveh's utterance about his people, "I shall put my law within them and write it on their hearts" (Jer. 31:33), which counsel itself comes from the Lord's heart (Ps 33:11). The following are a few references which show the importance which Judaism attaches to the heart. In Prov 4:23 we are told: "Keep thy heart with all diligence for out of it are the issues of life". Even wine and bread nourish "the heart of man" (Ps 104:15), In Gen 8:21 in the Covenant after the flood God claims that the "imagination of man's heart is evil from youth". The heart is seen as the locus of logical thought and memory: in Deut 29:4 it is claimed that God has given "an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear"; Moses asks that his instruction not "depart thy heart" (Deut 4:9). Of course emotions are always considered as being located in the heart: thus "Pharaoh's heart is turned against the people" (Ex 14:5) and "gladness of heart" is mentioned in Is 30:29, where it is also said "your heart shall rejoice" (Is 66:14). In the Biblical view it is not only emotion and sentiment that reside in the heart; it is in fact the seat of the mind itself.

Christianity took over this interest in the heart.

In the New Testament the Greek word kardia is used to denote the heart. There too it becomes a central term with a relative frequency not less than in the Old Testament. The early Christians are described as having "one heart and one soul" (Acts 4:32). Here we see an echo of the Upanisadic view that the heart is the abode of the soul, but it was probably arrived at independently.

In several places in the New Testament we get a clear statement of the doctrine that good and bad actions spring from the heart:

"A man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil: for of the abundance of his heart the mouth speaketh" (Lk 6:45).

"For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, theft, false witness, blasphemies" (Mat 15:19).

The view expressed here is quite contrary to the views expressed in Buddhism. When "Buddhist teachers" extol the importance of heart in generating karmically significant acts they are in fact propagating this Christian doctrine, not the Dhamma of the Buddha.

In Christianity the Heart is where the Holy Spirit lives (1 Cor 6:19). The beatitudes prefacing the Sermon on the Mount speak of those who are "pure in heart" (Mat 5:8). The heart is the source of speech: "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks" (Mat 12:34), as well as the location for the lesser emotions: "Let not your heart be troubled" (Jn 14:1). Speaking of Simon who wanted to buy the power of healing it is said: "... thy heart is not right in the sight of God"

(Acts 8:21) and the Romans speak of the "hard and impenitent heart" (Ro 2:5).

Catholicism took the heart-business one step further when it started the cult of the Sacred Heart of Jesus in the 13th century. This grew more and more grotesque as time progressed until it was given universal recognition in the Church in the 19th Century. The hagiography of Catholicism contains almost repulsive depictions of this cult especially when the "wounded heart of Jesus" is shown.

In contrast to the overwhelming importance attached to the heart in both the Brahmanical-Hindu and the Judeo-Christian traditions Buddhism has been free of this particular delusion until misguided Bhikkhus and other Western "teachers" of Buddhism began to import it into Buddhism, mainly from Christianity.

In Buddhism mind (mano, manas) is the forerunner of everything that is spiritually and karmically significant: "mano-pubbangamaa dhammaa manose.t.taa manomayaa" (Dhammapada 1). As Nyanatiloka has shown the Buddhist texts do not identify any specific human organ as the seat of mind. In Brahmanical and Judeo-Christian thinking it was the heart; the modern scientific view is that it is the brain. Where does the Pali Canon stand in this heart-brain controversy? We can answer this question in two ways. One is to examine it in terms of the literary evidence of the Canon, and the other is to examine it in terms of the central propositions of the Dhamma interpreted in terms of modern scientific and secular knowledge.

Consider first the evidence of the texts. The Pali word for heart is hadaya. This occurs very sparingly in the Pali Canon compared to its relative abundance in Upanisadic and Judeo-Christian scriptures. There are some references to the heart as a physical organ but this is often popular usage. In some places the mind is referred to as something different from the heart, e.g. in the Samyutta Nikaya where there is a reference to an "upset mind and a broken heart cittam vaa te khipissaami hadaya.m vaa te phaalessaami" (Yakkha-sa.myutta, S I, 207). But such usages may well be idiomatic. The mention of heart in a context that seems to imply that it is the seat of the mind occurs only in later writings like the Abhidhamma Pitaka and the Jataka. A good example of this kind of reference is the definition of citta and mano as given in the Dhamma-sangani, e,g, "cittam mano maanasa.m hadaya.m pandara.m" (Dhs 6, 17). There is a similar usage in the Nidessa (412). However the references found in the later Jataka (I.65, V.180, VI.349. VI.469) can be construed as being idiomatic rather than strictly doctrinal. The Buddha's reluctance to use the term "heart" in his actual discourses was not that he was unaware of the importance of this organ for physical existence but that he wanted to dissociate himself from the metaphysical meanings that had become attached to it in Brahminical-Upanisadic usage. But some reversion to the old usage occurs in some of the commentaries.

The brain is rarely mentioned in Brahmanical-Hindu or Judeo-Christian scriptures, but it does occur in the Pali Canon although not too frequently. The Pali words for "brain" listed by Buddhadatta Mahathera, one of the greatest Pali scholars of modern times, are: lasii, mati, matthalunga, and buddhi (English-Pali Dictionary). Of these the first appears to occur only in the commentaries and may be disregarded, but there are significant references to the other three to advance the view that the "brain" was considered by the Buddha to play an important role. The word mati comes from the same root as the English "mind" (via the Latin mens). Its usage in the Pali literature is seen in such terms as purisamati used to denote a man's thoughts (Vin III.138), dumati (a synonym of dupa~n~na) used to indicate foolishness (J III.83) and amalamati used to denote the "pure-minded" (which may be considered as the Buddhist equivalent of the Christian "pure in heart"). There are more references to matthalunga (Skt mastulunga) but this term seems to have been used in a purely descriptive sense to denote the physical organ rather than its role in the thought process. A typical usage is that in the Vijayasutta contained in the Uravagga of the Sutta Nipaata (v. 199). This is a typical listing of bodily organs to be used in the repulsive contemplations. A more elaborate account along these lines is contained in the Visuddhimagga (260) and shows how little of the brain was known even in Buddhaghosa's time. The references to buddhi occur throughout the Canon, as it is perhaps the most fundamental term in Buddhism. If Ven Buddhadatta Mahaathera's interpretation that buddhi could refer to the brain is accepted, then many of the references to this term could be taken to mean that the brain is the physical locus of enlightenment. A detailed examination of usages of this term in this sense cannot be undertaken in this brief essay.

The textual evidence on the heart vs. brain problem is thus hardly conclusive. Because the function of the brain was poorly understood until recent times what is important in the early Buddhist position is not the unequivocal acceptance of the brain as the base but the rejection of the earlier view of heart as the base as contained in Indian religious thought. That the Buddha was reluctant to import this concept into his system, which he could easily have done given its wide acceptance of that usage in his day, indicates that the Buddha did not accept the heart as the physical basis of the mind. There is however greater justification for the adoption of the brain as the physical focus of the mind if we are to understand the central Buddhist notions in terms of modern scientific knowledge. In the Buddhist scheme the human individual could be decomposed into five groups (pancakkhanda). The first of these the material group (rupakkhanda) need not concern us here. Three others are intimately connected with the brain. These are the group of feeling (vedana), perception (sanna) and consciousness (vinnana). The location and functioning of the remaining group (sankharakkhanda) is one of the great unknowns of Buddhism.

The interconnection of these groups can be interpreted in terms of the chain of causation (paticca-samuppada). The six bases (salayatana) play an important part in the "rebirth process". These bases are: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body (tactile sense) and "mind". To appreciate the role of the brain in this process consider how the first of these six bases, the eye or visual organ (cakkhaayatana) operates. To initiate the process there must first be contact (phassa or samphassa) with an external object. This occurs when the visual image in the form of electro-magnatic radiations strikes the retina of the eye generating electrical current. This current is then conveyed to the brain (not the heart!) via the optic nerve. These signals stimulate the visual cortex where the signals are analysed, often using pre-recorded memory (which is the input from the sixth sense organ recognised in Buddhism). It is at this stage that feeling (vedana) occurs. It is still in the brain. On the basis of this purposive actions (sankhara) can take place. Of course in almost every situation the eye-contact is accompanied by sensory input from the other sense organs where too a similar nexus is opened between the organ concerned and the brain. As we have seen the mind organ (manoindriya) plays a crucial role. This mano- indriya can only be physically located in the brain for no other candidate exists. A similar process can be postulated for the other bases.

It is true that the texts do not explain the process involved in the way our modern understanding enables us to do. Nonetheless there is nothing in them that precludes the operation of these forces which modern science has discovered. The Buddha could not use such techniques as secular knowledge of his day was very rudimentary in scientific matters. But as could be expected from a supremely enlightened person what he does say is not incompatible with scientific discovery in these areas. Had Buddhism been based on the heart-concept as Upanisadic and Judeo-Christian religion is, it would have to resort to empty metaphysical speculation to bring some rationale to its basic beliefs.

A logical corollary of giving the heart a central place in Buddhism is the view that faith is the cornerstone of Buddhist practice. The Pali word saddha (Skt sraddaa) means "confidence" not "faith". The word faith always involves an element of blind belief while the Buddha always advocated verification of all beliefs. Even for this some confidence in the doctrine or its proponent is need, and this is only what Buddhism requires. From its inception faith is an essential component of Judeo-Christian religion, but it entered Indian religion only with the Bhagavadgita where bhakti-yoga is recognised as one of the valid paths to moksha. This is a post-Buddhist development in India, and it should not be translated into Buddhism.

In popular usage thought is attributed to brain-activity while faith is usually attributed to the heart. The latter is only metaphorically true, but it could be allowed if only to distinguish it from rational thought. In Buddhism the opposition between the brain and the heart is nothing other than the opposition between panna and bhakti. While the former is the essence of Buddhism the latter has no place in Buddhist practice. Whatever practices Buddhists undertake should be based on panna and understanding, not blind devotion. This is particularly important when Buddhism is established in a new country in the modern age.

It is not surprising that those who advocate the primacy of the heart are also advocates of faith, and the practices that go with it such as rite and ritual, relic worship, idolatry, etc. Such practices are quite common in ethnic Buddhism as introduced to Western countries. The question of ethnic Buddhism has been explored elsewhere (see the author's Ethnic Buddhism and some Obstacles to the Dhamma in the West) and need not be considered in the present context.

It is important that the alleged primacy of heart and faith, and the denigration of the role of the brain in the cultivation of panna, and in Buddhist practice generally, should be refuted in the strongest terms. This is particularly true of the West where several other misconceptions about Buddhist theory and practice prevail. Already ethnic Buddhism, with its propagation of several Asian practices for which no sanction exists in the Buddha's discourses, and its crass commercialism, is doing considerable damage to the image of Buddhism in the West. This should not be compounded by the propagation of misrepresentations of the Dhamma itself.

<end of file>

The Prajnaparamita Heart Sutra

When the Bodhisattva Avalokitesvara was coursing in the deep Prajnaparamita, he perceived that all five skandhas are empty, thereby transcending all sufferings.
Sariputra, form is not other than emptiness and emptiness not other than form.
form is precisely emptiness and emptiness precisely form.
So also are sensation, perception, volition and consciousness.
Sariputra, this voidness of all dharmas is not born, not destroyed, not impure, not pure, does not increase or decrease.
In voidness there is not form,
and no sensation, perception, volition or consciousness:
no eye ear nose, tongue, body, mind;
no sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thought;
there is no realm of the eye
all the way up to no realm of mental cognition.
There is no ignorance and there is no ending of ignorance through to no aging and death and no ending of aging and death.
There is no suffering, no cause of suffering,
no cessation of suffering, and no path.
There is no wisdom or any attainment.
With nothing to attain, Bodhisattvas relying on Prajnaparamita have no obstructions in their minds.
Having no obstructions, there is no fear and departing far from confusion and imaginings, they reach Ultimate Nirvana.
All past, present and future Buddhas, relying on Prajnaparamita, attain Anuttara-Samyak-Sambodhi.
Therefore, know that Prajnaparamita is the great mantra of power,
the great mantra of wisdom, the supreme mantra
the unequaled mantra, which is able to remove all sufferings
It is real and not false.
Therefore, recite the mantra of Prajnaparamita:
Gate, Gate, Paragate, Parasamgate, Bodhi Svaha.

INTRODUCTORY NOTES TO

HSIN HSIN MING

Verses on the Faith Mind

by

The 3rd Zen Patriarch, Sengstau

These verses were given to me as a birthday present on 29 September 1982, while I was residing at Suan Mokkh Monastery in Southern Thailand They were given to me by a westerner who had been ordained as a Buddhist monk and who had painstakingly written them down by hand. There was no reference as to where he had found them and so it is not possible to give credit to the translator or publisher or ask permission for their further dissemination beyond these few words of acknowledgment.

The desire to write lengthly notes on these verses is a sign of my own attachment to them. The fact that I do not write those notes may, perhaps, be credited to some small sliver of wisdom derived from my study of them. In any case, having made what acknowledgments as are possible, I offer these verses on the Faith Mind to you, the reader, for your welfare and spiritual profit.

Peace....

Omshanti....

HSIN HSIN MING

Verses on the Faith Mind

by

The 3rd Zen Patriarch, Sengstau

The Great Way is not difficult for those who have no preferences.

When love and hate are both absent everything becomes clear and undisguised.

Make the smallest distinction, however, and heaven and earth are set infinitely apart.

If you wish to see the truth then hold no opinions for or against anything.

To set up what you like against what you dislike is the disease of the mind.

When the deep meaning of things is not understood the mind's essential peace is disturbed to no avail.

The Way is perfect like vast space when nothing is lacking and nothing is in excess.

Indeed, it is due to our choosing to accept or reject that we do not see the true nature of things.

Live neither in the entanglements of outer things nor in inner feelings of emptiness.

Be serene in the oneness of things and such erroneous views will disappear by themselves.

When you try to stop activity to achieve passivity your very effort fills you with activity.

As long as you remain in one extreme or the other you will never know Oneness.

Those who do not live in the single Way fail in both activity and passivity, assertion and denial.

To deny the reality of things is to miss their reality; to assert the emptiness of things is to miss their reality.

The more you talk and think about it, the further astray you wander from the truth.

Stop talking and thinking, and there is nothing you will not be able to know.

To return to the root is to find the meaning, but to pursue appearances is to miss the source.

At the moment of inner enlightenment there is a going beyond appearance and emptiness.

The changes that appear to occur in the empty world we call real only because of our ignorance.

Do not search for the truth; only cease to cherish opinions.

Do not remain in the dualistic state -- avoid such pursuits carefully.

If there is even a trace of this and that, of right and wrong, the Mind-essence will be lost in confusion.

Although all dualities come from the One, do not be attached even to this One.

When the mind exists undisturbed in the Way, nothing in the world can offend, and when such a thing can no longer offend, it ceases to exist in the old way.

When no discriminating thoughts arise, the old mind ceases to exist.

When thought objects vanish, the thinking-subject vanishes, as when the mind vanishes, objects vanish.

Things are objects because of the subject (mind); the mind (subject) is such because of things (object).

Understand the relativity of these two and the basic reality: the unity of emptiness.

In this emptiness the two are indistinguishable and each contains in itself the whole world.

If you do not discriminate between coarse and fine you will not be tempted to prejudice and opinion.

To live in the Great Way is neither easy nor difficult, but those with limited views are fearful and irresolute; the faster they hurry, the slower they go, and clinging (attachment) cannot be limited; even to be attached to the idea of enlightenment is to go astray.

Just let things be in their own way and there will be neither coming nor going.

Obey the nature of things (your own nature), and you will walk freely and undisturbed.

When thought is in bondage the truth is hidden, for everything is murky and unclear, and the burdensome practice of judging brings annoyance and weariness.

What benefits can be derived from distinctions and separations?

If you wish to move in the One Way do not dislike even the world of senses and ideas.

Indeed, to accept them fully is identical with true Enlightenment.

The wise man strives to no goals but the foolish man fetters himself.

There is one Dharma, not many; distinctions arise from the clinging needs of the ignorant.

To seek Mind with the (discriminating) mind is the greatest of all mistakes.

Rest and unrest derive from illusion; with enlightenment there is no liking and disliking.

All dualities come from ignorant inference. They are like dreams or flowers in air: foolish to try to grasp them.

Gain and loss, right and wrong: such thoughts must finally be abolished at once.

If the eye never sleeps, all dreams will naturally cease.

If the mind makes no discriminations, the ten thousand things are as they are, of single essence.

To understand the mystery of this One-essence is to be released from all entanglements.

When all things are seen equally the timeless Self-essence is reached.

No comparisons or analogies are possible in this causeless, relationless state.

Consider movement stationary and the stationary in motion, both movement and rest disappear.

When such dualities cease to exist Oneness itself cannot exist.

To this ultimate finality no law or description applies.

For the unified mind in accord with the Way all self-centered striving ceases.

Doubts and irresolutions vanish and life in true faith is possible.

With a single stroke we are freed from bondage; nothing clings to us and we hold to nothing.

All is empty, clear, self-illuminating, with no exertion of the mind's power.

Here thought, feeling, knowledge, and imagination are of no value.

In this world of suchness there is neither self nor other-than-self.

To come directly into harmony with this reality just simply say when doubt arises, 'Not two.'

In this 'not two' nothing is separate, nothing is excluded.

No matter when or where, enlightenment means entering this truth.

And this truth is beyond extension or diminution in time or space; in it a single thought is ten thousand years.

Emptiness here, Emptiness there, but the infinite universe stands always before your eyes.

Infinitelfy large and infinitely small; no difference, for definitions have vanished and no boundaries are seen.

So too with Being and Non-Being.

Don't waste time with doubts and arguments that have nothing to do with this.

One thing, all things: move among and intermingle, without distinction.

To live in this realization is to be without anxiety about non-perfection.

To live in this faith is the road to non-duality, because the non-dual is one with trusting mind.

Words!

The Way is beyond language, for in it there is no yesterday, no tomorrow, no today.

[This document can be acquired from a sub-directory coombspapers via anonymous FTP an
on the node COOMBS.ANU.EDU.AU]The document's ftp filename and the full directory path
thecoombspapers top level INDEX file][This version: 28 July 1993]----------TITLE: Boddhi originally has no treeAUTHOR: Hui-neng (J.Eno)SOURCE: The Ten Directions, Vol 2, No 3, October poem by the Six Zen Patriarch, Hui-neng, in response to a couplet byhis senior Shen-hsiu (J Jinshu). The Chinese text was translatedby Philip Yampolski.Boddhi originally has no tree,T has no stand.Buddha-nature is always clean andpure(or, "from the first, there is not a single is there room for dust?----------end of file

A HUMAN APPROACH TO WORLD PEACEby His Holiness Tenzin Gyatso, The Fourth Lama First published in 1984: 12,000 copies Second printing July 1985: 10,000 copies Third printing August 1987: 10,000 copies Fourth printing March 1988: 10:000 copies F April 1989: 7,500 copies ISBN 0 86171 027 4 Wisdom Publications361 Newbury Street, Bos 02115Copyright 1984 Tenzin Gyatso, the Fourteenth Dalai Lama DharmaNet Edition 1994 This electronic edition is offered for free distribution via DharmaNet by arrangem with the publisher. Transcribed for DharmaNet by Mark Blackstad DharmaNet International P.O. Box 4951, Berkeley CA 94704-4951Introduction~~~~~~~~~~~~~When w morning and listen to the radio or read the newspaper, we are confronted with the same sad crime, wars, and disasters. I cannot recall a single day without a report of something terrible somewhere. Even in these modern times it is clear that one's precious life is not safe. No for has had to experience so much bad news as we face today; this constant awareness of fear make any sensitive and compassionate person question seriously the progress of our mode ironic that the more serious problems emanate from the more industrially advanced societie technology have worked wonders in many fields, but the basic human problems remain. The literacy, yet this universal education does not seem to have fostered goodness, but only me and discontent instead. There is no doubt about the increase in our material progress and te somehow this is not sufficient as we have not yet succeeded in bringing about peace and ha overcoming suffering. We can only conclude that there must be something seriously wro progress and development, and if we do not check it in time there could be disastrous conse future of humanity. I am not at all against science and technology -- they have contributed in overall experience of humankind; to our material comfort and well-being and to our greater u the world we live in. But if we give too much emphasis to science and technology we are in touch with those aspects of human knowledge and understanding that aspire towards hones Science and technology, though capable of creating immeasurable material comfort, canno spiritual and humanitarian values that have largely shaped world civilization, in all its nationa we know it today. No one can deny the unprecedented material benefit of science and techr basic human problems remain; we are still faced with the same, if not more, suffering, fear, a Thus it is only logical to try to strike a balance between material development on the one ha development of spiritual, human values on the other. In order to bring about this great adjus to revive our humanitarian values. I am sure that many people share my concern about t worldwide moral crisis and will join in my appeal to all humanitarians and religious practition share this concern to help make our societies more compassionate, just, and equitable. I do Buddhist or even as a Tibetan. Nor do I speak as an expert on international politics (though comment on these matters). Rather, I speak simply as a human being, as an upholder of the values that are the bedrock not only of Mahayana Buddhism but of all the great world religio perspective I share with you my personal outlook-that1 universal humanitarianism is essenti global problems;2 compassion is the pillar of world peace;3 all world religions are already fo

peace in this way, as are all humanitarians of whatever ideology;4 each individual has a univ responsibility to shape institutions to serve human needs.Solving Human Problems through Human Attitudes~~~

living beings for their own selfish gains. In the end, such short-sighted actions bring suffering as well as to others. To be born a human being is a rare event in itself, and it is wise to use t opportunity as effectively and skillfully as possible. We must have the proper perspective, th universal life process, so that the happiness or glory of one person or group is not sought at of others. All this calls for a new approach to global problems. The world is becoming sm smaller -- and more and more interdependent -- as a result of rapid technological advances trade as well as increasing trans-national relations. We now depend very much on each othe problems were mostly family-size, and they were naturally tackled at the family level, but the changed. Today we are so interdependent, so closely interconnected with each other, that w universal responsibility, a feeling of universal brotherhood and sisterhood, and an understan that wereally are part of one big human family, we cannot hope to overcome the dangers to -- let alone bring about peace and happiness. One nation's problems can no longer be sati solved by itself alone; too much depends on the interest, attitude, and cooperation of other n universal humanitarian approach to world problems seems the only sound basis for world pe mean: We begin from the recognition mentioned previously that all beings cherish happiness suffering. It then becomes both morally wrong and pragmatically unwise to pursue only one's oblivious to the feelings and aspirations of all others who surround us as members of the sa
The wiser course is to think of others also when pursuing our own happiness. This will lead t
'wise self-interest,' which hopefully will transform itself into 'compromised self-interest,' or be still, 'mutual interest.' Although the increasing interdependence among nations might be exp generate more sympathetic cooperation, it is difficult to achieve a spirit of genuine cooperati people remain indifferent to the feelings and happiness of others. When people are motivate and jealousy, it is not possible for them to live in harmony. A spiritual approach may not solv political problems that have been caused by the existing self-centered approach, but in the l overcome the very basis of the problems that we face today. On the other hand, if humank approach its problems considering only temporary expediency, future generations will have t difficulties. the global population is increasing, and our resources are being rapidly depleted trees, for example. No one knows exactly what adverse effects massive deforestation will ha climate, the soil, and global ecology as a whole. We are facing problems because people ar only on their short-term, selfish interests, not thinking of the entire human family. They are n of the earth and the long-term effects on universal life as a whole. If we of the present gener think about these now, future generations may not be able to cope with them.Compassion a World Peace~~~~~~According to Buddhist psyc due to our passionate desire for and attachment to things that we misapprehend as enduring pursuit of the objects of our desire and attachment involves the use of aggression and comp supposedly efficacious instruments. These mental processes easily translate into actions, br belligerence as an obvious effect. Such processes have been going on in the human mind s immemorial, but their execution has become more effective under modern conditions. What and regulate these 'poisons' -- delusion,greed, and aggression? For it is these poisons that a almost every trouble in the world. As one brought up in the Mahayana Buddhist tradition, I love and compassion are the moral fabric of world peace. Let me first define what I mean by you have pity or compassion for a very poor person, you are showing sympathy because he compassion is based on altruistic considerations. On the other hand, love towards your wife your children, or a close friend is usually based on attachment. When your attachment chan also changes; it may disappear. This is not true love. Real love is not based on attachment, In this case your compassion will remain as a humane response to suffering as long as bein suffer. This type of compassion is what we must strive to cultivate in ourselves, and we m it from a limited amount to the limitless. Undiscriminating, spontaneous, and unlimited comp sentient beings is obviously not the usual love that one has for friends or family, which is allo ignorance, desire, and attachment. The kind of love we should advocate is this wider love th even for someone who has done harm to you: your enemy. The rationale for compassion of us wants to avoid suffering and gain happiness. This, in turn, is based on the valid feeling which determines the universal desire for happiness. Indeed, all beings are born with similar should have an equal right to fulfill them. If I compare myself with others, who are countless, others are more important because I am just one person whereas others are many. Further, Buddhist tradition teaches us to view all sentient beings as our dear mothers and to show ou loving them all. For, according to Buddhist theory, we are born and reborn countless numbe it is conceivable that each being has been our parent at one time or another. In this way all b universe share a family relationship. Whether one believes in religion or not, there is no o does not appreciate love and compassion. Right from the moment of our birth, we are under kindness of our parents; later in life, when facing the sufferings of disease and old age, we a dependent on the kindness of others. If at the beginning and end of our lives we depend upo kindness, why then in the middle should be not act kindly towards others? The developm heart (a feeling of closeness for all human beings) does not involve the religiosity we normal with conventional religious practice. It is not only for people who believe in religion, but is for regardless of race, religion, or political affiliation. It is for anyone who considers himself or he above all, a member of the human family and who sees things from this larger and longer pe a powerful feeling that we should develop and apply; instead, we often neglect it, particularly years when we experience a false sense of security. When we take into account a longer the fact that all wish to gain happiness and avoid suffering, and keep in mind our relative uni relation to countless others, we can conclude that it is worthwhile to share our possessions w

When you train in this sort of outlook, a true sense of compassion -- a true sense of love and others -- becomes possible. Individual happiness ceases to be a conscious self-seeking effo automatic and far superior by-product of the whole process of loving and serving others.
result of spiritual development, most useful in day-to-day life, is that it gives a calmness and mind. Our lives are in constant flux, bringing many difficulties. When faced with a calm and c problems can be successfully resolved. When, instead, we lose control over our minds throu selfishness, jealousy, and anger, we lose our sense of judgment. Our minds are blinded and moments anything can happen, including war. Thus, the practice of compassion and wisdom especially to those responsible for running national affairs, in whose hands lie the power and to create the structure of world peace.World Religions for World Peace~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~The principles discussed so far are in accord teachings of all world religions. I maintain that every major religion of the world -- Buddhism, Christianity, Confucianism, Hinduism, Islam, Jainism, Judaism, Sikhism, Taoism, Zoroastrian similar ideals of love, the same goal of benefiting humanity through spiritual practice, and the of making their followers into better human beings. All religions teach moral precepts for per functions of mind, body, and speech. All religions agree upon the necessity to control the un mind that harbors selfishness and other roots of trouble, and each teaches a path leading to state that is peaceful, disciplined, ethical, and wise. It is in this sense that I believe all religio have essentially the same message. Differences of dogma may be ascribed to differences o circumstance as well as cultural influences; indeed, there is no end to scholastic argument w the purely metaphysical side of religion. However, it is much more beneficial to try to implem life the shared precepts for goodness taught by all religions rather than to argue about minor in approach. There are many different religions to bring comfort and happiness to human the same way as there are particular treatments for different diseases. For, all religions ende own way to help living beings avoid misery and gain happiness. And, although we can find c preferring certain interpretations of religious truths, there is much greater cause for unity, ste the human heart. Each religion works in its own way to lessen human suffering and contribu civilization. Conversion is not the point. For instance, I do not think of converting others to Bu merely furthering the Buddhist cause. Rather, I try to think of how I as a Buddhist humanitari contribute to human happiness. While pointing out the fundamental similarities between v religions, I do not advocate one particular religion at the expense of all others, nor do I seek religion.' All the different religions of the world are needed to enrich human experience and w civilization. Our human minds, being of different caliber and disposition, need different appro peace and happiness. It is just like food. Certain people find Christianity more appealing, oth Buddhism because there is no creator in it and everything depends upon your own actions.

arguments for other religions as well. Thus, the point is clear: humanity needs all the world's suit the ways of life, diverse spiritual needs, and inherited national traditions of individual hu beings. It is from this perspective that I welcome efforts being made in various parts of th for better understanding among religions. The need for this is particularly urgent now. If all re make the betterment of humanity their main concern, then they can easily work together in h peace. Interfaith understanding will bring about the unity necessary for all religions to work t However, although this is indeed an important step, we must remember that there are no qu solutions. We cannot hide the doctrinal differences that exist among various faiths, nor can w replace the existing religions by a new universal belief. Each religion has its own distinctive to make, and each in its own way is suitable to a particular group of people as they understa world needs them all. There are two primary tasks facing religious practitioners who are con world peace. First, we must promote better interfaith understanding so as to create a workab unity among all religions. This may be achieved in part by respecting each other's beliefs an emphasizing our common concern for human well-being. Second, we must bring about a via spiritual values that touch every human heart and enhance general human happiness. This emphasize the common denominator of all world religions -- humanitarian ideals. These two us to act both individually and together to create the necessary spiritual conditions for world

We practitioners of different faiths can work together for world peace when we view differen essentially instruments to develop a good heart -- love and respect for others, a true sense
The most important thing is to look at the purpose of religion and not at the details of theolog metaphysics, which can lead to mere intellectualism. I believe that all the major religions of t contribute to world peace and work together for the benefit of humanity if we put aside subtle differences, which are really the internal business of each religion. Despite the progressiv secularization brought about by worldwide modernization and despite systematic attempts in world to destroy spiritual values, the vast majority of humanity continues to believe in one re another. The undying faith in religion, evident even under irreligious political systems, clearly demonstrates the potency of religion as such. This spiritual energy and power can be purpos bring about the spiritual conditions necessary for world peace. Religious leaders and human the world have a special role to play in this respect. Whether we will be able to achieve w or not, we have no choice but to work towards that goal. If our minds are dominated by ange the best part of human intelligence -- wisdom, the ability to decide between right and wrong.
of the most serious problems facing the world today. Individual Power to Shape Institutions~~~

children. Similarly those of the Western bloc should reduce their hatred towards of the easte the Eastern bloc is also human beings. In such a reduction of mutual hatred, the leaders of b powerful role to play. But first and foremost, leaders must realize their own and others' huma this basic realization, very little effective reduction of organized hatred can be achieved. I example, the leader of the United States of America and the leader of the Union of Soviet So suddenly met each other in the middle of a desolate island, I am sure they would respond to spontaneously as fellow human beings. But a wall of mutual suspicion and misunderstandin moment they are identified as the 'President of the USA and the 'Secretary-General of the U contact in the form of informal extended meetings, without any agenda, would improve their understanding; they would learn to relate to each other as human beings and could then try international problems based on this understanding. No two parties, especially those with a antagonism, can negotiate fruitfully in an atmosphere of mutual suspicion and hatred. I su world leaders meet about once a year in a beautiful place without any business, just to get to other as human beings. Then, later, they could meet to discuss mutual and global problems.
others share my wish that world leaders meet at the conference table in such an atmosphere and understanding of each other's humanness.To improve person-to-person contact in the w would like to see greater encouragement of international tourism. Also, mass media, particu democraticsocieties, can make a considerable contribution to world peace by giving greater interest items that reflect the ultimate oneness of humanity. With the rise of a few big powers international arena, the humanitarian role of international organizations is being bypassed an hope that this will be corrected and that all international organizations, especially the United will be more active and effective in ensuring maximum benefit to humanity and promoting int understanding. It will indeed be tragic if the few powerful members continue to misuse world UN for their one-sided interests. The UN must become the instrument of world peace. This w respected by all, for the UN is the only source of hope for small oppressed nations and henc as a whole. As all nations are economically dependent upon one another more than ever understanding must go beyond national boundaries and embrace the international communi unless we can create an atmosphere of genuine cooperation, gained not by threatened or ac but by heartfelt understanding, world problems will only increase. If people in poorer countrie the happiness they desire and deserve, they will naturally be dissatisfied and pose problems
If unwanted social, political, and cultural forms continue to be imposed upon unwilling people attainment of world peace is doubtful. However, if we satisfy people at a heart-to-heart level surely come. Within each nation, the individual ought to be given the right to happiness, a nations, there must be equal concern for the welfare of even the smallest nations. I am not s one system is better than another and all should adopt it. On the contrary, a variety of politic and ideologies is desirable and accords with the variety of dispositions within the human con variety enhances the ceaseless human quest for happiness. Thus each community should b own political and socioeconomic system, based on the principle of self-determination. Th of justice, harmony, and peace depends on many factors. We should think about them in ter in the long run rather than the short term. I realize the enormity of the task before us, but I s alternative than the one I am proposing -- which is based on our common humanity. Nations to be concerned about the welfare of others, not so much because of their belief in humanity is in the mutual and long-term interest of all concerned. An appreciation of this new reality is by the emergence of regional or continental economic organizations such as the European the Association of South East Asian Nations, and so forth. I hope more such trans-national will be formed, particularly in regions where economic development and regional stability se supply. Under present conditions, there is definitely a growing need for human understandin of universal responsibility. In order to achieve such ideas, we must generate a good and kin without this, we can achieve neither universal happiness nor lasting world peace. We canno paper. While advocating universal responsibility and universal brotherhood and sisterhood, that humanity is organized in separate entities in the form of national societies. Thus, in a re sense, I feel it is these societies that must act as the building-blocks for world peace. Attem been made in the past to create societies more just and equal. Institutions have been establ charters to combat anti-social forces. Unfortunately, such ideas have been cheated by selfis ever before, we witness today how ethics and noble principles are obscured by the shadow particularly in the political sphere. There is a school of thought that warns us to refrain from altogether, as politics has become synonymous with amorality. Politics devoid of ethics does human welfare, and life without morality reduces humans to the level of beasts. However, p axiomatically 'dirty.' Rather, the instruments of our political culture have distorted the high id noble concepts meant to further human welfare. Naturally, spiritual people express their con religious leaders 'messing' with politics, since they fear the contamination of religion by dirty

I question the popular assumption that religion and ethics have no place in politics and that persons should seclude themselves as hermits. Such a view of religion is too one-sided; it la perspective on the individual's relation to society and the role of religion in our lives. Ethics i crucial to a politician as it is to a religious practitioner. Dangerous consequences will follow politicians and rulers forget moral principles. Whether we believe in God or karma, ethics is of every religion. Such human qualities as morality, compassion, decency, wisdom, and so the foundations of all civilizations. These qualities must be cultivated and sustained through moral education in a conductive social environment so that a more humane world may emer required to create such a world must be inculcated right from the beginning, from childhood.
for the next generation to make this change; the present generation must attempt a renewal values. If there is any hope, it is in the future generations, but not unless we institute major worldwide scale in our present educational system. We need a revolution in our commitmen universal humanitarian values. It is not enough to make noisy calls to halt moral degenerat do something about it. Since present-day governments do not shoulder such 'religious' resp humanitarian and religious leaders must strengthen the existing civic, social, cultural, educa religious organizations to revive human and spiritual values. Where necessary, we must cre organizations to achieve these goals. Only in so doing can we hope to create a more stable peace. Living in society, we should share the sufferings of our fellow citizens and practice c and tolerance not only towards our loved ones but also towards our enemies. This is the tes strength. We must set an example by our own practice, for we cannot hope to convince othe religion by mere words. We must live up to the same high standards of integrity and sacrifice others. The ultimate purpose of all religions is to serve and benefit humanity. This is why it is important that religion always be used to effect the happiness and peace of all beings and n convert others. Still, in religion there are no national boundaries. A religion can and should any people or person who finds it beneficial. What is important for each seeker is to choose is most suitable to himself or herself. But, the embracing of a particular religion does not me rejection of another religion or one's own community. In fact, it is important that those who e religion should not cut themselves off from their own society; they should continue to live wit community and in harmony with its members. By escaping from your own community, you ca whereas benefiting others is actually the basic aim of religion. In this regard there are two t important to keep in mind: self-examination and self-correction. We should constantly check toward others, examining ourselves carefully, and we should correct ourselves immediately are in the wrong.Finally, a few words about material progress. I have heard a great deal of c against material progress from Westerners, and yet, paradoxically, it has been the very pride world. I see nothing wrong with material progress per se, provided people are always given my firm belief that in order to solve human problems in all their dimensions, we must combin economic development with spiritual growth. However, we must know its limitations. Althoug knowledge in the form of science and technology has contributed enormously to human welf capable of creating lasting happiness. In America, for example, where technological develop more advanced than in any other country, there is still a great deal of mental suffering. This materialistic knowledge can only provide a type of happiness that is dependent upon physica cannot provide happiness that springs from inner development independent of external facto renewal of human values and attainment of lasting happiness, we need to look to the comm heritage of all nations the world over. May this essay serve as an urgent reminder lest we fo values that unite us all as a single family on this planet.I have written the above linesTo tell m constant feeling.Whenever I meet even a 'foreigner,'I have always the same feeling:'I am me member of the human family.'This attitude has deepenedMy affection and respect for all bei natural wish beMy small contribution to world peace.I pray for a more friendly,More caring, a understandingHuman family on this planet.To all who dislike suffering,Who cherish lasting happiness--This is my heartfelt appeal._____

acknowledges the kind help of the following for sponsoring the publication of this booklet:B Foundation, Fullerton, CaliforniaAdam Engle, Boulder Creek, CaliforniaPotala Publications,

YorkThe Tibet Fund, New YorkTibet House, New YorkWisdom Publications~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
Publications is a non-profit publisher of books on Buddhism, Tibet, and related East-West th are published in appreciation of Buddhism as a living philosophy and with the specialcommit and transmit important works from all the major Buddhist traditions. If you would like more i a copy of our mail-order catalogue,and to be kept informed about future publications, please at:361 Newbury Street, Boston, MA 02115, USA.The Wisdom Trust~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~As Wisdom is dedicated to the publication of fine Dharma books for the benefit of all sentient be upon sponsorsin order to publish books like the one you are holding in your hand.If you wou a donation to the Wisdom Trust Fund to help us continue our Dharma work or receive inform opportunities forplanned giving, please write to our Boston office.Wisdom is a non-profit cha 501(c)(3) organization and a part of theFoundation for the Preservation of the MahayanaTra (FPMT).Tibet House~~~~~~~~~~~~Tibet House has been founded as a non-sectarian, educa cultural, not-for-profit institution, under the guidance of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, the spi temporal leader of the Tibetan people. Its purpose is:* To preserve as a living tradition Tibe cultural and religious heritage,* To present, as vital knowledge, Tibet's ancient traditions c philosophy, art and science, and* To share with the world community Tibet's unique contrib universal spiritual understanding and human development. Tibet House is currently see permanent residence in New York City. Through educational programs and lectures, exhibiti facilities, publishing enterprises, broadcast programming, concerts and special spiritual and events, Tibet House will stir the heart of the visitor who will encounter there the mystery, pov of Tibet.Programs~~~~~~~~~We have begun to realize Tibet House with the following progra House has co-sponsored the North American tours of several Tibetan performing arts group University Multiphonic Choir from October 1988 through February 1989; the Loseling Monas
Great Prayer Festival program, "Sacred Music, Sacred Dance," in February 1989; and the N Kalachakra Dancers from July through October, of 1989. Tibet House is working with the Institute of Buddhist Studies and the New York Open Center to present a series of seminars history, culture and religion at the Open Center. The first, in the Fall of 1987, and the second Fall of 1988, were both well attended. Major conferences on all aspects of Tibet will follow d of Tibet. In 1991 Tibet House will sponsor a series of nationwide cultural events to be cal Year of Tibet//. At the heart of this event is //Wisdom and Compassion// -- the most extensiv Tibetan art yet seen. Organized in cooperation with the Asian Art Museum of San Francisco include rare and extraordinary examples of Tibetan art and sculpture from museums and pri around the world, as well as from the personal collection of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. Ma works of art are to be displayed publicly for the first time. After its initial opening, //Wisdom a Compassion// is scheduled to travel to major art museums in Washington, New York and Ch plans are being made to present a show of Traditional Tibetan Folk Art to be seen in Los An Philadelphia and New York. Catalogues and related publications focusing on Tibetan art and developed with Harry M. Abrams, Inc. The Year of Tibet will also mark the premiere of a new opera by Philip Glass at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, based on the life of the great Tibet Milarepa. A world tour will follow. Additionally, audiences across the country will have the opportunity to see authentic Tibetan Opera, as performed by the Tibetan Institute of Perform Dharamsala, India, the capital of Tibet's government in exile. Complementing these activities newly produced narratives and documentary films, focusing on Tibet's culture and history, w national TV stations. //The Year of Tibet// will initiate the first annual Tibetan film festival.

help is needed and appreciated. Your contribution will make these programs possible. If you notified of our future events and our progress or make a tax-deductible contribution, payable House, please contact: Tibet House, 625 Broadway 12th Floor, New York, NY 10012. (212)

EDITORS FOREWORD

by Christmas Humpereys

Daisetz Teitaro Suzuki was Professor of buddhist Philosophy in Kyoto, Japan at the Otani University. He was one of the greatest authorities of Buddhist philosophy of his day. He has studied works in Sanskrit, Pali, Chinese, and Japanese. Although Professor Suzuki was not ordained a priest in any of the sects of Buddhism, he was always welcomed in any temple he visited because of his profoundness. Suzuki was among the first to write on the subject of Zen for the western world. His works include in french German and English. He was born in 1869.

This book is comprised of seven articles and lectures written by Suzuki. The articles cover a forty-seven year span of time. Here are some notes of interest about the seven articles of this text.

1.The Zen Sect Of Buddhism. This is reprinted from The Journal of the Pali Text Society in 1906. When permission was granted by Suzuki to include this article in this volume he asked that the following comment be added:

"This was written in 1906 and was the first article I have ever wrote on Zen Buddhism. It is based on traditional history of Zen as transmitted by historians. It does not include recent material later discovered in the Tung-huang MS. Few corrections have been made in light of my subsequent studies but in the main the article stands as originally written.

2. Zen Buddhism. This article is also considered an early work. It has been reprinted from Monumenta Nipponica in 1938. Suzuki says it as written before his views on Zen Buddhism were changed in the light of mature thought and recent discoveries.

3. An Interpretation of Zen Experience. This was first published for Philosophy-East and West in 1944. The paper was read in the East-West Philosophers' Conference held in the University of Hawaii during the summer of 1939.

4. Reason And Intuition in Buddhist Philosophy. This paper was taken from the Essays in East-west philosophy. It was published by the University of Hawaii Press in 1951. It was read in person by Suzuki at the second East-West Philosophers' Conference held in Honolulu in the summer of 1949. This article is regarded as by many as one of the greatest of the authors works.

